THIS BOOK
MUST NOT BE REMOVED FROM THE LIBRARY

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON LIBRARY

REFERENCE ONLY

346 Mx. North Gallery

UNIVERSITY OF LONDON LIBRARY

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2026

https://archive.org/details/weekly-law-reports_1960_1

THE WEEKLY LAW REPORTS 1960

The House of Lords

The Privy Council

The Supreme Court of Judicature

Assize Courts

and

Ecclesiastical Courts

BIBL. LONDIN. UNIV.

VOLUME 1

London

THE INCORPORATED COUNCIL OF LAW REPORTING FOR ENGLAND AND WALES

3 STONE BUILDINGS, LINCOLN'S INN, LONDON, W.C.2

Published by the Incorporated Council of Law Reporting for England and Wales · 3 Stone Buildings, Lincoln's Inn, London, W.C.2, and printed by The Eastern Press, Ltd., London and Reading

THE INCORPORATED COUNCIL OF LAW REPORTING FOR ENGLAND AND WALES

Chairman
The Hon. Mr. Justice McNair

Vice-Chairman
Sir Leslie Farrer, K.C.V.O.

EX-OFFICIO MEMBERS

The Rt. Hon. Sir Reginald Manningham-Buller, Bart., Q.C., M.P.
Attorney-General

Sir Jocelyn Simon, Q.C., M.P.
Solicitor-General

Denys T. Hicks, Esq., O.B.E., T.D., D.L.
President of The Law Society

NOMINATED MEMBERS

Lincoln's Inn
The Rt. Hon. Lord Jenkins — C. Montgomery White, Esq., Q.C.

Inner Temple
J. V. Nesbitt, Esq. — R. T. Monier-Williams, Esq., O.B.E.

Middle Temple
W. Latey, Esq., M.B.E., Q.C. — Montague L. Berryman, Esq., Q.C.

Gray's Inn
The Hon. Mr. Justice McNair — The Hon. Mr. Justice Edmund Davies

General Council of the Bar
G. W. Tookey, Esq., Q.C. — John Thompson, Esq., Q.C.

The Law Society
Sir Leslie Farrer, K.C.V.O. — Kenneth D. Cole, Esq.

CO-OPTED MEMBERS
A. G. P. Johnson, Esq. — R. E. Megarry, Esq., Q.C.

Secretary
F. G. Hudson, Esq.

Assistant Secretary
F. E. Smith, Esq.

3 Stone Buildings, Lincoln's Inn, W.C.2

EDITORS AND REPORTERS

*

Editor—R. P. Colinvaux, Barrister-at-Law

Assistant Editor—J. D. Pennington, Barrister-at-Law

*

REPORTERS

House of Lords
F. H. Cowper
J. A. Griffiths

Privy Council
Charles Clayton

Court of Appeal No. 1
B. A. Bicknell E. Dangerfield

Court of Appeal No. 2
F. R. Dymond I. G. R. Moses

Court of Appeal No. 3
M. M. Hill N. Primost

Chancery Division
K. R. A. Hart M. G. Thomas V. A. Moxon

Queen's Bench Division, Court of Criminal Appeal and Courts-Martial Appeal Court
J. D. Pennington J. F. Lamb C. J. Ellis
E. M. Wellwood

Probate and Divorce
J. B. Gardner E. Jones

Admiralty Division
B. D. J. Walsh

Restrictive Practices
J. F. Lamb N. Primost

Barristers-at-Law

HOUSE OF LORDS

Lord Chancellor: Viscount Kilmuir

Lords of Appeal in Ordinary

Lord Simonds
Lord Reid
Lord Radcliffe
Lord Tucker
Lord Cohen (retired Sept. 1960)
Lord Keith of Avonholm
Lord Somervell of Harrow (retired Jan. 1960)
Lord Denning
Lord Jenkins
Lord Morris
Lord Hodson

COURT OF APPEAL

Lord Chancellor: Viscount Kilmuir

Lord Chief Justice of England: Lord Parker of Waddington
Master of the Rolls: Lord Evershed
President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division: Lord Merriman

Sir Charles Robert Ritchie Romer (retired Jan. 1960)
Sir Frederick Aked Sellers
Sir Benjamin Ormerod
Sir Edward Holroyd Pearce
Sir Henry Gordon Willmer
Sir Charles Eustace Harman
Sir Patrick Arthur Devlin
Sir Gerald Ritchie Upjohn
Sir Terence Norbert Donovan

CHANCERY DIVISION

Lord Chancellor: Viscount Kilmuir

Sir Harry Bevir Vaisey (retired Jan. 1960)
Sir Ronald Francis Roxburgh (retired April 1960)
Sir Henry Wynn-Parry (retired Jan. 1960)
Sir Harold Otto Danckwerts
Sir George Harold Lloyd-Jacob
Sir Charles Ritchie Russell
Sir Geoffrey Cross
Sir Denys Burton Buckley
Sir John Pennycuick

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION

Lord Chief Justice of England: Lord Parker of Waddington

Sir Malcolm Hilbery
Sir Wintringham Norton Stable
Sir James Dale Cassels
Sir Gonne St. Clair Pilcher
Sir Austin Ellis Lloyd Jones
Sir Laurence Austin Byrne (retired Nov. 1960)
Sir Donald Leslie Finnemore
Sir Geoffrey Hugh Benbow Streatfeild
Sir Gerald Osborne Slade
Sir William Gorman
Sir Patrick Redmond Joseph Barry
Sir William Lennox McNair
Sir Cecil Robert Havers
Sir Colin Hargreaves Pearson
Sir William Arthian Davies
Sir Hildreth Glyn-Jones
Sir Eric Sachs
Sir John Percy Ashworth
Sir Kenneth Diplock
Sir George Raymond Hinchcliffe
Sir Gilbert James Paull
Sir Cyril Barnet Salmon
Sir Herbert Edmund Davies
Sir Richard Everard Augustine Elwes
Sir Gerald Alfred Thesiger
Sir Charles Rodger Noel Winn
Sir Fenton Atkinson
Sir Basil Nield

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION

President: Lord Merriman

Sir Hubert Joseph Wallington (retired Sept. 1960)
Sir Charles Arthur Collingwood
Sir Seymour Edward Karminski
Sir Aubrey Melford Steed Stevenson
Sir Geoffrey Walter Wrangham
Sir Joseph Bushby Hewson
Sir Henry Josceline Phillimore
Sir Archie Pellow Marshall
Sir Harry Vincent Lloyd-Jones
Sir David Arnold Scott Cairns

Attorney-General

Sir Reginald Edward Manningham-Buller

Solicitor-General

Sir Jocelyn Simon

CASES REPORTED

(VOL. 1)

A

	Page
Ackland & Pratten Ltd. (In Liquidation) v. Inland Revenue Commissioners	1117
Ackroyd & Sons v. Hasan (pet. dis.)	736
Addison v. Addison and Holden	1088
Airport Restaurants Ltd. v. Southend Corporation	880
Akerib v. Booth and Others Ltd.	454
Allen's Settlement Trusts, In re	6
Almond v. Heathfield Laundry (Birmingham) Ltd.	1339
Angus' Will Trusts, In re	1296
Ansbacher (Henry) & Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners	337

B

Bedford, decd., In re	1331
Beesly v. Hallwood Estates Ltd.	549
Best v. Glenville	1198
Black v. Black (May Intervening)	182
Black Bolt and Nut Association's Agreement, In re	884
Blatcher v. Heaysman	663
Bohnel v. Bohnel	590
Boulton, In re	140
Braithwaite v. Winwood	1257
Briggs (Henry), Son & Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners	532, 568
Brown v. National Coal Board	67
Brown v. Rolls-Royce Ltd.	210
Browne (A Bankrupt), In re	692
Bryan v. Robinson	506
Bullock v. Bullock	975
Burdett-Coutts v. Inland Revenue Commissioners	1027
Burnett & Hallamshire Fuel Ltd. v. Sheffield Telegraph & Star Ltd.	502
Buxton v. Jayne	783

C

C., 1958, No. 1950, In re	92
C. S. C., In re	304
Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner & Keeler Ltd.	1145
Carr v. Boxall	314
Ceylon University v. Fernando	223
Ching Garage Ltd. v. Chingford Corporation	947
Ching Garage Ltd. v. Chingford Corporation (pet. all.)	1185
Chung Kwok Hotel Co. Ltd. v. Field	1112
Cocke, decd., In the Estate of	491
Collins v. Collins	660
Cook v. "X" Chair Patents Co. Ltd.	60
Cook, decd., In the Estate of	353
Corfe v. Corfe	208
Corn v. Weir's Glass (Hanley) Ltd.	577
Cotterell v. Price	1097
Cracknell v. Smith	1239

D

D. (An Infant) v. Parsons	797
Davies v. Davies	1004
Daws v. Daily Sketch and Daily Graphic Ltd. Darke v. Same	126
Director of Public Prosecutions v. Milbanke Tours Ltd.	630
Dixon v. Cementation Co. Ltd.	746
Doncaster and Retford Co-operative Society's Agreement, In re	1186
Drewery and Drewery v. Ware-Lane	1204
Duple Motor Bodies Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners	510

E

Evans v. Roper	814

F

PAGE
FARR (A. E.) LTD. v. MINISTRY OF TRANSPORT 956
FEDERATION OF BRITISH CARPET MANUFACTURERS' AGREEMENT, In re 356
FEDERATION OF WHOLESALE AND MULTIPLE BAKERS' (GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND) AGREEMENT, In re 393
FERGUSON (HARRY) RESEARCH LTD. v. DAWKINS 639
FINCH v. FINCH 429
FISCHLER v. ADMINISTRATOR OF ROUMANIAN PROPERTY 917
FOX v. GENERAL MEDICAL COUNCIL 1017
FRENCH v. ELLIOTT 40

G

GARDNER v. BLAXILL 752
GODLEY v. PERRY 9
GREAT UNIVERSAL STORES LTD., In re 78
GREEN v. BOWES-LYON 176

H

HALL v. HALL 52
HAMBLEDEN'S WILL TRUSTS, In re 82
HANIVER v. HANIVER 310
HAYNES v. HAYNES AND SAWKILL 968
HEBRIDEAN COAST, THE (PET. ALL.) 861
HERBERT (ALFRED) LTD. v. HANCOCKS 271
HESZ v. SOTHEBY & CO. 285
HOLLOWAY v. DOVER CORPORATION 604
HOPKINS v. MANNERS 599
HORTON v. HORTON 987
HORWITZ v. ROWSON 803
HUGHES v. HALL 733

I

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. H. DUNNING & CO. (1946) LTD. 1106
INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. JACKSON 873
ISAAC v. HOTEL DE PARIS LTD. 239
ISAACS v. MARKET BOSWORTH R. D. C. 277

J

J., In re 253
JACOBS v. JACOBS 1236
JAQUIN v. HOLLAND 258
JEFFREY v. ROLLS-ROYCE LTD. 720
JEWISH ORPHANAGE CHARITY ENDOWMENTS TRUSTS, In re 344
JODLA v. JODLA 236
JUDD v. HAMMERSMITH, ETC., HOSPITALS BOARD 328

K

KEATS v. GRAHAM 30
KENSINGTON NORTH PARLIAMENTARY ELECTION, In re 762
KENTWOOD CONSTRUCTIONS LTD., In re 646
KIMPTON v. STEEL CO. OF WALES LTD. 527

L

LANGTON, DECD., In re 246
LEACH v. LITCHFIELD 1392
LENTON v. TREGONING 333
LESLIE v. LIVERPOOL CORPORATION 1
LEWIS v. PACKER 452
LINCOLN v. DANIELS 852
LITTLE, DECD., IN THE ESTATE OF 495
LITTLE LEIGH PAROCHIAL CHURCH COUNCIL v. CHURCH COMMISSIONERS 567
LONG v. LONG 546
LONGMUIR v. KEW 862
LOWE v. LOMBANK LTD. 196

M

PAGE
McKinley v. McKinley .. 120
Mallinson (William) & Sons (Mfg.) Ltd. v. Key Transport Co. Ltd. .. 1301
Margate Corporation v. Roach .. 1380
Marshall v. Nottingham Corporation .. 707
Mascherpa v. Direct Ltd. .. 447
Mayer v. Harte .. 770
Moore v. Gooderham .. 1308
Morgan v. Jones .. 1220
Morris Motors Ltd. v. Phelan .. 352, 566
Morris's Will Trusts, In re .. 1210
Morton v. Chaney .. 1312

N

National Association of British and Irish Millers Ltd.'s Scheme, In re .. 63
National Pig Progeny Testing Board v. Greenall .. 1265

O

Ohochuku v. Ohochuku .. 183
Onions v. Onions .. 983
Orman v. Saville Sportswear Ltd. .. 1055
Ostime (Inspector of Taxes) v. Duple Motor Bodies Ltd. (pet. all.) .. 621

P

Pachner v. Parker .. 486
Parish v. Judd .. 867
Parker v. Clark .. 286
Parker v. Ealing Borough Council .. 1398
Peak v. Burley Golf Club .. 568
Pearce v. Pearce .. 855
Pearce Duff & Co. Ltd., In re .. 1014
Pease v. George .. 427
Pemberton v. Bright .. 436
Pepper v. Pepper .. 131
Phenol Producers' Agreement, In re .. 464
Piddock v. Clifford Products Ltd. .. 1383
Practice Direction (Address of Petitioner) .. 548
Practice Direction (Appearance) .. 494
Practice Direction (Costs) .. 114, 125
Practice Direction (Court of Protection) .. 17, 1253
Practice Direction (Drawing Up of Orders) .. 1166
Practice Direction (Guardianship of Infants) .. 744
Practice Direction (Jury Actions) .. 658
Practice Direction (Maintenance) .. 566
Practice Direction (Minutes of Order) .. 1168
Practice Direction (Patents) .. 1272
Practice Direction (Powers of Masters) .. 1195
Practice Direction (Review of Taxation) .. 1142, 1194, 1226
Practice Direction (Trustee's Absence) .. 355
Prenn's Settlement, In re .. 1248
Price v. Romilly .. 1360

Q

Quintas v. National Smelting Co. Ltd. .. 217

R

Ramia (Edward) Ltd. v. African Woods Ltd. .. 86
Reg. v. Agricultural Land Tribunal for South Eastern Area. Ex parte Bracey .. 911
Reg. v. Bennett. Ex parte Radburn .. 102
Reg. v. Chapman .. 147
Reg. v. Dangerfield .. 268
Reg. v. Davey .. 1287
Reg. v. Dawson .. 163
Reg. v. Edmonton Justices. Ex parte Brooke .. 697
Reg. v. Golder .. 1169
Reg. v. Governor of Parkhurst Prison. Ex parte Philpot .. 115
Reg. v. James .. 812
Reg. v. Keeley .. 749

PAGE

REG. v. LEWES JUSTICES. Ex parte PLUMPTON AND DISTRICT CLUB TRUSTEES 700
REG. v. LIVERPOOL JUSTICES. Ex parte ROBERTS 585
REG. v. MINISTER OF HOUSING AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT. Ex parte CHICHESTER R. D. C. .. 587
REG. v. MORDANAM 7
REG. v. NICHOLLS 658
REG. v. NOTTINGHAM JUSTICES. Ex parte BROWN 1315
REG. v. REGISTRAR OF BUILDING SOCIETIES. Ex parte A BUILDING SOCIETY 669
REG. v. STALLY 79
REG. v. WENLOCK 163
REG. v. WILLIS 55
REG. v. WOODBURY LICENSING JUSTICES. Ex parte ROUSE 461
ROBERTSON'S WILL TRUSTS, In re 1050
ROBINS v. ROBINS 1089
RORKE (H. J.) LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS 1132
ROSSAGE v. ROSSAGE 249
ROUTH'S TRUSTEES v. CENTRAL LAND BOARD 737, 1388
ROYAL MUTUAL BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETY, In re 1143
RUSHTON v. TURNER BROTHERS ASBESTOS CO. LTD. 96

S

ST. GEORGE'S, BIRMINGHAM, In re 1069
SAMSON v. SAMSON 190
SCOTT v. SCOTT (QUINE CITED) 915
SCREMBY CORN RENTS, In re 648, 1227
SEISTAN, THE 186
SERVERS OF THE BLIND LEAGUE, In re 564
SHINDLER v. NORTHERN RAINCOAT CO. LTD. 1038
SHORT v. SHORT 833
SMITH v. HUGHES 830
SOFAER v. SOFAER 1173
STANTON v. EWART F. YOULDON LTD. 543
STIRLAND v. STIRLAND 18
STROUD BUILDING SOCIETY v. DELAMONT 431

T

TAYLOR v. MUNROW 151
THOMPSON'S WILL TRUSTS, In re 1165
TICKNER v. HEARN 1406
TINKER'S SETTLEMENT, In re 1011
TREPCA MINES LTD., In re 24, 1273
TRUNDLE, DECD., In re 1388
"TRUTH" (N.Z.) LTD. v. HOLLOWAY 997
TUKER v. MINISTRY OF AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD 819

U

ULLAH v. HALL LINE LTD. 1320
UNION OF INDIA v. COMPANIA NAVIERA AEOLUS S.A. 297
UNITY THEATRE SOCIETY LTD. v. SPEIDEL (PET. ALL.) 985

V

VAUGHAN v. BIGGS 622
VERNAZZA, In re (PETS. DIS. AND ALL.) 139
VICTORY (EX-SERVICES) ASSOCIATION LTD. v. PADDINGTON BOROUGH COUNCIL 106
VUMA LTD., In re 1283

W

WARE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. GAUNT 1364
WESSANEN'S KONINKLIJKE FABRIKIEN v. ISAAC MODIANO BROTHER & SONS LTD. 1243
WESTCOTT v. STRUCTURAL AND MARINE ENGINEERS LTD. 349
WHITEHOUSE v. BOARD OF CONTROL 1093
WHOLESALE CONFECTIONERS ALLIANCE'S AGREEMENT, In re 1417
WILLAN v. WILLAN 624
WILLIAMS v. SETTLE 1072
WILSON v. WREXHAM CORPORATION 319
WINE SHIPPERS (LONDON) LTD. v. BATH HOUSE SYNDICATE LTD. 613, 989
WOYNO v. WOYNO 986
WRING, In re (PRACTICE NOTE) 138

Z

ZALIHE VELI v. SEVIM ISMAIL 1254

SUBJECT-MATTER

(VOL. 1)

ADMINISTRATIVE OR JUDICIAL ACT

Quarter sessions

Order varying corn rents under Inclosure Act

No obligation to hear parties—Whether judicial decision—Whether power to state case—Inclosure Act, 1801 (Scremby). In re Scremby Corn Rents, Divl.Ct. 648.

ADOPTION

Adoption order

Child in possession of mother on three occasions

Whether "continuously in the care and possession" of applicants—Refusal of consent by mother—Duty of justices to consider possible legitimation of child—Whether power to order applicants to retain child pending appeal—Adoption Act, 1958, ss. 3 (1), 35 (3). In re C. S. C., Roxburgh J. 304.

AGENCY

Estate agent

Commission

"Prospective purchaser"—Meaning—Contract by vendor to pay commission if and when prospective purchaser signs estate agents' purchaser's agreement and vendor signs vendor's agreement—Agreements signed by prospective purchaser and vendor—Prospective purchaser unable to purchase without mortgage—Termination of negotiations for sale by vendor—Whether estate agents entitled to commission. Drewery v. Ware-Lane, C.A. 1204.

AGRICULTURE

Agricultural holding

Notice to quit

Reasons stated—Failure to remedy breaches of tenancy—Reference to arbitration of one reason under previous notice to quit—Whether second reason premature—Validity of notice to quit—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, ss. 24 (2) (d), 26 (1) (a) (d)—Agricultural (Control of Notices to Quit) Regulations, 1948, regs. 4, 5 and 7. French v. Elliott, Paull J. 40.

Agricultural land tribunal

Issue of sound management

Tenant's personal fortunes as farmer not to be considered—Discretion of tribunal—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, s. 25 (1) (b)—Agriculture Act, 1958, s. 3 (2). Evans v. Roper, Divl.Ct. 814.

Agricultural marketing

Scheme

"Scheme regulating the marketing of an agricultural product"—Apple and Pear Publicity Scheme—Prohibition on sales by unregistered producers—Discretionary powers of board as to advertising, distribution and sales to authorised merchants—Whether scheme "regulating the marketing"—Agricultural Marketing Act, 1931, ss. 1 (1) (8), 5 (as amended by the Agricultural Marketing Act, 1933, ss. 19, Sch. 3), 6 (1)—Agricultural Marketing Act, 1958, ss. 1 (1), 2 (7), 6 (1) (2), 7 (1), 8 (1). Tuker v. Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, C.A. 819.

Deficiency payments

Nature

Whether part of "price" of wheat for purposes of tithe corn rents—Cereals (Deficiency Payments) Order, 1955, arts. 3, 4. In re Scremby Corn Rents, C.A. 1227.

AIRCRAFT

Carriage by air

Nationalisation

Private aircraft company—Flights organised by association for own members—Public becoming members of association to participate in tours—"Scheduled journey"—Meaning—Air Corporations Act, 1949, s. 24. Director of Public Prosecutions v. Milbanke Tours Ltd., Divl.Ct. 630.

ANIMAL

Dog

Control

Complaint—Information laid against owner that dog was dangerous and not kept under proper control—Order by justices that dog to be kept under proper control—Whether proceedings correctly instituted—Dogs Act, 1871, s. 2. Reg. v. Nottingham Justices. Ex parte Brown, Divl.Ct. 1315.

ARBITRATION
Arbitrator
Misconduct
Waiver—Two arbitrators appointed under rules of trade association—Disagreement—Appointment of umpire—Status of arbitrators before umpire—Extent of authority.
Wessanen's Koninklijke Fabrikien v. Issac Modiano Brother & Sons Ltd., Diplock J. 1243.

BANKRUPTCY Debt
Proof of debt
Application to expunge proof—Commission agent's proof of debt for money due on taking accounts—Debtor and creditor dead—Whether debtor's statement of affairs admissible against trustees of creditor's estate—Whether gaming debt—Burden of proof—Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 141, Sch. II, r. 24. In re Browne (A Bankrupt), Cross J. 692.

BARRISTER Discipline
Bar Council
Whether complaint to Council absolutely privileged. Lincoln v. Daniel, Salmon J. 852.

BASTARDY Corroboration Opportunity
Evidence given in support of complainant's evidence—Mere evidence of opportunity—No evidence given by defendant—Whether defendant's silence can amount to corroboration—Whether statute satisfied—Affiliation Proceedings Act, 1957, s. 4 (2).
Cracknell v. Smith, Divl.Ct. 1239.

BUILDING
Contract
I.C.E. form
Engineer's certificate—Reference of "dispute" to arbitration—No reference to arbitration "except as to the withholding by the engineer of any certificate . . . until after "the completion . . . of the works unless with . . . consent of the employer and the "contractor"—Refusal by engineer to include certain claims not in certificate—Whether "dispute"—Whether certificate withheld.
A. E. Farr Ltd. v. Ministry of Transport, Buckley J. 956.

Safety regulations
"Hand-rail" or "guard-rail"
Meaning of—Factories Act, 1937, s. 25 (2)—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1145), reg. 27 (1) (2).
Corn v. Weir's Glass (Hanley) Ltd., C.A. 577.
"Temporary platform"
Fixed structure temporarily used as working place—Whether breach of statutory duty—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 24 (1) (5) (d).
Westcott v. Structural and Marine Engineers Ltd., Lord Parker C.J. 349.

BUILDING SOCIETY
Order against advertisement for capital
Hearing of representations by society
Determination by registrar to make order—Information subsequently received—Whether registrar's decision affected—Whether capacity of registrar quasi-judicial or administrative—Whether publication of society's name should be withheld—Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act, 1958, s. 11 (1) (2) (3).
Reg. v. Registrar of Building Societies. Ex parte A Building Society, Divl.Ct. & C.A. 669.

BURDEN OF PROOF
Husband and wife
Wilful neglect to maintain Justices. Stirland v. Stirland, Divl.Ct. 18.

CAPITAL OR INCOME
Administration or trust
Debentures
Scheme of arrangement—Statement by company that principal secured and interest accrued should be satisfied by payment of cash and securities—Whether binding as between tenant for life and remainderman—Whether payment apportionable.
In re Morris's Will Trusts, Cross J. 1210.
Parliamentary election
Breach of rules
Whether burden rests on respondent to prove compliance.
In re Kensington North Parliamentary Election, Election Ct. 762.

CAUSATION

Breach of statutory duty

Contributory negligence

Dangerous machinery—Deliberate act of folly by plaintiff—Personal injury.
Rushton v. Turner Brothers Asbestos Co. Ltd., Ashworth J. 96.

Onus of proof

Lack of hand-rail for stairs—Fall. Corn v. Weir's Glass (Hanley) Ltd., C.A. 577.

CHARITY

Investments

Variation of powers

Whether power to alter scheme includes power to enlarge investment clause.
In re Jewish Orphanage Charity Endowments Trusts, Cross J. 344.

Rules

Alteration

Charity established by scheme—Power to alter scheme provided that no "deviation from "the main principles"—Purported alteration of investment clause—Whether power to alter investment clause—Whether permitted range of investments one of "main prin-"ciples" of scheme.
In re Jewish Orphanage Charity Endowments Trusts, Cross J. 344.

COMPANY

Capital

Defective special resolution—Short notice—Second resolution for payment of premium on paid off preference shares submitted to meeting—Written consent by shareholders to second resolution—Whether effective to cure defect in initial notice—Subsequent consent by all shareholders to both resolutions being treated as valid—Whether sufficient basis for confirmation of reduction of capital—Companies Act, 1948, s. 14 (2).
In re Pearce, Duff & Co. Ltd., Buckley J. 1014.

Reduction

Practice—Scheme of arrangement and reduction of capital—Petition for sanction of court—Whether necessary to aver that company carrying on business—Companies Act, 1948, s. 206. In re Great Universal Stores Ltd., Roxburgh J. 78.

Private company

Exempt private company

Settlement of sum of money by principal shareholder—Settlor's shares in company subsequently brought into settlement by purchase with part of settled sum—Whether "will "or family settlement disposing of the shares . . ."—Companies Act, 1948, ss. 127, 129 (1) (2) (a), Sch. 7, para. 3 (1) (b) (2) (b).
In re Prenn's Settlement, Cross J. 1248.

Director

Managing Director

Service agreement for ten years—Resolution of company removing from directorship and terminating appointment as managing director.—Whether breach of contract—Companies Act, 1929, Sch. I, Table A, art. 68.
Shindler v. Northern Raincoat Co. Ltd., Diplock J. 1038.

Winding up

Appeal from liquidator

Rejection of proof by liquidator—Power of appellate court.
In re Trepca Mines Ltd., C.A. 1273.

——— Whether court should consider rights of claimant in light of evidence before liquidator—Whether matter to be considered de novo—Companies (Winding-Up) Rules, 1949, r. 108.
In re Kentwood Constructions Ltd., Buckley J. 646.

Costs

Petition abandoned—Whether company entitled to order dismissing petition with costs—Companies (Winding-Up) Rules, 1949, r. 33.
In re Royal Mutual Benefit Building Society, Pennycuick J. 1143.

Petition

Judgment creditor's petition for compulsory winding up—Opposition by majority of creditors—No evidence supporting opposition—Company insolvent and without assets—Whether opposition of majority conclusive—Discretion of court—Companies Act, 1948, s. 346. In re Yuma Ltd., C.A. 1283.

Void dissolution

Bequest to company after dissolution—Application for declaration that dissolution void—Whether discretion of court should be exercised—Charity—Companies Act, 1948, s. 352.
In re Servers of the Blind League, Pennycuick J. 564.

COMPULSORY PURCHASE

Compensation

Expired lease

Notice to treat during term—No claim until lease expired—Validity—Whether any interest expropriated. Holloway v. Dover Corporation, C.A. 604.

CONFLICT OF LAWS

Foreign judgment

Immovables

Mineral action involving mining rights—Action to enforce.
In re Trepca Mines Ltd., C.A. 1273.

CONTEMPT OF COURT

Appeal

Civil contempt

Refusal of committal order—Jurisdiction of Court of Appeal—Discretion or substantive law.
Lenton v. Tregoning, C.A. 333.

Witnesses

Civil

Passing-off action—Application to rectify Register of Trade Marks—Statement to persons engaged in the trade that defendant entitled to trade marks—Whether likely to deter possible witnesses from giving evidence—Whether contempt.
Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner & Keeler Ltd., Russell J. 1145.

CONTRACT

Construction

Power to amend terms unilaterally

Pension scheme—" Unforeseen circumstances."
Alfred Herbert Ltd. v. Hancocks, Cross J. 271.

Exceptions clause

Negligence

Tenancy agreement — Landlord not " in any circumstances " responsible for damage caused by water—Damage to tenant's goods by water escaping from cistern in water closet retained in landlord's possession—Landlord's liability for negligence.
Akerib v. Booth Ltd., Jones J. 454.

Formation

Intention to create legal relationship

Family arrangement—Sharing home—Agreement by plaintiffs to leave their own home and share home of defendants and by defendants to devise their house to female plaintiff.
Parker v. Clark, Devlin J. 286.

No intention to create new obligations

Intention to give effect to believed existing rights—Mistake of law—Whether new contract created.
Beesly v. Hallwood Estates Ltd., Buckley J. 549.

Illegality

Landlord and tenant

Agreement—User requiring planning permission—Undertaking by tenant during negotiations for letting to apply for permission — Planning permission refused — Whether agreement to let before permission obtained void for illegality — Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, ss. 12 (1), 23 (1), 24 (3).
Best v. Glenville, C.A. 1198.

Termination

Family agreement

Sharing home—Promise of bequest by owners—Whether agreement for their lives.
Parker v. Clark, Devlin J. 286.

COSTS

" Bullock " order

" Bullock " or Sanderson order

Discretion of court—County court—Action against three defendants—Judgment against insolvent defendant—Whether unsuccessful defendant should pay costs of successful defendants—Whether plaintiff should pay costs of successful defendants with right to recover from unsuccessful defendant.
Mayer v. Harte, C.A. 770.

County court action

Payment into court with fixed costs accepted

Accepted by plaintiff but subsequent application for " further costs " — Costs incurred before issue of summons—Discretion of court—Refusal to allow amendment of incomplete bill—County Court Rules, 1957, amended by County Court (Amendment) Rules, 1959, Ord. 11, r. 1 (3) (c).
Hopkins v. Manners, C.A. 599.

Justices

Crown practice

Liability of justices for costs—Certiorari—General practice.
Reg. v. Liverpool Justices. Ex parte Roberts, Divl.Ct. 585.

Taxation

Application to review

Chancery Division—Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959 (S.I. 1959, No. 1958, Sch. 2), s. 35.
Practice Direction 1194.

Order for

Form—Chancery Division—Originating summons—Construction of document or variation of trust.
Practice Direction, Ch.D. 114.

COUNTY COURT

High Court

Action transferred

Jurisdiction of county court—Action for unliquidated damages begun in High Court—Agreement contained in letters between parties to transfer action to county court—No express abandonment by plaintiff of excess of claim over £400—Consent order by master to transfer—No statement in order of provision under which master acted—Whether jurisdiction of county court unlimited—Agreement not in existence when summons to transfer issued—Agreement not filed until after judgment—Whether county court deprived of jurisdiction—County Courts Act, 1934, ss. 43, 45, 65—County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 16, r. 10 (2) (b)—County Courts Act, 1959, ss. 41, 42, 45, 67.
Williams v. Settle, C.A. 1072.

COURT OF APPEAL

Appeal out of time

Legally aided case

Notice of appeal should be filed without waiting for the grant of legal aid.
Addison v. Addison and Holden, C.A. 1088.

County court

Appeal from

Claim exceeding £200—Form of plaint—County Courts Act, 1934, ss. 40, 41—County Courts Act, 1955, ss. 1, 12. Leslie v. Liverpool Corpn., C.A. 1.

Jurisdiction—Fact, question of—Claim exceeding £200—Claim for damages originally exceeding £200 amended to reduce claim to less than £200 — Prayer for damages "limited to £400"—Third party proceedings by defendants for indemnity—Whether claim as between defendants and third party an action for damages exceeding £200 – Whether third party entitled to appeal on question of fact—County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 12, r. 3 (2)—County Courts Act, 1959, s. 109.
William Mallinson & Sons (Mfg.) Ltd. v. Key Transport Co. Ltd., C.A. 1301.

Discretion of judge, matter within

Application for jury

Whether court will interfere with judge's decision. Pease v. George, C.A. 427.

Jurisdiction

New Act after hearing below

Whether applicable on appeal—Powers of highway authority—Declaration—Highways Act, 1959. Ching Garage Ltd. v. Chingford Corpn., C.A. 947.

——————————— Procedural or substantive point — Act against vexatious litigants—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, ss. 27 (1), 51 (1)—Supreme Court of Judicature (Amendment) Act, 1959, s. 1 (1).
In re Vernazza, H.L.(E.) (pets. dis. and all.) 139.

CRIME

Aiding and abetting

Continuing offence

Taking and driving away motor-vehicle—Accessory to driving away only.
Reg. v. Stally, C.C.A. 79.

Evidence

Offences by driver of motor-cycle—Sitting on pillion—No evidence of joint enterprise—Road Traffic Act, 1930, ss. 28 (1), 35 (1). D. (An Infant) v. Parsons, Divl.Ct. 797.

Conspiracy

Complicated charge

"Rolled-up" charge—Undesirability. Reg. v. Davey, C.C.A. 1287.

Undesirability—Whether one conspiracy—Substantive charge to be considered first.
Reg. v. Dawson, C.C.A. 163.

Court of Criminal Appeal

Substitution of verdict

Alternative counts—Convictions on both—No rule that lesser charge should be preferred—Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, s. 5 (2). Reg. v. Dawson, C.C.A. 163.

Evidence

Depositions

Incriminating evidence by prosecution witness on deposition before committing magistrates—Contradictory evidence at trial—Witness treated as hostile—Refusal to admit truth of deposition—Whether jury entitled to rely on original statement.
Reg. v. Golder, C.C.A. 1169.

Hearsay

Admissible to show fact that statement was made—Charge of stealing—Defendant's lack of candour with police after commission of offence—Conversation between defendant and co-defendant before defendant's interviews with police—Evidence of conversation sought to be adduced by defendant—Whether admissible as evidence of defendant's state of mind at time of interviews, to explain his conduct. Reg. v. Willis, C.C.A. 55.

Previous testimony of accused

Bankruptcy proceedings, in—Admissibility—Larceny Act, 1916, ss. 20, 43 (2) (3).
Reg. v. Dawson, C.C.A. 163.

CRIME—continued.

Fraud

Credit by, obtaining

Sale—Agreement for—Price paid—Goods not delivered. Reg. v. Dawson, C.C.A. 163.

Indictment

Duplicity

Two separate offences charged in one count—Larceny Act, 1916, ss. 26 (1), 27 (2). Reg. v. Nicholls, C.C.A. 658.

Need for few counts

Inclusion of charges rejected at preliminary inquiry—Undesirability—Conspiracy count joined with substantive counts—Undesirability. Reg. v. Dawson, C.C.A. 163.

Practice

Sentence

Preventive detention—Prison Commissioners' report—Copy of report not shown to prisoner—Effect on sentence—Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21 (4) (5). Reg. v. Governor of Parkhurst Prison. Ex parte Philpot, Divl.Ct. 115.

Sentence

Borstal training

Vagrancy — Probation order — Breach — Three months' maximum sentence for vagrancy offence—Whether Borstal appropriate sentence—Vagrancy Act, 1824, s. 4. Reg. v. James, C.C.A. 812.

Probation order

Breach—Charge of—Breach found by justices—Remand to quarter sessions—Whether certificate of justices conclusive—Procedure—Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 6 (4). Reg. v. Chapman, C.C.A. 147.

——— New probation order while former order not discharged—Subsequent breach of both probation orders—Preventive detention imposed in respect of breach of first probation order—Whether sentence valid—Whether and for what purposes first probation order effective after making of second probation order. Reg. v. Keeley, C.C.A. 749.

Supervision order

Twelve months or more sentence—Two offences—Consecutive sentences of nine months in respect of each—Whether sentence of twelve months or more—Power of court to make order to notify address on discharge—Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 22. Reg. v. Mordanam, C.C.A. 7.

Verdict of jury

Unanimity

Need for—Judge's direction. Reg. v. Davey, C.C.A. 1287.

CROWN PRACTICE

Certiorari

Costs

Successful application to quash conviction—Application not resisted by prosecutor—No appearance by prosecutor—Whether costs may be awarded against non-appearing party. Reg. v. Liverpool Justices. Ex parte Roberts, Divl.Ct. 585.

Error of law on face of record

Agricultural land tribunal—Evidence wrongly admitted—No error of law on face of record—Inadmissibility of affidavit evidence. Reg. v. Agricultural Land Tribunal for South Eastern Area. Ex parte Bracey, Divl.Ct. 911.

Inferior tribunal

Jurisdiction—Evidence—Admissibility of affidavit evidence. Reg. v. Lewes Justices. Ex parte Plumpton & District Club Trustees, Divl.Ct. 700.

Registrar of Building Societies—Order against society advertising for capital—Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act, 1958, s. 11 (1) (2) (3). Reg. v. Registrar of Building Societies. Ex parte A Building Society, Divl.Ct. & C.A. 669.

CYPRUS

Hotchpot

Undisposed residue

Surviving children of predeceased son—Whether advance by deceased to son to be brought into hotchpot by son's children—" Share "—Cyprus Wills and Succession Law (c. 220), 1942, ss. 49, 51 Zalihe Veli v. Sevim Ismail, J.C. 1254.

DAMAGES

Exemplary

Copyright, breach of Sale of photographs of murdered father of plaintiff's pregnant wife—Conduct rendering possible vulgar and offensive behaviour by national newspapers—Scandalous conduct and flagrant breach by defendant—Whether jurisdiction to award exemplary damages—Copyright Act, 1956, s. 17 (3). Williams v. Settle, C.A. 1072.

DAMAGES—continued.
Mitigation
Service agreement
When duty to mitigate arises—Reasonableness of offer.
Shindler v. Northern Raincoat Co. Ltd., Diplock J. 1038.

Personal injuries
Disability pension
Compulsory contributor to statutory superannuation fund—Injuries resulting in inability to work—Superannuation before normal retirement age—Whether pension to be set off against loss of wages.
Judd v. Hammersmith, etc., Hospitals Board, Finnemore J. 328.

DEED Execution
Escrow
Intention to execute in duplicate — Execution of one part conditional on execution of counterpart—Whether delivery imported.
Beesly v. Hallwood Estates Ltd., Buckley J. 549.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW
Faculty
Demolition of church
Jurisdiction. In re St. George's, Birmingham, Salt Q.C. Ch. 1069.

Union of benefices
Scheme
Compliance by scheme framing authorities with statutory requirements—Jurisdiction of Judicial Committee to consider proposed scheme de novo and on its merits—Union of Benefices Measure, 1923, s. 10 (3) (5)—Pastoral Reorganisation Measure, 1949, s. 3 (2).
Little Leigh Parochial Church Council v. Church Comrs., J.C. 567.

EDUCATION University
Discipline
Domestic commission of inquiry—Duty to comply with natural justice.
Ceylon University v. Fernando, J.C. 223.

ESTOPPEL Conduct, by Contract
Promise inducing—Unenforceable contract—No detriment to promisee—Whether promise can render enforceable. Beesly v. Hallwood Estates Ltd., Buckley J. 549.

Husband and wife
Bigamy—Circumstances fully disclosed to other spouse at marriage.
Bullock v. Bullock, Divl.Ct. 975.

Motor car
Hire-purchase—Signature of hire-purchase documents unread—Effect.
Lowe v. Lombank Ltd., C.A. 196.

Per rem judicatam
Maintenance—Quantum—Attachment of earnings order—Subsequent proceedings.
Pepper v. Pepper, Probate 131.

Mortgage
Assignment of policy of assurance to mortgagee
Covenant by mortgagor to pay premiums—Premiums in arrears—Mortgagee's agreement to reinstatement of policy—Whether mortgagee estopped from exercising power of sale.
Braithwaite v. Winwood, Cross J. 1257.

EVIDENCE Affidavit
Hearsay
Scandalous hearsay allegations—Admissibility on application to suspend mother's access to child—R.S.C., Ord. 38, rr. 3, 11. Rossage v. Rossage, C.A. 249.
Ward of court—Statement of information and belief—Whether admissible in application to take ward out of jurisdiction—R.S.C., Ord. 38, rr. 3, 11.
In re J. (An Infant), Cross J. 253.

Cross-examination
Material unproved, on Discretion of advocate. Fox v. General Medical Council, J.C. 1017.

Deceased's statement
Bankrupt
Statement of affairs—Whether admissible—Whether a "deposition"—Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 141. In re Browne (A Bankrupt), Cross J. 692.

Denial
Prior denial of charge to friend
Whether admissible—Recent invention alleged.
Fox v. General Medical Council, J.C. 1017.

EVIDENCE—continued.
Privilege
Justices' clerk
Note of evidence in other proceedings. McKinley v. McKinley, Wrangham J. 120.

FACT OR LAW
Income tax
Profits of trade
Work in progress—Method of valuation.
Duple Motor Bodies v. Inland Revenue Comrs., C.A. 510.
Negligence
Standard of care
Always a question of fact. Brown v. Rolls Royce Ltd., H.L.(Sc.) 210.

FACTORY
Dangerous machinery (fencing)
Duty to guard against acts reasonably foreseeable Hand deliberately placed in position of danger—Effective cause of accident—Factories Act, 1937, s. 14 (1). Rushton v. Turner Brothers Asbestos Co. Ltd., Ashworth J. 96.

Fence, extent of duty to Handrail three feet high—Gap of eighteen inches—Overhead travelling cable way—Buckets suspended from cable—Whether cable way "machinery" requiring to be fenced—Factories Act, 1937, s. 14 (1).
Quintas v. National Smelting Co. Ltd., Devlin J. 217.
Vehicle
Truck used for carrying materials produced in factory—Workman injured by revolving fan of truck engine while adjusting oil feed—Whether truck "any machinery" requiring to have all dangerous parts fenced—Meaning of "any machinery"—Factories Act, 1937, s. 14 (1). Cherry v. International Alloys Ltd., C.A. 563.

Staircase
Handrails
Meaning of "staircase"—Three steps wedged into platform—Factories Act, 1937, s. 25 (2).
Kimpton v. Steel Company of Wales Ltd., C.A. 527.

FATAL ACCIDENTS ACTS
Damages
Funeral expenses
Tombstone—Erection of memorial over grave six months after funeral—Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, ss. 1 (2) (c), 2 (3).
Stanton v. Ewart F. Youldon Ltd., McNair J. 543.

FIREARM Certificate
Ambit
"Sporting purposes"—Loan to person not holding certificate with instructions to shoot rats—Firearms Act, 1937, s. 4 (7). Morton v. Chaney, Divl.Ct. 1312.
Meaning
"Lethal . . . weapon"
Airgun—Gun capable of causing serious injury only when misused by firing it at close range at vulnerable part of body—Least powerful type of airgun obtainable—Whether lethal weapon—Firearms Act, 1937, ss. 19 (1), 32 (1).
Moore v. Gooderham, Divl.Ct. 1308.

GAMING Betting
Promise to pay
Debtor and creditor both dead—Onus of proving whether debt is enforceable—Proof of debt admitted by debtor's trustee in bankruptcy.
In re Browne (A Bankrupt), Cross J. 692.

HABEAS CORPUS
Criminal cause or matter
Prisoner serving sentence
Application by—Practice. In re Wring (Practice Note), Divl.Ct. 138.

HIGHWAY
Access
Adjoining owner
Proposal by highway authority to erect "refuge" at point where means of access emerged on to highway. Ching Garage Ltd. v. Chingford Corpn., C.A. 947.

HIGHWAY—continued.
Private street works Footpath
Occupation way—Strip of land laid out as occupation way—Subsequent use by public for right of way on foot only—Whether a highway repairable by inhabitants at large—Highway Act, 1835, s. 23—Private Street Works Act, 1892, ss. 5, 7.
Margate Corporation v. Roach, Divl.Ct. 1380.

Improvements by local authority
Material defect in resolution—No reference to street lighting or sewering—Specification providing for new street lighting and surface water drainage—Limitation on power of justices to amend resolution—"Channel"—Meaning of—Whether apt to cover subterranean drainage. Ware Urban District Council v. Gaunt, Divl.Ct. 1364.

Objection to proposals
Jurisdiction of justices—Resolution to make up street and apportion expenditure on one basis — Service of notices — Further resolution on different basis — Whether valid—Private Street Works Act, 1892, ss. 6, 7, 10, 11.
Wilson v. Wrexham Corpn., Divl.Ct. 319.

Road made in 1885
Laid out alongside section of public footpath repairable by inhabitants at large—Further section of footpath diverted to lie alongside new road—Unfenced—Whole of road including footpath used by public on foot—No repairs carried out by local authority except to footpath—Whether road a "street" not repairable by inhabitants—Whether footpath fronts on street—Whether private premises fronting footpath "front" or "adjoin" street—Highway Act, 1835, s. 23—Private Street Works Act, 1892, ss. 5, 6, 8.
Ware Urban District Council v. Gaunt, Divl.Ct. 1364.

Refuge
Power to erect
Power of highway authority to erect "refuge" at point where means of access emerged on to highway—"Carriageway"—Whether refuge prevented access to highway—Highways Act, 1959, ss. 67 (1) (2) (3), 68 (1), 85 (1) (a), (3) (d), 295 (1).
Ching Garage Ltd. v. Chingford Corpn., C.A. 947.

HIRE-PURCHASE
Hire-purchase agreement
Implied statutory condition
Fitness for purpose—Acknowledgment by hirer of fitness of car—Whether hirer estopped from alleging that implied statutory condition broken—Hire-Purchase Act, 1938, s. 8 (2) (3). Lowe v. Lombank, C.A. 196.

HOUSING
Requisitioned houses
Recoverable rent
Rent increases in respect of requisitioned properties released to owners — Payment of increases by local authority—Whether duty of local authority to make periodic reviews—Requisitioned Houses and Housing (Amendment) Act, 1955, s. 4 (4).
Taylor v. Munrow, Divl.Ct. 151.

HOUSE OF LORDS
Leave to appeal
Mental deficiency
Refusal by Court of Appeal of leave to appeal against refusal of High Court of leave to bring proceedings—Whether jurisdiction to grant leave to appeal to House of Lords—Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 330 (2)—Mental Treatment Act, 1930, s. 16 (1)—Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, s. 3—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 31 (1) (i). Whitehouse v. Board of Control, H.L.(E.) 1093.

HUSBAND AND WIFE
Adultery
Connivance
Meaning — Husband turning wife out knowing she would return to lover — Absence of "corrupt" intention. Haynes v. Haynes and Sawkill, Wrangham J. 968.

Effect of common law
Conduct conducing by husband—Whether wife's licence to matrimonial home terminated by her adultery. Short v. Short, C.A. 833.

Evidence
Incriminating question — "Proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery" — Party cross-examined charged with cruelty—Party cross-examined alleging adultery—Question relevant to cruelty charge—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (3).
Haynes v. Haynes and Sawkill, Wrangham J. 968.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—continued.

Condonation

Cruelty

Cruel conduct by wife to induce sexual intercourse—Final act of intercourse by husband. Willan v. Willan, C.A. 624.

Revival of condoned offence

Pleading—Adultery unknown to condoning spouse and not pleaded—Whether capable of constituting revival—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 4. Scott v. Scott (Quine cited), Karminski J. 915.

Conduct conducing

Desertion, as

Constructive desertion — Wife's adultery condoned — Wife then turned out — Subsequent adultery. Haynes v. Haynes and Sawkill, Wrangham J. 968.

Insanity

As defence—Knowledge that acts of cruelty "wrong"—Meaning of "wrong"—Evidence of knowledge. Sofaer v. Sofaer, Collingwood J. 1173.

——— Whether genuine belief in false accusations arising from mental disorder is a defence to a charge of cruelty based thereon—Reasonable apprehension of injury to health. Robins v. Robins, Wrangham J. 1089.

Intention to injure

Effeminacy of husband—Feminine proclivities concealed from wife—Chance discoveries by wife—Failure of husband to undergo treatment—Treatment unlikely to cure marital difficulties. Bohnel v. Bohnel, C.A. 590.

Desertion

Separation agreement

Consensual separation recited in written maintenance agreement—Period of separation indefinite—Subsequent offers by husband to return rejected by wife—Whether wife in desertion. Hall v. Hall, Wrangham J. 52.

Termination

Separation agreement before 1938—Right to disregard agreement under statute—Wife in desertion at time of agreement—Husband's refusal of wife's offers to return—Whether parties entitled to rely on statute—Divorce (Insanity and Desertion) Act, 1958, s. 3. Pearce v. Pearce, C.A. 855.

Three years from presentation of answer

Amendment of answer to allege desertion by way of cross-petition—Three years completed at date of amendment but not at date of answer—Leave at hearing to amend answer further by striking out prayer for divorce—Leave to file a fresh petition seeking divorce and to consolidate the two suits. Jacobs v. Jacobs, Karminski J. 1236.

Divorce

Costs

Statement taken by petitioner's solicitor from respondent — Costs incurred excluded by commissioner—Whether wrongly excluded. Davies v. Davies, C.A. 1004.

Cross-petition

Bar to petition removed; whether cross-petition barred—Separation agreement before 1938—Respondent's desertion before separation agreement of 1936—Petitioner's desertion in 1943—Divorce (Insanity and Desertion) Act, 1958, s. 3. Pearce v. Pearce, C.A. 855.

"Proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery"—Whether cross-petition for cruelty part of proceedings—Meaning of "proceedings"—Question relevant to cruelty tending to show adultery—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (3). Haynes v. Haynes and Sawkill, Wrangham J. 968.

Discretion

Failure to pray for exercise—Disclosure of petitioner's adultery after decree nisi but before decree absolute—Leave to amend notwithstanding. Onions v. Onions, Collingwood J. 983.

Evidence

Adultery—Denial of adultery in answer—Verified by affidavit—Not denied in evidence-in-chief — Whether cross-examination thereon permissible — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (3). Corfe v. Corfe, C.A. 208.

Jurisdiction

Residence, based on—Polygamous marriage in Nigeria—Subsequent ceremony at register office in England—Jurisdiction of English court—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 18 (1) (a). Ohochuku v. Ohochuku, Wrangham J. 183.

No evidence advanced by one party seeking decree

Jurisdiction of court. Black v. Black (May intervening), Sachs J. 182.

INFANT

Custody

Appeal from justices

Practice—Guardianship of Infants Acts, 1886 and 1925—R.S.C., Ord. 55A. Practice Direction, Ch.D. 744.

INJUNCTION

Form

Joint or several

Injunction not expressed to restrain severally—Breach of injunction by one defendant—Jurisdiction to commit for contempt. Lenton v. Tregoning, C.A. 333.

Nuisance

Mandatory order on occupiers of land " at all times " to keep culvert clear and unobstructed—Whether too wide. Pemberton v. Bright, C.A. 436.

Trap

Injunction to restrain sales of cars as new—Disputed meaning of " new "—Need for definition in injunction. Morris Motors Ltd. v. Phelan, Roxburgh J. 352, 566.

INTEREST

Unliquidated damages

Time from which interest to be awarded Discretion of court—Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 3 (1). Carr v. Boxall, Cross J. 314.

JUDICIAL PRECEDENT

Question of fact

Jury question

Decision of judge on it not a precedent. Brown v. Rolls-Royce Ltd., H.L.(Sc.) 210.

JUSTICES

Appeal to High Court

Stay pending appeal

No power to stay refusal of order—Adoption Act, 1958, s. 35 (3). In re C. S. C., Roxburgh J. 304.

" Care and possession " of applicant for three months

Whether " continuous "

Child spent three nights with mother—Adoption Act, 1958, s. 3 (1). In re C. S. C., Roxburgh J. 304.

Case stated

Jurisdiction to state case

Quarter sessions—Order varying corn rents under Inclosure Act—No obligation to hear parties — Whether judicial decision — Whether power to state consultative case — Inclosure Act, 1801 (Scremby). In re Scremby Corn Rents, Divl.Ct. 648.

Committal to quarter sessions

Best method

Young person—Desirability of committal under section 29—Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, ss. 28, 29. Reg. v. Dangerfield, C.C.A. 268.

Discretion of court

Possibility of legitimising child

Relevance—Putative father willing to marry mother after divorce. In re C. S. C., Roxburgh J. 304.

Election to go for trial

Indictable offence triable summarily

Consent to summary trial—Magistrate's right to allow accused to withdraw consent—Whether he had begun to try information—Prosecution witness heard—Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, ss. 19 (5), 24. Reg. v. Bennett. Ex parte Radburn, Lord Parker C.J. 102.

Fine or penalty

National Insurance contribution

Failure to pay—Order for arrears—Jurisdiction to mitigate payment of arrears—" Recoverable as a penalty "—National Insurance (Contributions) Regulations, 1948, reg. 19 (5)—Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, s. 27 (1). Leach v. Litchfield, Divl.Ct. 1392.

Information

Information or complaint

Control of dog—Whether proceedings instituted by information or complaint—Dogs Act, 1871, s. 2—Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, ss. 42, 100 (1). Reg. v. Nottingham Justices. Ex parte Brown, Divl.Ct. 1315.

Judicial separation

Discretion

Prayer for discretion not required in petition for judicial separation—Discretion statement not required—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 14 (1)—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957, rr. 4 (4), 28 (1). Haniver v. Haniver, Sachs J. 310.

JUSTICES—continued.

Jurisdiction

Functi officio

Plea of guilty followed by fine—Accused recalled and acquitted—Whether justices have jurisdiction so to act—Whether functi officio. Morton v. Chaney, Divl.Ct. 1312.

Justices

Clerk

Note of evidence—Whether privileged. McKinley v. McKinley, Wrangham J. 120.

Public interest in proceedings

Election to call no evidence—Whether evidence may be called at rehearing. Horton v. Horton, Divl.Ct. 987.

Submission of no case

Submission upheld—Appeal—Rehearing ordered—Right of husband to call evidence at rehearing. Horton v. Horton, Divl.Ct. 987.

Maintenance

Divorce

Time bar—Application several years after decree—No prayer for maintenance in petition. Pachner v. Parker, Marshall J. 486.

Justices

Attachment of earnings—Effect of order in subsequent proceedings as to quantum—Married Women (Summary Jurisdiction) Act, 1895, s. 7—Maintenance Orders Act, 1958, s. 6. Pepper v. Pepper, Probate 131.

Jurisdiction—Wife's application for custody of and maintenance for child—No cross-complaint by husband—Whether original maintenance ordered for wife may be decreased. Pepper v. Pepper, Probate 131.

Variation—Appeal—Procedure—R.S.C., Ord. 41A, r. 3 (3). Practice Direction, Probate 566.

Wilful neglect to maintain—Burden of proof—Whether husband's delusion of physical disability an excuse. Stirland v. Stirland, Divl.Ct. 18.

Marriage

Declaration of validity

Power of court to make—R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 5. Woyno v. Woyno, Mr. Comr. Edgedale Q.C. 986.

Nullity

Wilful refusal to consummate

Just excuse—Husband aware that subsequent religious ceremony an essential pre-condition to matrimonial cohabitation—Refusal to arrange ceremony. Jodla v. Jodla, Hewson J. 236.

Practice

Costs. See also Divorce (Death of party).

Taxation—Application to review—Supreme Court Rules, 1959, r. 35. Practice Direction, Probate 1142.

Taxation—Bill to show item numbers—Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959, Appendix 2. Practice Direction, Probate, 125.

Pleading

Affidavit in support — Whether evidence at hearing — Cross-examination — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (3). Corfe v. Corfe, C.A. 208.

Amendment to allege adultery—Discretion statement—Amendment at trial after discretion statement put in evidence—Costs. Long v. Long, Karminski J. 546.

Answer—Bare denial—Provocation and other matters of the nature of confession and avoidance alleged at hearing. Finch v. Finch, Mr. Comr. Latey Q.C. 429.

Petition — Address of petitioner — Application for leave to omit address — Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1959, r. 4 (1) (d). Practice Direction, Probate 548.

Service of notice of charge on named woman

Allegation by wife of improper association by husband with named woman—No application to intervene—Costs. Collins v. Collins, Mr. Comr. Gallop, Q.C. 660.

Property

Act of 1882, s. 17

Divorce proceedings pending—Wife's admitted adultery in matrimonial home—Husband's application for possession—Extent of court's discretion—Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17. Short v. Short, C.A. 833.

Wedding presents—To whom?—Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 17. Samson v. Samson, C.A. 190.

Act of 1958, s. 7

Wedding presents—To whom?—Matrimonial Causes (Property and Maintenance) Act, 1958, s. 7. Samson v. Samson, C.A. 190.

JUSTICES—continued.
Quarter sessions
Jurisdiction
Sentence—Borstal training—Whether jurisdiction in addition to disqualify from driving —Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 20 (5) (a)—Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, s. 28.
Reg. v. Dangerfield, C.C.A. 268.

LAND REGISTRATION
Land Charge
Estate contract
Option for new lease—Non-registration—Whether void against purchaser of reversion—Land Charges Act, 1925, ss. 10 (1), Class C (iv), 13 (2).
Beesly v. Hallwood Estates Ltd., Buckley J. 549.

LANDLORD AND TENANT Assignment
Judgment for possession
Sale of property—Assignment of property to company without benefit of judgment—Whether company entitled to enforce order for possession—County Court Rules, 1936, Ord. 25, r. 6. Chung Kwok Hotel Co. Ltd. v. Field, C.A. 1112.

Business premises (security of tenure)
Discovery
Landlord's intention to demolish or reconstruct—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, s. 30 (1) (f).
Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v. Bath House Syndicate Ltd., Buckley J. 613, 989.

Dual proceedings
Notice to determine tenancy—Application to county court for new tenancy—Subsequent commencement of High Court action disputing validity of notice—Adjournment of county court proceedings—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, ss. 24 (1), 25 (1).
Airport Restaurants Ltd. v. Southend Corporation, C.A. 880.

Notice of opposition to new tenancy
Form—Application for new tenancy on terms proposed by tenants—Failure of landlord to state in his notice of opposition whether or not he objected to proposed new terms—No agreement in writing as to terms of new tenancy—Landlord appearing with evidence as to valuation at hearing—Duty of court to determine on evidence reasonability of new terms as to duration and rent—Whether parties' documents on application for new tenancy to be treated as pleadings—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, ss. 29 (1), 33, 34.
Morgan v. Jones, C.A. 1220.

Holding over "Wilfully"
Double rent—Meaning of "wilfully"—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1730.
French v. Elliott, Paull J. 40.

Option to extend term
Notice of exercise
Tenant remaining in premises and paying rent after expiry of original term—Rent accepted by landlords—Whether option validly exercised by tenant—"Option for continuing for an extension of seven or fourteen years"—Provided tenant "has reasonably fulfilled covenants." Gardner v. Blaxill, Paull J. 752.

Option to purchase
Construction
Lease for five years—Option to tenant to purchase freehold of premises "at any time" —Expiry of term in 1944—Tenant holding over as statutory tenant—Whether tenant entitled to exercise option in 1959—"At any time."
Longmuir v. Kew, Cross J. 862.

Rent restriction
Personal occupation
Mental illness—Prolonged absence therefrom—Animus revertendi—Test—Onus of proof.
Tickner v. Hearn, C.A. 1406.

Repairs
Act of 1927
Demolition required by planning authority—Whether premises to be demolished "at or "shortly after . . . termination of tenancy"—Meaning—Admissibility of evidence of events after tenancy terminated—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1).
Keats v. Graham, C.A. 30.

Covenant
Measure of damages for failure to yield up premises in "good and tenantable" repair—Diminution in value of reversion where premises immediately relet—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18 (1). Jaquin v. Holland, C.A. 258.

Reversionary tenancy Agreement for future tenancy Distinction—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, ss. 28, 65 (3).
Green v. Bowes-Lyon, Divl.Ct. 176.

LANDS TRIBUNAL
Appeal from Fact
Further evidence—Lands Tribunal Act, 1949, s. 3 (4).
Routh's Trustees v. Central Land Board, C.A. 737.

LAW REPORT
Citation Authenticity
Revision of The Law Reports by judges.
Reg. v. Agricultural Land Tribunal for South Eastern Area. Ex parte Bracey, Divl.Ct. 911.

LEGAL AID
Certificate
Appeal
Notice of Appeal to be filed without waiting for grant of legal aid.
Addison v. Addison and Holden, C.A. 1088.
Costs
Aided plaintiff and defendant
Action for damages for fraud—Plaintiffs awarded damages—No order as to costs—Liability of defendants to pay costs—Proper order—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, ss. 1 (7) (b), 2 (e), 3 (1). Blatcher v. Heaysman, C.A. 663.
Order for costs against aided person
Damages awarded to aided person—Payment into court—Payment out on satisfaction of costs to be paid by aided person. Carr v. Boxall, Cross J. 314.
Taxation
Expert witnesses—Solicitor and client costs—Disallowance of costs allowed on party and party taxation — Items not authorised — Payable by defendants to legal aid fund — Solicitor's right to recover—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (as amended by the Legal Aid (General) (Amendment No. 1) Regulations, 1954, and Legal Aid (General) (Amendment No. 2) Regulations, 1955), reg. 14 (4) (5) (6).
Ullah v. Hall Line Ltd., Davies J. 1320.

LIBEL AND SLANDER
Newspaper
Absolute privilege
Statement by solicitor at criminal trial—Whether newspaper bound to verify accuracy.
Burnett & Hallamshire Fuel Ltd. v. Sheffield Telegraph & Star Ltd., Salmon J. 502.
Republication
Innuendo—Onus of proof—Alleged misdirection.
"Truth" (N.Z.) Ltd. v. Holloway, J.C. 997.
Privilege
Absolute privilege
Judicial tribunal — Bar Council — Whether complaint to Council protected by absolute privilege. Lincoln v. Daniels, Salmon J. 852.

LICENCE OR TENANCY
Exclusive occupation
Payment of rent
Hotel premises—Permissive occupation under business arrangement—Whether conclusive of tenancy. Isaac v. Hotel de Paris Ltd., J.C. 239.

LICENSING
Forfeiture
Conviction of "the owner or occupier"
Members' club—Unlawful sale of liquor—Seizure by police—Conviction of one member—Liquor forfeited—Whether member was "the owner or occupier"—Licensing Act, 1953, s. 152 (2).
Reg. v. Lewes Justices. Ex parte Plumpton & District Club Trustees, Divl.Ct. 700.
Justices
Jurisdiction
Meeting subsequent to general annual licensing meeting fixed beyond statutory period—Mandamus—Licensing Act, 1953, Sch. 2, Part I, para. 5.
Reg. v. Woodbury Licensing Justices. Ex parte Rouse, Divl.Ct. 461.

LIMITATION OF ACTION
Bankruptcy
Mortgage
Order in bankruptcy against mortgagor—Rights of mortgagee not barred before bankruptcy—Whether time runs—Notice to trustee to elect whether to redeem security—Whether effective—Bankruptcy Act, 1914, Sch. II, r. 13 (c).
Cotterell v. Price, Buckley J. 1097.

LIMITATION OF ACTION—continued.

Crime

Continuing offence

Litter depositing—Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, s. 104.
Vaughan v. Biggs, Divl.Ct. 622.

Mortgage

Second mortgage

Order in bankruptcy against mortgagor—Second mortgagee's rights against mortgagor statute barred—Whether entitled to redeem first mortgage—Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 95. Cotterell v. Price, Buckley J. 1097.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT

Powers

Duty to exercise statutory discretion

Resolution by local authority to bear whole of rent increases of derequisitioned properties —Whether periodic reviews called for—Requisitioned Houses and Housing (Amendment) Act, 1955, s. 4 (4). Taylor v. Munrow, Divl.Ct. 151.

MASTER AND SERVANT

Conduct of service

Implied term

Absence from work through sickness — Whether remuneration payable — Notice ending service—Whether one week sufficient—Weekly salary.
Orman v. Saville Sportswear Ltd., Pilcher J. 1055.

Remuneration

Absence from work through sickness

Production manager employed at basic salary plus bonus—Whether implied term negativing employee's right to payment during period of sickness—Whether employee entitled to be paid bonus. Orman v. Saville Sportswear Ltd., Pilcher J. 1055.

MEDICAL PRACTITIONER

Medical Disciplinary Committee

Conduct of hearing

Appeal—Rehearing—Powers and duties of Board—"Due inquiry"—Evidence—Admissibility—Medical Act, 1956, s. 36—General Medical Council Disciplinary Committee (Procedure) Rules Order in Council, 1958, r. 43 (2).
Fox v. General Medical Council, J.C. 1017.

MENTAL DEFICIENCY

Court of Protection

Proceedings under Variation of Trusts Act, 1958

Procedure. Practice Direction, Ct. of Protection 17.

Jurisdiction

Patient's property—Settlement or gift of patient's property for benefit of patient's family —Mental Health Act, 1959, s. 103 (1) (d). Practice Direction, Ct. of Protection 1253.

Leave to bring order

Reasonable care

Urgent removal—Whether substantial ground for contention that officer acted without reasonable care—Whether reasonable belief that patient of unsound mind—Meaning of "unsound mind"—Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 14 (1) (a) (as amended by the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 50 and Sch. 9, Pt. I) and s. 330 (as amended by Mental Treatment Act, 1930, s. 16 (1). Buxton v. Jayne, C.A. 738.

Settlement of patient's property

Discretion of court

Possibility that patient might squander property on recovery—Mental Health Act, 1959, s. 103—Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 171 (1) (5).
In re C., 1958, No. 1950, Danckwerts J. 92.

METROPOLIS

Insulting behaviour occasioning breach of peace

Touting

Hostess standing in door of restaurant beckoning to passers-by—Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, s. 54 (13). Bryan v. Robinson, Divl.Ct. 506.

MINES

Act of 1954

Breach of statutory duty

Roof and sides—Fall of stone from roof following fall of girder—Injury to electrician working on fitting on fallen girder—Duty to keep road or working place secure—Whether impracticable to avoid or prevent contravention—Whether electrician "workman employed in that part of the mine"—Whether fitting was "debris"—Work "necessary for the setting of the supports"—Mines and Quarries Act, 1954, ss. 48 (1), 51 (3) (b), 157—Coal and Other Mines (Support) Order, 1956, Sch. I, reg. 12.
Brown v. National Coal Board, Thesiger J. 67.

MONEYLENDER
Action for recovery of money
Originating summons
Form—R.S.C., Ords. 3, r. 10; 20, r. 10; 55, r. 5A.
Lewis v. Packer, Danckwerts J. 452.

MORTGAGE
Practice
Summons for possession
Adjournment—Mortgage not repayable by instalments—Mortgagee's power of sale exercisable—Discretion of court to adjourn summons—R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A.
Braithwaite v. Winwood, Cross J. 1257.

Receiver Receipt of rent, by Trespasser, from—Whether tenancy created—Surrounding circumstances—Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 109 (2). Stroud Building Society v. Delamont, Cross J. 431.

NATIONAL INSURANCE Contribution
Failure to pay
Conviction for failing to pay one contribution—Order for payment of arrears—Whether justices have power to mitigate payment of arrears—"Recoverable as a penalty"—National Insurance (Contributions) Regulations, 1948, reg. 19 (5)—Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, s. 27 (1). Leach v. Litchfield, Divl.Ct. 1392.

NATURAL JUSTICE
Open court. See OPEN COURT.
Opportunity to meet charge
Notice of charge
Court of formal investigation—Expression of censure without previous notice of charge against officer censured. The Seistan, Admiralty 186.
Whether accused entitled to question witnesses University—Allegation of pre-knowledge of examination paper—Inquiry under domestic statute. Ceylon University v. Fernando, J.C. 223.

NEGLIGENCE
Onus of proof
Safe system of work
Failure to follow usual precautions. Brown v. Rolls-Royce Ltd., H.L.(Sc.) 210.
Safe system of work
Dangerous substance
Standard of care—Dermatitis contracted—Contact with oil—Precautionary system—Onus of proof. Brown v. Rolls-Royce Ltd., H.L.(Sc.) 210.
Pleading
Whether onus on servant to show alternative and safe system.
Dixon v. Cementation Co. Ltd., C.A. 746.

NEW ZEALAND
Libel
Newspaper
Republication—Innuendo—Onus of proof—Alleged misdirection.
"Truth" (N.Z.) Ltd. v. Holloway, J.C. 997.

NUISANCE
Highway
Obstruction
Motor-vehicle stationary and unlit on road at night—Illuminated by light from street lamp—Whether dangerous obstruction constituting nuisance.
Parish v. Judd, Edmund Davies J. 867.
Potential nuisance
Damage reasonably foreseeable Entrance to culvert left unprotected. Pemberton v. Bright, C.A. 436.
Watercourse
Interference by highway authority
Extension of ancient culvert with new entrance on adjoining occupiers' land—Entrance left unprotected by grid—Neighbouring land flooded by blocking of unprotected entrance 30 years after completion of work—Liability of highway authority—Highways Act, 1835, s. 67. Pemberton v. Bright, C.A. 436.

OPEN COURT Proceedings in Master
Reference under R.S.C., Ord. 36B, rr. 2, 6.
Hesz v. Sotheby & Co., Master Diamond 285.

OPEN COURT—continued.
Publication of name
Whether court has jurisdiction to forbid publication
Name of party—Court of Appeal.
Reg. v. Registrar of Building Societies. Ex parte A Building Society, Divl.Ct. & C.A. 669.

PARLIAMENT Election
Petition
Validity of election—Petition alleging breaches of Parliamentary Elections Rules—Whether election conducted substantially in accordance with law—Act or omissions not affecting result—Onus of proof—Representation of the People Act, 1949, s. 16 (3).
In re Kensington North Parliamentary Election, Election Ct. 762.

PARTNERSHIP
Dissolution
Continuance of business afterwards
Proprietary rights of former partners.
Burdett-Coutts v. Inland Revenue Comrs., Buckley J. 1027.

PASSING OFF
Contempt. See CONTEMPT OF COURT.
Goodwill, damage to Sale of article as new Motor-car—Injunction to restrain—Terms of injunction.
Morris Motors v. Phelan, Roxburgh J. 352, 566.

PATENT
Practice
Motions
To whom made—R.S.C., Ord. 53A, r. 2. Practice Direction, Ch.D. 1272.

PENSIONS SCHEME
Construction
Amendment
Reservation by employers of right to discontinue, suspend or amend in the event of "unforeseen circumstances"—Whether power to amend beneficial interests of employees. Alfred Herbert Ltd. v. Hancocks, Cross J. 271.

POWER OF APPOINTMENT
Fraud on power
Benefit to non-object
Purpose to benefit objects—Subsequent discovery of possible benefit to appointor—Whether purpose changed—Whether fraud on power.
In re Robertson's Will Trusts, Russell J. 1050.

PRACTICE
Adjournment
Discretion of court
Dual proceedings—High Court proceedings started after county court proceedings in same matter—Adjournment of county court proceedings pending outcome of High Court action. Airport Restaurants Ltd. v. Southend Corporation, C.A. 880.

Appearance
Memorandum
Modified form of writ—R.S.C., Ord. 12, r. 8 (as amended by R.S.C. (No. 1) 1960, r. 1).
Practice Direction, Divl.Ct. 494.

Chancery Division
Master
Powers—Amendment of R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 15. Practice Direction 1195.
Order, drawing up
Minutes of order drawn by counsel—Functions of registrar. Practice Direction, Ch.D. 1168.
Procedural orders. Practice Direction, Ch.D. 1166.

Consolidation of actions
Libel
Whether order for consolidation can be made out on summons for direction in second action—Discretion—Principles of exercise.
Daws v. Daily Sketch and Daily Graphic Ltd., C.A. 126.

Declaratory judgment
Discretion
Change in law pending—New Act not yet in force.
Ching Garage Ltd. v. Chingford Corpn., C.A. 947.

PRACTICE—continued.

Discovery

Originating summons

Landlord and tenant—Application for a new lease—Affidavit evidence—Summons adjourned for trial on affidavit and oral evidence—Whether tenants entitled to discovery.
Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v. Bath House Syndicate Ltd., Buckley J. 613.

Landlord and tenant—Application for a new lease—Affidavit evidence—Summons adjourned for trial on affidavit and oral evidence—Whether tenants entitled to discovery.
Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v Bath House Syndicate Ltd., C.A. 989.

Interlocutory proceedings

Meaning

Infant—Application to suspend access by mother—Whether interlocutory proceeding—Admissibility of hearsay evidence in affidavits—Scandalous matter—Discretion of court to strike out—R.S.C., Ord. 38, rr. 3, 11. Rossage v. Rossage, C.A. 249.

———Ward of court—Application to take out of jurisdiction—Whether interlocutory proceeding—Admissibility of hearsay evidence in affidavits—Discretion of court to strike out—R.S.C., Ord. 38, rr. 3, 11. In re J., Cross J. 253.

Interpreter

Plaintiff in person

Summons—Foreign applicant ignorant of English—Whether applicant entitled to open case through interpreter—Discretion of court.
In re Trepca Mines Ltd., Roxburgh J. 24.

Jury, civil action

Opening of pleadings by junior counsel

Discontinuance of practice. Practice Direction, Q.B.D. & P. 658.

Right to jury

Judge's discretion—Whether Court of Appeal will interfere—Personal injuries—Very grave injuries—R.S.C., Ord 36, r. 1 (1) (3). Pease v. George, C.A. 427.

Note of Evidence

Right of party to Matrimonial proceedings—Note of clerk to justices—Required for divorce suit—Right to subpoena clerk. McKinley v. McKinley, Wrangham J. 120.

Originating summons

Moneylender

Application by originating summons for payment of moneys secured—Whether summons should contain facts to be contained in statement of claim—R.S.C., Ords. 3, r. 10; 20, r. 10; 55, r. 5A. Lewis v. Packer, Danckwerts J. 452.

Parties

Joinder

Third party procedure—Third, fourth and fifth parties—Application by third party to serve fourth party notice on fifth party—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 39 (1) (b)—R.S.C., Ord. 16A, rr. 1, 11—Ord. 16, r. 11.
Piddock v. Clifford Products Ltd., C.A. 1383.

Pleadings

Amendment

Red ink—Whether necessary—R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 10; Ord. 28, r. 8.
In re Langton, decd., C.A. 246.

Particulars

Traverse negative pregnant — Income tax — Penalty — Failure to make returns within prescribed time "without reasonable excuse"—Denial by taxpayer that he failed to furnish particulars required "without reasonable excuse"—Whether denial a negative averment—Whether plaintiffs entitled to particulars of reasonable excuse to be relied on—Income Tax Act, 1952, ss. 19, 232 (2)—R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 6.
Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Jackson, C.A. 873.

Stay of Proceedings

Action against company in voluntary liquidation

Action for wrongful dismissal — Application by liquidator to stay action — Substantial dispute as to amount of damages—Whether a matter to be determined in the liquidation —Whether any advantage gained by stay of proceedings—Discretion of court.
Cook v. "X" Chair Patents Co. Ltd., Wynn-Parry J. 60.

Title of proceedings

Plaintiffs "trustees of estate"

Change in trusteeship. Routh's Trustees v. Central Land Board, C.A. 737.

PRESUMPTION

Death

Long absence

Spouse not heard of for 14 years despite police inquiries—Subsequent marriage—Present spouse aware of circumstances when marrying—Whether estopped from later alleging marriage bigamous. Bullock v. Bullock, Divl.Ct. 975.

PRIVY COUNCIL
Jurisdiction
Professional discipline
Appeal from General Medical Council—Powers and duties of Board.
Fox v. General Medical Council, J.C. 1017.
Union of benefices
Jurisdiction to consider proposed scheme de novo and on its merits—Union of Benefices Measure, 1923, s. 10 (3) (5)—Pastoral Reorganisation Measure, 1949, s. 3 (2).
Little Leigh Parochial Church Council v. Church Comrs., J.C. 567.

PROBATE
Costs
Taxation
Bill to show item numbers—Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959, Appendix 2.
Practice Direction, Probate 125.

PUBLIC HEALTH Litter
Leaving
Whether depositing and leaving litter continuing offence—Litter Act, 1958, s. 1 (1).
Vaughan v. Biggs, Divl.Ct. 622.

RATING
Agricultural building
Pig progeny testing research station
Surrounding land arable meadow or pasture—Buildings—Whether occupied together with and used solely in connection with agricultural operations on the land—"Agricultural "land"—"Agricultural building"—"Thereon"—Meanings—Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 2 (2).
National Pig Progeny Testing Board v. Greenall, C.A. 1265.
Industrial hereditament
Laundry
Whether retail shop or "premises of a similar character where retail trade or business . . . "carried on"—Shop—Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 3 (1) (4).
Almond v. Heathfield Laundry (Birmingham) Ltd., C.A. 1339.
Research establishment
Hereditament owned by subsidiary of commercial concern—Used for construction and testing of prototypes—Whether industrial hereditament—Whether used for factory purposes—Primary purpose—Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, s. 149 (1) (a) (i), Sch. VI —Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928.
Harry Ferguson Research Ltd. v. Dawkins, C.A. 639.
Playing field
Intermittent use by sports club
Whether "occupied for purposes of" club—"Occupied"—"For the purposes of"—Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955, s. 8 (1) (c).
Parker v. Ealing Borough Council, Pennycuick J. 1398.
Rateable occupation
Golf course
Golf courses occupied in New Forest under licence without prejudice to the rights of commoners—Public not prevented from wandering over golf courses—Whether any rateable occupation of golf courses. Peak v. Burley Golf Club, C.A. 568.
Intermittent use
Playing field used by sports club.
Parker v. Ealing Borough Council, Pennycuick J. 1398.
"Social welfare"
Ex-services club
"Main objects" contained in written constitution—"To promote comradeship between "and improve the condition and welfare of all ranks, both past and present" of the forces—Whether main objects of organisation "concerned with the advancement of . . . "social welfare"—Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955, s. 8 (1) (a). Victory (Ex-services) Association Ltd. v. Paddington Borough Council, Divl.Ct. 106.
Organisation whose purpose is advanced
Trade union or trustees—Convalescent home and home for the aged—Trustees subject to strict control by executive council of union—Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955, s. 8 (1) (a).
Isaacs v. Market Bosworth R. D. C., Divl.Ct. 277.

RESTITUTION
Unjust enrichment
Enemy property
Received by bank to use of enemy person—Claim after Peace Treaty.
Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property, H.L.(E.) 917.

RESTRICTIVE PRACTICES

Practice

Parties

Non-appearance of parties to agreement—Refusal by six respondents to be represented by trade association—Submission by association to agreed order declaring restrictions contrary to public interest—Undertaking by association not to revive or reintroduce similar scheme without giving notice to registrar—Whether registrar entitled to injunction against non-appearing respondents—Form of order—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, s. 20 (3) (a) (b)—Restrictive Practices Court Rules, 1957, r. 11.

In re National Association of British and Irish Millers Ltd.'s Scheme, R.P.Ct. 63.

Reference

Variation of agreement—Scope of inquiry—Reference of agreement containing home and export restrictions—Subsequent deletion of export restrictions from original agreement—Export restrictions incorporated in new document—Justification of restrictions by reference to maintenance of exports—Application to exclude consideration of export restrictions from hearing of reference—Whether court should restrict scope of inquiry—Discretion of court—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, ss. 8 (8), 18 (1), 31 (1).

In re Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Application, R.P.Ct., L.R. 1 R.P. 550; 356.

Recommendation

No powers for enforcing observance

Restriction deemed in law to arise by virtue of recommendation—Whether "restriction "accepted in pursuance of any agreement"—Whether presumption that contrary to public interest—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, ss. 6 (1) (7) (8), 21 (1).

In re Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, R.P.Ct. L.R. 1 R.P. 387; 393.

Restriction

Price restriction

Whether contrary to public interest—Phenol industry—Fixed prices for phenol—No formula or costings system—Natural phenol produced from distillation of tar—Current fixed price higher than free market price—Whether tar producers would divert tar to burning if phenol price fell—Whether benefits or advantages conferred on public by restrictions—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, s. 21 (1) (b).

In re Phenol Producers' Agreement, R.P.Ct. 464.

Whether contrary to public interest

Price restriction—Baking industry—Fixed retailers' margin—Ascertainment of retail price from average costs—System based on method evolved by Government Department during period of price control—Recommended prices low for high cost section of industry—Whether a true maximum—Whether retail prices in general lower by reason of recommendation—Whether benefits or advantages conferred on public—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, s. 21 (1) (b).

In re Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, R.P.Ct. 393.

——————— Black bolt and nut industry—Fixed prices for black bolts and nuts, carriage bolts and nuts and railway fastenings—Fixed prices reasonable—Quantity discount based on aggregate of purchases from association members—Minimum price for large users—Lowest price quoted by members interested—Large variety and number of bolts—Avoidance of necessity of stockholders and large and medium sized buyers to "go shopping"—Whether "the public as purchasers . . . of any goods"—Whether specific and substantial benefit—Whether benefits or advantages conferred on public by restrictions—Possibility of higher prices under restrictions—Whether restrictions reasonable—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, s. 21 (1) (b) (g).

In re Black Bolt and Nut Association's Agreement, R.P.Ct.(E. & W.) 884.

——————— Carpet industry—Minimum prices for standard quality carpets—No formula or costings system—Restrictions on discounts and direct sales to consumers—Whether removal of restrictions would result in reduction in export business—Whether benefit or advantages conferred on public—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, s. 21 (1) (b) (f). In re Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, R.P.Ct. 356.

——————— Confectionery industry—Recommended wholesale prices for confectionery—Wholesalers' buying and selling.

In re Wholesale Confectioners Alliance's Agreement, R.P.Ct. 1417.

Territorial and membership restrictions—Retail co-operative societies in contiguous areas—Boundary agreement delimiting trading areas of societies—Restriction on trading outside delimited area—Restriction on accepting members outside area—Avoidance of overlapping—Whether specific and substantial benefit—Whether benefits or advantages conferred on public by restrictions—Whether membership restriction a registrable restriction—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, ss. 6 (1) (b) (e), 21 (1) (b).

In re Doncaster and Retford Co-operative Societies' Agreement, R.P.Ct. 1186.

REVENUE

Estate duty

Business

Partnership assets—Partnership for joint lives—Death of one partner—Partnership a going concern—Whether "interest in a business passes on death"—Whether estate duty chargeable "in respect of" plant and machinery used in partnership business—Finance Act, 1955, s. 28 (1). Burdett-Coutts v. Inland Revenue Comrs., Buckley J. 1027.

Contribution to Estate duty not claimed on assigned part of fund—Whether duty payable rateably out of whole fund—Finance Act, 1894, ss. 1, 9. In re Boulton, C.A. 140.

Income Tax

Capital or income expenditure

Opencast coal mining—Payment for right of entry on land—Compensation payment for diminution in value—Payments normal and recurrent incident of trade—Whether revenue or capital expenditure—Whether "wholly and exclusively laid out . . . for the "purposes of the trade"—Profits tax—Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 137 (a).
H. J. Rorke Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, Cross J. 1132.

Capital or income receipt

Sale of "know-how" by manufacturers of aircraft engines to foreign governments and companies—To aid establishment of aircraft engine industry in foreign countries—Whether receipt of company's trade or proceeds of sale of capital asset—Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 123 (Sch. D, Case I).
Jeffrey v. Rolls-Royce Ltd., Pennycuick J. 720.

Employment

Perquisite—Valuation—Cost or value in hands of recipient—Gift from employer of new suit of clothes—Whether employee taxable on second-hand value only of suit—Income Tax Act, 1952, Sch 9, r. 1. Wilkins v. Rogerson, Danckwerts J. 515.

Penalty

Pleading—Application of normal rules in civil actions—Income Tax Act, 1952, ss. 19, 232 (2). Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Jackson, C.A. 873.

Profits of trade

Work in progress—Method of valuation—Whether "on cost" or "direct cost" method to be applied—Whether any principle involved.
Duple Motor Bodies v. Inland Revenue Comrs., C.A. 510.

Profits tax

Avoidance

Capitalisation of profits followed by liquidation and reconstruction—Distribution of surplus assets by liquidator—Direction by commissioners of basis of computation of profits tax liability—Whether main purpose of transaction avoidance or reduction of tax liability—No determination of last accounting period—Whether direction premature—Liability of company to profits tax—Finance Act, 1937, s. 20 (2) (b)—Finance Act, 1947, ss. 35 (1), 36 (1) (4); Finance Act, 1951, s. 32 (1) (3) (4).
Ackland & Pratten Ltd. (In Liquidation) v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, Cross J. 1117.

"Distribution"

Director-controlled company—Royalties paid to director for licence to manufacture patented article — Genuine commercial transaction — Whether payments made by way of "re-"muneration, loans or otherwise" — Whether "distributions" — Finance Act, 1947, s. 36 (1) (c).
Inland Revenue Commissioners v. H. Dunning & Co. (1946) Ltd., Cross J. 1106.

Nationalised industry—compensation

Dividends paid by subsidiary, a former colliery company in receipt of interim income payments — Subsidiary company remaining in being solely to receive compensation—Whether had "function" of holding property—Dividends received by parent company not "franked investment income"—Finance Act, 1937, s. 19 (4), Sch. 4 (1A), para. 7 (as substituted by Finance Act, 1947, s. 32 (1)).
Henry Briggs, Son & Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs., C.A. 532.

Stamp duty

Security

Contract for sale—Supplemental guarantee by bank—Contract not a primary document—Whether guarantee "primary security"—Stamp Act, 1891, Sch. 1.
Henry Ansbacher & Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs., Danckwerts J. 337.

ROAD TRAFFIC

Notice of intended prosecution

Issue whether notice given

Procedure — Appropriate time to dispute service of notice — Whether necessary to raise matter as preliminary point—Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 21.
Reg. v. Edmonton Justices. Ex parte Brooks, Divl.Ct. 697.

ROAD TRAFFIC—continued.

Negligence

Collision

Unlit vehicle standing on road at night—Presumption of negligence—Failure of lighting mechanism due to break in electric wiring—Car reasonably and properly maintained by owner—Whether presumption of negligence displaced.
Parish v. Judd, Edmund Davies J. 867.

Pedestrian crossing

Duty of drivers

Uncontrolled pedestrian crossing—Limits of crossing—Pedestrian Crossings Regulations, 1954, reg. 4. Hughes v. Hall, Divl.Ct. 733.

Taking and driving away motor-vehicle

Accessory

Appellant not present at taking—Whether entry into vehicle subsequently knowing it to have been taken and driven away without owner's consent sufficient to constitute offence—Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 28 (1). Reg. v. Stally, C.C.A. 79.

Aiding and abetting

Whether riding on pillion some hours after taking sufficient to constitute offence—Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 28 (1). D. (An Infant) v. Parsons, Divl.Ct. 797.

Third party insurance

Aiding and abetting offence

Vehicle taken and driven away without owner's consent—Riding on cycle subsequently as pillion passenger—Whether sufficient evidence to justify conviction—Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 35 (1). D. (An Infant) v. Parsons, Divl.Ct. 797.

SALE OF GOODS

Implied term

Fitness for purpose

Merchantable quality—Sale of toy by retailer to child—Sale of toys to retailer by wholesaler and by importer to wholesaler — Sales by sample — Defect rendering toy unmerchantable—Whether apparent on reasonable examination—Sale of Goods Act, 1893, ss. 14 (1) (2), 15 (2) (c). Godley v. Perry, Edmund Davies J. 9.

SHIPPING

Charterparty

Demurrage

Exceptions clause—Centrocon charter—"Time for loading or discharging . . . shall not "count" during strike—Whether receivers liable for demurrage during strike period after expiry of lay time.
Union of India v. Compania Naviera Aeolus S.A., McNair J. 297.

Court of formal investigation

Report

Expression of censure in rider signed by one assessor—Absence of notice of charge against officer censured—Irregularity. The Seistan, Admiralty 186.

SHIPS' NAMES

Seistan. The Seistan, Admiralty 186.

Spalmatori. Union of India v. Compania Naviera Aeolus S.A., McNair J. 297.

SOLICITOR

Discipline

Jurisdiction of court

Deprivation of costs—Inapt in case of alleged professional misconduct.
Davies v. Davies, C.A. 1004.

STATUTE

Construction

Directory or obligatory

Privilege or power conferred—Regulative provisions or acquisition or exercise—Timber concession. Edward Ramia Ltd. v. African Woods Ltd., J.C. 86.

Procedural requirement—Whether condition precedent to effective order—Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21 (4) (5).
Reg. v. Governor of Parkhurst Prison. Ex parte Philpot, Divl.Ct. 115.

Retroactive effect

Appeal

Whether new law applicable—Procedural point on substantive right—Vexatious litigant—Court of Appeal—Jurisdiction to vary High Court order to accord with new Act.
Attorney-General v. Vernazza, H.L.(E.) 466.

STATUTE—continued.
Purchase notice by owner
Minister's reasons for confirming notice
Whether fact that land of less use to owner than if developed proper test—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 19 (1) (2).
Reg. v. Minister of Housing and Local Government. Ex parte Chichester R. D. C., Divl.Ct. 587.

TITHE
Corn rents
Rents payable based on "average price" of wheat
Deficiency payments—No relation between amount of payments and value of wheat sold—Whether "price" includes deficiency payments—Inclosure Act, 1801 (Scremby)—Cereals (Deficiency Payments) Order, 1955, arts. 3, 4.
In re Scremby Corn Rents, C.A. 1227.

TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING
Development
Agreement to let premises for user requiring planning permission Undertaking by proposed tenant to apply for permission—Permission refused—Whether agreement to let illegal—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, ss. 12 (1), 23 (1), 24 (3). Best v. Glenville, C.A. 1198.

TRIBUNAL
Domestic
Bar Council
Function. Lincoln v. Daniels, Salmon J. 852.

TRUSTS
Abroad, trustee going
Power of attorney Statutory declaration—To be filed with each power of attorney—Trustee Act, 1925, s. 25 (4). Practice Direction, Q.B.D. 355.

Variation
Act of 1958
Affidavit by stockbroker—Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, s. 1.
In re Allen's Settlement Trusts, Vaisey J. 6.
Form of order—Effect of court's approval of arrangement—Whether direction to trustees necessary—Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, s. 1.
In re Hambleden's Will Trusts, Wynn-Parry J. 82.
Mental defective beneficiary—Application to Court of Protection—Procedure—Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, s. 1 (3). Practice Direction, Ct. of Protection 17.
Powers of investment—Application for variation of trustees' power of investment—Form of clause—Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, s. 1.
In re Thompson's Will Trusts, Cross J. 1165.
Protective trust—Exercise of power of appointment—Appointment to enable arrangement for division of trust fund—Intention to benefit appointees—Consequential benefit to appointor — Whether fraud on power — Whether court should approve arrangement — Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, s. 1. In re Robertson's Will Trusts, Russell J. 1050.
Rectification of settlement—Fund divided in equal shares between son and daughter—Son absolutely entitled to share on attaining 30—Gift over to daughter's share should son die under 30—Income from daughter's share payable to daughter for life and after her death capital held on trust for her children—Omission to provide for children of son should son not attain 30—Omission not intended by settlor—Application for variation to rectify—Settlement—Whether for benefit of "any person unborn"—Variation of Trusts Act, 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 53), s. 1. In re Tinker's Settlement, Russell J. 1011.

VAGRANCY
Prostitution
"In a street"
Soliciting from house, men passing in street—Whether soliciting "in a street"—Street Offences Act, 1959, s. 1 (1). Smith v. Hughes, Divl.Ct. 830.

Sentence
Whether Borstal training appropriate sentence
Vagrancy Act, s. 4. Reg. v. James, C.C.A. 812.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER Contract
Memorandum in writing
Offer in writing—Loss of letter of acceptance—Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 40 (1).
Parker v. Clark, Devlin J. 286.

WEST AFRICA

Gold Coast

Concession, application for Timber lands—Failure to comply with imperative statutory requirements for protection of grantor—Concession invalid—Laws of the Gold Coast (1951 Ed., c. 136), ss. 12 (2) (3) (4), 13 (11). Edward Ramia Ltd. v. African Woods Ltd., J.C. 86.

WILL

Execution

Will consisting of several sheets

Duly executed while pressed together by hand of deceased—Subsequent holograph additions inserted above signature—Testamentary intention—Wills Act, 1837, s. 9—Wills Act Amendment Act, 1852, s. 1. In the Estate of Little, decd., Sachs J. 495.

Construction

"Free of duty"

Chattels of artistic or historic interest—Specific legacy free of duty—Direction to trustees to pay duties payable "on my death"—Whether duty contingently payable on sale by legatees payable out of residue—Finance Act, 1930, s. 40.

In re Bedford, decd., Cross J. 1331.

Implied gift

Gift of moiety of residue remaining after "my wife has received her jus relictae"—Wife not entitled to jus relictae—Whether implied gift of residue to wife.

In re Angus' Will Trusts, Buckley J. 1296.

"Money in bank"

Whether confined to credit balance—Whether inclusive of travellers' cheques.

In re Trundle, decd., Cross J. 1388.

Dependent relative revocation

Two wills

First will followed by subsequent will containing revocation clause and inchoate clause referring to residue—Both wills treated as composite document.

In the Estate of Cocke, decd., Lloyd-Jones J. 491.

Signature

Sufficiency

Description of deceased in own hand in place of signature—"Your loving mother"—Wills Act, 1837, s. 9. In the Estate of Cook, decd., Collingwood J. 353.

WORDS AND PHRASES

"Agricultural building"—Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 2 (2).
National Pig Progeny Testing Board v. Greenall, C.A. 1265.

"Agricultural land"—Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act, 1928, s. 2 (2).
National Pig Progeny Testing Board v. Greenall, C.A. 1265.

"Any person unborn"—Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, s. 1.
In re Tinker's Settlement, Russell J. 1011.

"At any time"—Landlord and tenant—Option to purchase.
Longmuir v. Kew, Cross J. 862.

"Care and possession"—Adoption Act, 1958, s. 3 (1).
In re C. S. C., Roxburgh J. 304.

"Carriageway"—Highways Act, 1959, s. 295 (1).
Ching Garage Ltd. v. Chingford Corpn., C.A. 947.

"Channel"—Private Street Works Act, s. 6 (1).
Ware Urban District Council v. Gaunt, Divl.Ct. 1364.

"Connivance"—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (3).
Haynes v. Haynes and Sawkill, Wrangham J. 968.

"Disposition"—Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 141.
In re Browne (A Bankrupt), Cross J. 692.

"Dispute"—Institute of Civil Engineering General Conditions of Contract, cl. 66.
A. E. Farr Ltd. v. Ministry of Transport, Buckley J. 956.

"Distribution"—Finance Act, 1947, s. 36 (1) (c).
Inland Revenue Comrs. v. H. Dunning & Co. (1946) Ltd., Cross J. 1106.

"Due inquiry"—Medical Act, 1956, s. 36. Fox v. General Medical Council, J.C. 1017.

"Guard-rail"—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 27 (2).
Corn v. Weir's Glass (Hanley) Ltd., C.A. 577.

"Hand-rail"—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 27 (1).
Corn v. Weir's Glass (Hanley) Ltd., C.A. 577.

"Interest in a business passes on death"—Finance Act, 1954, s. 28 (1).
Burdett-Coutts v. Inland Revenue Comrs., Buckley J. 1027.

WORDS AND PHRASES—continued.

"Light industrial building"—Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order, 1950, art. 2 (2). Horwitz v. Rowson, Havers J. 803.

"Machinery"—Factories Act, 1937, s. 14 (1). Quintas v. National Smelting Co. Ltd., Devlin J. 217.

"Option for continuing for an extension of seven or fourteen years"—Landlord and tenant. Gardner v. Blaxill, Paull J. 752.

"Owner"—Treaty of Peace (Roumania) Order, 1948, art. 1 (5) (g). Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property, H.L.(E.) 917.

"Owner or occupier"—Licensing Act, 1953, s. 152 (2). Reg. v. Lewes Justices. Ex parte Plumpton and District Club Trustees, Divl.Ct. 700.

"Plant and machinery"—Finance Act, 1954, s. 28 (1). Burdett-Coutts v. Inland Revenue Comrs., Buckley J. 1027.

"Proceedings"—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (3). Haynes v. Haynes and Sawkill, Wrangham J. 968.

"Public as purchasers . . . of any goods"—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, s. 21 (1) (b). In re Black Bolt and Nut Association's Agreement, R.P.Ct.(E.&W.) 884.

"Refuge"—Highways Act, 1959, s. 68 (1). Ching Garage Ltd. v. Chingford Corpn., C.A. 947.

"Regulating the marketing"—Agricultural Marketing Act, 1931, s. 1 (1). Tuker v. Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, C.A. 819.

"Remuneration, loans or otherwise"—Finance Act, 1947, s. 36 (1) (c). Inland Revenue Comrs. v. H. Dunning & Co. (1946) Ltd., Cross J. 1106.

"Repository"—Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order, 1950, Sch. Horwitz v. Rowson, Havers J. 803.

"Restriction accepted in pursuance of any agreement"—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, s. 21 (1). In re Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, R.P.Ct. 393.

"Scheduled journey"—Air Corporations Act, 1949, s. 24. Director of Public Prosecutions v. Milbanke Tours Ltd., Divl.Ct. 630.

"Scheme regulating the marketing of an agricultural product"—Agricultural Marketing Act, 1931. Tuker v. Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, C.A. 819.

"Shop"—Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order, 1950, art. 2 (2). Horwitz v. Rowson, Havers J. 803.

"Social welfare"—Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955, s. 8 (1) (a). Victory (Ex-Services) Association Ltd. v. Paddington Borough Council, Divl.Ct. 106.

"Staircase"—Factories Act, 1937, s. 25 (2). Kimpton v. Steel Co. of Wales Ltd., C.A. 527.

"State in which [land] was immediately before beginning of the period of requisition"—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 89 (1). Routh's Trustees v. Central Land Board, C.A. 737.

"Street, (In a)"—Street Offences Act, 1959, s. 1 (1). Smith v. Hughes, Divl.Ct. 830.

"Temporary platform"—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, reg. 24 (5) (d). Westcott v. Structural and Marine Engineers Ltd., Divl.Ct. 349.

"Unsound mind"—Lunacy Act, 1890, s. 14. Buxton v. Jayne, C.A. 783.

"Wholly and exclusively laid out . . . for the purposes of the trade"—Income Tax Act, 1952, s. 137 (a). H. J. Rorke Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs., Cross J. 1132.

"Wilfully"—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1730, s. 1. French v. Elliott, Paull J. 40.

"Wrong"—M'Naghten Rules. Sofaer v. Sofaer, Collingwood J. 1173.

CASES JUDICIALLY CONSIDERED

PAGE

Admiralty Commissioners v. S.S. Volute [1922] 1 A.C. 129; 38 T.L.R. 225. Applied, Rushton v. Turner Brothers Asbestos Co. Ltd. 96
Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry Ltd. [1945] K.B. 189; [1945] 1 All E.R. 244. Applied, Akerib v. Booth and Others Ltd. 454
Arthur, decd., In the Goods of (1871) L.R. 2 P. & P. 273; 25 L.T. 274. Considered, In the Estate of Little, decd. 495, 501
Astle v. Astle [1939] P. 415; 55 T.L.R. 1045; [1939] 3 All E.R. 967. Applied, Robins v. Robins 1089

Balfour v. Balfour [1919] 2 K.B. 571; 35 T.L.R. 609. Distinguished, Parker v. Clark . . 286
Bank voor Handel en Scheepvaart N.V. v. Administrator of Hungarian Property [1954] A.C. 584; [1954] 2 W.L.R. 867; [1954] 1 All E.R. 969. Considered, Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property 917
Bath v. British Transport Commission [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1013, 1015; [1954] 2 All E.R. 542, C.A. Applied, Kimpton v. Steel Co. of Wales Ltd. 527
Bendall v. McWhirter [1952] 2 Q.B. 466; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 1332; [1952] 1 All E.R. 1307. Considered, Short v. Short 833
Benzon, In re [1914] 2 Ch. 68; 30 T.L.R. 435, C.A. Considered, Cotterell v. Price . . 1097
Betty's Cafés Ltd. v. Phillips [1959] A.C. 20; [1958] 2 W.L.R. 513; [1958] 1 All E.R. 607, H.L. Considered, Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v. Bath House Syndicate Ltd. . . 613
Bluett v. Stuchbury's (1908) 24 T.L.R. 469, C.A. Considered, Shindler v. Northern Raincoat Co. Ltd. 1038
Board of Education v. Rice [1911] A.C. 179, 182; 27 T.L.R. 378, H.L. Applied, Ceylon University v. Fernando 223
Borthwick, In re [1948] Ch. 645; 64 T.L.R. 471; [1948] 2 All E.R. 635, C.A. Applied, Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v. Bath House Syndicate Ltd. 613, 989
Bosley v. Bosley [1958] 1 W.L.R. 645; [1958] 1 All E.R. 167. Applied, Hall v. Hall . . 52
Bramwell v. Bramwell [1942] 1 K.B. 370, 374; 58 T.L.R. 148; [1942] 1 All E.R. 137, C.A. Dicta of Goddard L.J. applied, Short v. Short 833
Bristol Tramways Carriage Co. v. Fiat Motors [1910] 2 K.B. 831; 26 T.L.R. 629, C.A. Applied, Godley v. Perry 9
British Homophone Ltd. v. Kunz (1935) 152 L.T. 589. Distinguished, Beesly v. Hallwood Estates Ltd. 549
British and American Trustee and Finance Corpn. Ltd. v. Couper [1894] A.C. 399; 10 T.L.R. 415. Applied, In re Great Universal Stores Ltd. 78, 79
Brown v. Rolls Royce Ltd., 1959 S.L.T. (Notes) 73. Decision of the First Division of the Court of Session affirmed 210
Buckland v. Papillon (1866) 2 Ch. 67. Considered, Longmuir v. Kew 862
Butterworth v. Butterworth and Englefield [1920] P. 126, 136; 36 T.L.R. 265. Dicta of McCardie J. applied, Williams v. Settle 1072
Byrne v. Kinematograph Renters Society Ltd. [1958] 1 W.L.R. 762, 784; [1958] 2 All E.R. 578. Applied, Ceylon University v. Fernando 223

C. W. M., In re, 1941 No. 2396 [1951] 2 K.B. 714; [1951] 2 All E.R. 707. Considered, In re C., 1958 No. 1950 92
Caldow v. Pixell (1877) 36 L.T. 469, 470. Applied, Edward Ramia Ltd. v. African Woods Ltd. 86
Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons Ltd. [1948] A.C. 477, 486; 64 T.L.R. 384; [1948] 2 All E.R. 386, H.L. Applied, Quintas v. National Smelting Co. Ltd. 217
Cavanagh v. Ulster Weaving Co. Ltd. [1959] 3 W.L.R. 262, 273; [1959] 2 All E.R. 745. Dictum of Lord Keith of Avonholm considered, Brown v. Rolls Royce Ltd. . . 210, 213
Ceylon University v. Fernando (1956) 58 N.L.R. 265. Judgment of the Supreme Court of Ceylon reversed 223
Clark v. Molyneux (1877) 3 Q.B.D. 237, 243. Applied, "Truth" (N.Z.) Ltd. v. Holloway . 997
Clarke v. Grant [1950] 1 K.B. 104; 65 T.L.R. 241; [1949] 1 All E.R. 768. Considered, Isaac v. Hotel de Paris Ltd. 239
Clear v. Clear [1958] 1 W.L.R. 467; [1958] 2 All E.R. 353, C.A. Distinguished, Long v. Long 546
Coats (J. & P.) v. Chadwick [1894] 1 Ch. 347; 10 T.L.R. 226. Distinguished, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner & Keeler Ltd. 1145
Cobb v. Cobb [1955] 1 W.L.R. 731, 734; [1955] 2 All E.R. 696; Dictum of Denning L.J. considered, Short v. Short 833
Cobb v. Lane [1952] 1 T.L.R. 1037; [1952] 1 All E.R. 1199, C.A. Considered, Isaac v. Hotel de Paris Ltd. 239
Codd v. Delap [1906] W.N. 57. Considered, Gould v. National Provincial Bank Ltd. . . 417
Colfar v. Coggins & Griffith (Liverpool) Ltd. [1945] A.C. 197, 203; 61 T.L.R. 238; [1945] 1 All E.R. 326, H.L. Dictum of Viscount Simon L.C. considered, Dixon v. Cementation Co. Ltd. 746

PAGE

Colne Valley Water Co. v. Watford and St. Albans Gas Co. [1948] 1 K.B. 500; 64 T.L.R. 44; [1948] 1 All E.R. 104. Considered, Mascherpa v. Direct Ltd. 447, 451
Crofts v. Waterhouse (1825) 3 Bing. 319. Considered, Parish v. Judd 867
Crown Bedding Ltd. and South Wales Flock Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1946) 34 T.C. 107; [1946] 1 All E.R. 452, C.A. Applied, Ackland & Pratten Ltd. (In Liquidation) v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 1117
Cundy v. Lindsay (1878) 3 A.C. 459, H.L. Considered, Ingram v. Little 504
Cunliffe v. Goodman [1950] 2 K.B. 237; 66 T.L.R. 109; [1950] 1 All E.R. 720, C.A. Considered, Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v. Bath House Syndicate Ltd. 613
Currie v. Consolidated Kent Collieries Corpn. Ltd. [1906] 1 K.B. 134. Applied, Cook v. "X" Chair Patents Co. Ltd. 60

D. v. D. [1952] W.N. 486; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 791; [1952] 2 All E.R. 584. Considered, Collins v. Collins 660
Daw v. Eley (1868) 7 Eq.Cas. 49. Distinguished, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner & Keeler Ltd. 1145
De Verteuil v. Knaggs [1918] A.C. 557, 560; 34 T.L.R. 325, J.C. Dicta applied, Ceylon University v. Fernando 223
Debtor (No. 80 of 1957), In re a [1958] Ch. 81, 91; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 184, 191; [1957] 2 All E.R. 551. Dicta of Jenkins L.J. considered, Samson v. Samson 190, 193
Donald Campbell and Co. Ltd. v. Pollak [1927] A.C. 732; 43 T.L.R. 495, H.L. Applied, Mayer v. Harte 770
Drummond & Sons v. Van Ingen (E. H.) & Co. (1887) 12 App.Cas. 296; 3 T.L.R. 541. Dictum of Lord Macnaghten applied, Godley v. Perry 9
Duke's Court Estates Ltd. v. Associated British Engineering Ltd. [1948] Ch. 458, 461; 64 T.L.R. 373; [1948] 2 All E.R. 137. Dicta distinguished, Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Jackson 873

Emanuel v. Symon [1908] 1 K.B. 302; 24 T.L.R. 85. Considered, In re Trepca Mines Ltd. 24, 29
Errington v. Errington [1952] 1 K.B. 290; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 231; [1952] 1 All E.R. 149, C.A. Considered, Isaac v. Hotel de Paris Ltd. 239
Errington v. Minister of Health [1935] 1 K.B. 249; 51 T.L.R. 44. Considered, Reg. v. Registrar of Building Societies, ex parte A Building Society (Div.Ct. and C.A.) . . 669
Evans Medical Supplies Ltd. v. Moriarty [1958] 1 W.L.R. 66, 76; 37 T.C. 540; [1957] 3 All E.R. 718, H.L. Applied, Jeffrey v. Rolls-Royce Ltd. 720

Farr (A. E.) Ltd. v. Admiralty [1953] 1 W.L.R. 965; [1953] 2 All E.R. 512. Applied, Akerib v. Booth and Others Ltd. 454
Featherstone, In re (1953) 37 Cr.App.R. 146. Considered, In re Wring: In re Cook (Practice Note) 138
Flanagan v. Fahy [1918] I.R. 2 K.B. 361. Considered, Fox v. General Medical Council . 1017
Flint v. Pike (1825) 4 B. & C. 473; 6 Dow. & Ry.K.B. 528. Not followed, Burnett & Hallamshire Fuel Ltd. v. Sheffield Telegraph & Star Ltd. 502

G. v. M. (1885) 10 App.Cas. 171, 186. Considered, Bullock v. Bullock 975
Gaskell & Chambers Ltd. v. Hudson, Dodsworth & Co. [1936] 2 K.B. 595. Considered, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner & Keeler Ltd. 1145
General Medical Council v. Spackman [1943] A.C. 627, 638; 59 T.L.R. 412; [1943] 2 All E.R. 337. Dictum of Lord Atkin considered, Ceylon University v. Fernando . 223, 231
Gilbert v. Endean (1878) 9 Ch.D. 259, 269, C.A. Dicta of Cotton L.J. applied, Rossage v. Rossage [1960] 1 W.L.R. 249. Considered, In re J. 253
Gill v. Gill [1957] P. 151; [1956] 3 W.L.R. 695; [1956] 3 All E.R. 240. Distinguished, Onions v. Onions 983
Glen v. Inland Revenue, 1926 S.C. 44. Considered, Burdett-Coutts v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 1027
Goldthorpe v. Bain [1952] 2 Q.B. 455; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 1512; [1952] 2 All E.R. 23, C.A. Explained, Chung Kwok Hotel Co. Ltd. v. Field 1112
Goulard v. Sir Coutts Lindsay & Co. Ltd. (1887) 4 R.P.C. 189. Distinguished, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner & Keeler Ltd. 1145
Grant, v. Australian Knitting Mills [1936] A.C. 85; 52 T.L.R. 38. Applied, Godley v. Perry 9
Green v. Green and Partridge [1958] 1 W.L.R. 1104; [1958] 3 All E.R. 242. Considered, Collins v. Collins 660
Greenock Corporation v. Caledonian Railway Co. Ltd. [1917] A.C. 556; 33 T.L.R. 531, H.L. Followed, Pemberton v. Bright 436
Gregory v. Queen's Proctor (1846) 4 Notes of Cases 620. Applied, In the Estate of Little, decd. 495
Griffith v. Pelton [1958] Ch. 205; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 522; [1957] 3 All E.R. 75, C.A. Considered, Beesly v. Hallwood Estates Ltd. 549
Guildford Rural District Council v. Fortescue [1959] 2 Q.B. 112; [1959] 2 W.L.R. 643; [1959] 2 All E.R. 111. Dictum of Lord Evershed M.R. considered, Marshall v. Nottingham Corpn. 707

PAGE

Hammersley v. De Biel (1845) 12 Cl. & Fin. 45, 78. Dictum of Lord Lyndhurst L.C. applied, Parker v. Clark 286
Hanson v. Newman [1934] Ch. 298, 304; 50 T.L.R. 191, C.A. Dictum of Lawrence L.J. applied, Jaquin v. Holland 258
Harper, In re (1882) 21 Ch.D. 537. Considered, In re Browne 692
Harward v. Hackney Union Guardians of the Poor (1898) 14 T.L.R. 306. Considered, Buxton v. Jayne 783
Haskell Golf Ball Co. v. Hutchinson (1904) 21 R.P.C. 497. Considered, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner & Keeler Ltd. 1145
Helby v. Matthews [1895] A.C. 471; 11 T.L.R. 446, H.L. Considered, Beesly v. Hallwood Estates Ltd. 549
Henderson v. Henderson [1944] A.C. 49, 52–53; 60 T.L.R. 113; [1944] 1 All E.R. 44, H.L. Applied, Willan v. Willan 624
Hersey v. Giblett (1854) 18 Beav. 174. Applied, Gardner v. Blaxill 752
Hichens v. Hichens [1945] P. 23, 26; 61 T.L.R. 302; [1945] 1 All E.R. 451, C.A. Dictum of Lord Goddard considered, Samson v. Samson 190
Hill v. William Hill (Park Lane) Ltd. [1949] A.C. 530; 65 T.L.R. 471; [1949] 2 All E.R. 452, H.L. Considered, In re Browne 692
Hollington Bros. Ltd. v. Rhodes [1951] 2 T.L.R. 691. Considered, Beesly v. Hallwood Estates Ltd. 549, 562
Holloway's Trusts, In re (1909) 26 T.L.R. 62. Distinguished, In re Jewish Orphanage Charity Endowments Trusts 344
Hong v. A. & R. Brown Ltd. [1948] 1 K.B. 515; 64 T.L.R. 132; [1948] 1 All E.R. 185. Considered, Mayer v. Harte 770
Hope v. Great Western Railway Co. [1937] 2 K.B. 130; 53 T.L.R. 399; [1937] 1 All E.R. 625, C.A. Applied, Pease v. George 427
Horn v. Minister of Health [1937] 1 K.B. 164, 186; [1936] 2 All E.R. 1299. Dictum of Scott L.J. considered, Reg. v. Registrar of Building Societies, Ex parte A Building Society, C.A. 669
Horton v. Horton, 64 T.L.R. 62; [1947] 2 All E.R. 871, H.L. Applied, Jodla v. Jodla . . 236
Horwood v. Statesman Publishing Co. (1929) 98 L.J.K.B. 450, 453; 45 T.L.R. 237, C.A. Dictum of Scrutton L.J. applied, Daws v. Daily Sketch and Daily Graphic Ltd. . . 126
Hutchinson v. Hutchinson (sub nom. H. v. H.) 63 T.L.R. 645; [1947] 2 All E.R. 792. Considered, Short v. Short 833
Hutton v. Watling [1948] 1 Ch. 26; 64 T.L.R. 326; [1948] 1 All E.R. 803, C.A. Considered, Longmuir v. Kew 862
Hyams v. Stuart King [1908] 2 K.B. 596; 24 T.L.R. 675, C.A. Considered, In re Browne 669

Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Buxton Palace Hotel Ltd. (1948) 29 T.C. 329, 334. Observations of Atkinson J. considered, Henry Briggs, Son & Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 532, 540
Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Chappie Ltd. (1953) 34 T.C. 509, C.A. Applied, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. H. Dunning & Co. (1946) Ltd. 1106
Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Desoutter Bros. (1945) 62 T.L.R. 110; [1945] 2 All E.R. 532; 29 T.C. 155. Applied, Henry Briggs, Son & Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. . . 532
Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Lactagol Ltd. (1954) 35 T.C. 230. Distinguished, Inland Revenue Comrs. v. H. Dunning & Co. (1946) Ltd. 1106
Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Pollock & Peel Ltd. (In Liquidation) [1957] 1 W.L.R. 822; 37 T.C. 240; [1957] 2 All E.R. 483, C.A. Ackland & Pratten Ltd. (In Liquidation) v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 1117
Islington, West Division Case, Medhurst v. Lough and Gasquet (1901) 17 T.L.R. 210, 230; 5 O'M. & H. 120. Distinguished, In re Kensington North Parliamentary Election . 762

Jamieson v. Jamieson [1952] A.C. 525, 550; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 833; [1952] 1 All E.R. 875, H.L. Applied, Bohnel v. Bohnel 590
Joseph's Will Trusts [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1019; [1959] 3 All E.R. 474n. Not followed, In re Hambleden's Will Trusts 82

Kinally v. Home Office, The Times, July 25, 1959. Considered, Reg. v. Governor of Parkhurst Prison, Ex parte Philpot 115, 117
Knight v. Calder Grove Estates (1954) 35 T.C. 447. Considered, H. J. Rorke Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 1132

Lancaster Banking Corporation, Ex parte. In re Westby (1878) 10 Ch.D. 776. Considered, Cotterell v. Price 1097
Lane v. Esdaile [1891] A.C. 210, H.L. Applied, Whitehouse v. Board of Control . . . 1093
Lee v. Lee [1952] 2 Q.B. 489; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 968; [1952] 1 All E.R. 1294. Dicta of Somervell L.J. considered, Short v. Short 833
Leeds and Batley Breweries Ltd., In re [1920] 2 Ch. 548. Considered, Longmuir v. Kew . 862

PAGE

Lever Finance v. Trustee of the Property of L. N. & H. M. Needleman (Bankrupts) [1956] Ch. 375, 382; [1956] 3 W.L.R. 72; [1956] 2 All E.R. 378. Dictum of Harman J. applied, Stroud Building Society v. Delamont 431
Lewis v. Lewis [1908] P. 1; 24 T.L.R. 45. Applied, In the Estate of Little, decd. . . 495
Lilley v. Roney (1892) 8 T.L.R. 642; 61 L.J.Q.B. 727, D.C. Distinguished, Lincoln v. Daniels 852
London & Globe Finance Corporation, In re [1903] 1 Ch. 728, 732; 19 T.L.R. 314. Dictum of Buckley J. considered, Welham v. Director of Public Prosecutions 669
Loudon v. Ryder [1953] 2 Q.B. 202, 209; [1953] 2 W.L.R. 537; [1953] 1 All E.R. 741. Dicta of Singleton L.J. applied, Williams v. Settle 1072

McIlroy v. Clements [1923] W.N. 81, C.A. Considered, Longmuir v. Kew 862
Maitland v. Raisbeck and Hewitt Ltd. [1944] 1 K.B. 689; 60 T.L.R. 521; [1944] 2 All E.R. 272, C.A. Applied, Parish v. Judd 867
Manley v. Sartori [1927] 1 Ch. 157. Applied, Burdett-Coutts v. Inland Revenue Comrs. . 1027
Marrison v. Bell [1939] 2 K.B. 187; 55 T.L.R. 475; [1939] 1 All E.R. 745, C.A. Considered, Orman v. Saville Sportswear Ltd. 1055
Merigan (Doe d.) v. Daly (1846) 8 Q.B. 934. Considered, Short v. Short 833
Mexborough (Earl) v. Whitwood Urban District Council [1897] 2 Q.B. 111; 13 T.L.R. 443, C.A. Applied, Mascherpa v. Direct Ltd. 447
Miles v. Chilton (orse. Miles) (1849) 1 Rob.Ecc. 684. Distinguished, Bullock v. Bullock . 975
Moon v. London County Council [1931] A.C. 151, 166; 47 T.L.R. 154. Dictum of Lord Dunedin applied, Harry Ferguson Research Ltd. v. Dawkins 639
Moor Line Ltd. v. Distillers Co. Ltd., 1912 S.C. 514. Considered, Union of India v. Compagnia Naviera Aeolus S.A. 297
Morelli v. Fitch & Gibbons [1928] 2 K.B. 636; 44 T.L.R. 737, D.C. Applied, Godley v. Perry 9
Morris Motors Ltd. v. Lilley [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1184; [1959] 3 All E.R. 737. Considered, Morris Motors Ltd. v. Phelan (Practice Note) 352, 353
Morton v. William Dixon Ltd., 1909 S.C. 807, 809. Dictum of Lord President Dunedin considered, Brown v. Rolls Royce Ltd. 210, 213
Moss v. Barton (1866) L.R. 1 Eq. 474. Considered, Longmuir v. Kew 862
Mountney v. Watton (1931) 2 B. & Ad. 673, 678. Applied, "Truth" (N.Z.) Ltd. v. Holloway 997
Mullard Radio Valve Co. Ltd. v. Rothermel Corpn. Ltd. (1933) 51 R.P.C. 1. Considered, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner & Keeler Ltd. 1145
Munday v. Asprey (1880) 13 Ch.D. 855, 857. Dictum of Fry J. not followed, Parker v. Clark 286

National Deposit Friendly Society Trustees v. Skegness Urban District Council [1959] A.C. 293, 317; [1958] 3 W.L.R. 172; [1958] 2 All E.R. 601. Dictum of Lord Denning considered, Victory (Ex-Services) Association Ltd. v. Paddington Borough Council . 106
Nelson v. Nelson (James) & Sons Ltd. [1914] 2 K.B. 770; 30 T.L.R. 368, C.A. Considered, Shindler v. Northern Raincoat Co. Ltd. 1038
Newgrosh v. Newgrosh (cited in Rimmer v. Rimmer) [1953] 1 Q.B. 63, 68; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 767; [1952] 2 All E.R. 863, C.A. Considered, Samson v. Samson 190
Newman (R. S.) Ltd., In re Raphael's Claim [1916] 2 Ch. 309. Considered, Cook v. "X" Chair Patents Co. Ltd. 60, 62

Osborne v. Barton (1951) 66 T.L.R. (Pt. 1) 115. Considered, Reg. v. Dawson . . 163, 175
Osgood v. Nelson (1872) L.R. 5 H.L. 636, H.L. Considered, Ceylon University v. Fernando 223
Oxted Motor Co. Ltd., In re [1921] 3 K.B. 32; 37 T.L.R. 757. Distinguished, In re Pearce Duff & Co. Ltd. 1014

Pardy v. Pardy [1939] P. 288; 55 T.L.R. 1037; [1939] 3 All E.R. 779. Distinguished, Hall v. Hall 52
Pargeter v. Pargeter [1946] 1 All E.R. 570. Considered, Short v. Short 833
Paris v. Stepney Borough Council [1951] A.C. 367; [1951] 1 T.L.R. 25; [1951] 1 All E.R. 42, H.L. Applied, Brown v. Rolls Royce Ltd. 210
Parker and Cooper Ltd. v. Reading [1926] Ch. 975. Distinguished, In re Pearce Duff & Co. Ltd. 1014
Patrick v. Broadstone Mills Ltd. (1954) 35 T.C. 44; [1954] 1 All E.R. 163, C.A. Considered, Duple Motor Bodies Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 510
Payne v. Railway Executive [1951] 1 K.B. 26; [1951] 2 T.L.R. 929; [1951] 2 All E.R. 910, C.A. Applied, Judd v. Hammersmith, etc., Hospitals Board 328
Perpetual Executor and Trustee Association of Australia Ltd. v. Commissioner of Taxes for the Commonwealth of Australia [1954] A.C. 114; [1954] 2 W.L.R. 171; [1954] 1 All E.R. 339, P.C. Applied, Burdett-Coutts v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 1027
Petrie v. MacFisheries Ltd. [1940] 1 K.B. 258; 56 T.L.R. 119; [1939] 4 All E.R. 281, C.A. Considered, Orman v. Saville Sportswear Ltd. 1055
Pinson v. Lloyds and National Provincial Foreign Bank Ltd. [1941] 2 K.B. 72; 57 T.L.R. 558; [1941] 2 All E.R. 636, C.A. Applied, Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Jackson 873

PAGE

Practice Note (Prison Commissioners' Report) [1959] 1 W.L.R. 849; [1959] 2 All E.R. 734; sub nom. Reg. v. Wintle, 43 Cr.App.R. 191. Considered, Reg. v. Governor of Parkhurst Prison, Ex parte Philpot 115, 118
Preston-Jones v. Preston-Jones [1951] A.C. 391, 401, 417; [1951] 1 T.L.R. 8; [1951] 1 All E.R. 124, H.L. Dicta applied, Horton v. Horton 987
Proudfoot v. Hart (1890) 25 Q.B.D. 42; 6 T.L.R. 305, C.A. Applied, Jaquin v. Holland . 258

Rahimtoola v. Nizam of Hyderabad [1958] A.C. 379; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 884; [1957] 3 All E.R. 441. Considered, Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property . . . 917
Read v. Astoria Garage (Streatham) Ltd. [1952] 1 T.L.R. 1059; [1952] 1 All E.R. 922; [1952] Ch. 637; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 130; [1952] 2 All E.R. 292, C.A. Considered, Shindler v. Northern Raincoat Co. Ltd. 1038
Rederiaktiebolaget Transatlantic v. La Compagnie Française des Phosphates de l'Oceanie (1926) 32 Com.Cas. 126, C.A. Distinguished, Union of India v. Compania Naviera Aeolus S.A. 297
Rees v. Rees (1873) L.R. 3 P. & D. 84; 29 L.T. 375. Applied, In the Estate of Little, decd. 495, 499
Reg. v. Camborne Justices, Ex parte Pearce [1955] 1 Q.B. 41; [1954] 3 W.L.R. 415; [1954] 2 All E.R. 850, D.C. Applied, Reg. v. Registrar of Building Societies, Ex parte A Building Society 669
Reg. v. Cole (1889) 24 L.R.Ir. 522, C.C.R. Considered, Fox v. General Medical Council . 1017
Reg. v. Craske, Ex parte Metropolitan Police Commissioner [1957] 2 Q.B. 591; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 308; [1957] 2 All E.R. 772. Considered, Reg. v. Bennett. Ex parte Radburn 102
Reg. v. Devine [1956] 1 W.L.R. 236; [1956] 1 All E.R. 548. Applied, Reg. v. Chapman . 147
Reg. v. Farquhar (1874) L.R. 9 Q.B. 258. Applied, Reg. v. Woodbury Licensing Justices, Ex parte Rouse 461
Reg. v. Fulham, Hammersmith and Kensington Rent Tribunal. Ex parte Hierowski [1953] 2 Q.B. 147; [1953] 2 W.L.R. 1028; [1953] 2 All E.R. 4, 6, D.C. Dictum of Lord Goddard C.J. not followed, Reg. v. Agricultural Land Tribunal for South Eastern Area. Ex parte Bracey 911
Reg. v. Gazard (1838) 8 C. & P. 595. Considered, McKinley v. McKinley . . . 120, 122
Reg. v. Hammersley (1958) 42 Cr.App.R. 207. Distinguished, Reg. v. Dawson; Reg. v. Wenlock 163
Reg. v. Harvey (1858) 8 Cox C.C. 99. Considered, McKinley v. McKinley . . . 120, 123
Reg. v. Havant Justices. Ex parte Jacobs [1957] 1 W.L.R. 365; 41 Cr.App.R. 62; [1957] 1 All E.R. 475, D.C. Distinguished, Reg. v. Keeley 749
Reg. v. Ingram [1956] 2 Q.B. 424; [1956] 3 W.L.R. 309; [1956] 2 All E.R. 639. Considered, Reg. v. Dawson 163, 175
Reg. v. Judge Willis, Ex parte Abbey National Building Society [1954] 1 W.L.R. 136. Applied, Williams v. Settle 1072
Reg. v. Kennedy [1893] 1 Q.B. 533, D.C. Considered, Holloway v. Dover Corporation . . 604
Reg. v. Stally [1960] 1 W.L.R. 79; [1959] 3 All E.R. 814, C.A. Applied, D. (An Infant) v. Parsons 797
Reigate v. Union Manufacturing (Ramsbottom) Co. Ltd. [1918] 1 K.B. 592, 605, C.A. Applied, Orman v. Saville Sportswear Ltd. 1055
Reohorn v. Barry Corporation [1956] 1 W.L.R. 845; [1956] 2 All E.R. 742, C.A. Considered, Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v. Bath House Syndicate Ltd. 613
Revell, Ex parte, In re Tollemache (No. 1) (1884) 13 Q.B.D. 720, C.A. Applied, In re Browne 692
Rex v. Benjamin (1913) 8 Cr.App.R. 146, C.C.A. Considered, Fox v. General Medical Council 1017
Rex v. Birch (1924) 18 Cr.App.R. 26; 40 T.L.R. 365, C.C.A. Applied, Reg. v. Golder . . 1169
Rex v. Cooper and Compton (1947) 32 Cr.App.R. 102. Dicta of Sankey J. applied, Reg. v. Dawson; Reg. v. Wenlock 163
Rex v. Dickson [1950] 1 K.B. 394; 65 T.L.R. 749; [1949] 2 All E.R. 810. Explained, Reg. v. Governor of Parkhurst Prison. Ex parte Philpot 115
Rex v. Harris (1927) 20 Cr.App.R. 144, C.C.A. Applied, Reg. v. Golder 1169
Rex v. Johnson (1913) 9 Cr.App.R. 262. Considered, Reg. v. Dawson; Reg. v. Wenlock . 163
Rex v. Luberg (1926) 19 Cr.App.R. 133, 137. Dictum of Stanley J. applied, Reg. v. Dawson; Reg. v. Wenlock 163
Rex v. Meyrick and Ribuffi (1929) 21 Cr.App.R. 94. Distinguished, Reg. v. Dawson; Reg. v. Wenlock 163
Rex v. Russell, The Times, May 30, 1935. Explained, Reg. v. Golder 1169
Rex v. Smith (1915) 11 Cr.App.R. 81. Considered, Reg. v. Dawson; Reg. v. Wenlock . . 163
Rex v. Sussex Justices, Ex parte McCarthy [1924] 1 K.B. 256; 40 T.L.R. 80, D.C. Applied, Reg. v. Registrar of Building Societies, Ex parte A Building Society 669
Rex v. White (1922) 17 Cr.App.R. 59, C.C.A. Applied, Reg. v. Golder 1169
Rider v. Ford [1923] 1 Ch. 541. Considered, Longmuir v. Kew 862
Roberts v. Hopwood [1925] A.C. 578; 41 T.L.R. 436. Applied, Taylor v. Munrow . . 151
Rossage v. Rossage [1960] 1 W.L.R. 249. Applied, In re J. 253
Rudow v. Great Britain Mutual Life Assurance Society (1881) 17 Ch.D. 600, 607, 610. Explained, Mayer v. Harte 770

PAGE

Russell v. Duke of Norfolk (1948) 65 T.L.R. 225, 231; [1949] 1 All E.R. 109, 118. Dictum of Tucker L.J. considered, Ceylon University v. Fernando 223, 231

St. Martin's Theatre, In re [1959] 1 W.L.R. 872; [1959] 3 All E.R. 298. Considered, Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v. Bath House Syndicate Ltd. 613, 989
St. Mungo Manufacturing Co. v. Hutchinson Main & Co. Ltd. (1908) 25 R.P.C. 356. Distinguished, Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner & Keeler Ltd. 1145
Salisbury v. Gilmore [1942] 2 K.B. 38; 58 T.L.R. 226; [1942] 1 All E.R. 457. Applied, Keats v. Graham 30
Sanderson, Ex parte, In re Alexander (1856) 8 De G.M. & G. 849. Considered, In re Browne 692
Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan [1940] A.C. 880, 895–896, 902, 912–913; 56 T.L.R. 887; [1940] 3 All E.R. 399. Dicta considered and applied, Pemberton v. Bright . . . 436
Sheffield Corporation v. Luxford [1929] 2 K.B. 180; 45 T.L.R. 491. Considered, Short v. Short 833
Sherwood v. Tucker [1924] 2 Ch. 440; 40 T.L.R. 782, C.A. Considered, Longmuir v. Kew . 862
Simmons v. Mitchell (1880) 6 App.Cas. 156, P.C. Applied, "Truth" (N.Z.) Ltd. v. Holloway 997
Sirdar Gurdyal Singh v. Rajah of Faridkote [1894] A.C. 670; 10 T.L.R. 621. Considered, In re Trepca Mines Ltd. 24, 29
Skegness Urban District Council v. Derbyshire Miners' Welfare Committee [1959] A.C. 807, 823, 827; [1959] 2 W.L.R. 717; [1959] 2 All E.R. 258, H.L.(E.). Applied, Isaacs v. Market Bosworth R. D. C. 277
Smith v. Neale (1857) 2 C.B.N.S. 67. Applied, Parker v. Clark 286
Southern Foundries (1926) Ltd. v. Shirlaw [1940] A.C. 701; 56 T.L.R. 637; [1940] 2 All E.R. 445, H.L. Applied, Shindler v. Northern Raincoat Co. Ltd. 1038
Sperling, In the Goods of (1863) 3 Sw. & Tr. 272. Considered, In the Estate of Cook, decd. 353, 354
Stewart v. Stewart [1948] 1 K.B. 507, 513; 64 T.L.R. 115; [1947] 2 All E.R. 813, C.A. Dicta of Tucker L.J. applied, Short v. Short 833
Stirling v. Maitland (1865) 34 L.J.Q.B. 1; 5 B. & S. 840. Applied, Shindler v. Northern Raincoat Co. Ltd. 1038
Subramaniam v. Public Prosecutor [1956] 1 W.L.R. 965. Applied, Reg. v. Willis . . 55
Summers (John) & Sons Ltd. v. Frost [1955] A.C. 740, 758; [1955] 2 W.L.R. 825; [1955] 1 All E.R. 870. Applied, Quintas v. National Smelting Co. Ltd. 217
Synge v. Synge [1894] 1 Q.B. 466; 10 T.L.R. 194, C.A. Applied, Parker v. Clark . . 286

Tideway Investment and Property Holdings v. Wellwood [1952] Ch. 791; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 365; [1952] 2 All E.R. 514, C.A. Dictum of Evershed M.R. considered, Leslie v. Liverpool Corporation 1
Tobacco Trade Benevolent Association Charitable Trusts, In re [1958] 1 W.L.R. 1113, 1116; [1958] 3 All E.R. 353. Dictum of Harman J. considered, In re Jewish Orphanage Charity Endowments Trusts 344
Trathan v. Trathan [1955] 1 W.L.R. 805; [1955] 2 All E.R. 701. Applied, Pepper v. Pepper 131
Travers (Joseph) & Sons Ltd. v. Cooper [1915] 1 K.B. 73. Applied, Akerib v. Booth and Others Ltd. 454

Wake v. Taylor, The Times, July 8, 1952. Considered, Short v. Short 833
Wallasey Brick and Land Co., In re [1894] W.N. 20. Dicta of Kekewich J. explained, In re Great Universal Stores Ltd. 78
Walsall Overseers of the Poor v. L. & N. W. Railway Co. (1878) L.R. 4 App.Cas. 30, 39, 40, H.L. Applied, In re Scremby Corn Rents 648
Watkins, In re, decd. [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1323; [1953] 2 All E.R. 1113. Considered, Bullock v. Bullock 975
Westminster City Council v. Southern Railway Co. [1936] A.C. 511, 532; 52 T.L.R. 541; [1936] 2 All E.R. 322. Considered, Peak v. Burley Golf Club 568
Whimster & Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs., 1926 S.C. 20; 12 T.C. 813. Considered, Duple Motor Bodies Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 510
White v. White [1950] P. 39, 53; 65 T.L.R. 524; [1949] 2 All E.R. 339. Dicta of Asquith L.J. applied, Sofaer v. Sofaer 1173
Wholesale and Retail Bakers of Scotland Association's Agreement (1959) L.R. 1 R.P. 347, 379, 382. Applied, In re Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement [1960] 1 W.L.R. 393; In re Phenol Producers' Agreement 464
Wilkins v. Wilkins [1896] P. 108; 12 T.L.R. 212, C.A. Considered, Bullock v. Bullock . 975
Williams v. Sykes & Harrison [1955] 1 W.L.R. 1180; [1955] 3 All E.R. 225. Applied, Rushton v. Turner Brothers Asbestos Co. Ltd. 96
Williams v. Williams, The Times, March 15, 1958. Distinguished, Bohnel v. Bohnel . . 590
Woodland v. Woodland [1928] P. 169; 44 T.L.R. 495. Considered, Bullock v. Bullock . . 975
Working Men's Club and Institute Union Ltd. v. Swansea Corporation [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1197; [1959] 3 All E.R. 769. Distinguished, Victory (Ex-Services) Association Ltd. v. Paddington Borough Council 106

STATUTES JUDICIALLY CONSIDERED

PAGE

1730 Landlord and Tenant Act (4 Geo. 2, c. 28)—
s. 1: French v. Elliott 40
1801 Inclosure Act (Scremby) (41 Geo. 3, c. cxxiv)—
In re Scremby Corn Rents 648
1824 Vagrancy Act (5 Geo. 4, c. 83)—
s. 4: Reg. v. James 812
1835 Highways Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50)—
s. 67: Pemberton v. Bright 436
1837 Wills Act (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26)—
s. 9: In the Estate of Cook, decd. 353
s. 9: In the Estate of Little, decd. 495
1839 Metropolitan Police Act (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47)—
s. 54 (13): Bryan v. Robinson 506
1852 Wills Act Amendment Act (15 & 16 Vict. c. 24)—
s. 1: In the Estate of Little, decd. 495
1876 Appellate Jurisdiction Act (39 & 40 Vict. c. 59)—
s. 3: Whitehouse v. Board of Control 1093
1882 Married Women's Property Act (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75)—
s. 17: Samson v. Samson 190
s. 17: Short v. Short 833
1890 Lunacy Act (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5)—
s. 14 (1) (a) and s. 300: Buxton v. Jayne 783
s. 330 (2): Whitehouse v. Board of Control 1093
1891 Stamp Act (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39)—
Sch. 1: Henry Ansbacher & Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 337
1892 Private Street Works Act (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57)—
ss. 6, 7, 8, 10, 11: Wilson v. Wrexham Corpn. 319 1893 Sale of Goods Act (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71)—
ss. 14 (1) (2), 15 (2) (c): Godley v. Perry 9 1894 Finance Act (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30)—
ss. 1, 9: In re Boulton 140
1895 Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39)—
s. 7: Pepper v. Pepper 131
1901 Factory and Workshop Act (1 Edw. 7, c. 22)—
s. 149 (1) (a) (i), Sch. VI: Harry Ferguson Research Ltd. v. Dawkins . . . 639 1907 Criminal Appeal Act (7 Edw. 7, c. 23)—
s. 5 (2): R. v. Dawson 163
1914 Bankruptcy Act (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 59)—
s. 141, Sch. 11, r. 24: In re Browne (A Bankrupt) 692
Sch. II, r. 13 (c): Cotterell v. Price 1097
1916 Larceny Act (6 & 7 Geo. 5, c. 50)— ss. 20, 43 (2) (3): R. v. Dawson; R. v. Wenlock 163
ss. 26 (1), 27 (2): R. v. Nicholls 658
1923 Union of Benefices Measure (14 & 15 Geo. 5, No. 2)—
s. 10 (3) (5): Little Leigh Parochial Church Council v. Church Commissioners . . 567 1925 Trustee Act (15 Geo. 5, c. 19)—
s. 25 (4): Practice Direction (Trustee's Absence) 355 Law of Property Act (15 Geo. 5, c. 20)—
s. 40 (1): Parker v. Clark 286
s. 95: Cotterell v. Price 1097
s. 109 (2): Stroud Building Society v. Delamont 431
s. 146 (2): Mascherpa v. Direct Ltd. 447
s. 171 (1) (5): In re C., 1958 No. 1950 92
Land Charges Act (15 Geo. 5, c. 22)—
ss. 10 (1), Class C (iv), 13 (2): Beesly v. Hallwood Estates Ltd. 549
Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 49)—
s. 31 (1) (i): Whitehouse v. Board of Control 1093
1927 Landlord and Tenant Act (17 & 18 Geo. 5, c. 36)—
s. 18 (1): Keats v. Graham 30
s. 18 (1): Jaquin v. Holland 258 1928 Rating and Valuation (Apportionment) Act (18 & 19 Geo. 5, c. 44)—
s. 3 (1): Harry Ferguson Research Ltd. v. Dawkins 639 1930 Mental Treatment Act (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 23)—
s. 16 (1): Buxton v. Jayne 783
s. 16 (1): Whitehouse v. Board of Control 1093
Road Traffic Act (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 43)—
s. 21: R. v. Edmonton Justices. Ex parte Brooks 697
s. 28 (1): R. v. Stally 79
ss. 28 (1), 35 (1): D. (An Infant) v. Parsons 797

PAGE

1931 Agricultural Marketing Act (21 & 22 Geo. 5, c. 42)—
ss. 1 (1) (8), 5, 6 (1): Tuker v. Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food . . 819

1933 Agricultural Marketing Act (23 & 24 Geo. 5, c. 31)—
s. 19, Sch. 3: Tuker v. Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food 819

1934 Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act (24 & 25 Geo. 5, c. 4)—
ss. 1 (2), 2 (3): Stanton v. Ewart F. Youldon Ltd. 543

Debts Clearing Offices and Imports Restrictions Act (24 & 25 Geo. 5, c. 31)—
s. 1: Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property 917

Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act (24 & 25 Geo. 5, c. 41)—
s. 3 (1): Carr v. Boxall 314

County Courts Act (24 & 25 Geo. 5, c. 53)—
ss. 40, 41: Leslie v. Liverpool Corpn. 1
ss. 43, 45, 65: Williams v. Settle 1072

1937 Finance Act (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 54)—
s. 19 (4), sch. 4, para. 7 (1A): Henry Briggs, Son & Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 532

Factories Act (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67)—
s. 14 (1): Quintas v. National Smelting Co. Ltd. 217
s. 14 (1): Rushton v. Turner Brothers Asbestos Co. Ltd. 96
s. 20 (2) (b): Ackland & Pratten Ltd. (In Liquidation) v. Inland Revenue Comrs. . 1117
s. 25 (2): Corn v. Weir's (Glass) Ltd. 577
s. 25 (2): Kimpton v. Steel Co. of Wales Ltd. 527

1938 Hire-Purchase Act (1 & 2 Geo. 6, c. 53)—
s. 8 (2) (3): Samson v. Samson 190

1939 Trading with the Enemy Act (2 & 3 Geo. 6, c. 89)—
Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property 917

1946 National Health Service Act (9 & 10 Geo. 6, c. 81)—
s. 50 and Sch. 9, Pt. I: Buxton v. Jayne 783

1947 Treaties of Peace (Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, Hungary and Finland) Act (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 23)—
Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property 917

Finance Act (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 35)—
s. 32 (1): Henry Briggs, Son & Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 532 ss. 35 (1), 36 (1) (4): Ackland & Pratten Ltd. (In Liquidation) v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 1117
s. 36 (1) (c): Inland Revenue Comrs. v. H. Dunning & Co. (1946) Ltd. . . . 1106

Town and Country Planning Act (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 51)—
s. 12 (1) (2) (f): Horwitz v. Rowson 803
ss. 58 (1), 61 (5), 89: Routh's Trustees v. Central Land Board 737

1948 Companies Act (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 38)—
s. 141 (2): In re Pearce Duff & Co. Ltd. 1014
s. 206: In re Great Universal Stores Ltd. 78
s. 352: In re Servers of the Blind League 564

Criminal Justice Act (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 58)—
s. 6 (4): R. v. Chapman 147
s. 20 (5) (a): R. v. Dangerfield 268 ss. 21 (4) (5), 23: R. v. Governor of Parkhurst Prison, Ex parte Philpot . . . 115
s. 22: R. v. Mordanam 7

Agricultural Holdings Act (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 63)— ss. 24 (2) (d), 26 (1) (a) (d): French v. Elliott 40
s. 25 (1) (b): Evans v. Roper 814

1949 Lands Tribunal Act (12, 13 & 14 Geo. 6, c. 42)—
s. 3 (4): Routh's Trustees v. Central Land Board 737

Legal Aid and Advice Act (12, 13 & 14 Geo. 6, c. 51)—
ss. 1 (7) (b), 2 (e), 3 (1): Blatcher v. Heaysman 663

Representation of the People Act (12, 13 & 14 Geo. 6, c. 68)—
s. 16 (3): In re Kensington North Parliamentary Election 762

Pastoral Reorganisation Measure (12 & 13 Geo. 6, No. 3)—
s. 3 (2): Little Leigh Parochial Church Council v. Church Commissioners . . . 567

1950 Matrimonial Causes Act (14 Geo. 6, c. 25)—
s. 4: Scott v. Scott (Quine cited) 915
s. 14 (1): Haniver v. Haniver 310
s. 18 (1) (a): Ohochuku v. Ohochuku 183
ss. 19 (3), 29: Pachner v. Parker 486
s. 32 (3): Corfe v. Corfe 208
s. 32 (3): Haynes v. Haynes and Sawkill 968

1951 Finance Act (14 & 15 Geo. 6, c. 43)—
s. 32 (1) (3) (4): Ackland & Pratten Ltd. (In Liquidation) v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 1117

1952 Income Tax Act (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2, c. 10)— ss. 19, 232 (2): Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Jackson 873
s. 123 (Sch. D, Case I): Jeffrey v. Rolls-Royce Ltd. 720
s. 137 (a): Rorke (H. J.) Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 1132

PAGE

1952 Magistrates' Courts Act (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2, c. 55)—
ss. 19 (5), 24: R. v. Bennett, Ex parte Radburn 102
s. 28: R. v. Dangerfield 268
s. 104: Vaughan v. Biggs 622

1953 Licensing Act (1 & 2 Eliz. 2, c. 46)—
s. 152 (2): R. v. Lewes Justices. Ex parte Plumpton & District Club Trustees . 700
Sch. 2, Part I, para. 5: Reg. v. Woodbury Licensing Justices. Ex parte Rouse . 461

1954 Finance Act (2 & 3 Eliz. 2, c. 44)—
s. 28 (1): Burdett-Coutts v. Inland Revenue Comrs. 1027

Landlord and Tenant Act (2 & 3 Eliz. 2, c. 56)—
ss. 24 (1), 25 (1): Airport Restaurants Ltd. v. Southend Corporation 880
ss. 28, 65 (3): Green v. Bowes-Lyon 176
s. 30 (1) (f): Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v. Bath House Syndicate Ltd. . 613, 989

Mines and Quarries Act (2 & 3 Eliz. 2, c. 70)—
ss. 48 (1), 51 (3) (b), 157: Brown v. National Coal Board 67

1955 Requisitioned Houses and Housing (Amendment) Act (3 & 4 Eliz. 2, c. 24)—
s. 4: Taylor v. Munrow 151

County Courts Act (4 Eliz. 2, c. 8)—
ss. 1, 12: Leslie v. Liverpool Corpn. 1

Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 9)—
s. 8: Victory (Ex-Services) Association Ltd. v. Paddington Borough Council . . 106
s. 8 (1) (a): Isaacs v. Market Bosworth R. D. C. 277

1956 Restrictive Trade Practices Act (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 68)— ss. 6 (1) (b) (e), 21 (1) (b): In re Doncaster and Retford Co-operative Societies' Agreement 1186
ss. 8 (8), 18 (1), 31 (1): In re Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Application 356
s. 20 (3) (a) (b): In re National Association of British and Irish Millers Ltd's Scheme 63
s. 21 (1) (b): In re Phenol Producers' Agreement 464
s. 21 (1) (b): In re Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement 393
s. 21 (1) (b) (g): In re Black Bolt and Nut Association's Agreement 884

Copyright Act (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 74)—
s. 17 (3): Williams v. Settle 1072

Medical Act (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 76)—
s. 36: Fox v. General Medical Council 1017

1958 Litter Act (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 34)—
s. 1 (1): Vaughan v. Biggs 622

Matrimonial Causes (Property and Maintenance) Act (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 35)—
s. 1: Pachner v. Parker 486
s. 7: Samson v. Samson 190

Maintenance Orders Act (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 39)—
s. 6: Pepper v. Pepper 131

Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 45)—
s. 11 (1) (2) (3): R. v. Registrar of Building Societies. Ex parte A Building Society 669

Agricultural Marketing Act (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 47)—
ss. 1 (1), 2 (7), 6 (1) (2), 7 (1), 8 (1): Tuker v. Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food 819

Variation of Trusts Act (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 53)—
s. 1: In re Thompson's Will Trusts 1165
s. 1: In re Allen's Settlement Trusts. Allen v. Allen 6
s. 1: In re Hambleden's Will Trusts 82
s. 1: In re Tinker's Settlement 1011
s. 1: In re Robertson's Will Trusts 1050
s. 1 (3): Practice Direction (Court of Protection) 17

Divorce (Insanity and Desertion) Act (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 54)—
s. 3: Pearce v. Pearce 855

Agriculture Act (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 71)—
s. 3 (2): Evans v. Roper 814

Adoption Act (7 Eliz. 2, c. 5)— ss. 3 (1), 35 (3): In re C. S. C. 304

1959 County Courts Act (7 & 8 Eliz. 2, c. 22)—
ss. 41, 42, 45, 67: Williams v. Settle 1072

Highways Act (7 & 8 Eliz. 2, c. 25)—
ss. 67 (1) (2) (3), 68 (1), 85 (1) (a), 3 (d), 295 (1): Ching Garage Ltd. v. Chingford Corpn., C.A. 947

Street Offences Act (7 & 8 Eliz. 2, c. 57)—
s. 1 (1): Smith v. Hughes 830

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS JUDICIALLY CONSIDERED

R.S.C.— PAGE

Ord. 3, r. 10: Lewis v. Packer 452
Ord. 12, r. 8: Practice Direction 494
Ord. 19, r. 6: Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Jackson 873
Ord. 19, r. 10; Ord. 28, r. 8: In re Langton, decd. 246
Ord. 20, r. 10: Lewis v. Packer 452
Ord. 25, r. 5: Woyno v. Woyno 986
Ord. 36, r. 1 (1) (3): Pease v. George 427
Ord. 36B, rr. 2, 6: Hesz v. Sotheby & Co. 285
Ord. 36B, rr. 2, 6: Rossage v. Rossage 249
Ord. 38, rr. 3, 11: In re J. 253
Ord. 41D, r. 3 (3): Practice Direction (Maintenance) 566
Ord. 55, r. 5A: Lewis v. Packer 452
Ord. 55, r. 15: Practice Direction (Powers of Masters) 1195
Ord. 55A: Practice Direction (Guardianship of Infants) 744
Ord. 65, r. 11: Davies v. Davies 1004

Agriculture (Control of Notices to Quit) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 190)— regs. 4, 5 and 7: French v. Elliott 40

Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations (S.I. 1948, No. 1145)—
reg. 24 (1) (5) (d): Westcott v. Structural and Marine Engineers Ltd. 349
reg. 25 (2): Corn v. Weir's (Glass) Ltd. 577
reg. 27 (1) (2): Corn v. Weir's (Glass) Ltd. 577

Cereals (Deficiency Payments) Order, 1955 (S.I. 1955, No. 962)— regs. 3, 4: In re Scremby Corn Rents 648

Clearing Office (Roumania) Order, 1936 (S.R. & O. 1936, No. 427)—
Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property 917

Clearing Office (Roumania) Amendment Order, 1939 (S.R. & O., 1939, No. 750)—
Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property 917

Clearing Office (Roumania) Amendment Order, 1940 (S.R. & O. 1940, No. 963)—
Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property 917

Coal and Other Mines (Support) Order, 1956 (S.I. 1956, No. 1763)—
Sch. 1, reg. 12: Brown v. National Coal Board 67

Companies (Winding-Up) Rules, 1949 (S.R. & O. 1949, No. 330 (L. 4))—
r. 33: In re Royal Mutual Benefit Building Society 1143
r. 108: In re Kentwood Constructions Ltd. 646

County Court Rules, 1936 (as amended)—
Ord. 16, r. 10 (2) (b): Williams v. Settle 1072
Ord. 25, r. 6: Chung Kwok Hotel Co. Ltd. v. Field 1112

County Court Rules, 1957 (S.I. 1957, No. 174 (L. 1)), amended by County Court (Amendment) Rules, 1959 (S.I. 1959, No. 1251 (L. 7))—
Ord. 11, r. 1 (3) (c): Hopkins v. Manners 599

General Medical Council Disciplinary Committee (Procedure) Rules Order in Council, 1958 (S.I. 1958, No. 1805)—
r. 43 (2): Fox v. General Medical Council 1017

Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957 (S.I. 1957, No. 619 (c. 4))—
rr. 3 (3), proviso (ii), 44 (1): Pachner v. Parker 486
rr. 4 (4), 28 (1): Haniver v. Haniver 310

Matrimonial Causes (Amendment) Rules, 1958 (S.I. 1958, No. 208)—
r. 12: Pachner v. Parker 486

Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1959 (S.I. 1959, No. 619)—
r. 4 (1) (d): Practice Direction (Address of petitioner) 548

Pedestrian Crossings Regulations, 1954 (S.I. 1954, No. 370)—
reg. 4: Hughes v. Hall 733

Restrictive Practices Court Rules (S.I. 1957, No. 603)—
r. 11: In re National Association of British and Irish Millers Ltd.'s Scheme . . 63

Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959 (S.I. 1959, No. 1958, Sch. 2)—
r. 35: Practice Direction 1142
r. 35: Practice Direction 1194

Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order, 1960 (S.I. 1950, No. 1131)— art. 2 (2) and Sch.: Horwitz v. Rowson 803 arts. 2, 3, Sch.: Marshall v. Nottingham Corpn. 707

Treaty of Peace (Roumania) Order, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 118)— art. 1 (5) (g): Fischler v. Administrator of Roumanian Property 917

OVERSEAS ENACTMENTS JUDICIALLY CONSIDERED

Gold Coast—Laws of the Gold Coast (1951 Ed., c. 136)— ss. 12 (2) (3) (4), 13 (11): Edward Ramia Ltd. v. African Woods Ltd. 86

ERRATA

[1960] 1 W.L.R.

Page 126: Solicitors for the plaintiff appellants in Daws v. Daily Sketch and Daily Graphic Ltd. were Edward Thompson & Co. and not as printed.

Page 163: The solicitors acting for the appellant Wenlock in Reg. v. Dawson and Wenlock were H. Davies & Co. and not as printed.

Page 184: Line 6 of the judgment should read "by virtue of section 18 (1) (b) "of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950," and not as printed.

Page 447: The title to the case beginning on this page is MASCHERPA v. DIRECK LTD. and not as printed.

Page 502: The solicitors in In the Estate of Little decd. should read Enever, Strong, Freeman & Co.; Kinch & Richardson for Robert H. Kerrison, Coulsdon, and not as printed.

Page 504, para. 1 of judgment, line 13: For "libel" read "defamation."

Page 548: The relevant statutory instrument in the Practice Direction should read: Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957 (S.I. 1957, No. 619), r. 4 (1) (d), and not as printed.

Page 566: The relevant Order in the Practice Direction should read: Order 41D and not as printed.

THE WEEKLY LAW REPORTS

Volume I

Containing those cases of value to practitioners which are not intended to be included in The Law Reports and also practice notes and directions.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

* LESLIE v. LIVERPOOL CORPORATION.

C. A.

1959
Nov. 13, 16, 25.

Lord Evershed M.R., Sellers and Harman L.JJ.

[Plaint No. 266.]

Court of Appeal—County court—Appeal from—Jurisdiction—Fact, question of—Claim exceeding £200—Form of plaint—County Courts Act, 1934 (24 & 25 Geo. 5, c. 53), ss. 40, 41—County Courts Act, 1955 (4 Eliz. 2, c. 8), ss. 1, 12.

The plaintiff suffered relatively minor injuries as the result of a road accident in which the motor-bicycle which he was riding came into collision with the defendant corporation's motor-omnibus. He started proceedings against the defendants in the county court alleging that the accident was due to the negligence of their servant. In his particulars of claim he claimed damages expressly limited to £400. The county court judge dismissed the action holding that the accident was due to the plaintiff's own negligence. The plaintiff appealed, and on the appeal the question was raised whether, having regard to the terms of section 12 (2) of the County Courts Act, 1955,[1] an appeal lay on a question of fact to the Court of Appeal:—

Held, (1) that in the circumstances, including the nature of the claim, it would not be right to say that the plaintiff was not, when he started the proceedings, claiming damages exceeding £200, and that he had brought himself within section 12 (1) and (2) of the County Courts Act, 1955, since it was therefore open to the plaintiff to appeal to the Court of Appeal on matters of fact.

[1] County Courts Act, 1955, s. 12: "(1) . . . if any party to any such "proceedings in a county court as "are mentioned in the next following "subsection is dissatisfied with the "determination of the judge or jury "on any question of fact, the party "aggrieved by the judgment or order "of the court, may appeal therefrom "to the Court of Appeal. . . . (2) ". . . the proceedings in which a "right of appeal is conferred by this "section are—(a) any action founded "on contract or tort, or for money "recoverable by statute, where either "—(i) the debt, demand or damage "claimed exceeds £200; . . ."

C. A.

1959

LESLIE
v.
LIVERPOOL
CORPN.

Per curiam. The language of section 12 (2) of the Act of 1955 makes it clear that the question whether there is or is not a right of appeal depends on the claim which is made and not upon the amount which may later be recovered. In many cases it will be apparent from the language of the particulars of claim whether the amount which the plaintiff claims does or does not exceed £200. In other cases, however, and more especially in actions founded on tort where the damages are at large, they often may not be so. As a matter of general practice a prayer in particulars of claim should state whether or not the claim does or does not exceed £200.

It is a matter of common county court practice to state in the particulars of claim that the claim does not exceed £400; while there is no good ground for altering that practice, it is not necessary, as a matter of right, that such a limitation should be expressly put into particulars of claim in order that the county court may have jurisdiction.

Dictum of Evershed M.R. in Tideway Investment and Property Holdings Ltd. v. Wellwood [1952] Ch. 791, 808; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 365; [1952] 2 All E.R. 514, 520 considered.

APPEAL from Judge Harold Brown sitting at Liverpool County Court.

The plaintiff, Edward Leslie, on September 13, 1958, at 6 p.m. was riding a motor-bicycle travelling in a westerly direction along Utting Avenue East, Liverpool, when his bicycle came into collision with an omnibus owned by the defendants, the Liverpool Corporation, and driven by one of their servants. The omnibus at the time was crossing the avenue from Broadway. As a result of the accident the plaintiff suffered minor injuries and shock. He alleged that the accident was due to negligence of the defendants' driver, and in these proceedings claimed damages. In his particulars of claim the plaintiff expressly limited his damages to £400. The county court judge dismissed the action holding that the accident was solely due to the plaintiff's own negligence.

The plaintiff appealed. On the appeal the question was raised whether any appeal lay on questions of fact having regard to the provisions of section 12 (2) of the County Courts Act, 1955, since in his particulars of claim the plaintiff had not stated that his claim for damages exceeded £200.

The case only calls for report on the question of jurisdiction.

E. E. Youds for the defendant corporation.
E. Somerset Jones for the plaintiff.

The only case cited in argument is referred to in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

November 25. The following judgments were read.

LORD EVERSHED M.R. These proceedings arose out of a road accident which occurred at 6 o'clock in the evening on September 13, 1958, that is to say, when it was daylight. As these accidents go, fortunately this was not serious. It is first to be noted that, according to the agreed medical report, supplemented by the agreement of the counsel in the case, the total damage, including special damage, which the plaintiff suffered is to be taken at the sum of £100. That fact has a bearing upon a question which arose early in the case, namely, whether, according to the terms of the statute, this was a case in which an appeal lay at all to this court on matters of fact. Because we thought this question of some importance, we reserved our judgment, and since the hearing of the case I have had an opportunity of consulting with my brethren presiding in the other Divisions of this court, Hodson and Morris L.JJ.

The relevant terms of the County Courts Act, 1955, are to be found in section 12, which conferred for the first time a right of appeal on matters of fact from a county court to this court; but the right of appeal so conferred was limited by the later terms of the section. So far as is relevant in the present case, section 12 (2) provides that the proceedings in which a right of appeal is conferred by the section are: "(a) any action founded on contract "or tort, or for money recoverable by statute, where either (i) "the debt, demand or damage claimed exceeds £200." Subsection (3) of that section, in effect, makes that provision applicable to a counterclaim.

In the present case the action was founded on tort, the tort of negligence. The particulars of claim, having stated the particulars of negligence of the motor driver in what one might call almost common form, proceeded to give particulars of the personal injuries (fractures of the fingers, physical and nervous shock) and special damage £27 0s. 7d. The claim concluded with the words "and the plaintiff claims damages limited to £400." That limitation is inspired by the language of section 40 of the County Courts Act, 1934, as it is now amended by section 1 of the County Courts Act, 1955, giving to a county court jurisdiction in matters of this kind where the claim is limited to £400. It was suggested, however, in the present case that, having regard to the nature of the injuries as specified in the particulars of claim, reinforced by what had since appeared as plainly the upper limit of any monetary damage that could be recovered, the plaintiff here had not brought himself within section 12 (1) and (2) and so had no right of appeal on matters of fact. On a plain use of the English language, it is, of course, manifest that a claim expressed thus, "and the plaintiff claims damages limited to £400," is not the same thing as saying he claims damages exceeding £200, nor does the former, as a matter of English, as far as I can see, include the latter.

In all the circumstances of this case, which include the general nature of the claim (an action for damages for negligence on the part of a bus driver), it has seemed to us that it would not be right to say of this plaintiff that he was not claiming damages, when his proceedings started, exceeding £200, and we have,

C. A.
1959
LESLIE v. LIVERPOOL CORPN.
Lord Evershed M.R.

therefore, treated it as open to the plaintiff to appeal to this court on matters of fact. It was suggested that in truth the appeal was rather upon the inferences to be drawn from the facts found, than upon the facts themselves. But to that aspect of the matter I shall refer again, if at all, only very slightly, because I think, in all the circumstances, it would not be right to say that the plaintiff was not, when he started these proceedings, claiming damages exceeding £200.

But the fact that the question arose and caused some little debate made it desirable that we should consider whether in cases of this kind a plaintiff should not make it clear from the start whether he is or is not claiming damages more than £200 in extent. From the language of the subsection, it is to my mind clear beyond peradventure that the question whether there is or is not a right of appeal depends upon the claim that is made in the case and not upon the award which may later be recovered, and that view is, I think, supported by other language in the relevant section. In many cases—and this is, of course, especially true where the claim is for money recoverable by statute and very often true where the claim is founded on contract—it will be apparent from the language of the particulars of claim whether the amount which the plaintiff seeks to recover does or does not exceed £200. But in other cases, and more especially in actions founded on tort where damages are, as it is said, at large, this very often may not be so.

After speaking to my brethren, we think that as a matter of general practice a prayer in a statement of claim should state whether or not the claim does or does not exceed £200. I have said "as a matter of general practice" because there will be cases where such a result is obvious from the nature of the claim. But where it is not so clear, then I think it would be a proper practice that the prayer should make it clear. There are good reasons, as it seems to me, for such a view. In the first place, I do not think it right that a plaintiff, if he should be the unsuccessful party, should be in the position of getting the best of both possible worlds, so that in matters relating to costs he might say afterwards: "Although I did not say so, obviously my claim was a very small one from the start." On the other hand, whatever the actual sum that the judge might say he would have recovered had he succeeded, he might say: "My claim was always for more than £200." Perhaps even more important, I think it is right that the defendant, in such a case, should know where he stands upon this matter. In the present case, if the plaintiff had recovered say the amount of the £100, it might well have been a hardship to tell the defendant that he had no right of appeal on fact because the claim had not in fact in terms stated a demand for more than £200. Nor do I think that the adoption of such a practice is likely to lead to any kind of abuse. In trivial cases to put in that the plaintiff's claim exceeds £200 obviously might involve him in having to pay, if he lost, on a scale of costs which was inappropriate to the claim. More than that, I think the defendant would have a remedy if it was reasonably apparent that, in spite of the terms of the prayer, the real claim could not possibly be any figure as large as £200, so that prayer had plainly been inserted solely to confer a right of appeal on fact. In such a case I should have thought a defendant could make the appropriate application to the county court to amend the statement of claim by striking out such part of it as was, as I say, inappropriate to the true nature of the claim and designed merely for the purpose of conferring this right.

We, therefore, are of opinion that in this type of case as a general matter a plaintiff should state whether or not his claim exceeds £200. The present prayer does say that the claim does not exceed £400 in order to confer county court jurisdiction beyond a doubt. Whether that limitation should properly be inserted is a matter that was considered, incidentally, by this court in the case of Tideway Investment and Property Holdings Ltd. v. Wellwood.[1] I am there reported as declining to express a view whether the limitation ought to be expressed. I take the same view today and do not desire to say that it is necessary for such a limitation expressly to be put in. I understand, however, that as a matter of county court practice it commonly is put in, and if it is the practice, there is obviously no good ground for altering it; but I should not wish to say that it was necessary as a matter of right that such a limitation should expressly be put in in order that the county court might have jurisdiction.

So much for the preliminary question. As I have said, we have regarded the present appeal as open to the plaintiff on questions of fact as well as law, and I must now state how it came about that the collision occurred on this September evening.

[His Lordship proceeded to examine the evidence and held that the plaintiff was 50 per cent. to blame for the accident and was entitled to £50 damages, being half the damages which he had suffered.]

SELLERS L.J. My Lord has expressed the opinion of the court on section 12 of the County Courts Act, 1955, and I have nothing to add to that. [His Lordship then proceeded to consider the evidence.]

HARMAN L.J. I agree and have nothing to add.

Appeal allowed with the costs of the appeal and costs on Scale 3 in the court below. Damages of £50 for the plaintiff. Costs to be taxed at Liverpool.

Solicitors: Donald A. Kershaw; Thomas Alker, Town Clerk, Liverpool.

B. A. B.

[1] [1952] Ch. 791, 808; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 365; [1952] 2 All E.R. 514, 520.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1959
Oct. 29.

Vaisey J.

* In re ALLEN'S SETTLEMENT TRUSTS. ALLEN v. ALLEN.

PRACTICE NOTE.

[1959 A. No. 1215.]

Trust and Trustee—Variation of trusts—Power of investment—Affidavit by stockbroker—Variation of Trusts Act, 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 53), s. 1.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

A settlement, executed in 1937 on the marriage of the settlor and his wife, contained an investment clause giving a wide range of investments, but not including power to invest in ordinary shares. At the date of the summons there were two children of the marriage, born respectively on August 18, 1938, and June 9, 1942. At the time the settlement was made neither the settlor nor his wife had devoted any particular thought to the form of investment clause which should be inserted therein, but they were now both of the opinion that a wider power of investment would be to their advantage and also to the advantage of those interested in the capital. The summons, accordingly, was taken out, asking, under section 1 of the Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, for an extension of the powers of investment so as to give power to invest in ordinary shares. The reasons for the view of the settlor and his wife appeared from an affidavit intended to be sworn in the proceedings by a partner in a firm of stockbrokers appointed to advise the trustees.

Michael Browne for the trustees.
T. L. Dewhurst for the tenant for life.
J. D. M. Rennie for consenting adults.
Ian Romer for infant beneficiaries.

VAISEY J., in the course of the hearing, said that in future cases of this kind it would be unnecessary to file evidence by a stockbroker or other expert containing general matters of economic and financial history or argument in general terms as to the wisdom of extending powers of investment. He indicated that the same practice should be followed in applications made by charities for the purpose of obtaining wider investment powers.

His Lordship further indicated that this direction was not intended to preclude the filing of expert evidence relating to matters peculiar to the particular application which an applicant was advised should be brought to the attention of the court.

Solicitors: Theodore Goddard & Co.

K. R. A. H.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.]

* REGINA v. MORDANAM.

C. C. A.

1959
Dec. 1.

Lord Parker C.J., Hilbery and Salmon JJ.

Criminal Law—Sentence—Supervision order—Twelve months' or more sentence—Two offences—Consecutive sentences of nine months in respect of each—Whether sentence of twelve months or more—Power of court to make order to notify address on discharge—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 58), s. 22.

By section 22 (1) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (as amended by the Prison Act, 1952, s. 54 (1), Sch. III): "Where a person "is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with imprison- "ment for a term of two years or more and that person" has been convicted on two previous occasions of offences for which he was sentenced to Borstal training, or of one offence for which he was sentenced to corrective training, "the court, if it sentences him to a "term of imprisonment for twelve months or more, shall . . . order "that he shall for a period of twelve months from his next dis- "charge from prison be subject to the provisions of section 29 of "the Prison Act, 1952."

A defendant pleaded guilty before justices to two charges of obtaining money by false pretences and, having asked that eleven other offences be taken into consideration, was committed to quarter sessions for sentence under section 29 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952. Quarter sessions imposed a sentence of nine months' imprisonment in respect of each charge, the sentences to run consecutively, and made a supervision order pursuant to section 22 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948. On appeal against sentence:—

Held, that, although the hearing at quarter sessions was to be treated as a trial on indictment, there was not a sentence of imprisonment of twelve months or more, but two separate sentences, each being sentences of nine months, so that section 22 of the Act of 1948 did not require an order under that section to be made, and that, therefore, that order could not stand.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal against sentence.

The applicant, Rowe Mordanam, pleaded guilty at the West London Magistrates' Court to two charges of obtaining money by false pretences, asking that eleven other offences be taken into consideration, and was committed to quarter sessions for sentence under section 29 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952. Quarter sessions imposed a sentence of nine months' imprisonment in respect of each charge, the sentences to run consecutively, and made an order under section 22 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, that for a period of twelve months from his next discharge he should be subject to the provisions of section 29 of the Prison Act, 1952. The applicant applied for leave to appeal against sentence.

The applicant did not appear and was not represented.

HILBERY J. stated the facts set out above and continued: The applicant now asks for leave to appeal against sentence, and a

C. C. A.
1959
REGINA
v.
MORDANAM.
Hilbery J.

point emerges which results in this court, in the circumstances, giving leave to appeal against sentence and treating this application as the hearing of the appeal against sentence.

There were two charges, and the applicant was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment in respect of each charge, that is, in respect of each charge there was a separate sentence of nine months, but these sentences were ordered to run consecutively. The question which emerges is: Had the court imposing those sentences power to make an order under section 22 of the Act of 1948? That section [as amended] is in these terms: "Where a person is convicted on indictment of an offence punishable with imprisonment for a term of two years or more and that person (a) has been convicted on at least two previous occasions of offences for which he was sentenced to Borstal training or imprisonment; or (b) has been previously convicted of an offence for which he was sentenced to corrective training, the court, if it sentences him to a term of imprisonment of twelve months or more, shall, unless having regard to the circumstances, including the character of the offender, it otherwise determines, order that he shall for a period of twelve months from his next discharge from prison be subject to the provisions of section 29 of the Prison Act, 1952."

In the view of this court the sentence of nine months' imprisonment in respect of each of the two charges does not bring the case within the ambit of section 22 so as to require that the court shall order that for a period of twelve months from his next discharge from prison he shall be subject to the provisions of that section. It is true that when such a case as this is committed by a magistrates' court under section 29 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, to quarter sessions for sentence, the hearing by quarter sessions is treated as a trial on indictment, and that has been stated in this court. But here, treating it as a trial on indictment, there was not a sentence in respect of an offence charged in the indictment which was one of imprisonment for twelve months or more. Each sentence was one of less than twelve months, and the consequence is that the case did not come within section 22 as a case requiring the order to be made under that section. This court, therefore, varies the sentence in this case by eliminating from it the order under section 22.

Appeal allowed.

J. F. L.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

* GODLEY v. PERRY.

BURTON & SONS (BERMONDSEY) LTD. (THIRD PARTY).

GRAHAM (FOURTH PARTY).

1959
Nov. 23, 25.

Edmund Davies J.

[1958 G. No. 2023.]

Sale of Goods — Implied term — Fitness for purpose — Merchantable quality—Sale of toy by retailer to child—Sale of toys to retailer by wholesaler and by importer to wholesaler—Sales by sample—Defect rendering toy unmerchantable—Whether apparent on reasonable examination—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), ss. 14 (1) (2), 15 (2) (c).

A boy of six was injured when properly firing a stone from a toy plastic catapult which he had bought from a retail shop. The catapult fractured just below the point where the handle joined the fork and either a piece of the broken catapult or the stone entered the boy's eye, so rupturing it that it had to be removed. Subsequent examination showed that the catapult was made of a cheap brittle material and was indifferently moulded, containing internal voids. It was one of a small quantity bought by the retailer's wife from a wholesaler. Before ordering she had tested a sample by pulling back the elastic, and had similarly tested each catapult before displaying them in her shop-window. The same test of a sample catapult had been made by the wholesaler before he placed an order with the importer of the catapults from Hongkong, where they were manufactured.

In an action for damages against the retailer, the infant plaintiff claimed that in buying the catapult he had relied on the retailer's skill and judgment and had bought the catapult by description, and that in breach of the conditions contained in section 14 (1) and (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893,[1] the catapult was not fit for the purpose for which it was designed, or of merchantable quality. The retailer, who denied liability, brought

[1] Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 14: "Subject to the provisions of this "Act . . . there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality "or fitness for any particular purpose "of goods supplied under a contract "of sale, except as follows:—(1) "Where the buyer, expressly or by "implication, makes known to the "seller the particular purpose for "which the goods are required, so "as to show that the buyer relies on "the seller's skill of judgment and "the goods are of a description which "it is in the course of the seller's "business to supply (whether he be "the manufacturer or not), there is "an implied condition that the goods "shall be reasonably fit for such "purpose . . . (2) Where goods are "bought by description from a seller "who deals in goods of that description (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied "condition that the goods shall be "of merchantable quality: provided "that if the buyer has examined the "goods, there shall be no implied "condition as regards defects which "such examination ought to have "revealed . . ."

S. 15: "(1) A contract of sale is "a contract for sale by sample where "there is a term in the contract, "express or implied, to that effect. "(2) In the case of a contract for sale "by sample— . . . (c) There is an "implied condition that the goods "shall be free from any defect, "rendering them unmerchantable, "which would not be apparent on "reasonable examination of the "sample."

1959

GODLEY
v.
PERRY.

in the wholesaler as third party, who likewise brought in the importer as fourth party, the retailer and the wholesaler claiming respectively that the sales to them were sales by description or by sample, and alleging breaches of sections 14 (1) and 15 (2) (c) of the Act. The importer denied liability, and contended that if the sale by him to the wholesaler was a sale by sample, any defect in the catapults was obvious on reasonable examination:—

Held, (1) that the catapult was clearly not fit for the purpose for which it was designed and was not of merchantable quality, and the infant plaintiff was entitled to succeed against the retailer under section 14 (1) and (2) of the Act as an inference of reliance on the retailer's skill and judgment readily and properly arose in a case where the customer was a child of tender years, and a sale over the counter was no less a sale by description than one where an order was placed on the strength of a catalogue.

Grant v. Australian Knitting Mills Ltd. [1936] A.C. 85; 52 T.L.R. 38; Bristol Tramways Carriage Co. v. Fiat Motors [1910] 2 K.B. 831; 26 T.L.R. 629, and Morelli v. Fitch & Gibbons [1928] 2 K.B. 636; 44 T.L.R. 737 applied.

(2) That the sales by the wholesaler to the retailer, and by the importer to the wholesaler respectively, were sales by sample, and each was subject to the implied term in section 15 (2) (c) of the Act; and that, as the catapult which caused the accident was so defective as to be unmerchantable, and the defect was such that it was not apparent on reasonable examination of the sample (as carried out by the retailer's wife and the wholesaler), both the wholesaler and the importer were in breach of the implied term in section 15 (2) (c).

Dictum of Lord M'Naghten in Drummond & Sons v. E. H. Van Ingen & Co. (1887) 12 App.Cas. 284, 296 applied.

ACTION.

On April 10, 1958, the infant plaintiff, Nigel Godley, aged six years and four months, bought for 6d. a plastic toy catapult from a shop where the defendant, James A. Perry (hereinafter referred to as "the retailer"), carried on business as a newsagent, selling in addition the usual side-lines commonly found in such businesses, including children's toys. The boy's parents did not know that he was buying the toy, although he told the retailer's wife who sold it to him that he had their permission to buy it. The retailer's wife was originally reluctant to sell the boy the toy because of the possible damage she thought he might cause to windows, but her reluctance had nothing to do with any distrust she had in the toy itself. The boy's mother threatened to deprive him of the catapult but eventually permitted him to retain it. Having used it for two days without mishap, on April 13 the infant plaintiff put a stone in the catapult which he held in his left hand, pulled back the elastic and stone with his right hand to fire it, when the catapult broke and he was struck in his left eye, either by the stone or by a piece of the catapult itself. Subsequent examination showed that the handle of the catapult had fractured and broken off just below the point where it joined the fork. It was made of cheap brittle polystyrene, indifferently moulded, and contained internal voids. As a result of the accident the boy's left eye was ruptured and had to be removed. According to agreed medical reports the rupture to the eye was caused by "a catapult injury."

The catapult was one of a consignment of two dozen bought by the retailer's wife on April 7, 1958, from Burton & Sons (Bermondsey) Ltd., wholesalers, with whom the retailer was in the habit of doing business. On that day his wife had ordered them from the wholesaler's traveller who had visited the shop, produced a toy catapult, said that it was a good selling line, and pulled back the elastic by way of demonstrating the toy's worth and attraction. The retailer's wife examined it to judge its value to her youthful patrons, pulling back the elastic herself, and placed her order for two dozen which were delivered three days later. She displayed them in the shop-window after testing each by pulling back the elastic.

The wholesaler had come into possession of the catapults on August 30, 1957, when they placed an order for 30 gross with a traveller for Graham Bros., who had imported the toys from Hong-kong, where they were manufactured. On that occasion the importer's traveller had produced a sample catapult, quoting the wholesale price. There being a rule in the toy trade that the elastic of a catapult ought not to be capable of being pulled back more than two-and-a-half feet because of the danger of serious damage being inflicted on person or property by the propelled missile were a greater pull-back possible, the wholesaler and his manager tested the extent of the pull-back and, concluding that it was likely to prove a successful toy, and it never occurring to the wholesaler that the plastic frame could become fractured while the catapult was being properly used for its designed purpose, placed his order for 30 gross. That consignment arrived on December 6, 1957.

In this action the infant plaintiff, through his father, Reginald Ronald Godley, sued the retailer, claiming damages for the injuries sustained. Relying on section 14 (1) and (2) of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, he alleged that he had bought the catapult relying on the skill and judgment of the defendant, his servant or agent; that the sale by the retailer's wife to him was a sale by description, and that in breach of the implied conditions in section 14 (1) and (2), the catapult was not reasonably fit for use as a catapult and was not of merchantable quality.

The retailer denied liability and brought in the wholesaler as third party, claiming that the sale by the wholesaler to him of the two dozen catapults was a sale by description, and alleging a breach of the conditions implied in section 14 (1) and (2); further, or alternatively, that the contract for sale between him and the wholesaler was a sale by sample, and that there was a breach of the implied condition in section 15 (2) (c) of the Act that each of the catapults should be free from any defect rendering it unmerchantable which would not be apparent on reasonable examination of the sample. He accordingly claimed damages for breach of those conditions. The wholesaler also denied liability and brought in Stella H. Graham (widow), executrix of Ernest Martin Graham (deceased), who in his lifetime traded under the name of Graham Bros., the importers. The wholesaler also claimed that the sale to him of the 30 gross of catapults was a sale by description or by sample, and alleged breaches of the implied conditions contained in sections 14 (1) and 15 (2) (c), claiming damages amounting to an indemnity against the retailer's claim if liability was established.

1959

GODLEY v. PERRY.

The importer denied that the catapult was defective or in breach of condition in any of the respects alleged, but contended that if it suffered from any defect rendering it unmerchantable, the defect was such as would have been apparent on reasonable examination of the sample shown by their traveller to the wholesaler. Further, if the sale was a sale by description as well as by sample, he relied on the examination by the wholesaler as a sufficient examination of the goods for the purposes of the proviso to section 14 (2) to exclude the implied condition of merchantable quality as regards any such defect.

Donald Farquharson for the plaintiff.
Robin Dunn for the retailer (the defendant).
Michael Eastham for the wholesaler (the third party).
Nigel Bridge for the importer (the fourth party).

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 25. EDMUND DAVIES J. stated the facts and continued: The infant plaintiff is a small boy, with the short arms which one would expect in a child of his age and build, and, having seen his demonstration of how he was holding the catapult at the time of the accident, I am satisfied that he was using it as one would expect it to be used, that is to say, pulling back the elastic to an entirely proper extent for the purpose of projecting the stone.

Such an accident should never have happened and could not have happened had the catapult been reasonably suitable for its designed use.

[His Lordship referred to the evidence given by the defendant's wife as to the test she had made when the catapults were delivered and before selling them to her customers, and to a demonstration she had given in the witness-box when, on pulling back the elastic on a catapult, the plastic frame immediately broke in pieces which flew across the court, and said that whether she actually tested all the catapults was immaterial to the claim in contract in view of his finding that the infant plaintiff met with his injury while using the catapult in a perfectly proper manner. His Lordship continued:] From the agreed report of a consulting chemist, it appears that this consignment of catapults was made by the process known as injection moulding, the material used being polystyrene, which is the cheapest injection moulding material, and which, for the last 10 years, has been the preferred material for making cheap plastic toys. The chemist has long held the view that polystyrene is unsuitable for making toys, since it is brittle, easily broken, and breaks with a sharp dogtooth fracture. He said: "The Hongkong catapult is indifferently "moulded from, I think, low grade reconstituted polystyrene, "but even if it were moulded from virgin polystyrene, I should "still regard it as a dangerous toy for a child, that is, dangerous "because of its fragility and propensity to break with a dogtooth "fracture." Examination of the broken catapult actually used by the plaintiff revealed faults of internal voids, indicative of indifferent moulding conditions.

On this report, on what happened to the plaintiff himself, on what happened when the defendant's wife gave a demonstration in the witness-box, I have no hesitation in concluding that this was a most dangerous toy to be released on the market. As a result, this child of six was grievously injured, and his left eye completely destroyed. The injuries are the subject of agreed medical reports, and the general damages to which, subject to liability, the plaintiff is entitled in respect of pain and suffering, the loss of his eye, and the discomfort of daily removal of the artificial eye, is, in my judgment, the sum of £2,500.

On the issue of liability, the plaintiff seeks to rely upon the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, s. 14 (1) and (2). In my judgment he is entitled to succeed upon both heads. That the catapult was not in fact "reasonably fit for such purpose" as it was designed for, and that it was not "of merchantable quality," are propositions established beyond any sort of doubt.

As to section 14 (1), that the child was relying upon the shopkeeper's skill and judgment is, I think, clear. As Lord Wright said in Grant v. Australian Knitting Mills Ltd.[1]: "The "reliance will seldom be express; it will usually arise by implica-"tion from the circumstances; thus to take a case like that in "question, of a purchase from a retailer, the reliance will be in "general inferred from the fact that a buyer goes to the shop "in the confidence that the tradesman has selected his stock with "skill and judgment . . ." Furthermore, when the customer is, as here, of extremely tender years, an inference of reliance on the retailer's skill and judgment readily and properly arises.

As to section 14 (2), Mr. Robin Dunn, for the defendant, submitted that there was here no sale "by description"; that the subsection applies only to unseen goods, whereas here the catapults were displayed in the window and the plaintiff then bought one of these over the counter. In support he cited a passage from Farwell L.J.'s judgment in Bristol Tramways

[1] [1936] A.C. 85, 99; 52 T.L.R. 38.

1959

GODLEY v. PERRY.

Edmund Davies J.

Carriage Co. v. Fiat Motors[2] which reads: "The phrase "'merchantable quality' seems more appropriate to a retail "purchaser buying from a wholesale firm than to private buyers, "and to natural products, such as grain, wool or flour, than "to a complicated machine." But it is to be noted that the Lord Justice went on to add: "But it is clear that it extends to "both."

That a sale over the counter can be a sale "by description" is clear from Morelli v. Fitch & Gibbons,[3] per Branson J.,[4] and where, as here, a child asks for "a catapult," and one is sold to him over the counter, that is no less, in my judgment, a sale "by description" than one where an order is placed on the strength of a catalogue.

I turn to consider the defendant's claim to be indemnified by the third party, and the latter's claim over against the fourth party. The facts are but slightly disputed, if at all. [His Lordship referred to the facts as summarised above and said that he accepted the evidence given by the third party that, although he also sold catapults to other wholesalers, the accident to the infant plaintiff was the only one he had heard of arising out of the use of this toy; and that he had had some two or three dozen catapults returned in a broken condition—apparently not an unusually high figure for plastic toys—and when he first sought legal advice his solicitor broke one into a number of pieces by pulling back the elastic very hard, and there had been about a dozen similar breakages by similar experiments conducted since then. His Lordship continued:]

On the foregoing facts, counsel for the defendant was content to base his claim against the third party on section 15 (2) (c) of the Act of 1893. Here, he submitted, was clearly a sale by sample, and there was accordingly an implied condition that the goods would be free from any defect, rendering them unmerchantable, which would not be apparent on reasonable examination of the sample. I hold that this was indeed a sale by sample, and that the implied condition accordingly existed, and it is unnecessary for me to deal with the further suggestion—raised only by counsel for the third party, and promptly sought to be demolished by him—that section 14 (1) might also be invoked by the defendant.

Again, on the facts I hold that as between the third and fourth parties there was a sale by sample, with the like implied condition; that in breach of such condition, what I may call the accident catapult was so defective as to be unmerchantable is clear. But, nevertheless, counsel for the fourth party submitted that a reasonable examination of the sample would have revealed its defects, and that, accordingly, no such condition could be implied. The fragility of the toy was, he submitted, perfectly obvious, and however widely his clients might have departed from a proper standard of mercantile ethics in placing large supplies of such an object on the market, to be snapped up by juveniles, liability under section 15 (2) (c) could not be established as against them.

[2] [1910] 2 K.B. 831, 840; 26 T.L.R. 629.

[3] [1928] 2 K.B. 636; 44 T.L.R. 737.

[4] [1928] 2 K.B. 636, 643.

Counsel for the fourth party demonstrated that by squeezing together the two prongs of the catapult in the hand they could be fractured, and further suggested that by holding the toy down with one's foot and then pulling on the elastic its safety could be tested and, as I understand it, its inherent fragility would thereby inevitably be discovered. True, the potential customer might have done any of these things. He might also, I suppose, have tried biting the catapult, or hitting it with a hammer, or applying a lighted match to ensure its non-inflammability, experiments which, with all respect, are but slightly more bizarre than those suggested by counsel. But, looking at the matter realistically, as one must, in my judgment none of those tests are called for by a process of "reasonable examination," as that phrase would be understood by the common-sense standards of everyday life. All these suggested tests were doubtless practicable, but the Act speaks not of a "practicable," but of a "reasonable," examination. Not extreme ingenuity, but reasonableness, is the statutory yardstick.

In my judgment, to pull back the elastic as the third party and his manager did in August, 1957, and as the defendant's wife did in April, 1958, was all that could be reasonably expected of any potential customer, and such an examination wholly failed to make apparent to them, or even render them alive to the possibility of, such a defect as undoubtedly existed in the accident catapult. Whether the samples displayed to the third party and to the defendant's wife corresponded with the bulk which, of course, included the accident catapult, there is no means of telling, for the chemist's report speaks of "internal voids" in the latter, and these presumably might differ in number and location in different catapults. If the samples did not correspond with the accident catapult, the third and fourth parties were also in breach of section 15 (2) (a) but for the present purposes that matters not.

In Drummond & Sons v. E. H. Van Ingen & Co.,[5] decided before the Act of 1893, but nevertheless authoritative, Lord

[5] (1887) 12 App.Cas. 284; 3 T.L.R. 541.

1959

GODLEY
v.
PERRY.

Edmund Davies J.

M'Naghten said[6]: "Then it was argued, defect or no defect, "the sale was a sale by sample: the goods delivered correspond "with the sample, and there is an end to the matter: the seller "has fulfilled his bargain. I think the sale was strictly a sale "by sample. Certainly the goods corresponded with the "sample only too well. But does this exact correspondence, when "it is found to involve an unforeseen and unsuspected defect, "relieve the seller from his obligation to supply goods fit for the "purpose for which they were intended? After all, the office of a "sample is to present to the eye the real meaning and intention "of the parties with regard to the subject-matter of the contract "which, owing to the imperfection of language, it may be difficult "or impossible to express in words. The sample speaks for itself. "But it cannot be treated as saying more than such a sample "would tell a merchant of the class to which the buyer belongs, "using due care and diligence, and appealing to it in the ordinary "way and with the knowledge possessed by merchants of that "class at the time. No doubt the sample might be made to say "a great deal more. Pulled to pieces and examined by unusual "tests which curiosity or suspicion might suggest, it would "doubtless reveal every secret of its construction. But that is "not the way in which business is done in this country. Some "confidence there must be between merchant and manufacturer. "In matters exclusively within the province of the manufacturer "the merchant relies on the manufacturer's skill, and he does "so all the more readily when, as in this case, he has had the "benefit of that skill before." Lord M'Naghten was there dealing with the position as between the manufacturer and a person dealing with him. In my judgment, his observations apply mutatis mutandis to circumstances such as the present, where there are deals between one wholesaler and another.

Applying that passage to the present case, I hold that the defect which was undoubtedly present in the accident catapult, and which rendered it unmerchantable and, indeed, a most dangerous toy to be let loose on the juvenile market, was not apparent on reasonable examination of the samples shown by the third party's traveller to the defendant's wife, and by the traveller for the fourth party to the third party. The third and fourth parties were, accordingly, each in breach of section 15 (2) (c).

In the result, there must be judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant for £2,500 with costs; judgment for the defendant against the third party for the like amount with costs, such costs to include the defendant's costs of his defence as between solicitor and client in addition to his costs of the third party proceedings; and judgment for the third party against the fourth party for the same amount of damages with costs, such costs to include the costs hereby ordered to be paid by the third party to the defendant, the third party's own costs of defence against the defendant as between solicitor and client and the third party's costs of the fourth party proceedings.

[6] (1887) 12 App.Cas. 284, 296.

Judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant for £2,500 with costs. Judgment for the defendant against the third party for the like amount with costs, such costs to include the defendant's costs of his defence as between solicitor and client in addition to his costs of the third party proceedings. Judgment for the third party against the fourth party for the same amount of damages with costs, such costs to include the costs ordered to be paid by the third party to the defendant, the third party's own costs of defence against the defendant as between solicitor and client and the third party's costs of the fourth party proceedings.

Order that £100 be paid out forthwith to the plaintiff's solicitors and the balance of the £2,500 to be paid into court and transferred to the Bromley County Court.

Solicitors: Shaen, Roscoe & Co.; Bartlett & Gregory, Bromley; Harveys, Lewisham; Guyer & Co.

E. M. W.

[COURT OF PROTECTION.]

* PRACTICE DIRECTION (COURT OF PROTECTION).

1959
Dec. 9.

Trust and Trustee—Variation of trusts—Act of 1958—Mental defective beneficiary—Application to Court of Protection—Procedure—Variation of Trusts Act, 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 53), s. 1 (3).
Mental Deficiency—Court of Protection—Proceedings under Variation of Trusts Act, 1958—Procedure.

For the guidance of those who have reason to apply to the Court of Protection under section 1 (3) of the Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, the master has directed that the following notes on procedure shall be published:

1. As soon as an originating summons under the Act to which a patient is a respondent has been issued in the Chancery Division, the Court of Protection should be notified and an authority sought for leave to enter appearance and to apply for or consent to the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the patient in those proceedings.

2. No formal application should be issued in the Court of Protection for relief under the Act until the originating summons has been issued in the Chancery Division and evidence filed in support thereof, but the master will in suitable cases authorise counsel to be instructed on behalf of the patient to look after the patient's interests during negotiations for an arrangement.

1959

PRACTICE DIRECTION (COURT OF PROTECTION).

3. The formal application should only be entitled in the matter of the patient and the only respondent should be the patient unless the master otherwise directs. The master will direct whether the patient is to be served or service dispensed with, and where the master considers that the patient should be separately represented he may request the Official Solicitor to act as solicitor for the patient on the application.

4. A copy of the originating summons (or an office copy if the arrangement is to be found in the summons itself) and office copies of the evidence in support thereof, together with the exhibits, should be lodged with the application and an affidavit filed stating how the patient will be affected by the arrangement and whether it is considered to be for or against his benefit.

5. The master's order will make provision for subsequent approval of amendments which may be made to the arrangement after the date of the order.

E. F. ATKINSON,
Chief Clerk and Registrar.

December 9, 1959.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

1959
Oct. 12.

Lord Merriman P. and Phillimore J.

* STIRLAND v. STIRLAND.

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Justices—Wilful neglect to maintain—Burden of proof—Whether husband's delusion of physical disability an excuse.

Burden of Proof—Husband and wife—Wilful neglect to maintain—Justices.

A husband, who had been involved in an accident in 1955, thereafter convinced himself that he had an injury to his knee and his back, which made it dangerous for him to continue his work, and he, in fact, only worked spasmodically. From that date he was in and out of a mental hospital, to which he was admitted for the fourth time in March, 1959. On April 10, 1959, on the husband refusing to accept electro-convulsive therapy as advised, on the ground that it would not help his back, and discharging himself from the hospital, the wife told him that she could not continue to live with him if he persisted in his refusal. She, in fact, ceased to live with the husband and obtained an order on the ground of his wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her and her infant child from April 10, 1959, and divers dates before. No medical evidence as to the husband's physical or mental condition was adduced at the hearing. On the husband's appeal:—

Held, that, on an application for an order on the ground of wilful neglect to maintain by a wife living apart from her husband, the onus was on the wife to prove that she was justified in so living, and that the husband had, in fact, wilfully neglected to maintain her; the wife having discharged that onus, the burden shifted to the husband to prove that the failure to maintain was not wilful by reason of his physical or mental illness, and the husband had failed to discharge that burden.

Quaere, whether, if the husband were proved to be under a delusion that he was suffering from a physical disability, the burden would thereby be discharged.

APPEAL from Nottingham justices.

For considerable periods from about 1955, the husband had been in and out of a mental hospital in the neighbourhood of Nottingham as a voluntary patient. He had, in 1955, suffered some accidental injury in the pit in which he was working and had convinced himself that there was an injury to a knee which made it either difficult or even dangerous for him to work regularly in the pit, though it was common ground that he did work spasmodically, on and off. He maintained his opinion about the knee, in spite of some four separate examinations which, according to the wife's evidence, disclosed that there was nothing whatever the matter with the knee. He held a further opinion about himself, that some 11 years before, followed by some other unknown injury 10 years ago, his back was broken, so that he was really completely incapacitated from any laborious work, such as lifting an iron ring, which it was part of his duty to perform. No medical evidence was called to suggest that there was any such injury. On the contrary, the husband had, according to the evidence, been repeatedly told by doctors that there was no such injury. Having on three previous occasions been admitted to a mental hospital as a voluntary patient, he was admitted again on March 26, 1959, for the fourth time. On that occasion electro-convulsive therapy had been prescribed, which the husband positively refused to submit to on the ground, as he professed to say, that he was quite satisfied that there was nothing wrong with his head, and was quite equally satisfied that shock treatment to his brain would not do any good to his broken back.

On April 10, 1959, the wife went to fetch the husband out of hospital, taking him his clothes; he was a voluntary patient and, therefore, entitled to discharge himself. In the course of the next hour or so, as they were on the way, ostensibly, back to the matrimonial home, she handed him the key and told him that she could no longer live with him if he persisted in refusing to undergo the treatment for his ailment which had been prescribed. She, in fact, did not resume living with the husband, and issued a complaint that on April 10, 1959, and divers dates before the husband had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for herself and her infant child. At the hearing of the complaint no medical evidence was adduced by the husband as to his physical or mental condition.

1959

STIRLAND v. STIRLAND.

On July 1, 1959, the justices for the County of Nottingham found that the married life to which the husband had reduced the wife before he went into hospital on the last occasion was intolerable, and that it was making her ill, and that she was abundantly justified in not resuming cohabitation when the husband was openly refusing the treatment which was prescribed as likely to put him right. They further held that, as the wife was plainly willing to try a resumption of cohabitation if this treatment had been undergone, she was not a deserter, and made an order in her favour. From that order the husband appealed.

Charles McCullough for the husand.
R. D. Lymbery for the wife.

The following cases were cited in argument: Leng v. Leng [1]; Papadopoulos v. Papadopoulos [2]; Stringer v. Stringer [3]; Starkie v. Starkie (No. 2) [4]; Jones v. Jones.[5]

LORD MERRIMAN P. referred to the facts, substantially as set out above, and continued: This matter falls to be resolved in two stages; and it is not a wholly easy case, because, I think, there are two distinct stages in which the onus is one way on the wife and the other way on the husband. The wife had to prove that, notwithstanding her being a separated wife, she was still entitled to maintenance and that the husband had wilfully neglected to provide it. Certainly he had not provided it. That issue the justices have decided in her favour, and I do not think it is possible for this court, in the absence of seeing and hearing the witnesses, and in particular the evidence of the wife, which the justices preferred at every stage where the matter was controversial to the evidence of the husband, to say that, in these rather peculiar circumstances, the wife was not justified in temporarily refusing to resume cohabitation. It is important to bear in mind that there was no evidence whatever that she was taking up the position that she was entitled permanently to refuse to resume cohabitation; quite the contrary. So, up to that point, the wife has plainly discharged the burden which prima facie was upon her. But I am willing to assume—(indeed, I think it is an obvious proposition)—that if a man by some form of disablement is prevented from working and earning a living, that is very much a matter to be borne in mind in considering whether failure in fact to provide maintenance can be described as wilful neglect. I should think that that was perfectly clear in a case, for example, where a man is in hospital with a broken limb, which physically prevents him from working, but again the position might shift

[1] (1946) 62 T.L.R. 722; [1946] 2 All E.R. 590.
[2] [1930] P. 55.
[3] [1952] P. 171; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 415; [1952] 1 All E.R. 373.
[4] [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1396; [1953] 2 All E.R. 1255n.
[5] (1941) 165 L.T. 398.

and the burden change if there was evidence that a perfectly simple operation would mend the limb and enable him to work with perfect safety. Just as that would be true in the case of a physical disablement, so it might properly be held to be true in a case of mental disability. What, in substance, has been argued with great force on behalf of the husband is that this man refused to have this treatment because, in effect, he suffered from the delusion that the electro-convulsive therapy was designed to put his back right, and he was satisfied that it would do no good to his back, and there was nothing whatever wrong with his head. Were that delusion proved to the satisfaction of the justices I am not prepared to say that, so long as that delusion existed, it might not have the same effect as the uncured injury to a limb. But about this I think there is no shadow of doubt that, in order to prove a position like that, the burden plainly would lie upon the husband.

In fact, the justices have found, and this is the highest at which they put it, that although the husband was clearly mentally ill, he did not appear to be so disordered as not to be responsible for his actions. I should be prepared to hold that a man who thought that a proposed shock treatment to his head was designed to put right an imaginary broken back could be said to be suffering from a delusion, which might, in a certain degree, make him irresponsible for his actions, but I am very strongly of the opinion that to prove that state of things would require evidence of a very potent character on the part of the husband, and that evidence, manifestly, ought to come from some responsible witness from the mental hospital. Nobody was called to deal with the matter or to make any such suggestion, and it is suggested that we could spell all that out of the evidence of the wife. I do not think that is possible. I do not think that the evidence of the wife goes anywhere near establishing any such proposition as that, and it must be acknowledged that in the absence of any proper evidence about the husband's state of mind and the purpose for which the electro-convulsive therapy was designed, and the probability of its success, and such matters, there is very plainly the possibility, which, I think, is very much for the husband to rebut, if possible, that the whole thing savours rather of malingering. I do not want to impute any evil to the husband, but this, at any rate, is the fact, that the justices thought it significant that during the seven months of the preceding year, when the husband had been living with his own parents, he had been able to work regularly, and on that basis, and after a very careful review of the evidence, they stated their conclusions.

Their first conclusion was in the following words: "The "husband was capable of working regularly and earning sufficient "wages to maintain his wife and child properly, and had wilfully "failed to do so." Although that finding is challenged, it is a very long way from being challenged on the basis that the

1959

STIRLAND
v.
STIRLAND.

Lord Merriman
P.

husband had even begun to establish that he was prevented from working and earning money by some mental delusion of the kind that I have indicated. Having come to that conclusion, the justices then hold that, although the wife had refused to go back to her husband when he took his discharge from hospital, his previous conduct towards her had been such that she was fully justified in laying down the condition under which she would return. The condition was that he would undergo the treatment which he had been advised to undergo with the object, and the avowed object, of enabling them to settle down happily together. Then the justices say—(and this underlines the point of that aspect of the matter)—"If the husband would show a genuine "desire to change his conduct and maintain his wife and child, "for example, by accepting the medical advice, then the wife "would no longer be justified in refusing to return to him."

In my opinion, the justices were right in saying (at any rate, we have no right to interfere with their saying) that in the circumstances found by them the wife could not be held to be a deserter, and in so far as his case depends on his alleged mental disability, it was for him to prove it, and in my opinion he has not begun to do so. That being so, this appeal is misconceived, and must fail.

PHILLIMORE J. I entirely agree, and I only add a few words in deference to the argument of Mr. McCullough. The case which he sought to make on behalf of the husband was this. First, he said that, while it was no doubt true that the husband had failed to maintain his wife on April 10, 1959, and preceding days, this was due to the fact that he was ill and was unable to do so; and secondly, that, even if that were not the case, the wife, by deserting the husband when he came out of hospital, disentitled herself to claim any maintenance against him.

Taking first the failure to maintain on and before April 10, 1959: it was for the wife to show that her husband had failed to maintain her, and that his failure was wrongful and wilful. But the ordinary assumption that the law makes is that a man is liable to maintain his wife, and if, as here, a husband desires to say: "True, I failed to maintain you," then it is for him to show that he was not responsible at the time for his actions, or was otherwise excused from his ordinary liability.

The case that is put forward here is that this man was mentally ill. In the course of the hearing the wife gave evidence and the husband gave evidence, but no medical evidence was called. If a man in seeking to excuse himself from his normal legal liability on the ground of his mental state it is for him to call proper evidence to satisfy the court that it was due to his mental state that he failed in his obligation. He did not attempt to do so, and the justices, in those circumstances, had to deal with the case on the evidence before them, and they found in terms that the husband had made little effort to provide his wife with reasonable maintenance after they started to live together again at Christmas, 1958. They said: "We felt that "there was no physical reason why he should not go to work "regularly." Dealing with his mental condition, they found: "Even though he is clearly mentally ill, he did not appear to be "so disordered as not to be responsible for his actions. We think "it is significant that while he was with his parents for some "11 months"—that is a mistake; it should be seven months—"of last year he appeared able to work regularly." Accordingly, they reached this conclusion: "That the husband was capable "of working regularly and earning sufficient wages to maintain "his wife and child properly, and that he had wilfully failed "to do so."

In my judgment, there was evidence before them on which they could properly so find, and, indeed, in the absence of medical evidence it would have been difficult for them to find that this husband was justified owing to his mental state in failing to maintain his wife. Of course, it may be said that the mere fact that this man was in hospital at all should be held to excuse him from maintaining his wife and child since, whilst in hosital, it must be assumed that he was there properly and necessarily. I do not know. Men have before now been guilty of malingering, and, as Lord Merriman P. has said, on the evidence that would be a possible view, though I certainly do not say a necessary view, of this case. But it would be a possible view, and if as a result of malingering a man is removed to hospital when he does not require to be there, clearly he cannot rely upon the fact that he is there to protect him from his obligations. There was no sufficient evidence here to support the defence which this husband put forward that he was mentally unable to work and to support his wife and child.

On the second point, the question of desertion: the justices accepted the wife's evidence. She told them that when the husband came out of hospital he said he would not sign for the treatment in there; she also said: "He told me he was not "going to have the treatment. He never signed for the treat-"ment. He said there was nothing wrong with him. He said "I was silly to take notice of other people and not him." The treatment was electro-convulsive therapy, which the doctors had prescribed. The wife then told him that unless he would take the treatment which the hospital had suggested "so we could "live happily again and try to forget the illness, the same as the "doctors told him, I could not stand living with him again "because it was such a worry." In my judgment, that statement of the wife's is quite inconsistent with an intention to desert her husband and bring their married life permanently to an end. What this wife was saying in effect was this: "I am only too "anxious to preserve the marriage, but if we are going to live "happily together you must accept the advice of the doctors, "because I cannot go on living in the sort of way in which we "were living before."

1959

STIRLAND
v.
STIRLAND.

Phillimore J.

The justices had to consider that evidence against the background that for at least three and a half years this man had been constantly complaining of ailments which, as the doctors found, did not exist in reality. In May, 1958, when he came out of hospital, he failed to rejoin his wife and child. He went and lived with his parents, and then, when his wife took out the summons in August, 1958, charging him with failure to maintain her, he offered to return to her. She took him back in December, 1958, and then, after having worked quite regularly for some seven months whilst living with his parents, he began to behave as he had before, namely, working for a day or so, then taking a few days off on the ground that his back was hurting him, and sitting by the fire smoking, or retiring to bed and allowing his wife to look after him.

The justices found that his conduct had been such as to make life intolerable for the wife, and a misery, and, accordingly, they came to the conclusion that, although the wife had refused to go back to her husband when he took his discharge from the hospital in 1959, his previous conduct towards her had been such that she was fully justified in laying down the conditions under which she would return, and, therefore, they found that she was not in a state of desertion.

That finding, viewed against the background of this case, and the sort of life which this wife had had to endure with this husband, was really unassailable. Her statement to her husband was consistent only with a desire to preserve her marriage rather than destroy it, and it would be stretching language to describe their parting in those circumstances, when he refused her reasonable request, as desertion of her husband. Accordingly, I think that the matters put forward by Mr. McCullough fail, and, in my judgment, the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Sidney C. Elphick for Claytons, Nottingham; Church, Adams, Tatham & Co. for Healey & Smith, Nottingham.

E. J.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1959
Oct. 20.

Roxburgh J.

* In re TREPCA MINES LTD.

[00510 of 1957.]

Practice and Procedure—Interpreter—Plaintiff in person—Summons—Foreign applicant ignorant of English—Whether applicant entitled to open case through interpreter—Discretion of court.

A foreign applicant, a resident of Switzerland, took out a summons for an order reversing the decision of the liquidator of a British company in voluntary liquidation rejecting his claim to be a creditor of the company. Evidence was filed in the normal way and the summons was adjourned into court for hearing on affidavit evidence, with cross-examination of witnesses. Until the day of the hearing the applicant had been professionally represented, but at the hearing he appeared in person. He was unable to understand English and was incapable of conducting his case except through an interpreter:—

Held, that a case could not be opened through an interpreter without the consent of the court, that the court had a discretion in the matter, and that, since the court was entitled to have a case opened to it, in the exercise of that discretion and in the circumstances, the court would read the summons and the applicant's affidavits for itself, invite counsel for the respondent to read his evidence, and then read any affidavits in reply, for it would then be in a position to see what justice required should be done.

Observations on the function of an interpreter.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

A summons was taken out by a solicitor acting for the applicant, Radomir Pasic, a resident of Switzerland and apparently a Serb by birth, for an order that a decision of the respondent, the liquidator of Trepca Mines Ltd., a British mining company in voluntary liquidation, rejecting a claim by the applicant to be a creditor of the company for £2,616,486, be reversed and the proof ordered to be admitted in full. Until the day of the hearing the applicant had been professionally represented; security for costs in the sum of £650 had been ordered and evidence filed as in the normal course. Both parties gave notice of their intention to cross-examine witnesses. The summons was adjourned into court for hearing on affidavit evidence, with cross-examination of witnesses. At the hearing the applicant was not represented but appeared in person.

When the case was called on, the applicant rose and said "Pasic." This he repeated on being asked by his Lordship who he was, thereupon resuming his seat at his Lordship's request.

ROXBURGH J. Serious questions of constitutional law may arise in this case. I have been unable to find any precedent for a person who cannot speak English opening a case in these courts. Mr. Pasic, do you claim the right to address the court and, if so, in what language?

The applicant did not answer.

ROXBURGH J. Did you understand what has been said?

The applicant. No.

L. G. Scarman Q.C., Philip Sykes and Owen Stable for the liquidator. A question does arise. Addressing the court is quite different from giving evidence by a foreign witness through a sworn interpreter, or from foreigners who are prosecuted by the Crown giving evidence during proceedings. If the applicant can be heard at all as a litigant in person, it will be only because the court has the right to regulate its own procedure, and to swear an interpreter who must pass on to the court whatever the litigant is saying.

1959

TREPCA MINES LTD., In re.

[ROXBURGH J. When the court regulates its own procedure there is the position of counsel and solicitors to be considered. I have been unable to find any case in which a person who cannot speak or understand a single syllable of English has been invited to address the court.]

Certainly the court has power to regulate its own procedure, but in so doing it must not depart from its ancient usage. It is plain that the original language of the law, and the one in which it was originally conducted, was Norman French. Litigants found it difficult to understand what the lawyers said, and as English was gaining ground there was passed in 1362 the Pleadings in English Act, 1362,[1] which enacted that all pleas should be pleaded in the English tongue. If that statute was still in force the operative words were perfectly plain as to the way in which proceedings must be conducted before Her Majesty's judges.

[ROXBURGH J. I shall not require witnesses who are attending for cross-examination to attend today.]

The applicant then tried to address the court in Serbo-Croat. He was ordered by his Lordship to sit down, whereupon he addressed the court in French and sat down after a few moments.

Scarman Q.C. In the present case the question is whether the applicant can address the court through an interpreter.

[ROXBURGH J. The question whether a foreign litigant can address the court through an interpreter does not seem to have been decided.]

Litigants in the courts of Wales have the right to address the

[1] Pleadings in English Act, 1362 [repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1863]: " . . . Item, because it is " often shewed to the King, by the pre- " lates, dukes, earls, barons and all the " commonalty, of the great mischiefs " which have happened to divers of " the realm because the laws, cus- " tome and statutes of the realm be " not commonly known in the same " realm, for that they be pleaded, " shewed and judged in the French " tongue, which is much unknown in " the said realm, so that the people " which do implead, or be impleaded, " in the King's court, and in the " courts of other, have no knowledge " nor understanding of that which is " said for them or against them by " their serjeants and other pleaders " . . . the King . . . hath ordained " . . . that all pleas which shall be " pleaded in any courts whatsoever " . . . shall be pleaded . . . in the " English tongue, and that they be " entered and enrolled in Latin . . ."

Proceedings in Courts of Justice Act, 1731 [repealed by the Civil Procedure Acts Repeal Act, 1879], s. 1: " . . . " from and after March 25, 1733, . . . " all proceedings whatsoever in any " courts of justice within that part " of Great Britain called England, " and in the Court of Exchequer in " Scotland . . . shall be in the Eng- " lish tongue and language only . . ."

Welsh Courts Act, 1942, s. 1: " . . . it is hereby enacted that the " Welsh language may be used in any " court in Wales by any party or " witness who considers that he would " otherwise be at any disadvantage by " reason of his natural language of " communication being Welsh."

court in Welsh. [Reference was made to the Welsh Courts Act, 1942.]

[ROXBURGH J. Quite plainly, if a Welshman came here and sought to conduct proceedings before me through an interpreter I should be bound to refuse to hear him. Were I to give a Serb something which would be denied to a Welshman it might produce a Parliamentary crisis.]

It must be possible for a foreign litigant to conduct his case through an interpreter, provided that the court is satisfied with the interpreter's qualifications. It is, however, a matter for the court's discretion. [Reference was also made to the Proceedings in Courts of Justice Act, 1731; the Statute Law Revision Act, 1863; the Civil Procedure Acts Repeal Act, 1879; Collier v. Hicks [2]; and Rex v. Lee Kun.[3]]

ROXBURGH J. referred to the history of the proceedings and continued: There is no doubt that the applicant is wholly incapable of conducting this case at all unless he is permitted to conduct it through an interpreter. There seems to be, strange though it is, no case in any of the books—and the researches of counsel for the respondent have extended back beyond the Middle Ages—in which this question has ever been discussed, and it is one of very far-reaching consequence and importance.

There is, of course, no question but that the proceedings before me must be conducted in English and in no other language. That that is so is plain from the authorities to which counsel has very kindly drawn my attention; in particular, the Welsh Courts Act, 1942, which, in fact, deals with the Welsh language, but has considerable bearing on the problem before me.

In particular, the proceedings must not be conducted in French, which is unfortunate, because, from the point of view of saving costs I think I could get along without any interpreter at all if they were conducted in that language, but I am not allowed to do that.

Then there is the question whether the applicant can have an advocate who is not a member of the Bar. There is no doubt about that either, and certainly he cannot. Had he been able to put any argument before me at all he would surely have said that he wanted to conduct the case himself through the medium of an interpreter, the interpreter being the go-between, and nothing more, between himself and myself, bridging over the difficulty of language. Of course, I know from painful experience that that is not what does happen. Theoretically an interpreter is merely a mouthpiece and not an advocate at all, but, in fact, when an interpreter translates counsel's questions into the language of the witness, what happens is that rules of evidence are broken and, unless counsel or the judge knows the language, they are powerless to prevent it.

[2] (1831) 2 B. & Ad. 663.

[3] [1916] 1 K.B. 337; 32 T.L.R. 665.

1959

TREPCA MINES LTD., In re.

ROXBURGH J.

In my view, this question is wholly within the discretion of the judge, and it is for that reason I have been able to deliver an extempore judgment. If this had been an action I doubt if I should have proceeded. The judge is entitled to have the case opened to him, and it is certain that a case cannot be opened by an interpreter without the judge's consent. But these proceedings are not an action; they are proceedings by summons in which the evidence has all been filed, subject only to cross-examination, in English. I have no doubt at all that if I read the evidence I shall be much better able to see what justice requires than if I do not. There is no difficulty over that; I have the summons and the affidavits, settled by professional hands, and, therefore, in the exercise of my discretion in this particular case I propose to proceed by reading the summons and all the affidavits. So far as the respondent is concerned his counsel will, in the ordinary course, read their own evidence; then I shall read to myself the affidavits filed on behalf of the applicant in reply. At the end of that I shall consider what justice requires. I may say that I might well not have taken this course if the respondent had objected, but he is anxious that I should travel thus far.

I foresee that I can probably safeguard the respondent if I do go that far. I do not see myself how the cross-examination of witnesses is going to be conducted if it ever becomes necessary. Proceeding with an interpreter is going to increase the costs very much indeed; but the applicant is a foreigner resident abroad, who has thought fit to bring a claim for 2½ million pounds and upwards, and has not even retained a legal adviser to argue his case, and if it does become necessary to grant any form of adjournment, or to suffer a long period of time through an interpreter, I can deal with the matter by requiring further security for costs.

In those circumstances, believing that I have a discretion so to do, but not wishing to lay down any proposition of law other than that, I propose to proceed as I have said. When I have read the summons I shall myself proceed to read the affidavits in support of it. I shall then invite counsel to read his evidence and I shall then read, if there are any, any affidavits in reply. At the end of that time I will reconsider the position.

[After the court had proceeded accordingly, the applicant produced a document emanating from the Belgrade County Court indicating that proceedings in which he was taking part were still sub judice in that court. Being asked by his Lordship what he wished the court to do, he indicated through an interpreter that he wished the summons to be stood over, apparently to await the outcome of the proceedings in Belgrade, with a view to the enforcement of the judgment there in England against the company, should it be in his favour.]

ROXBURGH J. The applicant, in the year 1954, obtained judgment for a very large sum of damages against Trepca Mines Ltd.,

the company now in liquidation, in a Serbian court in the absence of the company. I do not mean that the company was not served, but that the company, as it was entitled to do under the authorities, to which I shall refer shortly, declined to submit to the jurisdiction of the Serbian court. However, for some reason not material, and notwithstanding the non-appearance of the company, that judgment was set aside by another higher Serbian court, and the position at the moment is that there is no judgment of any Serbian court in favour of the applicant. The applicant, however, has taken steps to endeavour to have his case reheard in the Serbian courts.

The liquidator very properly thinks it is high time this company should be wound up, that is to say, that the winding up should be completed, and, as he is taking no technical points, that enables me to read the document which the applicant has produced and which, though undoubtedly genuine, is not in fact in evidence.

[His Lordship referred to the document and continued:] When I asked the applicant what he wanted me to do he asked me, through an interpreter—I wish to emphasise that the interpreter has been very faithful in the discharge of my instructions to him; he has not attempted to conduct the case, which he has no right whatever to do, and he has done admirably because he has generally, so far as the applicant would allow him, translated the applicant's instructions; the applicant gave about 17 sentences, only one of which the interpreter was allowed to translate—to stand this case over. It was quite obvious to me, if I was going to pay any attention to the judgment of the Serbian court, the company ought to be represented before the judges in Belgrade. Therefore, I thought the best thing that I could do was to see whether or not this court would give effect to the judgment of the Serbian court if it should be in favour of the applicant.

The law on that point is perfectly plain. What is this action? It is not an action to recover immovable property; it is an action in the English terminology for damages; in the Serbian terminology it is an action for indemnification. [His Lordship referred to the affidavits filed on behalf of the applicant and continued:] It is clear on the authority of Sirdar Gurdyal Singh v. Rajah of Faridkote [1] and Emanuel and Others v. Symon [2] that, where the action is a claim for damages against a party not resident within the jurisdiction of the court, that respondent is not bound to submit to the jurisdiction, and if he does not no English court will enforce that judgment. Accordingly, in my judgment, I should not give effect to the judgment of the Serbian court, even if it were in the applicant's favour, and, therefore, I should not allow the liquidator to expend assets in defending that case. Therefore, I shall not grant any adjournment on that account.

[1] [1894] A.C. 670; 10 T.L.R. 621. [2] [1908] 1 K.B. 302; 24 T.L.R. 85.

1959

TREFCA MINES LTD., In re.

[The remaining points before the court do not call for report.]

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Freshfields.

K. R. A. H.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.

1959 Nov. 26, 27.

Lord Evershed M.R., Sellers and Harman L.JJ.

* KEATS v. GRAHAM AND ANOTHER.

[Plaint No. O. 4231.]

Landlord and Tenant Act of 1927—Repairs—Demolition required by planning authority—Whether premises to be demolished "at or "shortly after . . . termination of tenancy"—Meaning—Admissibility of evidence of events after tenancy terminated—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (17 & 18 Geo. 5, c. 36), s. 18 (1).

By section 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927: "Damages for a breach of a covenant . . . to leave . . . premises "in repair at the termination of a lease, . . . shall in no case "exceed the amount (if any) by which the value of the reversion ". . . is diminished owing to the breach . . . ; and in particular "no damage shall be recovered . . . if it is shown that the "premises, in whatever state of repair they might be, would at "or shortly after the termination of the tenancy have been or be "pulled down."

A lease in 1952 of premises comprising a building with an extension at the back contained a covenant by the tenants to leave the premises in substantial repair at the termination of the tenancy. The rear extension had been erected on the basis of permission granted by the London County Council under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, which had limited the period for which the building could be retained to seven years, and the use to "storage purposes only" (though, in 1953, this was amended to "stove enamelling" after an application had been made by the tenants). The tenants were informed in 1953 that it was unlikely that the period for which permission had been granted would be extended, and an application on behalf of the landlord was, in fact, turned down. When the authorised period expired the council did not take any steps to enforce the condition, but an appeal to the Minister against their refusal to grant any extension was unsuccessful. In December, 1956, the council wrote asking for written assurance that the extension would be removed within 14 days. The letter was sent to the tenants, and soon afterwards they notified the landlord that they would shortly be leaving. They left the premises on March 27, 1957. In defence to a claim by the landlord for damages for breach of the repairing covenant, the tenants said that at the time the tenancy ended the extension was to have been pulled down. This defence was tried as a preliminary issue.

The county court judge admitted as evidence that after the termination of the tenancy the landlord had relet the premises with the extension for a different industrial use and that, subsequently, he had been successful in obtaining permission to use the building for that purpose or for storage until 1962:—

Held, that in the circumstances, the probabilities at the relevant time, that is, when the tenants left the premises, were that the rear extension would shortly be pulled down.

(2) That the evidence as to the events after the tenants left was inadmissible.

Salisbury v. Gilmore [1942] 2 K.B. 38; 58 T.L.R. 226; [1942] 1 All E.R. 457 applied.

Per Lord Evershed M.R. and Sellers L.J. Evidence of events occurring after the termination of a tenancy would normally be inadmissible for the purpose of deciding whether section 18 (1) applied, though rarely they might be used to clarify and explain an ambiguity in what had gone before.

APPEAL from Judge Nicholas sitting at Shoreditch County Court.

By a lease dated August 25, 1952, one Yetta Keats granted to Barnett Graham and Richard Chesher (hereinafter called the "defendants") premises known as 30, Oldhill Place, Hackney, to hold for a term of three years expiring August 5, 1955, at a rent of £300 a year. The covenants by the defendants contained in the lease included a covenant "during the term to well and "substantially repair . . . maintain . . . and keep the said "buildings . . . and the said premises so repaired . . . and kept as "aforesaid at the expiration or sooner determination of the said "term unless prevented by destruction . . . to quietly yield "up . . . " (sic).

The premises consisted of a building in the front and a more recent extension at the back. On March 23, 1949, Mrs. Keats had obtained permission from the London County Council to erect and retain this extension for a limited period, and to use it "for storage purposes." The development permission was subject to conditions, including: "(1) The limited period for the "retention of the building and the use being seven years from "April 1, 1949, at the expiration of which period the building "shall be removed, and the use herein shall be discontinued, "without compensation, unless the council shall have previously "approved retention . . . and continuance of the use for a "further period. . . ." Notwithstanding that the permitted use of the rear extension was "for storage purposes only," the lease of 1952 limited the use of the premises to "stove enamel-"ling and spraying and metal finishing," and the premises were so used by the defendants, trading as General Enamelling Co. Ltd.

On April 24, 1953, the architect to the London County Council wrote to the defendants drawing attention to the contravention, to the enforcement powers of the council and to the provisions of section 18 (1) of the Town and Country Planning

C. A.
1959
KEATS
v.
GRAHAM.

Act, 1947, under which application could be made for permission to continue the use. The defendants made an application, and on June 24, 1953, permission was granted to use the premises until April 1, 1956, for stove enamelling but for no other purpose. At the expiration of that period the use was to be discontinued. The architect gave as his reasons for the conditions that the use was "inappropriate and undesirable as "a permanent measure particularly having regard to the "council's development plan for the area, which envisages a "residential use . . . this permission is granted as a temporary "measure to run concurrently with the permission granted "March 23, 1949, for the erection and retention of the building "at rear until April 1, 1956, . . . a renewal of an industrial use "of this latter building is unlikely to be granted."

Some months later a further application was made by a Mr. Keats, a surveyor and brother of the plaintiff, Gerald Keats, on whose behalf he was acting, though it was not clear whether at that time the plaintiff was in fact landlord of the premises. On February 15, 1954, the council's architect replied refusing permission for the "retention of the rear addition and the continued "use of 30, Oldhill Place . . . for stove enamelling or any industrial "use after April 1, 1956."

When April 1, 1956, came, no steps were taken to enforce the planning condition. The defendants appealed to the Minister of Housing and Local Government under section 16 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, but after an inquiry, at which the landlord gave evidence on behalf of the defendants, their appeal was dismissed. In a letter dated October 17, 1956, the Minister pointed out that the special industrial use of stove enamelling was wrongly sited in what was substantially a residential area. On December 12, 1956, the council's architect wrote again referring to the refusal of February 15, 1954, and the Minister's letter of October 17, 1956, and requesting "your "written assurance within the next 14 days that the rear "addition will be removed without delay." It was not clear for whom that letter was intended, because, although it was addressed to the "Secretary of the General Enamelling Co. Ltd.," as was also the Minister's letter, it opened "Dear Madam," and the reference to the letter of February 15, 1954 (which bore the same office reference number), suggested that it might have been intended for the plaintiff or, perhaps, Mrs. Keats. The plaintiff did not see the letter. Soon after, the defendants wrote to the plaintiff saying that they would be leaving in four to six weeks and on March 27, 1957, they handed over the key. There was no evidence whether they replied to the letter of December 12, but, apparently, about a fortnight before they left a representative of the council visited them. There was no evidence of what was said.

On July 8, 1957, solicitors acting for the plaintiff wrote to the defendants and, after referring to the delivery up of the premises, they required the defendants either to carry out repairs in compliance with the repairing covenant contained in the lease or to pay compensation amounting to £369 15s. The defendants disputed the amount claimed and also their liability in view of the expiry of the planning consent.

In an action on the covenant the defendants raised a special plea denying the alleged breach of covenant, and stating that they would submit that the rear extension was "at the time of the "termination of the defendants' tenancy to have been pulled "down and the plaintiff is not entitled to claim the alleged or any "damage." That plea (as Lord Evershed M.R. pointed out on the appeal) reflected section 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927.* The parties agreed that the question raised by that plea should be determined as a preliminary issue.

At the hearing in the county court, at which the second defendant did not appear, evidence was given and accepted of two events which occurred after the defendants had left the premises. In May, 1957, the plaintiff let the premises to another tenant for use for the "manufacture of glazing compounds and "allied products." In October, 1957, the plaintiff applied again to the council for permission to develop and received conditional permission to retain the rear extension until December 1, 1962, and to use the premises, including that extension, for storage and light industrial purposes.

The county court judge decided the preliminary issue in favour of the plaintiff and the defendant appealed.

Aron Owen for the first defendant.
P. A. W. Merriton for the plaintiff.
The second defendant did not appear and was not represented.

In addition to the case referred to in the judgments, the following was cited in argument: Cunliffe v. Goodman.†

LORD EVERSHED M.R. stated the facts, and read section 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, as set out above. His Lordship continued: Section 18 (1) of the Act of 1927 was subjected to critical consideration in this court in Salisbury (Marquis) v. Gilmore.[1] Lord Greene M.R., for example, deals[2] with the

* Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18: "(1) Damages for a breach of "a covenant . . . to leave . . . premises in repair at the termination "of a lease, . . . shall in no case "exceed the amount (if any) by "which the value of the reversion . . . "in the premises is diminished owing "to the breach . . . ; and in particular no damage shall be recovered "for a breach of any such covenant ". . . to leave . . . premises in repair "at the termination of a lease, if it "is shown that the premises, in "whatever state of repair they might "be, would at or shortly after the "termination of the tenancy have "been or be pulled down. . . ."

† [1950] 2 K.B. 237; 66 T.L.R. (Pt. 2) 109; [1950] 1 All E.R. 720.

[1] [1942] 2 K.B. 38; [1942] 1 All E.R. 457; 58 T.L.R. 226.

[2] [1942] 2 K.B. 38, 46.

C. A.
1959
KEATS
v.
GRAHAM.
Lord Evershed M.R.

criticism of the language which had led the judge at first instance to come to the conclusion that really the words could not be given any effective meaning at all. In effect, what Lord Greene M.R. said was that the formula that the premises "would at or shortly "after the termination of the tenancy have been or be pulled "down" comes (at any rate for the purposes of this case) to this, that the premises were going at that date to be pulled down, then or shortly thereafter. I add that Salisbury v. Gilmore [3] was a case in which no one but the landlords (the plaintiffs) and the tenants were concerned; it was a case, that is to say, in which no local authority had taken any part; but the plaintiffs had indubitably intended, and made plans accordingly for, the pulling down and reconstruction of those premises. The lease terminated on September 29, 1939 (which, as we all know, was a matter of three weeks or a little more after the outbreak of the war), and the point arose because, war having broken out and certain regulations later having come into force, the landlords had had to abandon their intention; so that they sought to say that, whatever might have been their intention prior to the outbreak of war, the fact was—certainly at the date of the action—that they no longer intended to pull the premises down, because, in truth, they could not have done so however much they wanted to. But the court held that for determining the question raised by the formula in the subsection one had to look at the date September 29, 1939, when the tenants went out and the lease determined, and at that date the proper inference was that the original intention of the landlords still subsisted.

One other matter of a little importance also is dealt with in Lord Greene M.R.'s judgment. As he pointed out, the formula which I have read could not be simply expressed by such a formula as, "if it is shown that the landlords intended to pull "down the premises," or some similar form of words, because (as Lord Greene M.R. observed) the formula had to cover the case where the pending destruction or pulling down did not depend upon any intention of the landlord but upon the effect of some local authority activity such as a demolition order, or planning, or the like.

So much for Salisbury v. Gilmore [3]; and I turn to this case. I venture to put the problem posed by the preliminary issue and the section in this form: What, at the termination of the tenancy, as a matter of fact, is the answer to the question: Were the premises then going to be shortly pulled down? That question can only be answered, of course, by forming a view on all the material that was then available. [His Lordship referred to the letter of March 23, 1949, set out above, and continued:]

The terms of that document reflect the provisions of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, by section 12 of which it is provided that after the appointed day (which had then passed) permission under this Part of the Act "shall be required in "respect of any development of land"—"any development of "land"; and the section goes on to indicate that permission may be conditionally granted.

[3] [1942] 2 K.B. 38.

So far it would appear plain enough that the plaintiff's predecessor then got permission to put up what I shall henceforth call the "extension," at the rear of 30, Oldhill Place, but upon terms that it should be removed at the end of seven years, namely, on April 1, 1956; and he also got permission, having erected it, to use the extension for storage purposes. Undeterred, I may say, by the limitation as to user, he granted the lease to the defendants in August, 1952, which contained the covenant that the tenants should use the premises for no other purpose than that of "stove enamelling and spraying and metal finishing," which I understand to be classified as a "special industrial" use, and certainly is not "storage." But that is not, in the present circumstances, particularly relevant, because there is no doubt that permission to use for stove enamelling was subsequently obtained. [His Lordship stated further facts, and went on:]

The fact is, undoubtedly, that, though no assurance had been given, the London County Council took no further steps at all, after their representative called on the defendants early in March, 1957, by way of enforcing the condition which they had attached to the permission to erect the extension. And so we arrive at the date of the termination of the tenancy on March 28, 1957.

[His Lordship referred to the two events which had occurred after the defendants had left the premises, and went on:] It has been debated before us whether these events, occurring after the termination of the tenancy, were really admissible at all. My own inclination, based on Salisbury v. Gilmore,[4] is that, strictly speaking, they were not admissible. What the court is required by the section to do is to reach a conclusion of fact: Aye or no, were these premises going to be pulled down as things were at the date of the termination of the tenancy? No doubt it may be said that, if some matter of fact is doubtful, later events may by reflection clarify and explain what had gone on before. But there is, to my mind, no such ambiguity in the present case. I will assume for the purposes of the rest of my judgment, however, that it was proper to receive this evidence, though what may be the weight of it is in the present case a very different matter.

The judge came to the conclusion that the tenant had not discharged the onus which the section places upon him. He did, undoubtedly, attach some weight—some considerable weight—to the circumstance that, as these later events showed, the premises had not been pulled down; and he inferred against the tenant that in truth it was not right to say at the termination of the tenancy that they were "shortly going to be pulled down." With great respect to him, I have reached a different conclusion.

[4] [1942] 2 K.B. 38.

C. A.
1959
KEATS
v.
GRAHAM.
Lord Evershed M.R.

It seems to me that, as the section requires, one has to form a conclusion as matters stood on March 28, 1957, and (on the facts as presented) answer as best one can the question: Is it shown that the premises were then going to be pulled down? The most, as it seems to me and as I have said, that these later documents might do would be to reflect something that was apparently doubtful prior to the March date; but on the material and as things stood at the March date, it seems to me that the inevitable inference was that these premises were then "shortly going to be "pulled down."

Let me summarise the reasons for that view. In the first place, the extension had only been erected on the condition that it was pulled down on April 1, 1956; and the landlord, unless he got some further permission, was plainly under obligation to perform that condition imposed. Not only so, but he had tried in 1954 to get a further extension and had failed. He had been told in plain terms in that year by the document of February 15, that permission for further development was refused, and that, therefore, the retention of the extension after April 1, 1956, would not be permitted. Finally, there is the letter which the architect of the London County Council sent to the defendants in which he called attention specifically to the council's refusal of permission in February, 1954, and asked for a written assurance within 14 days that the rear addition would be removed without delay. It is unfortunate, I think (or may be unfortunate, being wise after the event) that somebody from the council was not called who could have stated clearly what the council's then view was as to enforcing the condition. But these documents, particularly the last one, seem to me to have thrown the onus on the plaintiff if he was going to say that this letter of December 12 did not in truth reflect what was going to happen; and, in my judgment what later did happen when the application was made in October is not sufficient to discharge the onus so shifted. It seems to me (in other words) that on this material, anybody who had to answer the question, in March, 1957, "Is this extension shortly "going to be pulled down?", would have had to say, on the evidence, "Well, yes, it is." It is quite true that no steps for enforcement had been taken; but I suppose all the world knows that these matters do not always proceed with the greatest possible speed. Nonetheless, here was a building which could not have been erected without permission in the first instance, and had been erected pursuant to a permission which imposed the condition that it should be taken down in April, 1956.

With all respect to the judge, I venture to think that he did not give the weight he should have done to the two documents to which I attach importance, those of February, 1954, and December, 1956. Thus, he says in his judgment, as regards the February letter, "So in Feburary, 1954, the L.C.C. were "confirming that after April 1, 1956, the retention and use of "the premises for stove enamelling would not be permitted."

But that, as I have indicated, is not a correct interpretation or statement of the effect of the February letter. The February letter refused permission for the retention of the extension at all after April 1; and as regards the user of the premises as a whole, it was not confined solely to stove enamelling but was to cover "any industrial use." I venture to think that the view he had taken of the February letter may have perhaps affected the significance that he gave to the letter of December 12, 1956. He says as regard that letter: "By December 12, 1956, neither "owner nor occupier had any right to retain the extension or to "use it for special industrial purposes." Again, I interpolate that that is not correct. They had no right to use it for any industrial purpose. "It was obviously the duty of the L.C.C. to discover "what was the intention of the occupier. The letter of "December 12, 1956, was written to the defendants. If they "went that would have been the end of the matter." Again, with respect, that is not right, and proceeds on the assumption that all that was involved as between either the plaintiff or the defendants on the one hand, and the L.C.C. on the other, was the special industrial user. And so, finally, the judge was led to conclude: "I do not agree that this letter can be taken as "evidence of the intention of the L.C.C. to demolish or of a "decision that the back addition should be demolished. It was "to find out what the occupier intended to do. If the L.C.C. were "of the mind that whatever application be made it had to come "down, I would have expected something like this sent to the "owner and an enforcement notice would have followed. I do "not draw the inference that in December, 1956, the premises "had to be demolished. The L.C.C. had decided that it was "not to be used for the special industrial purpose for which it "was used by the defendants. It seems likely that the defen-"dants would have succeeded in an application for light "industrial user such as existed in the immediate vicinity."

With respect, I am unable to agree with the basis of that part of the judgment. It seems to me that the judge has supposed that the only permission that was required would be for the special industrial use. I have already indicated that the letter of February had made it quite clear that any industrial use was prohibited after April 1; and the letter of December 12, 1956, in the plainest possible terms required the removal of the extension. It seems to me impossible to say that the second letter cannot be taken as any evidence of the intention of the London County Council that the condition as to removal should not be enforced. I quite agree, of course, that no enforcement action had been taken; but still, in light of the terms of that letter and the whole history as I have tried to relate it, I conclude, I must say, without hesitation, that the right answer to the problem posed by the section and incorporated in the last paragraph of the defence is that at the relevant date, March 28, 1957, the tenant has shown

C. A.
1959
KEATS
v.
GRAHAM.
Lord Evershed M.R.

that this extension was going shortly to be removed, or taken down.

The only other point I would add by way of clarification is that the claim of the landlord originally extended to dilapidations both as regards what I have called the main or front portion of 30, Oldhill Place and the extension; but we understand that no issue arises as to the front or main portion, and we are, therefore, confined to the question as it affects the extension.

For the reasons I have given, I think that the defendant has shown that he is under no liability to pay damage for breach of the covenant to deliver up the extension in proper repair; and that the appeal, accordingly, should be allowed.

SELLERS L.J. I agree with my Lord's judgment.

As the defendants relied on section 18 (1), there calls for consideration as a preliminary point, as it chances, the second part of that section, and that gives rise to the question as to whether the extension "would be pulled down shortly after the termination of the tenancy." The termination of the tenancy was March 28, 1957, and the issue of fact was to be adjudged on the evidence as to whether that had been established by the defendants, who were the tenants. The important evidence on that issue, it seems to me, to which the greatest weight should be given, was the fact that the extension itself was erected after March of 1949, on the basis of permission which had then been granted under the Town and Country Planning Act by the London County Council, and the condition of its erection was that it was for a limited period, that period being seven years from April 1, 1949. So that, at the outset, it was erected as a temporary building and it was known that its life—although there was provision for extension if it was thought necessary or reasonable—might be no more than up to April 1, 1956.

In 1954 there was another indication of important evidence I think for consideration on the issue which arises. In their reasons for refusal to grant any use of the premises for "stove enamelling or any industrial use" at all after April 1, 1956, the London County Council, through their appropriate officer, said: "Reasons for refusal: (I) The proposed uses are undesirable and inappropriate as a permanent measure, particularly having regard to the council's development plan for the area, which envisages a residential use. (II) The further extension of a non-conforming use in an area envisaged for residential use in the council's development plan is inappropriate and undesirable."

By the time the tenancy had terminated or the lease was concluded—March, 1957—it is true that the premises had remained up without any order for their demolition some 12 months after the time of the expiration of the seven years. But I do not think that is evidence of the probability that they would continue. I should have thought it was more likely to be regarded as evidence that they were nearing the time when they would have to be demolished. The complication in this case, I think, which has influenced the judge's mind perhaps unduly and inappropriately is that there was introduced into the case evidence which arose after the material date. I am inclined to think that in the majority of cases evidence of events after the material date for consideration would be immaterial and therefore inadmissible. Perhaps that ought to be qualified to this extent, that it may be that a future event may cast some light on an uncertain state of mind or an intention at a prior date. But that can very rarely happen. It would not be admissible, I think, to adduce evidence that at a later date than the material date for consideration the building was still standing, because that would not affect the issue for consideration: it would really be a statement as to what in fact had developed. I think that is clear from the nature of the inquiry stated in the section, which has been illuminated by two authorities to which we have been referred and on this point particularly by Salisbury v. Gilmore,[5] where Lord Greene M.R. deals with this particular matter in this way—true, on an admission of counsel. "Mr. "Havers" (then appearing for the plaintiff) "admitted that if "the intention of the plaintiffs to pull down the building still "prevailed at the termination of the lease, the subsection would "apply and that a change of intention at a later date would not "assist him." If one is looking at evidence at a later date it may well be that it indicates a change of intention and does very little, if anything, to assist the inquiry as to what were the probabilities at the time when the lease came to an end. I think this issue has to be decided on the probabilities and in the light of the two matters I have mentioned and in the light of the letter which was sent, perhaps inadvertently, to the tenants saying that the rear addition would have to be removed without delay, with a request for a written assurance within the next 14 days that that would take place, and the fact that the tenants subsequent to that in January gave notice that they were going to leave the premises and eventually went in March. In those circumstances and on the probabilities, balanced with such evidence as could be set on the other side, balanced with the statement of the landlord that he had no intention to demolish the premises—as far as he was concerned he would stay as long as he could, which was of little effect if the authorities thought otherwise—I think that the county court judge took an erroneous view in deciding that the requirements of this limb (b) of section 18 (1) of the Act had not been complied with. On the probabilities I think that the evidence goes the other way.

For those reasons, along with the more detailed reasons given by my Lord, I also would allow this appeal.

[5] [1942] 2 K.B. 38, 47.

C. A.
1959
KEATS v. GRAHAM.

HARMAN L.J. I, too, agree. The finding of the judge depended on the inference which he drew from the letter of the county council architect written in December, 1956. His position was quite logical. If the inference that he drew was right, namely, that the only purpose of that letter was to get the defendants out of the premises because their particular use was disliked by the county council, and that if and when that end was achieved there was not any real intention to order the demolition of the building at all, then, of course, the judge's conclusion followed. But I do not see any evidence which entitled the judge so to construe that letter or to draw such an inference in the absence of any oral testimony. I think the proper inference was the other way, and the result would be that which my Lords have agreed it is.

Appeal allowed, with costs of the preliminary hearing and of the appeal on scale 4.

Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

Solicitors: Saunders, Sobell, Greenbury, Leigh; Stanley de Leon, Lewison & Co.

E. D.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

1959
Nov. 10, 11, 13.
Paull J.

* FRENCH AND ANOTHER v. ELLIOTT.

[1958 F. No. 55.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Notice to quit—Reasons stated—Failure to remedy breaches of tenancy—Reference to arbitration of one reason under previous notice to quit—Whether second reason premature—Validity of notice to quit—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 63), ss. 24 (2) (d), 26 (1) (a) (d)—Agriculture (Control of Notices to Quit) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 190), regs. 4, 5 and 7.

Landlord and Tenant—Holding over—"Wilfully"—Double rent—Meaning of "wilfully"—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1730, s. 1.

The landlords of an agricultural holding served the tenant with two notices under section 24 (2) (d) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, requiring him to remedy certain breaches of covenant within two months of service. The first, dealing with thatching and the cutting of weeds, was dated September 8, 1956, and the second, dealing with non-payment of rent, was dated October 5, 1956. The landlords then served a notice to quit dated November 13, 1956, under section 24 (2) (d) of the Act, stating as a reason non-compliance with the notice of September 8. The tenant served a counter-notice dated November 24, 1956, under the Agriculture (Control of Notices to Quit) Regulations, 1948, requiring all questions arising from the reasons stated in the notice to quit to be submitted to arbitration. By virtue of the regulations the operation of the notice to quit was suspended. Nothing further was done by either party with regard to this arbitration.

---

[Reported by A. D. RAWLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

The landlords served a further notice to quit, dated December 6, 1956, under section 24 (2) (d), stating as reasons, non-compliance with the notice of September 8, and non-payment of the rent required to be paid by the notice of October 5 within two months. In a letter accompanying this notice to quit the landlords' agent stated that it was given because the rent had not been received at the end of normal office hours, viz., 5.30 p.m. on December 6. The time for compliance given in the October 5 notice did not expire until midnight on December 6. The tenant received the notice to quit on December 7.

In an action by the landlords for possession, mesne profits and double value, the tenant contended that the December 6 notice to quit was bad in respect of the reason for non-payment of rent because it was given before the time for compliance in the October 5 notice had expired; and that because it contained a reason which had been referred to arbitration, viz., failure to comply with the September 8 notice, it was invalid or suspended pending the arbitration:—

Held, (1) that the date for considering whether the reason in respect of non-payment of rent was good was the date when the December 6 notice to quit was delivered to the tenant, viz., December 7. On that date it was a good reason because the rent had not been paid within the time limited by the October 5 notice (post, p. 47).

(2) That, since the notice to quit was good in respect of one reason it operated at once, and was not suspended until the arbitration under the November 13 notice to quit had been determined; it was clear and unambiguous and was not invalid because a reason was added which could not be pursued until the arbitration was determined. Accordingly, the landlords were entitled to an order for possession (post, p. 51).

(3) That the landlords were not entitled to double value because the tenant might not unreasonably have thought that he could not be disturbed until the arbitration had taken place; such a holding over was not wilful (post, p. 51).

ACTION.

The plaintiffs, Thomas Reginald French and Caroline Ruby French, were landlords of a farm and the defendant, Norman Cyril Elliott, was their tenant under a lease dated October 11, 1944. The landlords served a notice on the tenant dated September 8, 1956, under section 24 (2) (d) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, requiring him to remedy certain alleged breaches of covenant dealing with thatching and the cutting of weeds within a period of two months from the date of the service thereof. By a notice to quit dated November 13, 1956, the landlords required the tenant to deliver up possession of the farm on March 25, 1958. The notice stated that it was given "on and for the following "ground and reason and in pursuance of the paragraph appro- "priate thereto set out in section 24 (2) of the Act, paragraph (d), "at the date of the giving of this notice you have failed to comply "with a notice in writing dated September 8, 1956, and served "on you by me requiring you within a reasonable time or within 1959

FRENCH v. ELLIOTT.

"such reasonable time as was specified in the said notice to "remedy all the breaches by you that were capable of being "remedied of the terms or conditions of your tenancy not incon-"sistent with the fulfilment of your responsibilities to farm in "accordance with the rules of good husbandry as set out in the "said notice."

Within one month of the giving of this notice to quit, the tenant gave the landlords a notice, dated November 24, 1956, that he required all questions arising out of the reasons stated in the notice to quit to be determined by arbitration under regulations 4 and 5 of the Agriculture (Control of Notices to Quit) Regulations, 1948. By regulation 7 of the regulations the operation of the notice to quit was suspended pending the termination of the arbitration. Nothing further was done by either party with regard to this arbitration.

By a further notice dated October 5, 1956, which was also given under section 24 (2) (d) of the Act, the landlords required the tenant within two months of the service thereof to pay £115, being the rent due in respect of the holding for the quarter ending September 29, 1956. The two months expired at midnight on December 6, 1956.

By a further notice to quit, dated December 6, 1956, the landlords required the tenant to deliver up possession of the farm on March 25, 1958, the notice stating that "it was given on and for "the following grounds and reasons and in pursuance of the para-"graphs appropriate thereto set out in section 24 (2) of the Act: "paragraph (d), at the date of the giving of this notice you have "failed to comply with a notice in writing dated the 5th day of "October 1956 and served on you by me requiring you within two "months of the service of such notice to pay rent due in respect "of the holding. Paragraph (d), at the date of the giving of this "notice you have failed to comply with a notice in writing dated "the 8th day of September 1956 and served on you by me "requiring you within a reasonable time or within such reason-"able time as was specified in the said notice to remedy all "the breaches by you that were capable of being remedied of the "terms or conditions of your tenancy not inconsistent with the ful-"filment of your responsibilities to farm in accordance with the "rules of good husbandry as set out in the said notice."

Accompanying this notice to quit was a letter of the same date stating that the notice was given by reason of the fact that the rent had not been received at the end of normal office hours, viz.: 5.30 p.m. on that day, December 6. The notice to quit and the letter were delivered to the defendant on December 7, 1956.

The landlords claimed possession of the farm, mesne profits from March 25, 1958 till possession and double value for the same period.

The facts are more fully stated in the judgment.

D. M. Scott and J. B. S. Edwards for the landlords.

H. Heathcote-Williams, Q.C. and T. G. Field-Fisher for the tenant.

In addition to the cases and enactments referred to in the judgment, the following were cited in argument: Turton v. Turnbull [1]; Goldsmiths Co. v. West Metropolitan Railway Co. [2]; Wright v. Smith [3]; Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 26.

Cur. adv. vult.

November 13. PAULL J. Thomas Reginald French and Caroline Ruby French are landlords of a farm known as Teignharvey, Stoke-in-Teignhead, Devonshire. At all material times Norman Cyril Eugene Elliott was the tenant of that farm under a lease dated the 11th day of October, 1944, made between the defendant and one John C. French, the predecessor in title of Thomas French and Caroline French. Thomas French and Caroline French in this action sue to recover possession of that farm, alleging that the defendant's tenancy was duly determined on March 25, 1958, by a notice to quit served on the defendant on December 7, 1956. In addition to claiming possession, the plaintiffs also claim mesne profits from March 25, 1958, and double value from that date under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1730; that is to say, they allege that the defendant has wilfully refused to give possession. The tenancy of the farm is a tenancy which comes under the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (hereinafter called "the Act"). The Act has now been amended by the Agriculture Act, 1958, but the latter Act does not apply to this case and one has to look at the original provisions of the Act of 1948 and the regulations made thereunder.

The original defence merely stated that the defendant admitted the service of the notice to quit referred to in the statement of claim, but denied that the tenancy was validly determined thereby. The defence added a plea that the defendant would rely on the provisions of the Act. Subsequently this pleading was amended by striking out the paragraph referring to the Act and adding a paragraph alleging that in so far as the notice to quit was given for reasons that the defendant had failed to comply with a notice, those reasons were contained in a notice to quit served by the plaintiffs on the defendant dated November 13, 1956. The defendant then alleges that he gave the plaintiffs notice that he required all questions arising out of those reasons to be determined by arbitration; that he had not waived the notice requiring arbitration and stating that he relied upon section 26 of the Act and the regulations. A further plea was added that the notice to quit was bad, in that it was given before the expiration of the period of two months after the date of a notice given by the plaintiffs and dated October 5, 1956.

[1] [1934] 2 K.B. 197.
[2] [1904] 1 K.B. 1; 20 T.L.R. 7.
[3] (1805) 5 Esp. 203.

1959

FRENCH
v.
ELLIOTT.

Paull J.

The facts leading up to this litigation are as follows: There is no doubt but that for some time before the autumn of 1956 the plaintiffs and the defendant had not been on the best of terms. The plaintiffs had taken up the attitude that the defendant was neither paying his rent promptly nor fulfilling the covenants to repair contained in the lease. The defendant was taking up the attitude that the plaintiffs were requiring matters to be done which were not within the covenants of the lease, and that they were trying to restrain him from doing certain thatching which he considered necessary, and which under the lease he had to do, but for which the plaintiffs were responsible for the payment of the labour. Each side, I have no doubt, were from the beginning prepared to take advantage of every possible technical point under the Act, and I look upon this case as one in which it is unnecessary to have sympathy with the one side or the other, and where I have simply to determine the matter by looking to see whether the provisions of the Act have been fulfilled by the plaintiffs, there being no doubt but that the notice to quit relied upon would, but for the provisions of the Act, have been a perfectly good notice to quit at common law.

The matter is practically wholly contained in the correspondence, the evidence given by Mr. Tomlinson, the plaintiffs' agent, merely proving formally some of the documents contained in the correspondence. In so far as his evidence went beyond that, I do not think it assists me in my task. All through this judgment I shall disregard the fact that some letters were written by the agents for the parties and some by their solicitors, and will refer to the documents all through as though they had been signed personally by the parties.

By a notice dated September 8, 1956, the plaintiffs required the defendant to remedy certain alleged breaches of covenant. Those breaches were alleged to be in respect of covenants dealing with thatching and the cutting of weeds. The words of the notice follow the provisions of section 24 (2) (d) of the Act. By subsection (1) of that section the landlord of an agricultural holding may give an ordinary common law notice to quit, in which event the tenant may serve on the landlord a counter-notice requiring that subsection (1) of the Act shall apply to the notice, in which event the notice to quit does not have effect unless the Minister consents. By subsection (2) subsection (1) does not apply in certain circumstances, one of those circumstances, set out in (d) of subsection (2), being that at the date when the notice to quit is given the tenant has failed to comply with a notice in writing requiring him within two months from the service of that notice to pay any rent due, or within a reasonable time or within such reasonable period as is specified in the notice to remedy any breach of covenant by the tenant that is capable of being remedied. The notice served, therefore, was clearly a notice intended to be preliminary to a notice to quit. It stated a period of two months as the reasonable period and followed generally the wording of subsection (2) (d). That notice was posted on September 8 and was delivered to the defendant on September 10.

By notice dated October 5, the plaintiffs gave a further notice which clearly was intended to be another notice under the same subsection. That notice required the defendant to pay within two months from the service of the notice the sum of £115 which had become due on September 29. That notice was posted on October 5 and was received by the defendant on October 6. Clearly, by November 13, the period of two months stated in the notice dated September 8 had elapsed, and the plaintiffs took the view that the defendant had not remedied the breaches. In consequence, by a notice to quit dated November 13, the plaintiffs required the defendant to deliver up possession of the farm on March 25, 1958; that is, twelve months after March 25, 1957. Had the notice stopped there it would clearly have been an ordinary common law notice to quit and would come within section 24 (1) of the Act. The notice, however, went on to state that it was given "on and for the following ground and reason "and in pursuance of section 24 (2) (d)." The reason given by that notice was that the defendant had failed to comply with the notice of September 8.

The Act itself, curiously enough, does not in section 24 or in another section directly state what shall happen if a landlord serves such a notice to quit. Clearly the tenant cannot serve a counter-notice requiring subsection (1) to apply, because subsection (1) does not and cannot apply to such a notice to quit. That was admitted by both sides in this action. The situation is governed in a rather roundabout way by the fact that under section 26 (1) (a) the Minister may make regulations for requiring any question arising under subsection (2) of section 24 of the Act to be determined by arbitration under the Act, and for limiting the time for which any such arbitration may be required or proceedings taken. Clearly, whether the tenant had complied with the original notice would be a question arising under the subsection. The Minister, therefore, has made regulations, and the regulations which applied at the times material in this action were the Agriculture (Control of Notice to Quit) Regulations, 1948. By regulations 4 and 5 of those regulations it is open to the tenant (I stress the words "open") within one month from the giving of a notice to quit specifying that the tenant had failed to comply with a notice in writing under section 24 (2) (d) to serve on the landlord a notice in writing requiring any question arising out of the reason stated in the notice to quit to be determined by arbitration under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. The next step, therefore, that took place was that the defendant sent to the plaintiffs a notice stating that he required all the questions arising out of the reasons stated in the November 13 notice to be determined by arbitration under the Act.

By section 26 (1) (d) the Minister may make regulations suspending the operation of notices to quit until any arbitration such as that mentioned in the notice of November 23 has been heard and determined, and by paragraph 7 of the regulations to which I have referred the Minister made such a regulation. The consequence is that, so far as the notice to quit dated November 13 is concerned, the operation of that notice was suspended until after the arbitration desired by the defendant had been heard and determined.

1959

FRENCH v. ELLIOTT.

Paull J.

Nothing further was done by either party with regard to this arbitration. No doubt the defendant was perfectly content that the whole matter should remain in abeyance, and the plaintiffs no doubt had in mind that unless the defendant paid his rent in accordance with their notice dated October 5 they would very shortly have another reason coming within section 24 (2) (d); and that, if arbitration was desired with regard to that reason, it could be a short and simple arbitration merely determining whether rent had in fact been paid within the time limited by the notice.

By 5.30 p.m. on December 6, at which time the plaintiffs' agent closed his office in Exeter, no rent had been received by the plaintiffs in respect of the period covered by the plaintiffs' notice of October 5. In consequence, the agent wrote a letter stating that he was sending a further notice to quit by reason of the fact that the rent had not been received by the end of normal office hours, namely, 5.30 p.m. The notice is dated December 6, and states that it is given "on or for the following grounds and "reasons and in pursuance of section 24 (2) of the Act." It then sets out two grounds or reasons, each under paragraph (d) of the section. The first is: "At the date of the giving of this notice "you have failed to comply with a notice in writing dated the "5th day of October, 1956 and served on you by me requiring "you within two months of the service of such notice to pay rent "due in respect of the above holding." The second is: "At the "date of the giving of this notice you have failed to comply with "a notice in writing dated the 8th day of September, 1956 and "served on you by me requiring you within a reasonable time or "within such reasonable time as was specified in the said "notice to remedy all the breaches by you," and then follow the words contained in the subsection. That notice to quit, therefore, was based upon two quite separate grounds, one of which had already been covered by the earlier notice to quit, in respect of which there had been a notice requiring arbitration. The letter and the notice were posted on December 6, presumably some time in the evening, and were delivered to the defendant on December 7.

At the time when the notice was delivered the defendant had not paid the rent in question. The rent was sent by the defendant by a letter which is dated December 7, but which bears the postmark 1.30 a.m., December 8. It was received by the agent on the same day, December 8.

One of the points taken by Mr. Heathcote-Williams on behalf of the defendant is that, quite apart from any effect arising from repeating the reasons contained in the notice to quit dated November 13, the notice is a bad notice to quit because the agent gave, in the accompanying letter, a reason for sending the notice to quit, that reason being that the rent had not been received by 5.30 p.m. on the 6th. Mr. Heathcote-Williams argued that by 5.30 p.m. on the 6th the two months had not elapsed, and that, therefore, the notice is bad. He contended that section 26 (1), together with the regulations of 1948 made by the Minister, did not prevent the defendant from giving no notice of arbitration and then setting up as a defence to the action that the two months had not elapsed in respect of the payment of rent when the notice to quit was given. I was at first somewhat doubtful with regard to this. My attention, however, was drawn to Budge v. Hicks [1] and Jones v. Gates.[2] Although the ratio decidendi in the latter case appears to have been based upon the unfairness to the tenant which would have arisen in that particular case if he could not raise the question which arose under section 24 (2) (b) in the courts without having given a notice of arbitration, I have come to the conclusion that that case, in any event, would bind me to hold that the effect of section 26 and the regulations made under that section is not such as to shut out the tenant from raising the same point in an action for possession as he could raise under an arbitration by giving notice of a desire to arbitrate. However, that question is one which I feel is of no importance either in this case or generally. It is of no importance generally because after Jones v. Gates [3] the regulations were altered, and by the Agricultural Land Tribunals and Notices to Quit Order, 1959, paragraph 6, it is made obligatory on the tenant, who wishes to contest any reason under section 24 (2) (b), (d) or (e) given in a notice to quit, to serve on the landlord within one month a notice in writing requiring arbitration. It is of no importance in this case because I hold that if the question of time can be taken before me, the defendant wholly fails to establish his argument. In the first place, the letter written by the agent merely pointed out that he was sending the letter because the rent had not been received by 5.30 p.m. In other words, he was pointing out that it might be that the rent would be received by midnight on the 6th, in which event the notice could be disregarded, at any rate, so far as non-payment of rent was concerned. In any event, I cannot see why the letter should be brought into the matter at all.

The notice itself fully sets out the grounds and the reasons, and the reason given in respect of the non-payment of rent was a perfectly good and proper reason by the time the notice was delivered to the defendant, which is in this case the time which I have got to accept as being the proper time for the purpose of

[1] [1951] 2 K.B. 335; [1951] 2 T.L.R. 349; [1951] 2 All E.R. 245.

[2] [1954] 1 W.L.R. 222; [1954] 1 All E.R. 158.

[3] Ibid.

1959

FRENCH
v.
ELLIOTT.

Paull J.

considering whether the plaintiffs bring themselves within paragraph (d). That ground of defence, therefore, disappears, and had the notice to quit only contained one reason and not the two reasons, in my judgment, the plaintiffs would plainly be entitled to succeed in this action.

Continuing the history, on January 4, 1957, the defendant sent to the plaintiffs a counter-notice stating: "I hereby give you notice "that I require subsection (1) of section 24 of the above Act shall "apply to your notice to quit." That notice was based upon a complete misunderstanding of the position under the Act. Such a notice could only have effect if the notice to quit dated December 6 had been an ordinary common law notice to quit. I can, however, sympathise with those responsible for sending the notice, since, on the face of it, section 24 does not contain any provision as to what should happen where the notice is a notice stating reasons given under subsection (2) of that section. Sympathy or no sympathy, that notice was what I may call the first mistake. In my judgment, the notice was null and void and was of no effect.

On January 17 the plaintiffs sent to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food the notice to quit of December 6 and a form of application for the appointment of an arbitrator duly filled in. That form starts with the words: "The landlord and tenant "having failed to agree as to the person to act as arbitrator," and goes on after a few more words: "I hereby apply to the Minister "to appoint an arbitrator for the purpose of settling the claims, "differences or questions set forth below." The only paragraph having any bearing upon the question of the claim is a paragraph which requires the applicant to state the nature of the claim in respect of which arbitration is desired. The answer on the form was: "application by the tenant for arbitration on the reasons "for service of notice to quit under section 24 (2) (d)." In my judgment, the form and the letter must be read together, and since the letter sent a copy of the notice to quit of December 6, 1956, it must be taken that the plaintiffs were asking for an arbitrator to decide the question arising under that notice and no other. It is of some importance to decide that, since, on the face of the form itself, the application could be an application to determine the differences arising out of the notice to quit of November 13. Prima facie that would be so, since it was only in respect of that notice to quit that the tenant had served the notice requiring arbitration. The notice served by the defendant in respect of the notice to quit dated December 6, even if it had been valid, would not require arbitration, but would require the Minister to consider the matter and to say whether he consented to the notice to quit being effective.

Here then was the second mistake. The application for an arbitrator was not based on the tenant having fulfilled regulation 4 of the 1948 regulations. That being so, there having been no request for arbitration in respect of the terms of the notice to quit of December 6, and the landlords and the tenant not having failed to agree as to a person to act as an arbitrator in that matter, nor agreed to ask the Minister to appoint an arbitrator, the act of the plaintiffs in asking for an arbitrator was an act which they were not entitled to do and was based upon a complete misunderstanding of the position. In the same way as I sympathise with the agents of the defendant, so I sympathise with the agents of the plaintiffs. However clear the procedure may appear to be to a lawyer after a careful consideration of all the sections and regulations, nothing can be easier for a busy estate agent than to misunderstand the effect of the documents served on him. Here, however, was the second mistake, and, as I see it, that application for an arbitrator, like the notice given by the defendant, was null and void and was of no effect: although it may well be that if the defendant had subsequently agreed to an arbitrator being appointed under that application, it might be held that the arbitrator had authority to settle the questions in dispute between the parties under the notice to quit dated December 6.

The defendant, however, took up quite a different attitude. Having received a letter from the Ministry dated January 25, 1957, stating that the Minister was proposing to appoint an arbitrator to decide all questions arising out of the reasons stated in the notice to quit dated December 6, 1956, the defendant replied to the effect that, since the landlords had served two notices to quit and the tenant had served a counter-notice under the first of the notices to quit, the reference could only be a reference arising out of the reasons stated in that notice and not arising out of the reasons stated in the notice of December 6. In other words, the defendant was taking up the attitude that he was not prepared to allow an arbitrator to deal with the question whether the rent had been paid within the time limited by the notice dated October 5, 1956. The letter from the defendant (in fact, from his solicitors) says in terms that the tenant had not served a counter-notice in respect of the second notice to quit and, therefore, there was no right on the part of the Minister to appoint an arbitrator. The Minister having replied that, prima facie, the appointment would appear to be valid, and that he was bound to proceed with the appointment, the defendant once more wrote back stating in terms that the application for the appointment of an arbitrator was prima facie invalid and that the Minister had no power to appoint one. Undeterred by this, the Minister, by an appointment dated February 21, 1957, appointed an arbitrator, a Mr. Lawrence, and stated that it would be the duty of Mr. Lawrence to decide all questions arising out of the reasons stated in the notice to quit dated December 6, 1956.

By this time the plaintiffs had awakened to the fact that their application was based on a misunderstanding of the position, and by a letter dated February 22, 1957, they stated that it was their desire to withdraw the application for the appointment of an arbitrator. I am informed that there was a reply from the Ministry to that letter again stating that the Minister had no v.

BIBL. LONDON UNIV.

1959

FRENCH
ELLIOTT.

Paull J.

power to revoke his appointment. It seems to me that it was not a question of whether the Minister had a power to revoke, but whether he had a power to appoint. As I have already indicated in my judgment, that appointment was null and void and was of no effect.

Apart from the fact that the defendant wrote a letter to Mr. Lawrence to say that he had never made any request for arbitration, there the matter has remained, so far as arbitration is concerned. In my judgment, I am not only entitled to but must entirely disregard all these events which took place after the service of the notice to quit dated December 6. In my judgment, they do not in any way affect the legal rights of the parties. The question which I have to determine, therefore, is whether the fact that the defendant gave a notice requiring arbitration after the notice to quit dated November 13 prevents the notice to quit dated December 6 from being a valid notice to quit operating on March 25, 1958, or alternatively prevents it operating unless the arbitration invoked in respect of the notice to quit dated November 13 had by then been determined in favour of the plaintiffs.

It is admitted by Mr. Heathcote-Williams that if the notice to quit dated December 6 had stopped after the first reason, i.e., the non-payment of rent, that notice would clearly have been a good notice. I am told that there is no authority which throws any light upon the problem whether the notice to quit of December 6 is invalid because it added a bad reason to a good reason, or rather, added a reason which the landlords could not pursue until after the arbitration had taken place with regard to the notice to quit dated November 13. I therefore approach the problem by trying to make a simple analysis of the position. If a notice to quit has to give a good reason, and gives that good reason, I cannot see that it becomes a bad notice to quit because it gives in addition a bad reason. Mr. Heathcote-Williams urged that, at any rate, no notice to quit could be effective until the arbitration under the November 13 notice to quit had been held. I cannot see how that can be. If a new reason arises, I cannot see why the landlords cannot rely upon that new reason and serve an entirely new notice to quit. Mr. Heathcote-Williams relied upon Cowan v. Wrayford.[4] That case decided that if a landlord in fact chose to give a notice to quit based on section 24 (2) of the Act rather than a common law notice to quit he could not treat such a notice to quit as a common law notice to quit if the reason which he gave under subsection (2) turned out to be a bad reason. It is quite true that in that case expressions were used by the Court of Appeal with regard to a notice having to be clear and unambiguous, which is clearly right, whether the notice to quit is based upon reasons contained in subsection (2) or is simply a common law notice to quit. This notice to quit of December 6 seems to me quite clear and quite unambiguous. Its only fault (if it be a fault) is that of two reasons given one was a reason in respect of which there had been a requirement for arbitration and in respect of which, therefore, the notice could not be enforced until the arbitration had been held. It was quite open for the defendant to give a notice requiring arbitration under this notice to quit, and as no arbitrator had been appointed under the first notice to quit, one arbitrator could have been appointed by the Minister to deal with both matters had he been asked to do so by either party.

[4] [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1340; [1953] 2 All E.R. 1138.

If I be right, and the notice to quit of December 6 is a good notice, I can see no reason why its operation should be suspended until the arbitration under the November 13 notice has been determined. If two concurrent notices to quit are given for different reasons, and a request for arbitration is only made with regard to one of the notices, I cannot see why the other notice should not be an effective notice. It would be absurd to hold that a tenant could set a notice at nought by challenging quite a different notice, and that, it seems to me, would follow if the defendant's contention is right in this case. That argument also fails. I add that I do not see that Coates v. Diment [5] which Mr. Heathcote-Williams cited to me has any effect on this point. The plaintiffs, therefore, are entitled to possession.

With regard to the plaintiffs' claim for double value, in my judgment that fails. As I see it, the fact that the defendant was habitually late in paying his rent, or behaved badly while a tenant, has nothing to do with whether the plaintiffs are entitled to double value. The wording of section 1 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1730, is: "in case any tenant shall wilfully hold "over any tenement after the determination of his term." It has been held that "wilfully" means "contumaceously," but I can see no reason why the old English word "wilfully" does not exactly express the true meaning of the statute. The statute does not mean that a tenant is a contumaceous tenant. It deals only with the moment of time when the tenancy comes to an end. At that moment of time a tenant may say: "I shall stay on. "I think I have a right to do so." His staying on is not wilful. On the other hand, a tenant may say: "I will stay on, although "I know I have no right to do so." That is wilful, and well illustrates the now sometimes forgotten distinction between "I "shall" and the insistent "I will." In this case there was, in my judgment, a sufficient muddle on both sides to prevent the wilfulness arising, since the defendant may not unreasonably have thought that he could not be disturbed until the arbitration had taken place.

The result is that the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for possession of Teignharvey with mesne profits from March 25, 1958 to possession and are entitled to the costs of this action.

[5] [1951] 1 All E.R. 890.

1959

FRENCH v. ELLIOTT.

Judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

Solicitors: Ellis, Bickersteth, Aglionby & Hazel for James Mason, Tucker & Son, Newton Abbot; Kinch & Richardson for Carter, Fisher & Co., Torquay.

[LEEDS ASSIZES.]

1959
Dec. 1, 2, 11.

Wrangham J.

* HALL v. HALL.

Husband and Wife—Desertion—Separation agreement—Consensual separation recited in written maintenance agreement—Period of separation indefinite—Subsequent offers by husband to return rejected by wife—Whether wife in desertion.

On June 4, 1952, after a violent scene, the husband left the wife and matrimonial home, and on July 3, 1952, both parties signed an agreement providing for maintenance and other matters, and reciting that it was no longer possible for them to reside together as man and wife, and that they had agreed that they should live separately. By a letter dated April 3, 1953, and on repeated visits to the wife for week-ends and holidays the husband asked her for a reconciliation but she steadfastly refused to live with him again. The husband continued to pay under the agreement as he regarded it as his moral duty to provide for his wife. The husband petitioned for a divorce on the ground of desertion:—

Held, that the agreement to live separately was for an indefinite period, and that it was terminable upon the will of either party. By his letter and subsequent conversations the husband had made it clear that he was putting an end to the agreement and the wife had no legal right to refuse her husband's genuine offer of reconciliation, and from the date of her refusal had been in desertion.

Bosley v. Bosley [1958] 1 W.L.R. 645; [1958] 1 All E.R. 167 applied.

Pardy v. Pardy [1939] P. 288; 55 T.L.R. 1037; [1939] 3 All E.R. 779 distinguished.

PETITION.

By his petition the husband prayed for dissolution of his marriage on the ground that his wife had treated him with cruelty and deserted him. The wife denied both cruelty and desertion and asserted that her husband had treated her with cruelty and deserted her. At the outset, however, the husband abandoned his case of cruelty and relied on desertion only. In his judgment Wrangham J. held that the wife's case of cruelty failed and the case is reported only on the issue of desertion.

The parties were married on July 15, 1922, and there were four children, Jean, Malcolm, Mollie and Alastair (known as Sandy). On June 4, 1952, occurred a violent scene which ended the marriage, after which the husband left the wife. The subsequent facts are set out in the judgment.

---

[Reported by G. M. SMAILES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

The agreement of July 3, 1952, referred to in the judgment was in the following terms:

"Minute of Agreement, between Harry Richard Hall, "Engineer, 2 Summerfield Villas, Edinburgh (hereinafter referred "to as 'the First Party') and Mrs. Ruth Hall, wife of the said "Harry Richard Hall and residing at 365 Lanark Road, Edinburgh "(hereinafter referred to as 'the Second Party').

"Whereas the First Party and the Second Party are agreed "that it is no longer possible for them to reside together as man "and wife; and Whereas they have agreed that they should live "separately; and Whereas certain matters require to be regulated "between them; Now Therefore the parties agree as follows:

"1. The First Party agrees to pay the Second Party by "monthly instalments a maintenance allowance at the rate of not "less than Three hundred pounds per annum under deduction of "Income Tax at the full standard rate for life or until the "parties are divorced. . . ." Then followed provision for other matters including property and access to one of the children.

Edward Lyons for the husband.
H. G. Bennett for the wife.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 11. WRANGHAM J., reading his judgment, considered the matrimonial history up to the separation on June 4, 1952, held that the wife's case of cruelty failed, and continued:

Soon after the parting the parties were in contact through solicitors and on July 3, 1952, they signed an agreement providing for maintenance and certain other matters. This agreement recited that the parties were agreed that it was no longer possible for them to reside together as man and wife, and they had agreed that they should live separately. However, by a letter dated April 3, 1953, the husband wrote asking the wife for a reconciliation. The wife replied, not reproaching him for past cruelty or asking for assurances of reform in the future, but saying that "I am me and nothing will alter me." Thereafter, the husband repeatedly visited the wife for week-ends and holidays and asked her for a reconciliation but the wife has steadfastly refused to live with him again. She set out her reasons in a letter on November 1, 1953, in which she said: "I do not honestly think "it would work—we are so incompatible in our natures." I am inclined to think she was right. Moreover, she had tasted independence, as appears in that letter, and was living with Jean

1959

HALL
v.
HALL.

Wrangham J.

and her son-in-law who admired her greatly, Mollie and Sandy in a contented home.

Eventually, by a letter dated February 11, 1958, the husband told the wife that he had decided to start divorce proceedings. The wife, not unreasonably, pointed out that they had, in her words, agreed to be good friends even if they could not be husband and wife, and that she had in no way defaulted on that bargain. The husband's contention before me, however, was that the existence of the oral separation agreement recited in the written maintenance agreement did not prevent his wife's refusal of an offer of reconciliation from constituting desertion. I am satisfied that on many occasions from April, 1953, onwards the husband made genuine offers of reconciliation and that these were refused by the wife. I do not think that there has been proved against the husband any such misconduct as to justify the wife in refusing that offer; the law does not regard mere incompatibility of temperament as good ground for refusing a genuine offer of reconciliation. But the question remains whether, in view of the oral separation agreement, the wife was under any duty to accept the offer of reconciliation.

In paragraph 134 of Rayden on Divorce (7th ed.) it is stated that: "A separation which begins by being consensual may be "changed into desertion without a previous resumption of "cohabitation, but it must lose its consensual element on both "sides." That statement of law is based on a passage in the judgment of Greene M.R. in Pardy v. Pardy.[1] But in that case the parties had executed a separation deed "couched in the "ordinary terms,"[2] which presumably provided for a separation during the joint lives of the parties. The question was in what circumstances an agreement to separate for a defined period could become ineffective during that period; and it was held that a repudiation of the agreement by one party, acquiesced in by the other, produced that result. In Bosley v. Bosley[3] the Court of Appeal held that where the agreement to live separately was for an indefinite period it did not prevent the refusal of a genuine offer of reconciliation from constituting desertion. This, I think, implies that an agreement to live separately for an indefinite period is terminable upon the will of either party either immediately (as in the case of tenancy at will) or perhaps upon reasonable notice if the other terms of a particular agreement are such as to lead to the inference that such a term should be implied. To that extent the statement of the law in Rayden is misleading.

In the present case the agreement to live separately recited in the written maintenance agreement was, in my judgment, an agreement for an indefinite period; had it been for the joint lives of the parties, or any other defined period, the recital would have said so. It follows that it was terminable upon the will of either party, there being nothing to show that notice was required. By his letter in April, 1953, and his subsequent conversations the husband made it clear that he was putting an end to the agreement. It is true that he continued to pay under the maintenance agreement which was based upon the separation agreement; but I am satisfied from the evidence that he regarded it as his moral duty to provide as generously for his wife as he could, and it would be unreasonable to hold that his failure to stop payments of maintenance was inconsistent with his termination of the separation agreement. Had there been any benefits under the maintenance agreement which he continued to take the position might have been different. The separation agreement being out of the way the wife had no legal right to refuse her husband's genuine offer of reconciliation, and from the date of her refusal has been in desertion. There must, therefore, be a decree nisi upon the petition and the prayer of the answer for dissolution rejected.

[1] [1939] P. 288, 303; 55 T.L.R. 1037; [1939] 3 All E.R. 779.

[2] [1939] P. 288, 289.

[3] [1958] 1 W.L.R. 645; [1958] 1 All E.R. 167.

Decree nisi.

Solicitors: Lionel Altman, Leeds; Morrish & Co., Leeds.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.]

* REGINA v. WILLIS.

C. C. A.
1959
Nov. 23.
Lord Parker C.J., Hilbery and Salmon JJ.

Criminal Law—Evidence—Hearsay—Admissible to show fact that statement was made—Charge of stealing—Defendant's lack of candour with police after commission of offence—Conversation between defendant and co-defendant before defendant's interviews with police—Evidence of conversation sought to be adduced by defendant—Whether admissible as evidence of defendant's state of mind at time of interviews, to explain his conduct.

The appellant, a director of a scrap metal business, was charged jointly with the firm's foreman, one N., with the larceny of a drum of cable from the Atomic Energy Authority at Aldermaston. The cable had been taken from Aldermaston and delivered two days later to one of the firm's customers. The appellant's defence was that he was unaware of the taking and delivery of the cable, and that he was first made suspicious by a telephone conversation with the customer's representative a few hours after its delivery. The prosecution case was largely founded on the appellant's failure candidly to inform the police of these suspicions.

The appellant sought to explain this failure by giving evidence of the content of a conversation with N. which took place shortly before the appellant's interviews with the police. It was contended on his behalf that this evidence was admissible to show his state of mind at the time of his interviews with the police, and so to explain

---

[Reported by GROVE HULL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

C. C. A.

1959

REGINA
v.
WILLIS.

his conduct. The evidence was rejected as inadmissible and the appellant was convicted. On appeal:—

Held, that the evidence was admissible since it was evidence of the appellant's state of mind, which was relevant in considering his conduct at the interviews with the police, and that the fact that the conduct to be considered was subsequent to and not contemporaneous with the commission of the offence was irrelevant; but that, having regard to the overwhelming nature of the prosecution evidence, the appeal would be dismissed under the proviso to section 4 (1) of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907.

Subramaniam v. Public Prosecutor [1956] 1 W.L.R. 965 applied.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant, George Arthur Willis, was convicted at Berkshire Quarter Sessions (deputy chairman: Judge Duveen Q.C.) on July 3, 1959, of the larceny of a drum of cable from the Atomic Energy Authority's premises at Aldermaston. He was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment.

The appellant was a director of G. A. Willis Ltd., a firm of scrap metal dealers carrying on business at Southend. The firm employed one Charles Samuel Napper as an "outside foreman" and one David Edmund Boulton as a driver. The firm had a contract with the Atomic Energy Authority to remove scrap weekly from Aldermaston and it was the appellant's practice to go there once a week in his car, accompanying such lorries as were necessary to collect the scrap. At Aldermaston, the appellant concerned himself only with seeing officials and inspecting property which was for sale and left the task of collecting and loading the scrap to Napper.

On January 19, 1959, the appellant accompanied two of his lorries to Aldermaston. Napper and Boulton were in the party. In the appellant's absence, Napper instructed Boulton to load a large and valuable drum of cable on to one of the lorries. The drum was packed round with scrap metal and a tarpaulin was put over it. Later the appellant returned and accompanied the two lorries to an inn, where all the members of the party spent the night. The next morning, January 20, the appellant left the party. The lorry with the drum of cable was driven to Southend, where it was unloaded in G. A. Willis Ltd.'s yard. By the time the appellant returned to the yard it was dark.

On the following day, January 21, a lorry left the yard taking the drum of cable to the premises at Watford of the Brookside Metal Co., customers of G. A. Willis Ltd., who employed one Albert Henry Stock as their buyer. According to the appellant's evidence he arrived at his office after the lorry departed, and was up to this time totally ignorant of the fact that a drum of cable had been brought from Aldermaston.

Later on the same day police visited the appellant at his office and informed him that they were interested in a large drum of cable which had come from Aldermaston on January 19. The appellant replied that no cable had been taken. On the same day the appellant had one or two telephone conversations with Stock, in which Stock told him that the Brookside Metal Co. had received some cable from G. A. Willis Ltd. The appellant, according to his evidence, then realised that no drum of cable of the type described by Stock could have been sent in an honest way by his firm, and that something was very wrong.

In the evening of the same day, January 21, the appellant was notified by the police that Napper, who had been arrested and was at the police station, wished to see him. The appellant had a conversation with Napper. Later in the same evening, the appellant saw a police officer engaged in the investigation of the theft, but said nothing about his conversation with Stock. On the following day, the appellant was interviewed by two other police officers, who told him that they were investigating the theft. According to the police, the appellant said: "My lorries have not "been used to take any drums of cable out. I know different to "that." According to the appellant, he said: "I do not know "anything about it."

Later, the appellant was arrested, and was charged jointly with Napper and Boulton with stealing the drum of cable. The appellant was also charged separately with receiving the cable. Napper pleaded Guilty to the charge against him and the appellant pleaded Not Guilty to both the charges. Boulton also pleaded Not Guilty.

At the trial, the case for the prosecution was based, first, on the comment that if Napper was acting on his own and not in concert with a fraudulent employer, he was taking a fantastic risk in stealing under his employer's eyes; that he was taking a further great risk in taking the drum of cable to the employer's customer; and that in so doing he stood to gain nothing, for payment would be made to the employer and not to him.

Secondly, the prosecution commented upon the appellant's failure to give candid answers to the police, particularly after the conversations with Stock should have put him on his guard.

The defence sought to adduce evidence by the appellant of his conversation with Napper on the evening of January 21, in order to explain the appellant's state of mind after the conversation and to illuminate his subsequent conduct. The prosecution objected to this evidence, and the deputy chairman ruled that it was inadmissible, on the ground that the appellant's state of mind after the conversation was not relevant, in the sense required to render the evidence admissible. Neither the defence nor the prosecution called Napper and the jury never heard evidence of the content of the conversation.

In his summing-up the deputy chairman commented several times upon the appellant's failure to inform the police of his suspicions aroused by the conversations with Stock, and upon the appellant's answers given to the police after these conversations. The jury convicted both the appellant and Boulton of stealing,

C. C. A.
1959
REGINA
v.
WILLIS.

returning no verdict upon the count of receiving against the appellant.

The appellant appealed against his conviction upon the grounds, inter alia, that the deputy chairman was wrong in ruling that the appellant's evidence of his conversation with Napper on January 21 was inadmissible, that the appellant was prevented thereby from giving a full explanation of his state of mind when subsequently interviewed by the police, and that in consequence the deputy chairman in his summing-up improperly stressed the appellant's failure to inform the police that the drum of cable had been delivered by Napper to the Brookside Metal Co.

The court was informed by counsel for the appellant that in the course of the conversation with Napper the appellant was told by him that he (Napper) was not guilty of any offence, and that he had never taken any cable to Mr. Stock at all.

Edward Clarke for the appellant.
Kenneth Jones for the Crown.

No cases, other than that which is referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument.

LORD PARKER C.J., giving the judgment of the court, stated the facts and referred to the deputy chairman's ruling upon the admissibility of the appellant's conversation with Napper, and continued: This court is of opinion that that ruling was wrong. It is quite clear that evidence of what has been said by a person who is not called as a witness may be perfectly good evidence of the state of mind in which the defendant was. In a recent case in the Privy Council, Subramaniam v. Public Prosecutor,[1] it was held that the state of mind of a man charged with possessing ammunition contrary to certain regulations could be proved by what had been told him by certain terrorists into whose hands he had come. Mr. de Silva, giving the advice of the Board, said[2]: "In ruling out peremptorily the evidence of con-"versation between the terrorists and the appellant the trial "judge was in error. Evidence of a statement made to a witness "by a person who is not himself called as a witness may or may "not be hearsay. It is hearsay and inadmissible when the object "of the evidence is to establish the truth of what is contained "in the statement. It is not hearsay and is admissible when it "is proposed to establish by the evidence, not the truth of the "statement, but the fact that it was made. The fact that the "statement was made, quite apart from its truth, is frequently "relevant in considering the mental state and conduct thereafter "of the witness or of some other person in whose presence the "statement was made."

In the opinion of this court that statement of the law is applicable to the present case. It is true that the Board were there considering the state of mind and conduct of the defendant at the time of the commission of the offence, but provided the evidence as to his state of mind and conduct is relevant, it matters not whether it was in regard to the conduct at the time of the commission of the offence or, as here, at a subsequent time, to explain his answers to the police and his conduct when charged. Accordingly, that evidence in the present case was wrongly excluded.

[1] [1956] 1 W.L.R. 965. [2] Ibid. 970.

In those circumstances, Mr. Clarke points to the fact that a great deal of the prosecution case was based on the answers that the appellant gave to the police, and he has drawn attention to a number of passages in which the deputy chairman in his summing-up stressed the matter. It is sufficient to refer only to one of the passages, occurring at the end of the summing-up. It is in these terms: "But it does not end there. He told you "the reason why he did not do it was because he wanted to see "Napper first. He saw Napper that evening, and saw Sergeant "Rickwood immediately after he had seen Napper. You may "ask yourselves, members of the jury, if he had decided not to "tell the police until he had seen Napper, why after he had seen "Napper did he not then tell Rickwood, whom he saw that even-"ing, about the drum. You will have to consider that very "carefully, members of the jury, and ask yourselves what "light that throws on Willis's mentality."

It appears that the evidence which the appellant sought to give was that Napper had said that he, Napper, was not guilty of any offence and had not taken any drum of cable to the Brookside Metal Co. It is said that if that evidence had been given, a comment such as I have referred to—and there are several others—would not have been made. It seems to this court, however, that although the comment would not have taken exactly the same form, a similar comment was inevitable, namely: Was the absence of a true statement to the police consistent with this man's innocence?

This court is sparing in its application of the proviso to section 4 (1) of the Act, but in the present case the evidence is really overwhelming. In the first place, it is almost inconceivable that an honest employer, even though told by his employee that nothing had been stolen, and that nothing had been taken to Stock's yard, should not at once have told the police what he had been told by Stock, namely, that a drum of cable which appeared to have been stolen had come from the appellant's yard. It is almost inconceivable that on the next day, when he was seen by Inspector Moyle, he should have said: "My lorries have not been "used to take any drums of cable out; I know different to "that." Finally, there was the overwhelming case against the appellant on the basis that Napper with an honest employer was taking the most fantastic risk and appeared at the end not to be in a position to obtain any advantage from it. Any jury properly directed would have been bound to return the same verdict even if this evidence had been admitted and, accordingly, this appeal must be dismissed.

C. C. A.
1959
REGINA v. WILLIS.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Nelson, Mitchell & Williams, Southend-on-Sea; Berkshire County Solicitor.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1959
Nov. 17;
Dec. 1.
Wynn-Parry J.

* COOK v. "X" CHAIR PATENTS CO. LTD.

[1959 C. No. 2859.]

Practice and Procedure—Stay of proceedings—Action against company in voluntary liquidation — Action for wrongful dismissal — Application by liquidator to stay action—Substantial dispute as to amount of damages—Whether a matter to be determined in the liquidation—Whether any advantage gained by stay of proceedings —Discretion of court.

The plaintiff in August, 1959, brought an action against a company in voluntary liquidation claiming damages for wrongful dismissal from their employment, the dismissal being due to the liquidation. The company did not dispute the terms of the plaintiff's employment or that he had been wrongfully dismissed, but there was a substantial dispute as to the amount of damages which he should receive. On a summons, dated October 1, 1959, by the liquidator to have all further proceedings in the action stayed on the footing that the plaintiff should prove his claim in the winding up:—

Held, that although the court had a discretion in the matter, as a general principle it would not interfere with the right of an employee, pursuing a claim for damages for wrongful dismissal in a voluntary liquidation, to choose his tribunal unless there were circumstances justifying such interference; that since there was a substantial dispute as to the amount of damages, as to which evidence and cross-examination might be required, it was not a case in which any good would be done or expense saved by staying the action; and that, therefore, the court would not exercise its discretion in the liquidator's favour.

Currie v. Consolidated Kent Collieries Corporation Ltd. [1906] 1 K.B. 134 applied.

PROCEDURE SUMMONS.

The plaintiff, George Cook, on or about August 31, 1959, issued a writ claiming £5,685 damages against the defendant company, the "X" Chair Patents Co. Ltd., for wrongful dismissal from their employment as works manager. The company was in course of a voluntary liquidation pursuant to a special resolution of the members passed on May 12, 1958, and the dismissal was due to the winding up: the company did not at any time dispute the terms of the plaintiff's employment or that he had been wrongfully dismissed, but solely the amount of damages he should receive, and the correspondence between the parties' solicitors showed that there was a substantial dispute as to the amount. The liquidator took out a summons on October 1, 1959, asking that all further proceedings in the action be stayed, it being contended that the plaintiff should prove his claim in the winding up of the company, which would be both more convenient and expeditious, and less expensive.

---

[Reported by Miss MARGARET THOMAS, Barrister-at-Law.]

G. B. Parker for the defendant company.
D. A. Thomas for the plaintiff.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, were cited in the course of argument: Freeman v. *General Publishing Co.; Gerard v. Worth of Paris Ltd.†

Wynn-Parry J. stated the facts and continued:

So far as the law is concerned, I think that for all practical purposes it is contained in one case, namely, Currie v. Consolidated Kent Collieries Corporation Ltd.[1] That was a strong case upon the facts because the liquidator denied any liability at all on the part of the company, and, in view of that denial, the employee concerned put in an alternative plea that he was entitled to damages on the basis of a quantum meruit. In the course of his judgment Collins M.R. enunciated the clearly established principle that in the case of a voluntary liquidation prima facie the employee pursuing his claim for damages for wrongful dismissal has a right to choose his tribunal; he can either prove in the liquidation, or he can bring a separate action, and the court ought not to interfere with the employee's decision in the exercise of his undoubted discretion unless it is satisfied that circumstances exist which justify such interference and the taking away from the employee of his choice of tribunal. The Master of the Rolls said[2]: "The court had no doubt stayed the "action in cases where the liquidator could show some sufficient "reason for its not being decided in the ordinary way"—that is, by an ordinary action. "Where, for instance, the existence "of a debt or liability was substantially admitted, though there "might be some question of the exact amount due, the ordinary "practice seems to have been that, liability not being really "contested, but only the exact amount due, the matter was "treated as one which might properly, and ought to, be deter-"mined in the liquidation." Romer L.J. in a concurring judgment said[3]: "On an application of this kind the court un-"doubtedly has a discretion, and I think that it ought to exercise "that discretion, even although the judge below did not exercise

* [1894] 2 Q.B. 380.
† [1936] 2 All E.R. 905.
[1] [1906] 1 K.B. 134.
[2] Ibid. 139.
[3] Ibid.

1959

COOK
v.
"X" CHAIR
PATENTS
CO. LTD.

Wynn-Parry J.

"any discretion. Now, what are the circumstances of this case? "Is it a case in which any good would be done, or expense "saved, by staying an action which has been properly brought, "and in effect sending the claim to be determined in the Chan-"cery Division?"; and he held that in the particular circumstances no advantage would be gained by so doing.

I take those observations as my guide in deciding what I ought to do in this case and, bearing them in mind, I refer to the correspondence. It is quite clear. Merely taking the correspondence by itself is that it is impossible to postulate in this case that there is only some question of the exact amount due. Although the existence of the debt or liability has been admitted, the parties on a reading of the correspondence will be found to be miles apart. It is true that certain deductions may well have to be made from the amount of £5,685 claimed by the plaintiff in his action; it may well be that some deduction may have to be made in respect of the likelihood of his getting further employment; but Mr. Parker, in a most ingenious argument went too far. His clients in the letter of December 18, 1958, said with regard to the plaintiff's application: "we think it "cannot seriously be contested but that he"—that is, the plaintiff—"will be able to obtain other suitable work. We appreciate "that it may not be at the same salary, but over the remaining "period of his contract it is felt that he should earn between "£800 and £1,000 per annum." Taking the middle figure of £900 per annum, Mr. Parker sought to satisfy me that I should proceed upon the basis that there should be a deduction at least of £5,400 from the amount claimed by the plaintiff. The plaintiff has made a deduction in respect of income tax. It is true that there may be a case for saying that there should be some further reduction because the payment will be a payment of a lump sum, and no doubt it is true, on the authority of In re R. S. Newman Ltd., Raphael's Claim[4] that nothing is payable in respect of future commission; but the figure of £900 when examined is an entirely arbitrary figure. The whole of Mr. Parker's argument really depends on introducing that figure of £900 multiplied by six years, the amount of the period to run, and thus asking me to deduct £5,400 from the claim which is put forward in the action. Indeed, he goes so far as to say that when the other matters to which I have referred which he introduced are taken into consideration, the plaintiff is in all probability likely to get less than the amount of £1,300 which the liquidator has offered him.

In those circumstances, I am not prepared to say that this case is within that exception to which I have referred in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in Currie v. Consolidated Kent Collieries Corporation Ltd.[5] But further than that, I think there is great force in what Mr. Thomas said, namely, that on such an issue as to where a man of sixty years of age is likely to get further employment he is entitled to give oral evidence. Mr. Parker said he could equally well do that by way of affidavit evidence. Whichever way it is done, it is more than likely that there will have to be cross-examination. Further, the plaintiff is entitled, if he so desires, to bring the evidence of other people skilled in the matter to say what chance he has in the particular trade, or, having regard to what his accomplishments are, is likely to get by way of further employment and at what rate. The correspondence shows perfectly clearly that there is a really substantial dispute between the parties. The matter having proceeded as far as it has by action, it seems to me that I should not properly be exercising my discretion in this case if I were to stop the action now and put the plaintiff to what will be new expense, namely, of putting in a proof which I am satisfied on the basis of the correspondence is in all likelihood (I put it no higher) to be rejected by the liquidator, in which case the matter will, in the first place, have to go before the registrar in the companies' winding up, and is quite likely from him to be brought to this court.

[4] [1916] 2 Ch. 309. [5] [1906] 1 K.B. 134, 139.

In those circumstances it appears to me that I must pose to myself the question which was asked by Romer L.J.[6]: "Is it "a case in which any good would be done, or expense saved, "by staying an action which has been properly brought, and in "effect sending the claim to be determined in the Chancery "Division?" Further, in my view, I must answer it in the words which Romer L.J. used in answering his own question[7]: "In my opinion, no advantage would be gained by so doing." For those reasons, this application must fail.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: George & George; Bond & Banbury.

[6] [1906] 1 K.B. 134, 139. [7] Ibid.

[RESTRICTIVE PRACTICES COURT.]

R. P. Ct.† (E. & W.)

1959 May 29

* In re NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF BRITISH AND IRISH MILLERS LTD.'S SCHEME.

[1957 No. 19 (E. & W.).]

Restrictive Practices — Practice — Parties — Non-appearance of parties to agreement—Refusal by six respondents to be represented by trade association—Submission by association to agreed order declaring † Upjohn J., Sir Stanford Cooper, Mr. W. L. Heywood, Mr. W. Wallace and Mr. W. G. Campbell.

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF BRITISH AND IRISH MILLERS LTD.'S SCHEME, In re.

restrictions contrary to public interest—Undertaking by association not to revive or reintroduce similar scheme without giving notice to registrar—Whether registrar entitled to injunction against non-appearing respondents—Form of order—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 68), s. 20 (3) (a) (b)—Restrictive Practices Court Rules, 1957 (S.I. 1957, No. 603), r. 11.

The majority of the parties to an agreement, the subject of a reference to the court, consented to be represented by their trade association, and the court so ordered. Six of the parties refused to be represented and neither delivered a statement of case nor entered an appearance. The registrar did not apply for an order under rule 23 of the Restrictive Practices Court Rules, 1957, against the six parties debarring them from taking any further part in the proceedings, and they were properly served with notice of the proceedings and with notice of the hearing of the reference, but they did not appear. At the hearing the trade association offered no evidence but submitted to an order declaring that the restrictions in the agreement were contrary to the public interest, and the registrar, on the association giving an undertaking not to enforce the agreement or to introduce a similar one without giving 28 days' notice to the registrar, did not pursue, as against the association, a formal application for an order in the terms of section 20 (3) (a) and (b) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956. As against the six parties to the agreement who were not represented by the association:—

Held, that the registrar was entitled to a declaration in a form binding on the six parties that the restrictions were contrary to the public interest.

Semble. The registrar was also entitled to an order against the six parties restraining them from giving effect to or enforcing the agreement in respect of the restrictions or making any other agreement to the like effect in the terms of section 20 (3) (a) and (b).

REFERENCE.

By notice of reference, dated July 22, 1957, the registrar referred to the court an agreement between all the participants in the Scheme of Deferred Rebates for Big Buyers of Home Milled Flour sponsored by the Incorporated National Association of British and Irish Flour Millers Ltd. (hereinafter called the "association"), an agreement whereby aggregated deferred rebates were paid to buyers in respect of all their purchases from participants in accordance with a scale, claims being submitted for verification by buyers to a firm of chartered accountants to whom participants paid the total amount of rebate due from them to all their customers for division and transmission to the buyers. The participants were either millers who were members of the association or factors approved by the association who had joined the scheme by completing an application form.

On October 17, 1957, the registrar applied to the court for a representation order under rule 11 of the Restrictive Practices Court Rules, 1957.[1] Notice of the proposal to apply for a representation order was given to all the participants and the majority gave actual consent to be represented by the association for the purposes of all proceedings under the Act in respect of the agreement. Four participating companies did not give actual consent, but did not dissent; six companies dissented, and at the hearing of the application the court ordered that all parties to the agreement other than the six dissenting companies be represented by the association. The association duly delivered a statement of case but no statement of case was filed on behalf of the six dissenting companies and no appearance was entered by them.

[1] Restrictive Practices Court Rules, 1957 (S.I. 1957, No. 603), r. 11: "Where a numerous class of persons "have a common interest in the proceedings by reason they are all "parties to the same agreement . . .

Before the hearing the association intimated that it was prepared to submit to an order and to give certain undertakings not to enforce the scheme or to introduce a similar scheme without giving 28 days' notice to the registrar. When the reference came on for hearing the registrar asked the court to make an agreed order in similar form to that made in In re British Constructional Steelwork Association's Agreement,[2] reciting, inter alia, that the association admitted that the agreement contained restrictions set out in the schedule to the order within the meaning of section 6 (1) of the Act and had not offered any evidence in justification of them, and declaring the restrictions to be contrary to the public interest: the restriction as set out in the schedule was not to sell qualifying flour except on terms that the rebate scheme would operate. In view of the undertaking given by the association the registrar did not pursue his application for an order pursuant to and in the terms of section 20 (3) (a) and (b).

The report is solely concerned with the position of the six companies who refused to be represented by the association.

W. A. Bagnall for the registrar. The six dissenting companies were properly joined as parties; the proceedings and notice of today's hearing have been served upon them, but they are not before the court. They have not delivered a statement of case and, therefore, it would have been open to the registrar at any time after the expiry of the time for delivery of a statement of "the court may, on an application "made by the registrar after the issue "of the notice of reference but before "the service thereof, make an order "(hereinafter referred to as 'a repre-"'sentation order') that the class, "or any members thereof, shall be "represented by such representative "respondents as the court may direct, "who may be individual members of "the class or a trade association or "associations to which all or some of "the members belong . . ."

R. 12: "Before making a representation order, the court may direct "that notice of the application for "the order shall be served on such "persons . . . as the court may think "fit, and may give such persons as "aforesaid an opportunity of objecting "to the making of the order . . ."

R. 13: "Where the court makes a "representation order, then, unless "the court otherwise directs . . . (ii) a "copy of the notice of reference shall "be served on any member of the "class to whom the representation "order does not extend;"

R. 23: "If a respondent fails to "deliver a statement of his case . . . "within the time limited for doing so, "the court may, on the application of "the registrar, direct that the respondent be debarred from taking any "further part in the proceedings . . ."

[2] (1959) L.R. 1 R.P. 199; [1959] 1 W.L.R. 306; [1959] 1 All E.R. 428.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF BRITISH AND IRISH MILLERS LTD.'S SCHEME, In re.

case to apply for an order under rule 23 of the Restrictive Practices Court Rules, 1957, debarring them from taking any further part in the proceedings: such an application would have prevented them from making any last minute application, which might even have been made today. Proceedings under the Act of 1956 are instituted by the registrar but the Act puts the onus of justification upon the respondents, and it is not easy to find a parallel for the present position, but perhaps the closest analogy is with that when a plaintiff institutes proceedings and does not appear at the trial. The effect of the court's judgment by this agreed order is like that of a judgment in rem, for, no matter how many of the parties to the agreement are before the court, it is a declaration that its operation is contrary to the public interest.

There is a formal application before the court for an order in the terms of section 20 (3) (a) and (b), which is only not proceeded with against the association because of the undertaking. The six dissenting companies who are not before the court cannot give an undertaking and it seems that it would be open to the registrar to press the court to make an order against them. In this case the matter is of little practical importance, since this particular scheme cannot be effective unless it is operated by the association, but the registrar is anxious that it should not be thought that a respondent in this type of case who flatly refuses to be represented by his association should find himself in a better position when the matter comes for trial than those respondents who have acted reasonably and have agreed to be represented. The registrar has been advised that in the majority of such cases it would be proper to ask the court to grant an immediate injunction against non-appearing respondents on the footing that they have shown a disposition to "go it "alone" and would be likely to continue to operate restrictions in an agreement.

UPJOHN J. I think that the registrar is entitled to a general order against the six dissentients. The question is whether, having regard to the practical aspect of this case, he is entitled to an immediate injunction against them or merely liberty to apply for an injunction.

Bagnall. That part of the order declaring that the restriction is contrary to the public interest presents no difficulty, since it is not made by consent and the dissentients have been properly served, and general liberty to apply would include liberty to apply for an injunction against all the parties to the agreement. There might be difficulty in including in the order an injunction against the dissenting companies in the terms of the proposed undertaking because the undertaking has been worked out as a matter of convenience and practice between the parties, and an injunction in its precise terms might not be authorised by section 20 (3).

UPJOHN J. I share your doubts.

H. A. P. Fisher for the association. The other participants are in contractual relationship with the six dissentients, but such an order would safeguard their position. The declaration that the restriction is contrary to the public interest has the effect of making the agreement void in respect of the restriction, so that the dissentients could not sue them for breach of contract. There is, therefore, no need for the other participants to be protected by an injunction in the terms of the undertaking, although it would seem right that by order of the court they should be made subject to the same obligations as the respondents represented by the association. Since in practice it makes no difference, the association does not press for an injunction against them; it assents to the proposed order.

UPJOHN J. The registrar is plainly entitled to a declaration that the restriction is contrary to the public interest in a form which binds the dissenting companies. But the order needs to distinguish them from the other participants and it might do so by defining the represented respondents and reciting their admission and continuing as against the other six respondents, "and it "appearing that the agreement contains restrictions"—not using the word "admitting"—"and upon those respondents not having "entered appearance" declare that the restriction is contrary to the public interest. There will be general liberty to apply.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Treasury Solicitor; Coward, Chance & Co.

J. F. L.

[NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE ASSIZES.]

* BROWN v. NATIONAL COAL BOARD.

1959
Oct. 15, 16, 30.

Thesiger J.

Mines and Minerals — Coal — Breach of statutory duty — Roof and sides—Fall of stone from roof following fall of girder—Injury to electrician working on fitting on fallen girder—Duty to keep road or working place secure—Whether impracticable to avoid or prevent contravention—Whether electrician "workman employed in that "part of the mine"—Whether fitting was "debris"—Work "necessary for the setting of the supports"—Mines and Quarries Act, 1954 (2 & 3 Eliz. 2, c. 70), ss. 48 (1), 51 (3) (b), 157—Coal and Other Mines (Support) Order, 1956 (S.I. 1956, No. 1763), Sch. I, reg. 12.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants as an electrician in one of their coal mines. A tub knocked away a prop holding up a girder which fell down at one end and at once a stone fell from the roof. An electric light fitting was attached to the girder and it would have been difficult to insert a prop to support the girder

---

[Reported by G. M. SMAILES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

1959

BROWN
v.
NATIONAL COAL BOARD.

unless the fitting was removed. The overman sent a message to recall the plaintiff, who had finished what he had to do on that shift and was making his way towards the shaft bottom. The plaintiff returned unknown to the overman, saw the girder down and, knowing why he was wanted, started work on the light fitting, when another stone fell from about the same part of the roof and injured him.

The plaintiff claimed damages for breach of statutory duty relying, inter alia, on the Mines and Quarries Act, 1954,[1] alleging that the defendants, in breach of section 48 (1) of the Act, had failed to take such steps by way of supporting the roof of his working place as were necessary for keeping the working place secure, and that in breach of section 51 (3) (b) of the Act the overman had failed to withdraw the plaintiff from the working place. The plaintiff also alleged a breach of regulation 12 in Schedule I of the Coal and Other Mines (Support) Order, 1956,[2]

[1] Mines and Quarries Act, 1954, s. 48 (1): "It shall be the duty of "the manager of every mine to take, "with respect to every road and "working place in the mine, such "steps by way of controlling move- "ment of the strata in the mine and "supporting the roof and sides of the "road or working place as may be "necessary for keeping the road or "working place secure."

S. 51 (3): "It shall be the duty "of the manager of every mine to "secure that a sufficient supply of "suitable materials for support is at "all times readily available, for use "at the place where he is actually "working, to each workman who "needs them, and—(a) where a suffi- "cient supply of such materials is not "readily available, for use at the "place where he is actually working, "to a workman who needs them, he "shall withdraw to a place of safety "and forthwith report to an official "of the mine that, by reason of the "premises, he has done so; and— "(b) where it appears to the person "for the time being in charge of a "part of a mine that such a supply is "not available as aforesaid to a "workman employed in that part of "the mine, the said person shall "cause the workman to withdraw as "aforesaid; and where, on any "occasion, a workman has, in pursu- "ance of either of the foregoing "paragraphs, withdrawn from the "place where he was actually work- "ing, the person for the time being "in charge of the part of the mine in "which that place is situate shall not "permit the workman to return to it "thereafter until that person is satis- "fied that such a supply of materials "as aforesaid will be readily avail- "able, for use at that place, to that "workman when he needs them."

S. 53: "It shall be the duty of "every person employed at a mine "who is appointed for the purpose of "fulfilling any requirements imposed "with respect to the mine by virtue "of paragraph (a) of subsection (1) "of section twelve of this Act to "ensure to the best of his ability that "all such rules made under or by "virtue of any of the foregoing pro- "visions of this Act relating to sup- "port as have effect with respect to "the mine are executed and enforced "and that there are duly set any "supports which appear to him to be "necessary in addition to those set "in pursuance of the requirements "imposed by or by virtue of the said "provisions."

S. 157: "It shall be a defence in "any legal proceedings to recover "damages and in any prosecution, in "so far as the proceedings or prosecu- "tion are or is based on an allegation "of a contravention, in relation to a "mine . . . to prove that it was "impracticable to avoid or prevent "the contravention."

[2] Coal and Other Mines (Support) Regulations, 1956, reg. 12: "If any "fall of roof or side involving the "displacement or breakage of any sup- "port has occurred at a place where "any person has to work or pass, it "shall be the duty of the person for "the time being in charge of that "part of the mine forthwith to ensure "that any roof or side exposed there- "by is, if necessary, dressed and is "secured by supports, and that any "such dressing and securing is done "before any work of clearing debris "is begun, other than such work of "clearing debris as is necessary for "the setting of the supports."

in that the overman failed forthwith to ensure that the roof was secured by supports before any work of clearing debris was begun. The defendants, in addition to denying the alleged breaches, relied on the provisions of section 157 of the Act, saying that it was impracticable to avoid or prevent any contravention:—

Held, (1) that sections 48 and 157 of the Act must be construed together and, on the facts, the defendants at the time of the plaintiff's injury were taking such steps as were necessary for keeping the roof secure and the plaintiff, unknown to them, tried to assist in the work; therefore, there was no evidence of a contravention by the manager of section 48 (1), or it was impracticable to avoid or prevent the contravention (post, p. 77).

(2) That the words of section 51 (3) (b) of the Act were not apt to cover the case of the plaintiff who was not, until he went into the danger zone, "employed in that part of the mine," and therefore there was no question of withdrawing him until materials arrived for his use (post, p. 71).

(3) That the light fitting did not constitute "debris" within the meaning of regulation 12 and, even if it did, its removal was "work necessary for the setting of the supports" within the regulation (post, p. 72).

ACTION.

The plaintiff was employed by the defendants as an electrician at their Crofton Mill Colliery at Blyth in Northumberland. On April 8, 1958, he was injured by a stone falling from the roof. He sustained a mild compression fracture of one of his upper lumbar vertebral bodies and after examination at hospital he went home. He was in a plaster cast for six weeks after being in bed for a week, and started light work on September 8, 1958, but remained slightly partially incapacitated in September, 1959, and made an excellent recovery.

On April 8, 1958, a tub came up a drift at the mine and knocked away a concrete prop, whereupon a girder which had been held up by the prop fell down at that end and a piece of stone at once fell from the roof. In the centre of the partly fallen girder was a light fitting. The overman in charge of that part of the mine, James Simpson, wished to insert a prop to support the leaning girder. Just before the fall the plaintiff had finished what he had to do on that shift and was making his way towards the shaft bottom. The overman sent a boy to tell the plaintiff that he wanted the fitting removed. If it had remained in position it would have been difficult to put in the prop as proposed and then force it upright. The plaintiff received the message and returned and saw the girder down and some stone on the floor. He was looking for a spanner to start undoing the bracket of the light fitting in order to detach it from the fallen girder when another stone fell from about the same part of the roof and inflicted the injury described. It was held on the evidence that the overman was not aware that the plaintiff had turned up, but that the plaintiff knew from the message why he was wanted and went forward to the girder and the fitting because, like everyone else, he was anxious to get the coal moving and the clearance job done. It was also held that the overman told the men present

1959

BROWN
v.
NATIONAL
COAL BOARD.

to stand back but the plaintiff was not present when this order was given.

By paragraph 3 of the statement of claim the plaintiff alleged negligence and/or breach of statutory duty by the defendants and their servants. The allegations of breach of statutory duty were: (a) In breach of section 48 (1) of the Mines and Quarries Act, 1954, the defendants failed to take such steps by way of controlling movement of the strata in the mine and supporting the roof and sides of the plaintiff's working place as were necessary for keeping the said working place secure. (b) In breach of section 51 (3) of the said Act they failed to ensure that a sufficient supply of suitable material for support was readily available for use at the place where the plaintiff was working, in that the only props at the working place were too long. In breach of section 51 (3) (b), the defendants' servant Simpson, the overman, failed to withdraw the plaintiff from the working place when no suitable supports as aforesaid were available. (c) In breach of section 53 of the said Act the said overman failed to set necessary supports in addition to those set in pursuance of the support requirements and the provisions of the Act. (d) In breach of paragraph 12 of the Coal and Other Mines (Support) Regulations, 1956, after a fall of roof and/or side involving the displacement and/or breakage of supports the overman failed forthwith to ensure that all roof and side exposed thereby was dressed and secured by supports before any work of clearing debris was begun.

An allegation by the defendants of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff was held not to be established.

G. S. Waller Q.C. and J. A. Baldwin for the plaintiff.
Geoffrey Veale Q.C. and D. B. B. Fenwick for the defendants.

The cases cited in argument are all referred to in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Oct. 30. At Durham Assizes THESIGER J. read the following judgment, in which he considered the evidence, stated his findings of fact summarised above and continued: On my findings of fact, the plaintiff could not succeed at common law. The question is whether his injuries were caused by breach of some statutory duty owed to him. The plaintiff relies on various provisions of the Mines and Quarries Act, 1954, which I shall call "the Act of 1954." I start with paragraph 3 (b) of the statement of claim. Though the plaintiff does not now rely on a breach of section 51 (3) (a), he does rely on an alleged breach of section 51 (3) (b) of the Act of 1954. [His Lordship read subsection (3) and continued:]

Mr. Veale, for the defendants, argued: (i) that if paragraph (a) of the subsection does not apply, then paragraph (b) could not apply, for paragraph (b) assumed that it appeared to the person in charge that a sufficient supply of suitable materials was not available; (ii) that, if a person did not know that the workman was there, he could not cause him to withdraw to a place of safety. Mr. Veale also relied, in answer to this part of the claim, on the provisions of section 157 of the Act of 1954.

Mr. Waller, for the plaintiff, contended that there were no such materials, to wit, props of the right length, readily available; therefore, it was the duty of the overman, Mr. Simpson, as "the "person for the time being in charge of a part of the mine" (which Mr. Simpson was in fact) "to cause the workman to "withdraw," and, says Mr. Waller, he did not do so, and, as he did not give the order "Stand back" at that time, the defendants have not proved that it was impracticable to comply with section 51 (3) (b). In my judgment, the words of section 51 (3) are not apt to cover the case of the plaintiff, who was summoned to come and who was not, until he came and then went into the danger zone, "employed in that part of the mine"; therefore, there was no question of withdrawing him until materials arrived for his use.

The plaintiff next, by paragraph 3 (c) of the statement of claim, relies on section 53 of the Act of 1954. [His Lordship read it.] Mr. Veale, for the defendants, submitted that this provision is the normal support provision with which deputies and overseers must comply, and that Mr. Simpson was in the course of complying with this provision (if, indeed, the substitution of the broken support by a new one could properly be described as "addition"). Mr. Waller argued that if (but I think only if) Mr. Simpson was not doing his best to get supports but was trying to shift the girder first to expedite the flow of coal, the plaintiff could say that there was a breach of section 53. I hold that Mr. Simpson had sent for supports and was not moving or intending to move the girder until supports arrived and were put under it. I hold that Mr. Simpson was not in breach of his duty under section 53.

The plaintiff next, by paragraph 3 (d) of the statement of claim, relies upon regulation 12 of the Coal and Other Mines (Support) Regulations, 1956, [which his Lordship read].

Mr. Waller submitted: (i) that a fall of roof or side involving displacement or breakage of support had occurred at a place where a workman had to "work or pass," and (ii) that Mr. Simpson was a "person for the time being in charge of that part of "the mine." So far, I agree. Then, says Mr. Waller, Mr. Simpson had a duty forthwith to ensure that any roof exposed by the breakage of support was, if necessary, secured by supports, and that any such securing was done before any work of clearing debris was begun, other than such work of clearing debris as was necessary for the setting of the supports. Mr. Waller says that one should do the necessary clearing of the ground only and then should wait for supports. The light fitting was, says Mr. Waller, "debris" because it was something that had fallen. Mr. Waller then relied on the testimony of Mr. Hindson (an expert

1959

BROWN
v.
NATIONAL COAL BOARD.

Thesiger J.

called for the plaintiff) who said that it was not necessary to remove the light fitting. Mr. Veale submitted that, if one looked at the regulations as a whole, they were dealing with support; that "debris" really meant stone from the roof; that Mr. Simpson was complying with the first part of the duty imposed by regulation 12, and that, if someone were moving or breaking up a stone which was part of the "debris" properly so called, that someone was not the plaintiff, and any breach of the regulation in connection with that person did not contribute to the plaintiff's injury. I was not at all convinced by Mr. Hindson's evidence. In my opinion, the light fitting did not, on the facts of this case, constitute "debris" within the meaning of regulation 12. More important is the fact that I hold that if it did, it was necessary to move it to set the supports. In this regulation, at least, the word "necessary" must be construed so as to allow some latitude to the man directing the work.

I now come to the main problem in this case. Mr. Waller relied chiefly on the provisions of section 48 of the Act of 1954, which Mr. Veale contended did not impose an absolute liability, and, if they did impose such liability, Mr. Veale relied on the provisions of section 157 of the same Act. Those provisions replace the provisions of sections 49 and 102 (8) of the Coal Mines Act, 1911. [His Lordship read sections 48 (1) and 157 of the Act of 1954.]

The case for the plaintiff is set out in paragraph 3 (a) of the statement of claim and is, that in breach of section 48 (1) of the Act of 1954 the defendants failed to take such steps by way of controlling movement of the strata in the mine and supporting the roof and sides of the plaintiff's working place as were necessary for keeping the working place secure. The plaintiff's argument is that: (i) the two falls, or at least the second fall, established the failure to take such steps as were necessary for keeping secure the place to which the plaintiff went in order to work, and at which he was working; (ii) that place was, therefore, not secure; and (iii) it was a working place and a road. The plaintiff then says that the defendants have not proved that it was impracticable to avoid or prevent the contravention, therefore, the plaintiff must succeed. Such was the way in which the case for the plaintiff was put on this part of his claim in opening. I will now set out the argument for the defendants and then the reply on behalf of the plaintiff.

For the defendants Mr. Veale admitted that the former section 49 of the Act of 1911 had been held to impose an absolute duty and that defendants bound by it could only escape liability if section 102 (8) of the Act of 1911 applied. He submitted that "not reasonably practicable" in subsection (8) of section 102 of the Act of 1911 meant the same thing as "impracticable" in subsection (3) thereof, for otherwise it would be easier to defend a civil claim than a criminal prosecution. I am not much impressed by this argument because, if Parliament wants to induce caution, it is apt to impose absolute liability when constituting these summary offences in which small maximum penalties only are involved, and for which magistrates may impose only a small part of that maximum penalty. Mr. Veale went on to argue that section 48 of the Act of 1954 makes a clear change in form in that subsection (1) thereof merely says: "It shall be the duty of the manager . . . to take such steps . . . as "may be necessary." The former section, section 49 of the Act of 1911, used the phrase: "The . . . sides . . . shall be made "secure." Moreover, in the Act of 1954, the legislature, when it wishes to impose absolute liability, says "he shall" in sections 79 and 80, and "shall be" in section 81 (which corresponds to a section in the Factories Act, 1937). Section 82 (1) of the Act of 1954 also uses the phrase "shall be," and in section 82 (2) where it refers to the manager (as does section 48, which is under discussion) the wording is different from that of section 48. Section 55 also deals with the manager and subsection (1) thereof says "such steps as are necessary," not "such "steps as may be necessary." The former section 49 of the Act of 1911 (so runs the argument) used words which were held to impose an absolute duty. The new section 48 in the Act of 1954 uses different phrases from those which had been held to impose absolute duty, and it now imposed some duty on the manager personally, using different phrases from those used in other sections of the Act of 1954, when it desired to impose absolute duty. Mr. Veale further argued that section 48 of the Act of 1954 introduced for the first time reference to controlling movement of the strata, and, since strata must move, one would expect Parliament to be requiring the greatest efficiency rather than absolute success in controlling such movement; therefore one would expect the requirement to be to take the best steps taken by the most competent managers in practice in the coal fields. Indeed, as Mr. Veale pointed out, subsection (2) of section 48 uses the phrase "discharge efficiently the duty imposed . . . by "the foregoing subsection." I am a little impressed by this part of the argument. If a member of Parliament says that it is the duty of a motorist to take such steps for controlling the movement of his motor-car on the roads and applying his brakes as may be necessary for avoiding accidents, one would, I believe, think he was uttering a platitude rather than suggesting imposing liability for every accident.

Mr. Veale next argued that certain decisions under the Act of 1911, which was held to impose an absolute duty, nevertheless held the defendants to be not liable. These decisions, he said, must apply, a fortiori, to the new phrases in section 48 of the Act of 1954. He referred to two decisions of Hallett J. on this circuit. The first, on April 29, 1952, in Hayes v. National Coal Board,[1] is unreported, and the second is Jackson v. National Coal Board,[2]

[1] Unreported, Leeds Assizes, April 29, 1952.

[2] [1955] 1 W.L.R. 132; [1955] 1 All E.R. 145.

1959

BROWN v. NATIONAL COAL BOARD.

Thesiger J.

which refers to the earlier decision. The legislature, urged Mr. Veale, would not put an absolute duty on a manager to control strata—unless, perhaps, the legislature thought that the words "keep secure" merely meant "keep reasonably safe"—and the words "as may be necessary" must import judgment and foreseeability. Mr. Veale adopted as part of his argument the only reported decision on this new section 48 in the Act of 1954; that is the decision of a quarter sessions court in Wright v. Jenkins.[3] He urged that some guilty mind is assumed to be required when a breach of duty is, as this one is, subject to enforcement by criminal prosecution.

In considering the construction of section 48 of the Act of 1954, Mr. Veale mentioned two technical points. Section 48 puts a personal duty on the manager (who also has a duty of seeing that others discharge their duty: see section 2 (2) of the Act of 1954). The statement of claim, so he pointed out, puts the duty on the defendants, and the whole of the evidence was directed to the activities of an overman in an emergency. Then, again, the point at which the accident took place was really a road, and not a working place. Passing to the facts of the case in relation to section 48, Mr. Veale argued that the work which was being done was the operation of complying with the provisions of section 48, and, on reasoning parallel to that which appealed to Romer L.J. and other members of the Court of Appeal in Walsh v. National Coal Board,[4] the defendants could not be under an absolute duty to do something, and an absolute liability for doing it. So far as those two technical points are concerned, Mr. Veale was, I think, really emphasising that this new section, in contrast to the old section, imposed a duty on the manager; that any alleged contravention was that of the manager; and that the operation of section 157 with its test of "impracticability" must be considered in relation to the position of the manager. The statement of claim, in using the phrase "the defendants," is presumably assuming that there is vicarious responsibility, and I hold that the omission to add the words "by their servant and "agent the manager" cannot in itself be fatal. As Mr. Veale did not expressly argue the point (which, indeed, is masked by the omission of those words) I will assume that, having regard to section 159 of the Act of 1954, an employer is vicariously liable for a breach of statutory duty imposed, not on him, but expressly on someone else who merely happens to be acting as his servant or agent. On the other technical point, Mr. Veale was willing that paragraph 3 (a) of the statement of claim should be amended by adding or substituting an allegation that the defendants failed to take such steps as were necessary, by way of controlling the movement of the strata in the mine and supporting the roof of the road, for making the road (as opposed to a working place) secure.

[3] (1958) 43 Cr.App.R. 17.

[4] [1956] 1 Q.B. 511; [1955] 3 W.L.R. 829; [1955] 3 All E.R. 632.

Finally, Mr. Veale argued for the defendants that it was impracticable to avoid or to prevent the alleged contravention, and he emphasised that section 157 of the Act of 1954, which provided a defence in those circumstances, referred to "contravention" and not to the fall of stone or the injury. He urged that, while it was the manager who had the duty, the overman was doing all that was necessary for keeping the roof secure by getting a temporary prop. There were, said Mr. Veale, possibly three concepts: (i) physically possible; (ii) practicable; (iii) reasonably practicable. He referred me to two cases. In the first, Marshall v. Gotham Co. Ltd.[5] he drew attention to passages in Lord Oaksey's speech[6] and in Lord Reid's speech.[7] He also referred to Atkinson v. Shaw.[8] Mr. Veale submitted that "practicable" implies some element of reasonableness, and the word "reasonably" inserted before "practicable" might be regarded as redundant, like the first word in the common phrase "surrounding circumstances." I am interested by the recognition that even in an Act of Parliament one may sometimes attempt to express an idea more shortly than was done in older Acts without intending to alter the meaning. I notice also that Mr. Veale's argument, which attaches importance to the qualifying word "efficiently" in one place (section 48 (2) of the Act of 1954), attaches little to the omission of a qualifying word in another.

I will now summarise the reply for the plaintiff. Mr. Waller, for the plaintiff, submitted that so far as sections 48 and 157 of the Act of 1954 were concerned, it was useful to trace the history of the liability through the successive Acts of 1872, 1887 and 1911. The duty seems to have been imposed in similar words each time. It was unthinkable, he argued, that Parliament would lighten the burden that had been imposed on employers for so long. The Act of 1954 only used altered phraseology in order to set out the same duties in greater detail and to impose them on particular people. I am not sure that, with the changes in arrangements for compensation for industrial injuries and in the ownership of the mines, it is safe to assert that Parliament cannot be supposed to intend to alter burdens if the language used is different and tends to show such intention. Mr. Waller emphasised that section 48 did not mention "making," but only "keeping," the road or working place secure; thus it was assumed that to start with they would be secure. The phrase "as may be" was, so he argued, used to deal with situations which changed physically from time to time, but the obligation was still absolute. The different phraseology in section 55 (1), to wit, "such steps as are necessary," was used to deal with a changing physical situation. Mr. Waller submitted that the test cannot be subjective to the manager because the words are not "such

[5] [1954] A.C. 360; [1954] 2 W.L.R. 812; [1954] 1 All E.R. 937.
[6] [1954] A.C. 360, 370.
[7] Ibid. 372.
[8] [1915] 2 K.B. 768; 31 T.L.R. 421.

1959

BROWN v. NATIONAL COAL BOARD.

Thesiger J.

"steps as appear to the manager to be necessary." "May be "necessary," he argued, is equivalent to "may prove to be neces- "sary." The necessary steps have not been taken, says Mr. Waller, if the roof and sides are not secure. The qualification, if any, would be in the meaning of the word "secure." A fall, however, from natural causes means, so he argued, that the steps necessary for keeping secure have not been taken. I interpolate at this point my feeling that any fallacy lurking in Mr. Waller's argument is probably to be found here. Mr. Waller went on to submit that the omission by a deputy to insert a support required to implement the manager's duty would not absolve the defendants. I again interpolate that I agree; but that may be because the defendants are vicariously liable for the deputy's negligence. Mr. Waller went on to contend that the only reasonable approach was to take Parliament as rephrasing the duty which had always been absolute, and not as removing the duty from everyone except the manager and then relieving him of an absolute obligation. After dealing with the three reasons relied on in Wright v. Jenkins,[9] Mr. Waller said that Walsh v. National Coal Board[10] was wrongly decided in the Court of Appeal, the fallacy being that a man can, and does in practice, make the place secure ahead of him before he actually goes under the roof and between the sides. That case, said Mr. Waller, though binding on me as regards the exact point, was decided on a different section, and the fallacious argument, even if it were sound, depended on the obligation to "make secure." Here the obligation is to take steps to "keep secure." Moreover, argued Mr. Waller, Walsh was a road-head man and the decision should not be extended to any person who for one minute was helping indirectly to make a roof secure by the work of removing a light fitting.

Finally, on section 157 of the Act of 1954, Mr. Waller submitted that the elimination of the qualification "reasonably" made it more difficult for the defendants to bring themselves within the section. He relied on the judgment of Asquith L.J. in Edwards v. National Coal Board,[11] and on the speech of Lord Reid in Marshall v. Gotham Co. Ltd.[12] "Practicable," so he argues, means "capable of being carried out," and the defendants had called no evidence on the point. So much for the reply for the plaintiff.

I will now state my own view of sections 48 and 157 of the Act of 1954 in the light of those arguments, and in so far as those sections have to be applied to the facts of this case in which the fall and injury followed on the knocking away of a support.

First, it is important to remember that a short phrase like "absolute liability" is apt to mislead, because one is tempted to add to it some words to describe the direct physical cause of the injury such as "for the fall of the stone," and to say the

[9] (1958) 43 Cr.App.R. 17.
[10] [1956] 1 Q.B. 511.
[11] [1949] 1 K.B. 704; 65 T.L.R. 430; [1949] 1 All E.R. 743.
[12] [1954] A.C. 360, 372.

section imposes "absolute liability for damage done by the fall "of a stone." Strictly, however, the imposition of a specific statutory duty merely relieves a jury of the burden of considering whether a reasonably careful man would have done that which the statute directs. It is in that respect that a statutory duty differs from common law duty to exercise reasonable care. Next, it is important to remember that Parliament when debating the form of the clause imposing the duty, and any proposed amendments to the original form of the clause, would undoubtedly be invited to consider the effect of clause 157 of the same Bill. Therefore, I must construe the two sections together because Parliament intended them to have effect in combination.

Now section 48 places a duty on the manager of the mine. That duty is to deal with controlling the movement of the strata in the mine. That duty is imposed in relation to roadways and working places. All this points to somewhat long-term strategic planning as opposed to short-term tactical measures of repair. The latter measures might have to be taken by the men on the spot immediately upon the occurrence of an emergency; the emergency might be due to the knocking away of an effective support by a third party. It is a defence to prove that it was impracticable for the manager to avoid or prevent a contravention of that long-term though continuing duty. I do not believe Parliament intended that the fall of a stone in the circumstances of this case should be held to prove a contravention of the duty imposed by section 48, and that section 157 should then be practically useless by way of defence in such circumstances. In other words, I do not believe Parliament intended to impose liability on a manager to pay damages for injury caused almost immediately after the knocking away of a support, by the fall of a stone from the roof of a temporarily blocked roadway, on someone who (without the knowledge of anyone on the spot who mattered) went under the roof while such steps as were necessary were being taken to keep the roof secure. One may hold either, in those circumstances, that the fall of the stone was not sufficient evidence of a contravention of his duty by the absent manager, or that it was impracticable for him to avoid or prevent any contravention of the statutory duty that could fairly be inferred from that fall. When the roadway that had been effectively supported was deprived of its support, I think that one must ask oneself what step the manager then failed to take that was practicable for him to take, and that was necessary to make the roof secure in the sense of preventing the fall of the stone that hit the plaintiff. I cannot see on the evidence that the manager omitted any step that was practicable. It was, indeed, impracticable for him to act to avoid the fall. The plaintiff went into a a place where the roadway was blocked, and I reject the evidence that he was specifically set to work at that place. At the time he was injured, the defendants, by their servants or agents, were taking such steps as were necessary for keeping the roof secure.

1959

Brown v. National Coal Board.

Thesiger J.

The plaintiff was injured because he, unknown to the defendants, tried to assist in that work.

I hold that the defendants have not been proved to be negligent, and I hold that the plaintiff's action must fail also on the allegations of breach of statutory duty.

[His Lordship assessed the total damages, if liability had been established, at £1,137 11s. 7d., which included the agreed sum of £537 11s. 7d. as special damages.]

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors: Watson, Burton, Booth & Robinson, Newcastle-upon-Tyne; W. M. Burnside, Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1959 Dec. 14.

Roxburgh J.

* In re GREAT UNIVERSAL STORES LTD. AND OTHERS.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Company—Capital—Reduction—Practice—Scheme of arrangement and reduction of capital—Petition for sanction of court—Whether necessary to aver that company carrying on business—Companies Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 38), s. 206.

Dicta of Kekewich J. in In re Wallasey Brick and Land Co. [1894] W.N. 20 explained.

PETITIONS to sanction schemes of arrangement and confirm reductions of capital.

A company, Great Universal Stores Ltd., and subsidiary companies, applied to the court to obtain its sanction under section 206 of the Companies Act, 1948, to schemes of arrangement and the subsidiaries also applied for orders confirming reductions of capital.

T. D. D. Divine and R. B. S. Instone for the petitioners.

ROXBURGH J. This is a complicated scheme involving a large number of subsidiary companies as well as the parent company, and there is one small matter which I think might now be settled. There is not, in fact, in any of the petitions the allegation that the relevant company is carrying on business. It might appear from a report of a decision of Kekewich J. in In re Wallasey Brick and Land Co.,[1] that such an averment was necessary in order to obtain the sanction of the court to a reduction of capital. On looking at the report I am not at all sure that Kekewich J. intended to say anything of that sort. The court, of course, always has a discretion as regards reductions of capital, and it may be that all that he was saying was that, in the exercise of his discretion, he refused to sanction a reduction in that particular case. If so, that has no relevance to any other case. But if he intended to go further than that, it seems to me that any such view is now completed out-dated and has so been since the decision of the House of Lords in British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation Ltd. v. Couper,[2] which was given on April 16, 1894, within a few months of the decision of Kekewich J. There is no ground for suggesting that such an averment is a sine qua non of the success of a petition. The facts in this case are entirely different, and the only reason why I have dealt with the point is because of the possibility that a different view might still be lingering in the textbooks or elsewhere.

[1] [1894] W.N. 20.

I sanction the scheme with regard to the companies and confirm the reductions as regards all the subsidiaries.

Solicitors: Linklaters & Paines.

M. G. T.

[2] [1894] A.C. 399; 10 T.L.R. 415.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.]

* REGINA v. STALLY.

C. C. A.

1959 Oct. 2.

Barry, Diplock and Salmon JJ.

Road Traffic—Taking and driving away motor-vehicle—Accessory—Appellant not present at taking—Whether entry into vehicle subsequently knowing it to have been taken and driven away without owner's consent sufficient to constitute offence—Road Traffic Act, 1930 (20 & 21 Geo. 5, c. 43), s. 28 (1).

Criminal Law—Aiding and abetting—Continuing offence—Taking and driving away motor-vehicle—Accessory to driving away only.

During the night of February 14, 1959, a motor-van was taken from outside a house without the owner's permission. In the early hours of the following morning the van was found; it had been used by the appellant and another man to make several journeys within the London district. Both men were charged on indictment with taking and driving away a motor-vehicle without lawful authority, contrary to section 28 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. The other man pleaded guilty; the appellant pleaded not guilty, his defence being that he was not present when the other man had taken the motor-van. In the summing-up the jury were directed that they were entitled to find the appellant guilty of taking and driving away the vehicle without the owner's consent if they found that he had entered the vehicle some time after it had been taken, knowing that the driver had in fact taken it and driven it away without the owner's consent. The appellant was convicted. On appeal:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that the summing-up amounted to a misdirection; the jury should have been told that on the evidence

---

[Reported by Miss EIRA CARYL-THOMAS, Barrister-at-Law.]

C. C. A.

1959

REGINA
v.
STALLY.

they must be satisfied that the appellant was in fact a party to the taking in the sense that the taking had been a joint enterprise even though he was not present when the vehicle was actually removed.

APPEAL against conviction.

The following facts are taken from the judgment: During the night of February 14, 1959, a Bedford motor-van was taken from outside a house in Neville Road. That van belonged to one Day, who had given permission neither to the appellant, Ronald James Stally, nor to another man named Wise to take or drive away the vehicle. In the early hours of the following morning the van was found in a street in the East End of London, and the appellant and Wise were either in it at the time when the police officers discovered it, or had on their own showing been in it for some time; it had been used by the appellant and Wise to make several journeys within the London district that night.

The appellant was convicted at the County of London Sessions of taking and driving away a motor-vehicle, contrary to section 28 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930. He was sentenced by the deputy chairman to nine months' imprisonment. He appealed against conviction, alleging misdirection of the jury by the deputy chairman.

Kevin Winstain for the appellant.
R. D. Harman for the Crown.

The following cases were cited in argument: Shimmell v. Fisher [1]; Moynes v. Coopper [2]; Russell v. Smith [3]; Du Cros v. Lambourne [4]; Johnson v. Youden [5]; Reg. v. Richardson. [6]

BARRY J., delivering the judgment of the court, stated the facts, which he said were extremely simple and need only be set out in the broadest outline, and continued: The appellant's case was that on the evening of February 14 he met Wise at a dance hall. They left there together and met two girls who invited them to a party. They went to the party and, thereafter, at about 1.30 a.m. they attempted to obtain a taxi to drive the girls and themselves home. Unfortunately one at least of the girls had drunk too much at the party and was ill and the taxi driver refused to take them as fares. The appellant says that he then went off to try to find another taxi but he was unsuccessful and ultimately returned. On his return he found Wise and the two girls in a van not in Neville Road but in another street very close to it. According to the evidence, the engine of the van at that time had been running and it does seem clear that Wise, who

[1] [1951] 2 T.L.R. 753; [1951] 2 All E.R. 672, P.C.
[2] [1956] 1 Q.B. 439; [1956] 2 W.L.R. 562; [1956] 1 All E.R. 450.
[3] [1958] 1 Q.B. 27; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 515; [1957] 2 All E.R. 796.
[4] [1907] 1 K.B. 40; 76 L.J.K.B. 50; 23 T.L.R. 3.
[5] [1950] 1 K.B. 544; 66 T.L.R. (Pt. 1) 395; [1950] 1 All E.R. 300.
[6] [1958] Crim.L.R. 480.

pleaded guilty, had driven the car from Neville Road to the place where it was entered by the appellant, the appellant not being present at that period. Indeed, Wise, who gave evidence at the trial, stated specifically that the appellant was not present when he, Wise, took the van from Neville Road. Whether or not that was proved, there was no evidence adduced by the prosecution to indicate that the appellant had in fact been present when the van was first removed.

In directing the jury the learned chairman indicated to them very clearly and with complete accuracy that in order to find the appellant guilty of taking and driving away this car without the consent of the owner, it was quite unnecessary for the appellant to have been actually in the driving seat at any time and in control of the motor-car. It would be quite sufficient, as the learned deputy chairman very clearly pointed out, if the two men, the appellant and Wise, had been acting in concert in relation to the taking of this motor-car without the owner's consent. Unfortunately, as it appears to us, after giving this extremely clear direction, the learned deputy chairman proceeded to say: "There is another way in which Stally can be guilty of taking "and driving away this motor-vehicle. The law puts it in this "way. If one person originally removes a motor-vehicle without "the consent of the owner and drives it away, subsequently any-"body else getting into that motor-vehicle, if they know perfectly "well the driver has taken it without the consent of the owner, is "guilty of the offence. So if you came to the conclusion that "Wise originally removed the van from Neville Road, and subse-"quently picked up Stally, and Stally knew perfectly well Wise "had taken the vehicle without the permission of the owner, "Stally would still be guilty of the offence. Taking and driving "away is a continuing offence. It goes on all the time the "vehicle is being driven, so Stally could be guilty in those "circumstances."

Again, at a later stage in the summing-up, the learned deputy chairman posed this question to the jury: "Was Stally a party "to that"—that is to say, the taking of the motor-van by Wise and the driving of it away—"either present and taking part in "the commission of the offence at the time when the van was "removed, or subsequently joining that van, knowing perfectly "well Wise had no permission to be driving it. If you are satis-"fied that either of these positions is the correct one you should "convict Stally."

In the opinion of this court the two passages to which I have referred state the law in very much too broad a way and, in fact, amount to a misdirection. If the learned deputy chairman had made it clear that once the jury were satisfied that the appellant was a party to the taking in the sense that the taking had been a joint enterprise, even though he himself was not present when the vehicle was actually removed, no complaint could possibly have been made. The difficulty, as we see it, is that the learned

C. C. A.
1959
REGINA
v.
STALLY.

deputy chairman indicated to the jury that they would be entitled to find the appellant guilty of this offence on the mere ground, and the sole ground, that he entered the vehicle some time after it had been taken, knowing that the driver of that vehicle had in fact taken it and driven it away without the consent of the owner. In very many cases the fact that a man entered a car which he knew had been stolen and then drove in it, might well lead the jury to the conclusion that that man had been a party to the original taking, in the sense that the taking had been a joint enterprise between him and the driver of the car. In the passages to which I have referred the learned deputy chairman does not direct the jury that on the evidence they must be satisfied that the appellant was in fact a party to the taking. It might well have been on this evidence that the jury would have so found if so directed, but it is also possible that the jury took the view here that Stally played no part at all in the taking of the van, and that although when he came up to the van, which had already been taken by Wise, he was aware that Wise had taken it without the owner's consent, but nonetheless he had been quite unaware that Wise was going to take it, then, in those circumstances, to say that the mere fact of entering the van and being driven in it would constitute a taking and driving away, seems to this court to be an inaccurate statement of the law.

In those circumstances, in our view, the only possible course is to quash this conviction.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Registrar, Court of Criminal Appeal; Solicitor, Metropolitan Police.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1959
Dec. 15.
Wynn-Parry J.

* In re HAMBLEDEN'S WILL TRUSTS.

[1959 H. No. 1632.]

Trust and Trustee—Variation of trusts—Act of 1958—Form of order—Effect of court's approval of arrangement—Whether direction to trustees necessary—Variation of Trusts Act, 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 53), s. 1.

On an application under section 1 of the Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, the court approved an arrangement varying the residuary trusts of a will. Draft minutes of order were then produced which, after reciting that the adult respondents to the summons consented to the order and providing that the court approved the arrangement on behalf of the infant respondents and unborn persons entitled under protective trusts, also contained the words: "And doth "authorise and direct the trustees of the said will to carry the "said arrangement with effect." No instrument had been executed by any of the adult parties and the court was told that it was not intended that this should be done:—

Held, that the court had no jurisdiction to make an order which included words directing the trustees to carry the arrangement into effect because, once the court's approval of the arrangement was given, the trusts were ipso facto altered and the trustees bound to give effect to the arrangement. The direction to the trustees contained in the draft minutes should, therefore, be deleted and no document was necessary.

In re Joseph's Will Trusts [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1019; [1959] 3 All E.R. 474 not followed.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By his will dated June 6, 1946, the testator, the Right Honourable William Henry Viscount Hambleden, directed that one share of his residuary estate should be held upon trusts under which, in the events which happened, the income thereof was to be held upon protective trusts for his son, the present Viscount Hambleden during his life and after his death, and subject to any appointment that such son should make for the benefit of any wife who might survive him for her life, in trust for his children or remoter issue as he should appoint and in default of appointment in trust for his children who being male should attain the age of twenty-one or being female should attain that age or marry and if more than one in equal shares and in default of such children in trust for other members of the family. The present Lord Hambleden, in exercise of that power, had appointed on his marriage with the present Lady Hambleden, an annuity of £2,500 to be payable to her during the period of her life after his death and during which any child of the intended marriage should be living or after a child of the intended marriage should attain a vested interest in certain other funds such annuity to be payable out of such share.

By an originating summons dated July 10, 1959, the present Lord Hambleden applied to the court under section 1 of the Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, that the court might approve an arrangement, intended to be exhibited to an affidavit to be filed in the proceedings on behalf of the applicant, on behalf of (a) infant respondents to the summons; (b) persons unborn who might thereafter become entitled (otherwise than under the protective trusts thereinafter mentioned) to a beneficial interest in Lord Hambleden's share and (c) any person who was or might thereafter become entitled to any discretionary interest under the protective trust upon which the life interest of the applicant was held. The scheme of arrangement exhibited to the affidavit provided that the trusts of Lord Hambleden's share should be varied as follows, namely "(a) the whole of Lord Hambleden's "share is released from the appointed annuity and no part of "Lord Hambleden's share should henceforth at any time be "subject thereto (b) the annuity fund [being certain specific "investments forming part of Lord Hambleden's share scheduled

1959

HAMBLEDEN'S WILL TRUSTS, In re.

"to the scheme] shall henceforth be held upon trust to pay the "income thereof to Lady Hambleden during her life and subject "thereto upon the trusts of the children's fund (c) the children's "fund [being certain other investments forming part of Lord "Hambleden's share scheduled to the said scheme] together "with the intermediate income thereof shall henceforth be held "on the following trusts." Such trusts provided immediate interests for Lord Hambleden's children and in default for other members of the family being trusts identical with those in the will after the death of Lord Hambleden. It was further provided in the scheme that nothing thereinbefore contained should operate any forfeiture of Lord Hambleden's protective life interest in the remainder of Lord Hambleden's share. The effect of the scheme therefore was that Lady Hambleden's annuity was released and in substitution therefor she obtained an immediate life interest in the annuity fund and Lord Hambleden's protected life interest was released in respect of the annuity fund and the children's fund. At the date of the summons Lord Hambleden had three infant children.

After the court had considered and approved the scheme in principle with minor amendments, draft minutes of order were produced which, after reciting that the adult respondents by their counsel consented to the order, provided that the court approved the arrangement set forth in the schedule thereto (being the document referred to in the summons) on behalf of the infant respondents and unborn persons and persons entitled under protective trusts as indicated in the summons and also contained the words "And doth authorise and direct the trustees of the "said will to carry the said arrangement into effect." It was pointed out to the court that no instrument had been executed by any of the adult parties and it was not intended that this should be done. At this point some discussion arose.

Geoffrey Cross Q.C. and D. H. McMullen for Lord Hambleden. The question has been raised whether, when the court makes an order under the Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, the trusts are ipso facto varied or some document is necessary. Apart from the Act, the court would have no power to vary the trusts in a case such as this, where no question of any compromise arises. Although the Act is not perhaps very happily worded, its scheme seems to be that all the beneficiaries in existence must be before the court. All persons of full age consent to the proposed variation in the trusts, which the court then approves, if it sees its way to doing so, on behalf of the infants and unborn persons beneficially interested, thereby ipso facto varying the trusts. Having regard, however, to the decision of Vaisey J. in In re Joseph's Will Trusts [1] the words "and doth authorise and direct the trustees of the said will to "carry the said arrangement into effect" have been inserted in the draft minutes of order.

[1] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1019; [1959] 3 All E.R. 474.

[WYNN-PARRY J. I do not agree with that decision. I take the view that I have no jurisdiction to make an order including words directing the trustees to carry the arrangement into effect, and those words should be deleted from the draft minutes.

Nothing is required except the approval of the court to the arrangement. If that approval is given the trusts are ipso facto altered, and the trustees are bound thereafter to give effect to the arrangement. I would, however, like to hear counsel for the infants.]

W. T. Elverston for the infant children of Lord Hambleden. It is apprehended that those who have raised this point have in mind the decision of the House of Lords in Grey v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [2] where it was held that a verbal direction to trustees to hold property upon certain trusts was not enforceable, since section 53 (1) (c) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, requires a disposition of an equitable interest to be in writing. It is, of course, essential from the point of view of the infants in the present case that there should be a valid determination of Lord Hambleden's protected life interest in the annuity fund and the children's fund. It is agreed that nothing further is needed than that the court should approve the arrangement, thereby ipso facto varying the trusts, but perhaps it might be so stated.

[WYNN-PARRY J. I will so state, subject to anything counsel for other parties may say. If I approve an arrangement, I alter the trusts. Res ipsa loquitur.]

The only enforceable trust will then be the trusts of the will as varied. If, after the order of the court, anybody should at any time apply to the court for an order for the execution of the trusts, it is submitted that the trusts ordered to be executed would be the trusts as varied by the arrangement and not the original trusts.

[WYNN-PARRY J. Yes. The trusts will take effect according to the arrangement.]

F. E. Skone-James for the trustees of the will other than the applicant and Lady Hambleden. The court is not asked to decide the matter otherwise than in accordance with the view just expressed, but, having regard to Grey v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [2] it seemed to those who took this point that the effect of section 53 (1) (c) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, might be that an agreement was required, which the adult parties would execute, and the court would be asked to approve on behalf of infants and unborn persons to give effect to the proposed variation of the trusts.

[WYNN-PARRY J. I do not think that that Act has any application to this case. If I approve an arrangement, I vary the trusts.]

[2] [1959] 3 W.L.R. 759; [1959] 3 All E.R. 603.

1959

HAMBLEDEN'S WILL TRUSTS, In re.

E. G. Wright for other adult persons interested in the trusts of the shares. This point was taken for the reasons just indicated, but if the court has formed the view that no document is necessary, and will so state, that will dispose of any doubts.

D. H. Mervyn Davies for Lady Hambleden.

V. G. H. Hallett for infants other than the children of Lord Hambleden interested under the trusts.

WYNN-PARRY J. Very well. I hold that the effect of my approval is effective for all purposes to vary the trusts. Thereafter, the trusts are the trusts as varied.

I approve the minutes of order, with the slight alterations which have been referred to, and the arrangement in the schedule.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Bircham & Co.

P. P.

[PRIVY COUNCIL.]

J. C.†

1960 Jan. 19.

* EDWARD RAMIA LTD. . . . . APPELLANT;

AND

AFRICAN WOODS LTD. . . . . RESPONDENT.

ON APPEAL FROM THE WEST AFRICAN COURT OF APPEAL.

West Africa—Gold Coast—Concession, application for—Timber lands—Failure to comply with imperative statutory requirements for protection of grantor—Concession invalid—Laws of the Gold Coast (1951 Ed., c. 136), ss. 12 (2) (3) (4), 13 (11).

Statute — Construction — Directory or obligatory — Privilege or power conferred—Regulative provisions or acquisition or exercise—Timber concession.

Section 12 of the Concessions Ordinance of the Gold Coast provides that any person desiring to obtain a concession in respect of an area of land in Ashanti shall make application to the chief or chiefs concerned, and "(2) . . . shall give notice in writing to "the Chief Commissioner of Ashanti of such application" who "(3) . . . shall instruct the chief or chiefs concerned to appear "before him . . . and . . . shall ascertain from them, in the "presence of the applicant or his agent, whether they are willing "to grant the concession . . . and shall make such other inquiries "touching the grant of the concession as he shall consider necessary . . . (4) The terms of the agreement reached between the "applicant and the chief or chiefs . . . shall be embodied by "the applicant in a concession which shall contain full particulars "of the boundaries and which shall be executed by the interested "parties in the presence of the Chief Commissioner . . ."

---

† Present: LORD TUCKER, LORD DENNING, the RT. HON. L. M. D. DE SILVA.

Section 13 provides that "No concession shall be certified as "valid . . . (11) unless . . . the concession has been obtained in "accordance with the provisions of section 12":—

Held, that sections 12 and 13 (11) were clearly imperative and their provisions were to be strictly observed; they were designed to protect the grantor in the public interest and no waiver was possible of any of the conditions of section 12.

Where, therefore, the appellant company, which had applied for and been granted a concession by the Stool of Bekwai relating to timber rights in land in Ashanti, had admittedly failed to comply with the provisions of subsections (2), (3) and (4) of section 12 of the Concessions Ordinance, the concession was invalid.

Principles stated by Denman J. in Caldow v. Pixell (1877) 36 L.T. 469 at 470 applied.

Judgment of the West African Court of Appeal affirmed.

APPEAL (No. 33 of 1958) from a judgment and order of the West African Court of Appeal (March 19, 1956) setting aside a judgment and order of the Supreme Court of the Gold Coast, Concessions Division Land Court, Kumasi, Ashanti (January 13, 1955) whereby the Land Court dismissed the opposition in Concession Inquiry No. 447.

The following facts and statutory provisions are taken from the judgment of the Judicial Committee: This appeal concerned two Concession Inquiries numbered 447 and 450 in the Concessions Division Land Court, Kumasi, Ashanti. In Concession Inquiry No. 447 the present appellant, Edward Ramia Ltd., was the claimant, and in Concession Inquiry No. 450 the present respondent, African Woods Ltd., was claimant. On January 13, 1955, the Land Court dismissed the opposition of African Woods Ltd. as opposer in Inquiry No. 447 to the grant of a certificate of validity to Edward Ramia Ltd. in respect of a concession, notice of which was filed on July 20, 1953. The claim of African Woods Ltd. to a concession in Inquiry No. 450 in respect of land, part of which was the same as that claimed by Edward Ramia Ltd. in Inquiry No. 447, was not dealt with by the court having regard to the view it took adverse to African Woods Ltd. as to the rights of the parties under their competing concessions.

The parties will be referred to hereafter as "Ramia" and "African Woods."

The claimant Ramia in Inquiry No. 447 on July 20, 1953, filed notice of a concession dated May 26, 1953, granted to it by the Stool of Bekwai. On March 30, 1954, Ramia filed a supplementary document dated February 26, 1954, between the same parties in support of the said concession. By notice dated November 20, 1953, African Woods gave notice of a concession dated October 3, 1953, granted to it by the same Stool of Bekwai covering a large part of the land comprised in the concession claimed by Ramia. By notice filed on June 4, 1954, African Woods entered opposition to the grant of a certificate of validity to Ramia in respect of the concession the subject-matter of Inquiry No. 447 in so far as it purported to coincide with the grant

J. C.
1960
EDWARD RAMIA LTD.
v.
AFRICAN WOODS LTD.

claimed by it by virtue of the concession the subject-matter of Inquiry No. 450. The principal ground of opposition was that the provisions of section 11 (now section 12) of the Concessions Ordinance (c. 136) had not been complied with.

The material sections of the Ordinance were: " 2. In this Ordinance—' Concession ' means any instrument whereby any right, title or interest in or to land, or in or to minerals, timber, rubber, or other products of the soil in or growing on any land or the option of acquiring any such right, title or interest purports to be granted or demised by a native . . .

" 3.—(1) Any agreement whereby any right, interest, or property in, to or over land, in or to minerals, metals, precious stones, timber, rubber or other products of the soil in or growing on any land, or the option of acquiring any such right, interest or property, purports to be granted by a native to a person who is not a native, shall be void unless it is in writing.

" 4.—(1) Every concession shall be held to be under and subject to the operation of this Ordinance.

" 6. The court shall have power, jurisdiction and authority to inquire into and certify as valid or invalid any concession, except so far as otherwise provided in this Ordinance, and shall exercise such power, jurisdiction and authority subject to and in accordance with the provisions of this Ordinance . . .

" 8.—(1) Notice of very concession shall within two months of the date thereof be filed in the court having jurisdiction to inquire into the concession by the person claiming to be entitled to the benefit thereof (hereinafter called the ' claimant ').

" 8.—(3) The notice shall be in Form A of the Schedule and shall contain the particulars specified in the said form and together with the said notice there shall be delivered a plan of the land comprised in such concession which shall be prepared in accordance with any regulations from time to time made under section 5.

"8.—(4) The claimant shall also file within the said period of two months such other documents (including a copy of the concession) or duly certified copies thereof as he relies upon in respect of his right to the concession and together with any such documents there shall be filed a list of such documents in such form as may be provided by rule: Provided that the filing of any such copies shall not be deemed to render unnecessary the due production at the inquiry into any concession or at the trial of any questions relating thereto of the original document so relied upon.

" 8.—(5) Every concession, in respect of which compliance has not been made with the provisions of this section, shall on the expiration of two months after the date of the concession, become null and void and all rights of the claimant with respect to the concession shall thereupon determine absolutely: Provided that the court may in its discretion for good cause shown, and upon such terms as to it seem fit, extend the said period " of two months for one or more terms not exceeding in all four " months.

" 12.—(1) Any person desiring to obtain a concession in respect " of an area of land of which either the whole or the greater part " is situate in Ashanti shall make application to the chief or chiefs " concerned for the grant of such concession and the chief or " chiefs concerned may grant such concession.

" (2) Any person who has made application as aforesaid " (hereinafter called the ' applicant ') shall give notice in writing " to the Chief Regional Officer of Ashanti of such application.

" (3) Upon receipt of any such notice the Chief Regional " Officer of Ashanti shall instruct the chief or chiefs concerned to " appear before him or before a Government Agent, and the Chief " Regional Officer or Government Agent shall ascertain from " them, in the presence of the applicant or his agent, whether " they are willing to grant the concession applied for, and shall " make such other inquiries touching the grant of the concession " as he shall consider necessary, and shall arrange with the " applicant or his agent in the presence of the chief or chiefs " concerned the sum which should be paid annually in considera- " tion of the concession.

" (4) The terms of the agreement reached between the appli- " cant and the chief or chiefs concerned after the aforesaid " appearance before the Chief Regional Officer or Government " Agent shall be embodied by the applicant in a concession which " shall contain full particulars of the boundaries and which shall " be executed by the interested parties in the presence of the " Chief Regional Officer or a Government Agent, and the Chief " Regional Officer or the Government Agent before whom any " such interested party executes such concession shall certify to " the due execution of such concession by such party.

" 13. No concession shall be certified as valid . . . (11) Unless, " in the case of a concession granted in respect of an area of land " of which either the whole or the greater part is situate in " Ashanti, the concession has been obtained in accordance with " the provisions of section 12.

" 32.—(1) A certificate of validity shall be good and valid from " the date of such certificate as against any person claiming " adversely thereto, and shall be effective in respect of the whole " area of land contained by the boundaries stated in such certi- " ficates, whether or not any discrepancy exists between such " area and the area indicated by the notice and plan of the " concession referred to respectively in subsections (1) and (3) of " section 8.

" (2) A certificate of validity . . . shall be conclusive evidence " that all the requirements of the Ordinance . . . and all matters " precedent and incidental thereto have been complied with . . ."

The concessions in question related to timber rights in land in Ashanti. Section 12 of the Ordinance laid down the procedure to be adopted in such cases. It was common ground that Ramia

J. C.
1960

EDWARD RAMIA LTD.
v.
AFRICAN WOODS LTD.

failed to comply with the provisions of subsections (2), (3) and (4) of this section in respect of the concession dated May 26, 1953.

The supplementary document dated February 26, 1954, was executed before the Government Agent, but subsections (2) and (3) of section 12 had not been complied with, nor was there compliance with section 8 (4). Furthermore, the document, although expressed to be supplementary to the lease of May 26, 1953, contained a demise from its date, viz., February 26, 1954, and related to an area of land of 64 square miles whereas the lease of May 26, 1953, related to 82 square miles.

The trial judge (Quashie-Idun J.) held that the intention of the legislature was purely to protect the grantors of concessions in Ashanti from exploitation, and that, where the grantors raised no objection to the terms contained in a lease, as in the present case, it would be inequitable to hold that such lease was null and void. He considered that the court had a discretion in the matter and dismissed African Woods' opposition to the validity of Ramia's concession. He made no finding with regard to Inquiry No. 450.

On appeal, the West African Court of Appeal (Coussey P., Korsan J.A. and Baker Ag.J.A.) allowed African Woods' appeal and declared Ramia's concession invalid. They remitted the case of Inquiry No. 450 to the Supreme Court of the Gold Coast for adjudication, and on May 19, 1956, Benson J. declared African Woods' concession invalid on the ground that in granting it the Bekwai chiefs had not understood the nature and terms of the grant, and were under the impression that the land already leased to Ramia did not include the land leased to African Woods.

This judgment was not appealed, and the hearing before their Lordships was confined to Inquiry No. 447.

1959. Dec. 10. Anthony Cripps Q.C. and Mark Smith for the appellant.

Dingle Foot Q.C. and T. O. Kellock for the respondent.

The following cases, in addition to the case referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Wassaw Exploring Syndicate Ltd. v. African Rubber Co. Ltd.[1]; In re Concession Inquiry No. 939 (Accra). Came, Ofori Atta, African Selection Trust Ltd.[2]

1960. Jan. 19. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD TUCKER, who stated the facts as set out above and continued: It will be convenient first to dispose of the supplementary grant of February 26, 1954. As already stated, this lease related to a smaller area of land than that comprised in the original grant, and the requirements of subsections (2) and (3) of section 12 and of section 8 (4) were not complied with. It is therefore clear that if the original grant was invalid for non-compliance with section 12 the supplementary grant will not avail Ramia, whose case must stand or fall on the validity of the original concession.

[1] [1914] A.C. 626. [2] (1933) 9 W.A.C.A. 305, 317.

As to this, the President of the West African Court of Appeal (the late Sir Henley Coussey) in his judgment allowing the appeal of African Woods, after quoting from the judgment of Denman J. in Caldow v. Pixell [1] said: "Applying these principles, the words "of sections 12 and 13 (11) are, to my mind, clearly imperative. "The respondent could only take a concession under the Ordin- "ance and in compliance with section 12. It is true that there "are no negative words in the sections referred to, but the "affirmative words are absolute, explicit and peremptory, and "when you find in an Ordinance only one particular mode of "effecting the object, one train of formalities to be observed, the "regulative provisions which the section prescribes are essential "and imperative. To render the purpose of section 12 unmis- "takable, subsection (4) provides that the terms of the agreement "can only be embodied in a concession after they have been "agreed upon before the official named. The policy of the law "clearly insists upon strict observance of the steps already alluded "to before there can be a concession. Sections 12 and 13 (11) "are so clearly designed to protect the grantor in the public "interest that in my opinion the learned judge erred in holding "that a waiver is possible of any of the conditions of section 12 "and that the grantors had waived them. To accede to this "proposition would be to entirely ignore the intention of the "legislature for the public good and to defeat one of the main "purposes of the Concessions Ordinance."

With these words their Lordships are in complete agreement and do not desire to add anything thereto.

Later in his judgment the President, referring to the lease of May 26, 1953, used these words: "That deed may be good as a "demise of land and the covenants therein no doubt are binding "on the parties, but it never came into existence as a concession "owing to non-observance by the parties of the imperative "provisions of section 12." Relying on these words counsel for Ramia invited their Lordships, if against him on the main issue, to vary the order of the West African Court of Appeal by making no order instead of declaring the concession invalid.

Their Lordships express no view with regard to the first sentence in the above quoted passage, which may raise issues which are not germane to the present proceedings and were not canvassed in the courts below. They find no ground for varying the judgment pronounced by the West African Court of Appeal and will, for the reasons indicated above, humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal be dismissed. The appellant must pay the costs of the appeal.

Solicitors: Knapp-Fishers & Blake and Redden; Birkbeck, Julius, Coburn & Broad.

C. C.

[1] (1877) 36 L.T. 469, 470.

[COURT OF PROTECTION.]

1960
Jan. 18.

Danckwerts J.

* In re C., 1958, No. 1950.

Mental Deficiency—Discretion of court—Settlement of patient's property—Possibility that patient might squander property on recovery—Mental Health Act, 1959 (7 & 8 Eliz. 2, c. 72), s. 103—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 20), s. 171 (1) (5).

A patient was subject to the control of a receiver of income from March, 1953, until November, 1955, during which time he became entitled to considerable funds under a will. On the receiver's discharge the patient dealt very extravagantly with his money. In October, 1958, it again became necessary to appoint a receiver. The prospect of the patient's recovery was small and there was a possibility that if he recovered he might again deal recklessly with his money. On a summons for an order under section 171 of the Law of Property Act, 1925,[1] authorising the receiver to execute on behalf of the patient a settlement whereby substantially the whole of his property should be held by the Public Trustee as sole trustee on trust as the patient with the consent of the trustee should appoint, and subject thereto, while the patient was subject to a disability, to hold the capital and income for his benefit as the master of the Court of Protection should direct, with power, while he was not subject to a disability, to advance of capital with his consent, the patient to have a protected life interest and a general power of appointment by will:—

Held, that the court had a general discretion under section 171; and that, although it was the general practice that a patient discharged from the control of a receiver should be given control of his property free from any restriction, in the circumstances it was proper and desirable and in the patient's own interests that if he should come out into the world again he should be prevented from squandering his property but that it might be preserved for his maintenance, and the court, in the exercise of that discretion, would authorise the execution of the settlement.

[1] Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 171: "(1) The court may direct a "settlement to be made of the property of a lunatic or defective, or "any part thereof or any interest "therein, on such trusts and subject "to such powers and provisions as "the court may deem expedient, and "in particular may give such directions— . . . (b) where the property "has been acquired under a settlement, a will or an intestacy or "represents property so acquired . . .

"(3) This section applies whether "or not the lunatic or defective has "executed a testamentary disposition "and notwithstanding that it is not "known whether he has executed "such a disposition or not, but does "not apply when he is an infant. . . .

"(5) Subject to making due provision for the maintenance of the "lunatic or defective in accordance "with his station in life, whether out "of the capital or income of the "property settled or other property "or partly in one way and partly in "another, and to providing, by means "of a power of appointment or "revocation, or otherwise, for the "possibility of the lunatic or defective "recovering full capacity, the court "may, in making any order under "this section, have regard to" certain matters.

"(7) At any time before the death "of the lunatic or defective, the "court may, as respects any property "remaining subject to the trusts of a "settlement made under this section, "on being satisfied that any material "fact was not disclosed to the court "when the settlement was made, or "on account of any substantial change "in circumstances, by order vary the "settlement in such manner as it "thinks fit, and give any consequential directions."

In re C. W. M., 1941 No. 2396 [1951] 2 K.B. 714; [1951] 2 All E.R. 707 considered.

Application by summons to the judge for an order under section 171 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, directing a settlement of the patient's property.

The following statement of the facts is taken substantially from the judgment: The patient, a man of 43 years of age, was the subject of an order under section 116 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, from March 27, 1953, until November 22, 1955, during which time his mother had been the receiver of his income. At that time he became entitled to considerable funds under a will, a substantial part of the funds being acquired as a result of the settlement of proceedings arising on the construction of the will in the Court of Appeal, and in May, 1955, his mother applied for an order authorising her to execute a settlement of the funds. These proceedings had to be abandoned since the patient was released from a mental hospital as relieved in September, 1955, when he procured his mother's discharge. He thus became able to deal freely with his property and he spent more than £14,000, purchasing among other things five motor-cars and a caravan. The cars were kept in the street in central London and the patient had several summonses for motoring offences but there was third party insurance cover. His Lordship found that when the patient was free to deal with his property he was irresponsible; further, that he was liable to be violent.

In October, 1958, it again became necessary for the patient to have a receiver and his solicitor was appointed. The receiver sold the cars and the caravan for the total sum of £823. The evidence showed that the prospect of the patient's recovery was small and that, if he did recover it seemed, having regard to his previous record, that he might again deal recklessly with his property.

By this summons the receiver and the mother and brother of the patient applied for an order under section 171 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, authorising the receiver to execute in the name and on behalf of the patient a settlement of substantially the whole of his property, and yielding a net income of about £637. By the settlement, the patient as settlor, acting by the receiver, transferred the investments to the Public Trustee as sole trustee to hold the trust fund upon trust as the patient, with the consent of the trustee, should appoint, subject thereto, while the patient was subject to the jurisdiction of the master of the Court of Protection to hold the capital and income available for the patient's benefit as the master should direct and with power, while he was not under such disability, to advance capital to him with his consent; subject thereto the patient to have a protected life interest and a general power of appointment by will.

W. S. Wigglesworth for the applicants.

J. A. Wolfe for the Official Solicitor.

1960

C., 1958, No. 1950, In re.

The case cited in argument is referred to in the judgment.

DANCKWERTS J. This is an application by the receiver of income of a patient who is in a mental hospital for a settlement to be approved under section 171 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. In passing, it may be noted that this section is repealed by the Mental Health Act, 1959, which has not yet come into force; but section 103 of that Act contains provisions which are extremely similar to those of section 171 of the Law of Property Act, 1925.

It should first be stated that the general principle followed by the court as a matter of practice hitherto has been that, when a patient is discharged from the control of the receiver of his income, he is usually given his property free from any restriction, so that he is able to deal with it completely as he wishes. But the facts of this case are very unusual. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] It is to be noted that the fund produces a fair income which is sufficient for the patient's maintenance at the present time, but if the capital were to be squandered again the situation might become extremely unfortunate. Consequently, on the grounds of common sense and prudence, it seems proper to prevent the patient from having the opportunity to deal with his property in a reckless manner if he should recover.

The powers under which I am asked to act are contained in section 171 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. [His Lordship read section 171 (1) (b), (3), (5) and (7), and continued:] The power contained in subsection (1) is perfectly general and the directions therein seem to be intended only to deal with particular cases and do not restrict the generality of the court's powers. The property which the patient has was acquired under a will, the larger part as a result of a settlement in the Court of Appeal of disputed questions arising on the construction of the will. So that section 1 (1) (b) would seem to cover the present case. Another subsection to which I have been referred is subsection (3), which I do not think has much effect in the present case. A suggestion was also made that the Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, might be relevant because now the proposed settlement could be approved under it, but I do not think that that is of much assistance to me in the present case. The patient has now made a will and whether it will be effective when he dies depends upon whether it is opposed and whether he was capable of making a will at the relevant time.

Subsection (5) requires provision to be made by way of a power of appointment or revocation for the possibility of recovery of full capacity and under subsection (7) a patient who has fully recovered may secure full dominion over property which his trustee has not handed over as he should, by an application to the court for variation. The main provisions of that subsection are preserved by section 103 of the Mental Health Act, 1959.

In the present case there is no power of revocation in the settlement but there is a general power of appointment which would enable the property to be appointed to the patient himself if the power were exercised with the consent of the trustee of the proposed settlement. It was held by the Lords Justices sitting as judges in lunacy in In re C. W. M., 1941 No. 2396,[1] that the court in its discretion is not bound to insist upon a power of revocation. It would appear, therefore, that the insertion of a power of revocation is by no means essential. Reliance has also been placed on the practice as set out in Heywood & Massey, 7th ed. (1954), at p. 45, relating to the provisions in the case of a lunatic so found. Powers which were derived from section 105 of the Lunacy Act, 1890, in the case set out in that book, allowed the court to direct a conditional supersedeas in the case of the recovery of a lunatic so found so that there might be restraint exercised on his property if the court should think that advisable. An order was made for supersedeas under section 105 "on the "recovered patient undertaking by his solicitor to execute a "settlement in the form of a draft initialled by the judge." Then the authors continue: "such a settlement should be "framed so as to prevent the recovered patient from obtaining "control of the settled fund for his own benefit as the sole object "of the trust; the power of appointment of new trustees should "be vested in him alone, and any power of revocation should be "vested in him (and some reliable person) so that if incapacity "recurs recourse must be had to the court for the exercise of "those powers." That jurisdiction does not apply in the present case, but in exercising the jurisdiction conferred upon the court by section 171 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, the court is entitled, I think, to have regard to the spirit of the exercise of the jurisdiction in cases which come within section 105 of the Lunacy Act, 1890. There is a close analogy between the two cases, that is to say, a case under section 105 and the jurisdiction which I have to consider now.

It seems to me, therefore, that I have a general discretion under section 171 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and the question remains whether I should exercise that discretion in the manner which is suggested by the present application. I have come to the conclusion that in the interests of the patient himself it is quite plain that an order should be made by which the settlement in the terms suggested should be executed. It appears he may recover physically, but his powers of concentration and appreciation apparently are likely to be impaired. This is a case where it is proper and desirable that the court should restrain the patient if he comes out into the world again so that he is not able to squander his property to his own detriment. This settlement is for the purpose of preserving his property so that it shall be available for his maintenance, and to secure him against want and misfortune in his financial circumstances: consequently, I am prepared to exercise my jurisdiction under the section by authorising the settlement on the terms of the draft which has been put before me.

[1] [1951] 2 K.B. 714; [1951] 2 All E.R. 707.

1960

C., 1958, No. 1950, In re.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Longhurst & Butler; Official Solicitor.

M. G. T.

[MANCHESTER ASSIZES.]

1959 July 22.

Ashworth J.

* RUSHTON v. TURNER BROTHERS ASBESTOS CO. LTD.

[1958 R. No. 38.]

Factory—Dangerous machinery (fencing)—Duty to guard against acts reasonably forseable—Hand deliberately placed in position of danger—Effective cause of accident—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 14 (1).

Causation—Breach of statutory duty—Contributory negligence—Dangerous machinery—Deliberate act of folly by plaintiff—Personal injury.

The plaintiff suffered an injury to his hand whilst operating a crushing machine in the course of his employment in the defendants' factory. The relevant part of the machine was a pan round which rotated two stones for the purpose of crushing asbestos fibre placed therein through a chute. At the end of the process the product was collected from an outlet chute which was opened by operating a trap-door which slid on two side grooves. The grooves, which were normally separated from the pan by a protective layer of metal, required cleaning from time to time during each shift, and a knife was provided for the purpose. The plaintiff had been operating this machine for some eight months at the time of the accident, having received full instructions, in particular a clear instruction that he was on no account to clean the grooves when the machine was in motion. During the day of the accident, when the plaintiff was working the machine, part of the top of a groove broke away, leaving the upper barrier to that extent incomplete. The plaintiff reported this to the foreman, who decided that the repair should be carried out the next day, and that the machine was safe to run for the rest of that shift. The plaintiff then resumed work, being fully aware of the condition of the groove. When the time came to clean the grooves, he attempted to clean them with his fingers without stopping the machine, and his fingers were crushed by the rotating stones:—

Held, that the defendants were in breach of section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, but that since the plaintiff's deliberate act of folly was the operative and effective cause of his injury, the defendants were not liable therefor.

Williams v. Sykes & Harrison [1955] 1 W.L.R. 1180; [1955] 3 All E.R. 225; and Admiralty Commissioners v. S.S. Volute [1922] 1 A.C. 129; 38 T.L.R. 225 applied.

[Reported by DONALD HART, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

ACTION.

The plaintiff, William Davies Rushton, was employed by the defendants as a fibre packer in their factory at Rochdale. He had originally been employed as a trucker, but some eight months prior to September 9, 1958, when he suffered the injury with which this claim is concerned, he had been transferred at his own request to the more highly paid task of operating a crushing machine, and had been fully instructed in this task. The relevant part of the machine consisted of a pan, round the edge of which two stones rotated for the purpose of crushing asbestos fibre. It was part of the plaintiff's duties to fetch a sack of this fibre, empty it into a chute in the machine, and collect the resulting product from the outlet chute when the process was completed some eight minutes later. In order to permit the crushed fibre to leave the pan there was a trapdoor or slide, which was operated by turning a handle. This door slid in two grooves, one on each side, which were 13/16th inch by $\frac{3}{4}$ inch, and separated from the pan at the top by a protective layer of metal 13/16th inch thick. Parts of the fibre discharged into the chute tended to collect in the two grooves and to harden thereon, making it difficult to close the trap-door effectively. It was therefore the operator's task to clean these grooves from time to time during the shift. This was normally done by stopping the machine and cleaning the grooves with the knife provided for the purpose.

At some time during September 9, 1958, while the plaintiff was operating the machine, the top part of one of the grooves became broken off, leaving a gap in the top protective barrier. The plaintiff reported this to his superiors, and it was decided, in his presence, that the machine was safe to run for the rest of the shift. The plaintiff then resumed work, with full knowledge of the state of the groove. When the time for cleaning the grooves arrived the plaintiff attempted to do so with his fingers and without stopping the machine. The tips of the fingers of his left hand came into contact with the stones and were crushed.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendants were in breach of section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937,[1] in that the discharge hole, stones, sliding door and grooves of the machine were not securely fenced; and were negligent in allowing him to work the machine with the piece of metal missing, in failing to give him sufficient warning of danger, and in causing or allowing him to clean the machine while it was in motion. The defendants denied these allegations and alleged contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff in attempting to clear asbestos from the grooves when the machine was in motion, in failing to immobilise the machine before so doing, contrary to express instructions, and in increasing the risk to himself by attempting to clear out the grooves with his hand instead of using the knife provided for the purpose.

[1] Factories Act, 1937, s. 14 (1): "Every dangerous part of any "machinery, other than prime movers "and transmission machinery, shall "be securely fenced unless it is in "such a position or of such construc-"tion as to be as safe to every per-"son employed or working on the "premises as it would be if securely "fenced."

1959

RUSHTON v. TURNER BROTHERS ASBESTOS CO. LTD.

C. T. B. Leigh for the plaintiff.
Fenton Atkinson Q.C. and J. M. Collins for the defendants.

The cases cited in argument on the question of contributory negligence are referred to in the judgment.

ASHWORTH J. described the machine and the injuries to the plaintiff and continued: As the fibre was discharged from out of the trap-door into the chute parts of it tended to collect in the two grooves on either side of the trap-door. As the process went on the material which collected in the grooves tended to harden or become impacted on the sides of the grooves. If sufficient material had collected it was clearly difficult to close the trap-door effectively, and therefore it was necessary from time to time during a shift to clean the grooves. That was the operator's task, and bearing in mind that the stones were rotating round the pan, and that in between the stones there were scrapers cleaning the surface of the pan, I should have thought it was elementary to say that for a man to place his hand into the trapdoor while the machine was in motion was about as foolish a piece of negligence as anyone could conceive.

The defendants were fully alive to the importance of safety precautions amongst their operatives, and among the documents produced was a small card entitled: "Safety in the Factory," at the bottom of which there was a place for a signature, and the plaintiff acknowledged that he had received such a document. It states that it is a breach to attempt to touch any part of the machine when it is in motion, "except those parts that form part "of your normal job and which you have been instructed to do by "the foreman, charge-hand or duly appointed teacher-operative."

The plaintiff was put on this machine at his own request, and the defendants were fortunately able to call before me two witnesses who were responsible for his instruction. I have seldom met witnesses who gave more clearly an impression of reliability and truthfulness. One of them, Mr. Southworth, is a safety man himself, and he said that he put the other, Mr. Butler, in charge of the plaintiff and told him to instruct him about the machine. He said: "After Butler said that Rushton "was sufficiently trained, I examined him for a good hour, and "then unbeknown to him I watched him for three days because "it was my job to be in that particular department and I saw "that he was doing the work properly." I accept that evidence fully, and I am satisfied that in the course of the instructions it was made abundantly plain to the plaintiff that on no account should he attempt to clean the grooves while the machine was in motion. It was obviously necessary while he was being trained for him to operate the machine, and in the course of the day to clean the grooves, and it was for that reason that I asked Mr. Southworth if he had seen him do it. He said that he had, and that the plaintiff cleaned it with the machine stopped, and used for the purpose a knife which was provided by the defendants. The reason why the knife was provided was because the impacted material tended to stick in the grooves and some form of sharp instrument was needed to flick it out of the corners of the grooves—the bare fingers would not be suitable or efficient for that purpose.

Before this accident, probably for eight months, the plaintiff had been allowed to operate the machine, fully instructed as to the proper way of doing so, and with clear instructions that on no account had he to clean the grooves when the machine was in motion. The method of cleaning could be one of two. It was possible to lift the cover of the pan and approach the grooves from above. If that course were taken the machine was stopped, for the rotation of the stones would be stopped automatically. The other method of approach to the grooves was from underneath. It was possible to open the trap-door and then insert the hand into the opening, and I was told by more than one witness that that was the normal method of cleaning the grooves adopted by those operating the machine. But the witnesses for the defendants who gave those answers were careful to add that in all circumstances the machine was stopped before any attempt was made to clean the grooves. None of them had ever seen a man indulge in the appallingly dangerous manoeuvre of attempting to clean the grooves while the machine was in motion; and, indeed, Mr. Southworth's view of it was that if he saw a man doing so he would tell him off in round terms, and if he saw him do it a second time he would be finished. I believe that, too.

I am quite satisfied on all the evidence that the idea of cleaning the grooves when the machine was in motion was something which the defendants, from the common-sense angle, had barely any reason to contemplate as being likely to occur; but one must remember that it is not only the sensible workman but the fool who is within the scope of the Factory Acts' protection.

I take the view that because the defendants knew that the normal method of cleaning the groves was from below by opening the trap-door and inserting the knife, they should have contemplated as a matter of law that one day one man would be foolish enough to do that without stopping the machine, and it is against that sort of risk, as I find, that the Factories Act was passed. I confess that I should have been very willing, if the decided cases allowed it, to hold the defendants free of any breach of the Factories Act at all. It seems to me that this case only just falls over the line into the realm of a risk through lack of fencing which the ordinary employer ought to contemplate and guard against, but I do so find that this particular part was dangerous, and it was not fenced at all. Fencing clearly could have been applied to the opening, because since the accident a form of wire guard or barrier has been installed. That is, I need hardly say, not conclusive, but counsel for the plaintiff quite properly relies on it as indicating that the provision of the guard was a relatively simple matter.

1959

RUSHTON v. TURNER BROTHERS ASBESTOS CO. LTD.

Ashworth J.

The strength of the defendants' case is the folly of the plaintiff. [His Lordship referred to the plaintiff's testimony, finding him not to be an impressive witness and at times untruthful, and continued:] What happened on September 9, was this: At some time during that day when the plaintiff was working the machine, some part of the top groove broke away, and at about four o'clock the plaintiff produced the piece of metal that had broken away and took it to Mr. Butler, asking: "Where has this come from?" It was then passed up the stages of rank in the factory, and not long afterwards there was, so to speak, a little conference round the machine. [His Lordship referred to the evidence, and continued:] As a result of this little conference it was decided that the repair should be carried out on the Wednesday, but that the machine was safe to run for the rest of that shift. Mr. Butler, as it were in response to the plaintiff's original question, "Where "did this come from?" showed the plaintiff where the piece of metal came from, namely, the top edge of the groove. The plaintiff, therefore, was fully aware when he started to work again at about 5.15 that evening that the top edge of the groove was in a condition where part of it had disappeared. The result of the disappearance was that this slight barrier, 13/16th inch in depth, was incomplete to the extent of the metal that had gone. There was, therefore, nothing to prevent the hand or finger coming into contact, if it were lifted past the level of the groove, with the stones. That is what happened. The time came to clean the grooves. The plaintiff put in his finger, cleaned the right-hand groove and managed to do it without injury; and then he did the same with the left and was crushed. He told me that he had done it many times before, and I understood him to say that he done it even hundreds of times. Once again, I do not believe him.

This was one of two machines in the room, which was compact—about eight men working in it—and with a man like Mr. Southworth about I am convinced that it would have been utterly impossible for the plaintiff to risk this highly dangerous method without coming under Mr. Southworth's notice and censure. He might well have done it once or twice when people were missing, but I do not think that he made a practice of it or lulled himself into the belief that that was the proper way of doing it at all. I need hardly say that when he put his finger in he had failed to stop the machine. There would have been no accident if he had stopped it. The method by which he could have stopped it was within one-pace distance of it. Indeed I doubt whether it was even necessary to step that one pace. If he had reached out his right hand he could have operated the lever with ease; but he chose not to do so. In those circumstances he says that the defendants are liable to pay him compensation for an accident which was entirely his own folly.

I have been pressed, and rightly pressed, by counsel for the plaintiff, with the submission that this accident does not differ in kind from many other accidents reported in the books in which the defendant employers have been found guilty of a breach of the Factories Act, and none the less the plaintiff has succeeded in spite of considerable contributory negligence on his own part. It seems to me that in each case it is a question of degree. It is a question of degree, looking at the whole of the circumstances, fairly and broadly, to see whether a breach of the Factories Act is of itself an operative cause of the accident or is more truly in a sense the circumstances in which the accident happened. Singleton L.J., in Williams v. Sykes and Harrison,[1] quoted from a speech by Lord Birkenhead in Admiralty Commissioners v. S.S. Volute,[2] where he says: "... the question of contributory negligence must "be dealt with somewhat broadly and upon common-sense prin-"ciples as a jury would probably deal with it. And while no doubt, "where a clear line can be drawn, the subsequent negligence is "the only one to look to, there are cases in which the two acts "come so closely together, and the second act of negligence is so "much mixed up with the state of things brought about by "the first act, that the party secondly negligent ... might, on the "other hand, invoke the prior negligence as being part of the "cause of the collision so as to make it a case of contribution." That was a case decided in 1922, but the principle there laid down which was appropriate in those days in Admiralty cases, and is now appropriate in common law, was adopted by Singleton L.J. in the Williams case,[3] and I would respectfully endeavour to apply it here, as Lord Birkenhead said: "somewhat broadly "and upon common-sense principles."

It seems to me in this case that, first of all, the plaintiff was not injured by reason of some accidental omission on his part to take due care, nor was it a case of momentary inadvertence and failing to remember the safety rules. This was a case in which he must have known that the machine was in motion. He must have known that the limited safety permitted by the top of the groove had been greatly reduced by the breakage; and he must have known that he was placing his hand in a position of grave danger when he deliberately inserted it into the left-hand groove. I know that the word came from me, but it was accepted by the plaintiff and I repeat it: it was a crazy thing to do. He admits himself that he would not do it again. What reason he had for doing it then, unless it be that his intelligence is less than I estimate, I do not know. What I do find is that he did it quite

[1] [1955] 1 W.L.R. 1180, 1189.
[2] [1922] 1 A.C. 129, 144; 38 T.L.R. 225.
[3] [1955] 1 W.L.R. 1180.

1959

Rushton v. Turner Brothers Asbestos Co. Ltd.

Ashworth J.

deliberately, and that the cause, in the sense of the operative and effective cause of this accident, is wholly to be attributed to him.

I fully appreciate that the occasions on which a court is able to permit defendants to escape in a case of this sort must be rare. Generally, when they have been in breach of the Factories Act they must be expected to bear some portion of the responsibility and to pay some proportion of compensation. But this will not be the first case on record in which a court has come to the conclusion that the defendants can escape altogether because their breach of the statutory provisions was not in a true sense of the word an effective cause of this accident. The present Lord Chief Justice gave a decision to the same effect in Johnson v. Tennant Bros. Ltd,[4] which was upheld in the Court of Appeal; and there have been other cases in which the degree of responsibility of the plaintiff has been placed as high as 90 per cent. I think that the only proportion which it would be possible or fair to impose on the defendants would be absolutely minimal in this case, and I am not prepared to give the plaintiff something, for example, as little as 5 per cent. for damages which he could recover. I do not decide it on the ground that 5 per cent. is the same as nought because others might have a different view. I take the view that in this case, looked at fairly, the plaintiff is the sole author of his own misfortune.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors: J. Bright, Clegg & Son, Rochdale; James Chapman & Co., Manchester.

[4] Unreported. Parker J., Leeds Assizes, July 9, 1954; affirmed C.A., Nov. 19, 1954.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

1959 Dec. 11.

Lord Parker C.J., Hilbery and Pearson JJ.

* REGINA v. BENNETT. Ex parte RADBURN.

Justices—Election to go for trial—Indictable offence triable summarily—Consent to summary trial—Magistrate's right to allow accused to withdraw consent—Whether he had "begun to try" information—Prosecution witness heard—Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2, c. 55), ss. 19 (5), 24.

The applicant was charged with attempted suicide and, it appearing to the magistrate that the circumstances were such that the offence did not require trial on indictment, and the provisions of section 19 (3) and (4) of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952,[1] having been complied with, she elected to be tried summarily and pleaded not guilty. Evidence of arrest was given by a police constable, after which the applicant was remanded for seven days for a medical report. At the adjourned hearing the applicant asked for leave to change her election so that she could go for trial. The magistrate, deciding that in the circumstances he had no power to allow the applicant to change her election, refused the request. On an application for mandamus and prohibition:—

[1] Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, s. 19: "(2) If at any time during the "inquiry into the offence it appears "to the court, having regard to any "representations made in the presence "of the accused by the prosecutor or "made by the accused, and to the "nature of the case, that the punish- "ment that the court has power to "inflict under this section would be "adequate and that the circumstances "do not make the offence one of

Held, that a court of summary jurisdiction had "begun to try" an information within section 24 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, when it began to hear the evidence and the magistrate, having heard the evidence of the police constable, had begun to try the case summarily and therefore was precluded by section 24 from thereafter proceeding to inquire into the information as an examining justice.

Reg. v. Craske, Ex parte Metropolitan Police Commissioner [1957] 2 Q.B. 591; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 308; [1957] 2 All E.R. 772 considered.

APPLICATION for prohibition and mandamus.

The applicant, Eileen or Anna Radburn, having elected to be tried summarily before a metropolitan magistrate (Paul Bennett, Esq., V.C.), on a charge of attempted suicide, subsequently wished to change her election and to go for trial. The magistrate being of the opinion that he had begun to try the information summarily refused to allow the applicant to change her election. The applicant thereupon moved for orders prohibiting the magistrate from continuing the trial summarily and directing him to hold a preliminary inquiry. The facts are stated in the judgment.

Peter Sheridan for the applicant.
Paul Wrightson for the Commissioner of Police.

Cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

LORD PARKER C.J. In this case Mr. Sheridan moves for an order of mandamus and prohibition directed to the stipendiary "serious character and do not for "other reasons require trial on indictment, the court may proceed with a "view to summary trial. (3) For the "purpose of proceeding as aforesaid, "the court shall cause the charge to "be written down, if this has not "already been done, and read to the "accused and shall tell him that he "may, if he consents, be tried summarily instead of being tried by a "jury and, if the court thinks it desirable for his information, shall tell "him before what court he would be "tried if tried by a jury and explain "what is meant by being tried summarily. (4) Where the offence with "which the accused is charged is "triable by quarter sessions, the court "shall also explain to him that if he "consents to be tried summarily "and is convicted by the court "he may be committed to quarter "sessions under section 29 of this Act "if the court, on obtaining information of his character and antecedents, is of opinion that they are "such that greater punishment should "be inflicted than the court has power "to inflict. (5) After informing the "accused as provided by the last two "preceding subsections the court shall "ask him whether he wishes to be "tried by a jury or consents to be "tried summarily, and, if he consents, "shall proceed to the summary trial "of the information."

S. 24: "Except as provided in subsection (5) of section 18 of this Act, "a magistrates' court, having begun "to try an information for any indictable offence summarily, shall not "thereafter proceed to inquire into "the information as examining "justices."

1959

REGINA
v.
BENNETT.
Ex parte
RADBURN.

Lord Parker C.J.

magistrate sitting at the Marlborough Street Magistrates' Court. The application is made on behalf of one Eileen or Anna Radburn, and the short facts are these: On November 16, 1959, the applicant appeared before the magistrate charged with attempted suicide. It appeared to be a matter which the magistrate could properly deal with summarily, and, accordingly, the provisions of section 19 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, were invoked. I entirely accept the magistrate's affidavit that that section was fully complied with; in other words, the court ordered the charge to be written down and read to the accused, and she was told that she was at liberty to be tried summarily instead of being tried by a jury. She did elect to be tried summarily, and thereupon she was asked to plead, and she pleaded not guilty.

Thereafter, a woman police constable was called, who said: "At 11.45 today at St. George's Hospital I saw the defendant. "I told her I should take her to Gerald Road Police Station "where she would be charged with attempted suicide. When "charged and cautioned she said: 'It was not an attempt to "'commit suicide.'" Thereafter, she was remanded for seven days, and the magistrate directed that there should be a medical report.

On the adjourned hearing on November 23 she was represented by counsel, who asked the magistrate for leave to change her election so that she should go for trial. The magistrates decided that he had no power to allow her to change her election, and it is in those circumstances that this court was moved to prohibit him from continuing with the trial in a summary way.

The whole matter depends upon sections 19 and 24 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952. By section 19 (5) it is provided: "After informing the accused as provided by the last two pre-"ceding subsections the court shall ask him whether he wishes "to be tried by a jury or consents to be tried summarily, and, "if he consents, shall proceed to the summary trial of the "information." Pausing there, there is nothing in the Act which deals in any way with the possibility of a change in the election but, by section 24 it is provided: "Except as provided in sub-"section (5) of section 18 of this Act"—which has no relevance in this case—"a magistrates' court, having begun to try an "information for any indictable offence summarily, shall not "thereafter proceed to inquire into the information as examining "justices." Accordingly, the short question here is whether on the facts this magistrate had begun to try an information summarily within the meaning of that section.

There have been two authorities at least on this matter. In Reg. v. Craske, Ex parte Metropolitan Police Commissioner[1] it was held by this court that a magistrate who has merely taken the plea has not begun to try an information summarily, and that he does not so begin until he begins to take evidence. Again, in

[1] [1957] 2 Q.B. 591; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 308; [1957] 2 All E.R. 772.

Reg. v. Ibrahim,[2] it was held by the Court of Criminal Appeal that a magistrate has not begun to try an information summarily within section 24 by hearing the opening by the prosecution. Again, it is said that he does not so begin until he begins to hear evidence.

In the present case a policewoman did give the evidence to which I have referred. Mr. Sheridan, however, says, if I understand him aright, that that evidence was merely formal evidence, the sort of evidence you would have given in connection with bail. He says that this was formal evidence in connection with remand and was not, as he puts it, evidence in the case. He seeks to support that by reference to Reg. v. Craske, where he maintains that a similar evidence of arrest and charge had been given albeit in the form of depositions. I am satisfied that no help can be obtained from Craske's case. It is true that there is a reference [3] to evidence being taken in deposition form of the arrest and charge of one Rees, but if one looks at the passage closely it is quite clear that that evidence in deposition form was referring to a period after the magistrate had decided in that case to allow the prisoner to change his election, and had begun to take evidence as an examining justice. Without deciding whether there can be what is called formal evidence as opposed to evidence in the case, I am clear, accepting the magistrate's affidavit as I do, that the evidence of this police officer was evidence in the case. In his affidavit the magistrate says: "The witness concerned was a "witness in the trial and fully gave her evidence, though I believe "the police officer in charge of the case had first intimated to me "that he had only one witness ready to give evidence and would "ask for a remand after she had so given evidence. The police "officer in charge did so ask for a remand thereafter."

The court has been supplied with a transcript of a shorthand note taken from which it appears that after the plea, Police Inspector Francis Woods said: "I will ask for a remand, Your "Worship," and then the evidence was given. It seems to me that that largely supports the magistrate's affidavit, and it seems to me, accepting that evidence as I do, that this woman police officer was the first witness in the case, was the only witness for the prosecution who was present, and she gave her evidence in the trial, and the prisoner was thereafter remanded. Accordingly, I think these applications fail and should be dismissed.

HILBERY J. I agree.

PEARSON J. I agree.

Application dismissed.

Solicitors: Barry Ziff; Solicitor, Metropolitan Police.

J. D. P.

[2] (1957) 122 J.P. 119; 42 Cr.App.R. 38.

[3] [1957] 2 Q.B. 591, 594.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

1960
Jan. 20.

Lord Parker C.J., Cassels and Ashworth JJ.

* VICTORY (EX-SERVICES) ASSOCIATION LTD. v. PADDINGTON BOROUGH COUNCIL.

Rates and Rating — "Social welfare" — Ex-services club — "Main "objects" contained in written constitution—"To promote com- "radeship between and improve the condition and welfare of all "ranks, both past and present" of the forces—Whether main objects of organisation "concerned with the advancement of . . . "social welfare"—Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 9), s. 8.

The Victory (Ex-Services) Association Ltd., a company limited by guarantee, was incorporated in 1947 to administer a fund of £300,000 raised by a public appeal, organised in 1944, for money to form a fund to commemorate members of His Majesty's forces who had died in the last war, such memorial to take the form of a residential club in London which would be open to all ex-service members of such forces. The objects for which the association was established, as set out in clause 3 of the memorandum of association were: "(A) To promote comradeship between and "improve the condition and welfare of all ranks, both past and "present, of the Navy, Army and Air Force of the United King- "dom, British Dominions, Colonies, India, and such allied Nations "as the Council shall from time to time determine, together with "all ranks of the W.R.N.S., A.T.S., W.A.A.F. and the correspond- "ing services of the British Dominions, Colonies, India and Allied "Nations. (B) With a view to the furtherance of the last "mentioned object, to undertake all or any of the following "activities, namely, (i) to conduct a welfare and advice bureau; "(ii) to conduct an employment agency; (iii) to establish, own, "maintain and conduct a residential club or clubs for such persons "as are mentioned in object (A), and for the wives or husbands "of such persons . . . and to provide a club or club-houses and all "suitable conveniences and amenities in connection therewith," and a number of other objects were set out in paragraphs (C) to (I).

The association acquired premises which it opened in 1948 under the style of The Victory Ex-Services Club, a club which it had caused to be formed, where it provided residential and other facilities for members. Membership of the club was restricted to ex-service men and women, irrespective of former rank, on payment of an annual subscription of 10s. a year, and there were about 23,000 members. The association also provided on the premises a welfare advice bureau and an employment agency open to all ex-service men and women without charge: the area of the premises made available for the club considerably exceeded that used for the welfare advice bureau and the employment agency. On an appeal by the association from the dismissal by quarter sessions of its appeal against a rate made and demanded in respect of the premises, in which the association claimed to be entitled to relief under section 8 of the Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955, on the ground that it was an organisation "whose main "objects are . . . concerned . . . with the advancement of social "welfare" within the meaning of section 1 (a):—

Held, that where an organisation had a written constitution setting out its objects, it was that which had to be looked to in order to determine what were its main objects, and it was only in the case of ambiguity or a possible change of objects that regard should be had to its activities; that, as a matter of construction, the main objects of the association were the single composite object set out in clause 3 (A) of the memorandum of association, "to "promote comradeship between and improve the condition of all "ranks" of the forces, which object was concerned with "the "advancement of social welfare" within the meaning of section 8 (1) (a); and that, therefore, the association was entitled to the relief claimed.

Dictum of Lord Denning in National Deposit Friendly Society Trustees v. Skegness Urban District Council [1959] A.C. 293, 320; [1958] 3 W.L.R. 172; [1958] 2 All E.R. 601 considered.

Working Men's Club and Institute Union Ltd. v. Swansea Corporation [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1197; [1959] 3 All E.R. 769 distinguished.

CASE STATED by London Quarter Sessions Appeals Committee.

The appellants, the Victory (Ex-Services) Association Ltd., appealed to quarter sessions against a rate made and demanded by the respondent rating authority, the Paddington Borough Council, in respect of premises at 73–79, Seymour Street, London, W.2, for the year beginning April 1, 1956, in the sum of £5,372 17s., on the ground that the premises were occupied for the purposes of the association, an organisation which satisfied the requirements of section 8 (1) (a) of the Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955,[1] and that by virtue of section 8 (2) the demand should not have exceeded £3,127 7s. 6d., the rate paid in respect of the premises in the year beginning April 1, 1955.

The following were among the facts found by quarter sessions: The association was a company limited by guarantee incorporated on February 7, 1947. In 1944, a public appeal was organised by Field-Marshal Sir Philip Chetwode with the support of the Duke of Gloucester, the Prime Minister, the Lord Mayor of London, and numerous well-known public figures, to raise a fund which should commemorate the members of His Majesty's forces who had died in the war in which the country was then engaged, such memorial to take the form of a residential club in London which would be open to all ex-service members of such forces. Between the years 1944 and 1950 over £344,000 was raised by public subscription in response to such appeal, and the association was incorporated to administer such moneys. In 1947 the association acquired premises known at Nos. 73–79, Seymour Street, and opened them under the style of The Victory Ex-Services Club in 1948. Those premises constituted the hereditament under appeal, and it was occupied for the purposes of the association as hereinafter set out.

[1] Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955, s. 8: "(1) This section applies to the "following hereditaments, that is to "say—(a) any hereditament occupied "for the purposes of an organisation "(whether corporate or unincorporate) "which is not established or con-"ducted for profit and whose main "objects are charitable or are other-"wise concerned with the advance-"ment of religion, education or social "welfare . . . (2) For the purposes of "the making and levying of rates . . . "the amount of rates chargeable in "respect of a hereditament to which "this section applies shall . . . be "limited as follows, . . ."

1960

Victory (Ex-Services) Association Ltd. v. Paddington Borough Council.

The association had caused to be formed a club known as the Victory Ex-Services Club, the terms and conditions governing the enrolment of members being such as might be published from time to time. The form of application for membership called for a proposer and seconder who should be members, but potential members, if they had no friends who were members, were invited to fill up the application form, leaving the proposer and seconder lines blank, and to return the form with their service discharge papers. With a few minor exceptions membership of the club was restricted to ex-service men and ex-service women (irrespective of former rank) on payment of an annual subscription of 10s. per head. There were approximately 23,000 such members.

The club provided residential and other facilities for members and the charges made for meals and accommodation were less than those which would be charged for comparable services elsewhere in London.

The association also encouraged the use of the premises for reunions of ex-service men and women with a view to maintaining the spirit of comradeship formed during their service. The residential and other facilities were extensively used by ex-service men and women passing through London, seeking work in London, or on holiday in London, who might otherwise have difficulty in obtaining accommodation of a comparable standard.

The association also provided upon the premises a welfare advice bureau and employment agency which was open to all ex-service men and women without charge, whether members of the club or not. The area of the premises made available for the club considerably exceeded that used for the advice bureau and employment agency.

The association was not established or conducted for profit.

By clause 3 of the memorandum of association, annexed to the case, the objects for which the association was established were: "(A) To promote comradeship between and improve the condition "and welfare of all ranks, both past and present, of the Navy, "Army and Air Force of the United Kingdom, British Dominions, "Colonies, India, and such Allied Nations as the council shall "from time to time determine, together with all ranks, both "past and present, of the W.R.N.S., A.T.S. and W.A.A.F., "and the corresponding services of the British Dominions, "Colonies, India and Allied Nations. (B) With a view to the "furtherance of the last-mentioned object, to undertake all or "any of the following activities, namely, (i) To conduct a welfare "and advice bureau. (ii) To conduct an employment agency. "(iii) To establish, own, maintain and conduct a residential club "or clubs for such persons as are mentioned in object (A), and "for the wives or husbands of such persons as the case may be, "and to provide a club-house or club-houses and all suitable "conveniences and amenities in connection therewith."

Paragraphs (C) to (I) of clause 3 set out objects relating to dealings in real and personal property, the undertaking and execution of trusts conducive to the objects of the association, the borrowing of and investment of money, the establishment and support or aid in the establishment and support of any charitable or benevolent associations or institutions, the provision of money for charitable or benevolent purposes connected with the purposes of the association or calculated to further its objects, and in all such things as were incidental or conducive to the attainment of the above objects or any of them.

It was contended by the association that its main objects were concerned with the advancement of social welfare within the meaning of section 8 (1) (a) of the Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955, and that it was accordingly entitled to the relief claimed.

It was contended by the rating authority that the main objects of the association were not such as were mentioned in section 8 (1) (a), and that the association was accordingly not entitled to the relief prescribed by section 8 (2).

Quarter sessions were of the opinion that the main objects of the association were not concerned with the advancement of social welfare within the meaning of section 8 (1) (a) and, accordingly, dismissed the appeal.

The association appealed.

J. Ramsay Willis Q.C., Alan Fletcher and Graham Eyre for the association.

J. T. Molony Q.C. and F. A. Amies for the rating authority.

The following cases were referred to in argument: Derbyshire Miners' Welfare Committee v. Skegness Urban District Council [2]; Working Men's Club and Institute Union Ltd. v. Swansea Corporation [3]; National Deposit Friendly Society Trustees v. Skegness Urban District Council [4]; Waterson v. Hendon Borough Council [5]; Independent Order of Oddfellows Manchester Unity Friendly Society v. Manchester Corporation [6]; and English Speaking Union v. Westminster City Council. [7]

LORD PARKER C.J. This is an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the County of London sitting as an appeals committee of quarter sessions of that county. The justices found that the appellants, Victory (Ex-Services) Association Ltd., were not

[2] [1958] 1 Q.B. 298; [1957] 1 W.L.R. 764; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 1048; [1957] 2 All E.R. 405; [1957] 3 All E.R. 692; [1959] A.C. 293; [1959] 2 W.L.R. 711; [1959] 2 All E.R. 258, H.L. (sub nom. Skegness Urban District Council v. Derbyshire Miners' Welfare Committee).

[3] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1197; [1959] 3 All E.R. 769.

[4] [1959] A.C. 293; [1958] 3 W.L.R. 172; [1958] 2 All E.R. 601.

[5] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 985; [1959] 2 All E.R. 760.

[6] [1958] 1 W.L.R. 1171; [1958] 3 All E.R. 378.

[7] (1959) 52 R. & I.T. 124.

1960

VICTORY (EX-SERVICES) ASSOCIATION LTD. v. PADDINGTON BOROUGH COUNCIL.

Lord Parker C.J.

entitled to the relief in regard to rates afforded by section 8 of the Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955.

The matter arises in this way: the appellants are a company limited by guarantee with no share capital, and were incorporated on February 7, 1947. In 1944 there had been a public appeal for money to form a fund to commemorate members of His Majesty's forces who had died in the last war, such memorial to take the form of a residential club in London which would be open to all ex-service members of such forces. A sum of over £300,000 was raised and the appellants, with that money, acquired premises at 73–79, Seymour Street, Marylebone, and opened the premises under the style of the Victory (Ex-Services) Club Ltd. in 1948. Those are the premises with which this appeal is concerned. The club was known as the Victory (Ex-Services) Club, and, with a few minor exceptions, membership of the club was restricted to ex-service men and ex-service women. Membership of the club entailed a payment of 10s. per head and a member of the club thereupon also became a member of the association. There are approximately 23,000 such members.

Apart from that part of the premises occupied as a club there is a part where the appellants provide a welfare advice bureau and employment agency. That part of the premises is open to all ex-service men and women without charge, whether or not they are members of the club or members of the association. The area of the premises made available for the club is, according to the findings in the case, considerably larger than that part used for the advice bureau and the employment agency.

The appeals committee found that the appellants were not entitled to relief, and they dismissed the appeal.

This is yet another of the many cases that have come before the courts of recent years under this section 8. The relevant words for the purposes of the present appeal are as follows: "This "section applies to the following hereditaments, that is to say— "(a) any hereditament occupied for the purposes of an organisa- "tion (whether corporate or unincorporate) which is not "established or conducted for profit and whose main objects"— and the relevant words—"are charitable or are otherwise con- "cerned with the advancement of . . . social welfare."

Certain matters are quite clear and are agreed in this case. The appellants were the occupiers of the hereditament. The hereditament was occupied for the purposes of the appellants. The appellants are a corporate organisation and they are not established or conducted for profit. Accordingly, the sole question in this case is whether they are an organisation whose main objects are the advancement of social welfare. Their activities are fully set out in the case, to many of which I have referred, though not in detail; but before one ever comes to a consideration of their activities, it seems to me that one must look at their objects. Prima facie, where an association has a written constitution setting out its objects, it is to the written constitution that one must look to see what are the objects and what are the main objects. Of course, if there is any ambiguity, it would be right to look to see what in practice the organisation concerned was doing, what their activities were in fact. It is true that in the first case which came before the courts and went to the House of Lords, namely, the National Deposit Friendly Society v. Skegness Urban District Council,[1] Lord Denning, in the course of his speech, said[2]: "But in order to ascertain the 'main objects' "of an organisation, you are entitled, I think, to look not only "at its rules but also to consider the way in which it has "conducted its affairs." That is a very wide and general statement, but as far as I know that has never been the approach except in the case of an ambiguity, or in a case such as arose in Working Men's Club and Institute Union Ltd. v. Swansea Corporation.[3] There the position was that an organisation, formed a very long time ago, in 1862, had, by the time when the rating authority sought to levy rates, changed its activities very considerably, and it is to be observed that Morris L.J. said[4]: "The "objects of the union are set out in rule 2, which I have read. "Those objects are numerous and diverse. In considering the "applicability of section 8 it becomes necessary to ascertain "which are the 'main objects.' In my judgment, this cannot "be discovered merely by reading rule 2 or by construing rule 2. "It was legitimate, therefore, to consider the way in which the "union has conducted its affairs. It may be that an organisation "will have numerous declared objects which over many years will "remain its objects, but that in one period one or more of such "objects will be the 'main' ones, while in another period "other objects will be the 'main' ones."

In the present case, however, as I have said, this company was incorporated in 1947, and there is no suggestion in the case that its original objects have in practice changed. Accordingly, for my part, I think that the proper approach to this matter is to look, at any rate in the first instance, at the written constitution and only to look at the activities if there is any ambiguity in the objects expressed in the constitution. Clause 3 of the memorandum of association provides: "The objects for which the "association is established are," and then a number of objects (A) to (I) are set out. I think it is only necessary for me to read (A) and (B). They are in these terms: "(A) To promote com-"radeship between and improve the condition and welfare of all "ranks, both past and present, of the Navy, Army and Air Forces "of the United Kingdom, British Dominions, Colonies, India, "and such Allied Nations as the council shall from time to time "determine, together with all ranks, both past and present, of "the W.R.N.S., A.T.S. and W.A.A.F., and the corresponding "services of the British Dominions, Colonies, India and Allied

[1] [1959] A.C. 293; [1958] 3 W.L.R. 172; [1958] 2 All E.R. 601.
[2] [1959] A.C. 293, 320.
[3] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1197; [1959] 3 All E.R. 769.
[4] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1197, 1201.

1960

VICTORY (EX-SERVICES) ASSOCIATION LTD. v. PADDINGTON BOROUGH COUNCIL.

Lord Parker C.J.

"Nations. (B) With a view to the furtherance of the last-"mentioned object, to undertake all or any of the following "activities, namely:—(i) to conduct a welfare and advice bureau; "(ii) to conduct an employment agency; (iii) to establish, own, "maintain and conduct a residential club or clubs for such "persons as are mentioned in object (A), and for the wives or "husbands of such persons as the case may be, and to provide a "club-house or club-houses and all suitable conveniences and "amenities in connection therewith." I do not read the so-called objects set out in (C) to (I) because I think that it is clear, and, indeed, I think counsel admitted, that those are not objects in the true sense but are merely means by which the objects shall be carried out. It also seems to me that 3 (B) is also a means of carrying out the object expressed in (A) because it begins with the words "With a view to the furtherance of the last-"mentioned object." Though the words that follow may be of relevance in construing (A), they are not in themselves, in my judgment, an object. The main object or objects are, I think, to be found in paragraph 3 (A), and they are in these words: "To promote comradeship between and improve the condition "and welfare of all ranks, both past and present," broadly speaking, of the past and present members of the forces of the Crown throughout the Commonwealth. It seems to me that the class of persons whom it is intended to benefit is clearly of a sufficiently large and of sufficient public character to enable it to be said that the words "advancement of social welfare" if otherwise applicable, apply. It is also, I think, clear that in so far as it is necessary, there is here an element of altruism since the funds of the association were raised by voluntary gifts. The sole question, as I see it, is whether it is proper to say that the words "to promote comradeship between and improve the con-"dition and welfare of all ranks, both past and present" of members of the forces can properly be said to be the advancement of social welfare.

Mr. Molony has said that the object in paragraph 3 (A) is not a single object but that there are two objects, first, to promote comradeship between the members of the forces, and, secondly, to improve the condition and welfare of those members. He said that whereas it may be that an object to improve the condition and welfare of members of the forces may be capable of coming within the words "advancement of social welfare," an object which exists solely to promote comradeship between those members cannot be said to be the advancement of social welfare, and that, however praiseworthy such an object may be, it is not an advancement of social welfare within the meaning of the section. Of course one must be careful in these cases to apply, as indeed one always should, a strict construction, and it would be quite wrong to say that the appellants' objects are very worthy objects, and to try and stretch the words to give them relief, because in so far as they are relieved the burden will fall upon others, namely, the ratepayers in Paddington. It is purely a question of construction as to whether those words can be brought within the words of the statute, "the advancement of "social welfare."

For my part, I think that there is only one object and a composite object in paragraph 3 (A). It is not divided up. It is framed in a composite form, "to promote comradeship between "and improve the condition and welfare of" all ranks of the forces. Read as a composite whole, I can see no reason why those words do not aptly describe the concept of the advancement of social welfare, and I think that some help is to be gained from the activities which it is envisaged will be used for the furtherance of the object contained in that composite phrase. Under paragraph 3 (B) the activities contemplated are the conducting of a welfare and advice bureau, an employment agency, a residential club and amenities, and it seems to me that read as a whole those words in paragraph 3 (A) can properly be construed as having the object of the advancement of social welfare.

It has been said in some of the cases that the conception is that there should be an activity which benefits the needy but, in my judgment, the reference to the needy in such a concept does not necessarily mean those in need financially. It seems to me that, in dealing with the vast number of people who, as the result of the many wars are now ex-service men, and those who are at present serving in the forces, there is a need for the sort of activities which this association propose to carry out and has, in fact, carried out with the object of promoting comradeship and improving the condition and welfare of all ranks. In my opinion, the association fully qualifies for the relief provided by section 8 of the Act. Accordingly, I find it unnecessary to go to a further stage and consider the activities of the association, or to consider what are the main or subsidiary activities of the association. It is sufficient to say that they are activities which were contemplated by the memorandum of association as a means whereby the objects expressed in paragraph 3 (A) should be carried out.

So far as the case is concerned, there is no finding of fact which is binding upon this court and would force me to come to a different conclusion. The appeals committee very properly set out the facts of the case. They do not find affirmatively what they consider is the main object, but that, as I said, is at any rate in this case, a pure question of the construction of the memorandum of association, and all that they hold is that, as a matter of opinion, the objects, whatever they are, are not concerned with the advancement of social welfare. In my judgment, the appeals committee came to a wrong decision; the main objects of the association are concerned with the advancement of social welfare, and, accordingly, this appeal should be allowed.

1960

VICTORY (EX-SERVICES) ASSOCIATION LTD. v. PADDINGTON BOROUGH COUNCIL.

CASSELS J. I agree.

ASHWORTH J. I also agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Speechly, Mumford & Soames; W. H. Bentley, Town Clerk, Paddington.

J. F. L.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1960
Jan. 27.

* PRACTICE DIRECTION (COSTS).

Costs—Taxation—Order for—Form—Chancery Division—Originating summons—Construction of document or variation of trust.

The following precedent of an order for the taxation and payment of costs has been approved by the judges of the Chancery Division for use on an application by originating summons for the construction of a document or under the Variation of Trusts Act, 1958, or other like application:

"IT IS ORDERED that it be referred to the taxing master:

"FIRST to tax the costs of an incidental to the said application of the plaintiffs the trustees of the said will:

"SECONDLY to tax on the common fund basis the costs of the defendants of and incidental to the said application, and

"THIRDLY to tax on the common fund basis the costs to which the said Legal Aid and Advice Act applies and which have been incurred on behalf of the defendant A B.

"AND IT IS ORDERED that the first and secondly mentioned costs be respectively retained and paid out of the fund held by the plaintiffs upon the trusts of the said will."

Note: Sub-rule (2) of rule 1 of the Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959, contains the following definition:

"'Costs' includes fees, charges, disbursements, expenses and remuneration."

J. B. H. WYMAN,
Chief Registrar,
Chancery Division.

January 27, 1960.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

* REGINA v. GOVERNOR OF PARKHURST PRISON. Ex parte PHILPOT.

1959 Dec. 11.

Lord Parker C.J., Hilbery and Pearson JJ.

Criminal Law—Practice—Sentence—Preventive detention—Prison Commissioners' report—Copy of report not shown to prisoner—Effect on sentence—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 58), s. 21 (4), (5).

Statute—Construction—Directory or obligatory—Procedural requirement — Whether condition precedent to effective order — Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21 (4), (5).

The applicant, who was sentenced in 1953 to a term of preventive detention, applied for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that, before being sentenced, no copy of the Prison Commissioners' report had been given to him or to his counsel or solicitor as required by section 21 (5) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948 [1]:—

Held, that it was a well-known principle that the court did not in the ordinary way grant a writ of habeas corpus to a person who was serving a sentence passed by a court of competent jurisdiction, but assuming that the court had jurisdiction to entertain the application, section 21 (5) of the Act of 1948 was directive and not imperative, and did not make the handing of such a report to the prisoner a condition precedent to a sentence of preventive detention.

Rex v. Dickson [1950] 1 K.B. 394; 65 T.L.R. 749; [1949] 2 All E.R. 810 explained.

APPLICATION for writ of habeas corpus.

On July 10, 1953, the applicant, John Philpot, was convicted at Worcester County Quarter Sessions, together with two other persons, of attempted shopbreaking, and was sentenced to a term of nine years' preventive detention. The applicant, who was detained in Parkhurst Prison, applied for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the Home Secretary and the Governor of Parkhurst Prison on the ground that before the passing of the sentence of preventive detention upon him, no copy of the Prison Commissioners' report was handed to him or to his counsel or solicitor, as was required by section 21 (5) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948.

Neil Butter for the applicant.

J. R. Cumming-Bruce for the Governor of Parkhurst Prison.

[Reported by A. H. BRAY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

[1] Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 21: "(4) Before sentencing any "offender to . . . preventive detention, the court shall consider any "report or representations which may "be made to the court by or on behalf "of the Prison Commissioners. . . . "(5) A copy of any report or representations in writing made to the "court by the Prison Commissioners "for the purposes of the last foregoing "subsection shall be given by the "court to the offender or his counsel "or solicitor."

1959

REGINA
v.
GOVERNOR OF PARKHURST
PRISON.
Ex parte
PHILPOT.

The following cases were cited in argument, in addition to those referred to in the judgments: Reg. v. Evans[2]; Reg. v. Dunn[3]; Reg. v. Newton[4]; Ex parte Lees[5]; In re Corke.[6]

LORD PARKER C.J. In these proceedings Mr. Butter moves for a writ of habeas corpus on behalf of one Joseph Philpot now undergoing imprisonment in Her Majesty's Prison at Parkhurst. The applicant was sentenced as long ago as July 10, 1953, to a term of preventive detention following on his conviction with two other persons of attempted shopbreaking. His complaint, which he has been voicing from time to time since 1954, is that he was not shown a copy of the Prison Commissioners' report.

Let me say at once that there are many difficulties in his way in this application. For one thing, it is almost impossible for this court to say with any certainty today whether, on a certain day in 1953, a copy of the Prison Commissioners' report was or was not handed to him or to his legal representative, although it appears from the affidavit evidence that, in fact, a report was made. Secondly, it is a well-known principle that this court does not in the ordinary way grant a writ of habeas corpus to persons who are in execution, that is to say, persons who are serving sentences passed by courts of competent jurisdiction: see, in particular, the judgment of the Divisional Court in In re Featherstone.[1] I will assume, however, for the purposes of these proceedings that no report of the Prison Commissioners was ever served on or given to the applicant or his legal representative, and I will also assume that, contrary to what my impression is at the moment, this court has jurisdiction to entertain the application.

Section 21 (5) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, provides: "A copy of any report or representations in writing made to the "court by the Prison Commissioners for the purposes of the last "foregoing subsection shall be given by the court to the offender "or his counsel or solicitor."

The sole question, and the short question, is whether the words "shall be given" in section 21 (5) are merely directed to the procedure which should be followed, or whether they are imperative and are making it a condition precedent to a sentence of preventive detention that the copy should be given. I am quite satisfied that those words are directed only to the procedure to be followed. They are, as it seems to me, in direct contrast to the words used in section 23, which provides for a notice being served of the intention to prove previous convictions. There the words used are: "No account shall be taken of any previous conviction "or sentence unless notice has been given to the offender . . ." In other words, the subsection is making it abundantly clear that the qualifying convictions which are necessary before a sentence

[2] [1957] 1 Q.B. 35; [1956] 3 W.L.R. 978; [1956] 3 All E.R. 750.
[3] (1847) 12 Q.B. 1026.
[4] (1855) 24 L.J.Q.B. 246.
[5] (1860) E.B. & E. 828.
[6] [1954] 1 W.L.R. 899; [1954] 2 All E.R. 440.
[1] (1953) 37 Cr.App.R. 146.

of preventive detention is given cannot be given in evidence at all unless a condition precedent is complied with, namely, the serving of the requisite notice.

Reliance, however, was put on the decision of the Court of Criminal Appeal in Rex v. Dickson.[2] In that case the prisoner was sentenced to 10 years' preventive detention, but no evidence had been given that the notice had been served upon him. It had, in fact, been served on him and his signature had been obtained to it, but at the trial no evidence was given that it had been served, nor was his signature proved, nor was he asked whether he admitted the convictions set out in it. The decision in Rex v. Dickson relates, as I read it, solely to the question of the section 23 notice. It is true that in the statement of the facts,[3] it is said that the appeal was on the question of the alleged failure to carry out the requirements of section 21, that is, the handing of the Prison Commissioners' report. It is quite clear, however, from reading the arguments and the judgment that that is a mistake, and the appeal was on the sole ground of the alleged failure at the trial to carry out the requirements of section 23. However, there is no doubt that in giving the judgment of the court, Lord Goddard C.J. did use words which, taken out of their context, would appear to convey that section 21 (5) was imperative, and was something which had to be done before a prisoner qualified for and could be sentenced to preventive detention. It is only perhaps necessary to refer to one passage, where he says[4]: "The "court thinks that this is a good opportunity for stating what is "the proper procedure to be adopted by all courts, concerning "proof of the matters necessary to qualify a prisoner to receive "a sentence of corrective training or preventive detention." He then goes on to say that that procedure should include the handing to the prisoner of the report of the Prison Commissioners. The truth of the matter, as I see it, is that this is merely a decision in regard to section 23, but that an opportunity was there taken by Lord Goddard to say what was the proper procedure as a matter of routine in regard to copies of the Prison Commissioners' report. I am quite satisfied that he was not treating or intending to treat section 21 (5) as setting out a condition precedent to a sentence of preventive detention.

I should add that the same view was taken by Glyn-Jones J. in Kinally v. Home Office[5] where, in regard to Lord Goddard's judgment, he said: "By those words"—that is, after quoting the passage in the judgment—"Lord Goddard was not laying down "conditions precedent to jurisdiction, he was merely giving "directions as to a businesslike way of complying with the proper "procedure laid down by the statute." I entirely agree. That, however, does not mean that the provisions of the subsection should not be complied with. Indeed, in Dickson's case,[6] and

[2] [1950] 1 K.B. 394; 65 T.L.R. 749; [1949] 2 All E.R. 810.
[3] [1950] 1 K.B. 394, 395.
[4] Ibid. 397.
[5] The Times, July 25, 1959.
[6] [1950] 1 K.B. 394.

1959

REGINA
v.
GOVERNOR OF PARKHURST
PRISON.
Ex parte
PHILPOT.

Lord Parker
C.J.

again more recently in the Court of Criminal Appeal in a Practice Note,[7] this court has been anxiously concerned to see that a procedure is adopted whereby the handing of the Prison Commissioners' report or, in the case of Borstal, the Borstal Commissioners' report, is recorded in some way on the shorthand note. The point is constantly being taken by prisoners that a copy was never given to them or to their legal representatives, and, unless there is something recorded on the transcript it is almost impossible for the court to say whether it was done or not. But neither Dickson's case [8] nor the Practice Note [9] are in any way authorities for saying that section 21 (5) is a condition precedent to a sentence of preventive detention.

The matter is, I think, made even clearer when one realises that it is not in every case that there has to be a Prison Commissioners' report. Section 21 (4) merely says that before sentencing any offender to corrective training or preventive detention the court shall consider any report or representations which may be made to the court by or on behalf of the Prison Commissioners. In a case where a report of that sort is not of itself a condition precedent to a sentence of preventive detention, it seems to me all the less reason for saying that the handing of a copy to the prisoner is itself a condition precedent. Accordingly, in my judgment, this application fails and should be dismissed.

HILBERY J. I agree. I only add a word or two because I was a member of the court in Rex v. Dickson [10] when Lord Goddard C.J., giving the judgment of the court, referred to the handing of a copy of the Prison Commissioners' report and when it should take place. In that case, if the argument is looked at, it is perfectly clear, and it is in accordance with my recollection, that the whole case depended upon a contention that there was no evidence that the notice of an intention to prove previous convictions was served on the appellant, and that the provisions of section 23 (1) had not been observed. It was urged that in the absence of an admission of those previous convictions by the accused, the determination of the question whether those previous convictions had been suffered by the accused would have to be left to a jury. If the argument is looked at, it will be seen that for the Crown Mr. Fay admitted that there was certainly no evidence that the notice had been served on the appellant. The whole case turned on whether the service of the notice of intention to prove previous convictions required by section 23 was a condition precedent to a sentence of preventive detention or corrective training being passed. It is perfectly true that the court gave a direction as to the procedure which should be followed, but I think it is not unimportant to observe that, in giving that direction, if Lord Goddard's language is looked at carefully it will be

[7] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 849; [1959] 2 All E.R. 734; sub nom. Reg. v. Wintle, 43 Cr.App.R. 191.

[8] [1950] 1 K.B. 394.

[9] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 849.

[10] [1950] 1 K.B. 394.

seen that in the first part of it he deals with matters that require proof. He said [11]: "The court thinks that this is a good opportunity for stating what is the proper procedure to be adopted by all courts, concerning proof of the matters necessary to qualify a prisoner to receive a sentence of corrective training or preventive detention." He is dealing with proof of matters necessary to qualify and the procedure to be adopted concerning proof of those matters, and then he says [12]: "After a plea or verdict of guilty has been returned a police officer should be called by counsel for the prosecution to prove that he served a notice on the prisoner, as provided by section 23 (1), three days before the trial. When that has been proved, the clerk of assize or the clerk of the peace, as the case may be, should then put the contents of that notice to the prisoner and obtain his admission or his denial of the convictions in open court; generally speaking, it will be an admission that he has had the previous convictions." There he is dealing with the matters which must be proved. Then he gave a direction, and I think, speaking as one of the court, clearly intending, as I for my part certainly intended, that it should be read and understood as a direction that a copy of the Prison Commissioners' report should be handed to the prisoner. Stress is laid on the word "must," but I think it was never meant to imply any more than that as a matter of procedure and no more, that course is to be adopted. I think that explanation, if explanation is needed, is all I need add to what has fallen from my Lord, and I only ventured to add it as I was a member of the court in giving the judgment in Dickson's case.

It has been called to our attention that in Kinally v. Home Office [13] Glyn-Jones J. clearly indicated that that was the right interpretation of the judgment in Rex v. Dickson,[14] and what Lord Goddard intended to convey. I agree that this application fails, but I desire to emphasise that we are assuming for the purpose of giving this judgment that the application could be made although the prisoner is in execution.

PEARSON J. I agree and have nothing to add.

Application dismissed.

Solicitors: Official Solicitor; Treasury Solicitor.

[11] [1950] 1 K.B. 394, 397.
[12] Ibid.
[13] The Times, July 25, 1959.
[14] [1950] 1 K.B. 394.

[LEEDS ASSIZES.]

1959
Dec. 14, 15.

Wrangham J.

* McKINLEY v. McKINLEY.

Husband and Wife—Justices—Clerk—Note of evidence by—Whether privileged.

Practice—Note of evidence—Right of party to—Matrimonial proceedings—Note of clerk to justices—Required for divorce suit—Right to subpoena clerk.

Evidence—Privilege—Justices' clerk—Note of evidence in other proceedings.

In 1955 a wife unsuccessfully took proceedings against her husband before a stipendiary magistrate, and the assistant to the magistrates' clerk took a shorthand note of the evidence in those proceedings. The husband now petitioned against her for divorce in the High Court and the wife wished to adduce in the divorce proceedings evidence of what had occurred in the former proceedings before the magistrate, and issued subpoenas against both the clerk and his assistant to attend and bring with them a transcript of those proceedings and the relevant notebooks. On the application of the clerk the district registrar ordered that the subpoenas be set aside on the grounds that the clerk was a privileged person, and that the notes of evidence were privileged documents. It was conceded that the clerk would be able to give relevant and admissible evidence. From this order the wife appealed:—

Held, that there was no rule which prevented a magistrates' clerk from being compelled to attend and give evidence in divorce proceedings if there was any relevant or admissible evidence which he could give and the subpoena to the assistant should stand, but only to order him to bring his note.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL from the district registrar at Kingston-upon-Hull heard in open court.

In 1955 the appellant wife, Lily McKinley, took proceedings against her husband, Alfred McKinley, before the stipendiary magistrate at Kingston-upon-Hull on the grounds of cruelty and desertion which proceedings, after a three-day hearing, were dismissed. Charles Phillips, the assistant to the magistrates' clerk, took a shorthand note of those proceedings. The appellant's husband now instituted divorce proceedings against her in the Kingston-upon-Hull District Registry of the High Court on the ground of her desertion. The appellant was defending these proceedings and was herself asking for relief on the grounds of her husband's cruelty and desertion, and she wished to be able to adduce evidence of what occurred before the stipendiary magistrate. She therefore issued against the magistrates' clerk, Thomas Arthur Doubleday, and the assistant, Phillips, subpoenas ad testificandum and duces tecum requiring them to bring to the hearing of the divorce suit a certified transcript of the 1955 proceedings with five copies for the court and the relevant shorthand notebooks. The clerk and his assistant applied to have the subpoenas set aside and by their affidavits claimed (inter alia) that the documents were privileged documents. On November 20, 1959, the district registrar ordered the subpoenas to be set aside, and from this order the wife now appealed.

[Reported by G. M. SMAILES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Rudolph Lyons Q.C. and H. Ognall (A. M. Hurwitz with them) for the appellant.

John McLusky for the magistrates' clerk and his assistant.

The following cases were referred to in argument which are not mentioned in the judgment: Padley v. Padley [1]; In re S. (An Infant) [2]; Ainsworth v. Wilding [3]; Rawstone v. Preston Corporation [4]; Ward v. Shellmex and B.P. Ltd. [5]

Wrangham J. This is an appeal against the decision of the district registrar at Kingston-upon-Hull setting aside two subpoenas issued to the clerk to the Kingston-upon-Hull justices and his assistant. It raises an important question of general interest and has, therefore, on the application of the parties, been argued in open court.

The relative facts are not very clearly set out in the affidavits—I think because, until the hearing, the nature of the real issues between the parties was not completely apprehended; but they are not really in dispute and the basis on which this appeal should be decided has been agreed between the parties here. The relevant facts are these: the appellant is the respondent in divorce proceedings in which her husband is petitioning on the ground of her desertion; in 1955 there were proceedings before the stipendiary magistrate for Kingston-upon-Hull against her husband on the grounds of his cruelty and desertion. After a three-day hearing those proceedings were dismissed. She now wishes to be able to adduce, in the divorce proceedings, evidence of what occurred in the magistrates' court. There is no doubt that she would herself be able to give evidence of what her husband said before the magistrate, and of any other matters that occurred there, provided that they were admissible in the divorce proceedings—if, of course, she could remember them. But far more reliable evidence on the same lines of what took place before the magistrate could be procured from the magistrates' clerk, not because he has a better memory but because he has got a note from which his memory can be refreshed. The note is one which he is under a duty to take for use in connection with appeals (see the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957 (S.I. 1957, No. 619), r. 73 (3)); so it is bound to be in existence. The note is not directed by any rule to be supplied to parties in divorce proceedings, and parties in divorce proceedings have, in my

[1] [1954] P. 302; [1953] 3 W.L.R. 834; [1953] 2 All E.R. 1197.
[2] The Times, Nov. 18, 1959.
[3] [1900] 2 Ch. 315.
[4] (1885) 30 Ch.D. 116; 52 L.T. 922.
[5] [1952] 1 K.B. 280; [1951] 2 T.L.R. 976; [1951] 2 All E.R. 904.

1959

McKINLEY
v.
McKINLEY.

Wrangham J.

judgment, no right to have that note produced to them; but the fact that the note must exist because, for another purpose, it is directed to be taken, is nevertheless a fact of prime importance in this particular appeal. Otherwise, the appeal, which might be equally good in law, would be of less value in practice. In those circumstances there can be no doubt that the clerk would be competent to give, on behalf of the appellant, evidence which would be relevant and admissible, and which could not be excluded on any ground of State privilege or legal professional privilege.

With certain exceptions, such as the Sovereign and others which it is not necessary to mention, all competent witnesses are compellable; and all compellable witnesses can, of course, be ordered to attend court by a subpoena issued under R.S.C., Ord. 37, r. 20. It appears from Rex v. Baines,[1] which has not actually been cited to me, but of which I have some recollection, that a subpoena issued to a potential witness can be set aside on the ground that it is oppressive because the witness has not in fact any admissible evidence which he is in a position to give; but it cannot be set aside on the ground of the status of the witness, even though that status may be very high, unless he is within the category of specific exceptions, none of which, save perhaps one which I am going to discuss in a moment, applies to this case.

The contention on behalf of the magistrates' clerk, the respondent to this appeal, is that it would be oppressive to compel him to attend court for a variety of reasons. He does not give as a reason that he would be unable to give relevant or admissible evidence; on the contrary, it is, and it must be, conceded that he would be able to give relevant and admissible evidence. It might turn out to be valuable; it might turn out not to be valuable; as to that, I have no means of judging. It is sufficient that it would be admissible and relevant. The first reason on which he relies in his affidavit is that attendance at court would be a serious interruption of his public duty as clerk to the magistrates. That may very well be true, but the law does not recognise it as an excuse for failure to attend as a witness. Attendance as a witness commonly involves serious interruption of private or public business. Nevertheless, the law requires such attendance unless there is some other reason for exemption.

The second and more substantial reason is, it is contended, that he is a privileged person and that his notes are privileged documents. There is some authority that judges of the superior courts should not be compelled to give evidence of what takes place in cases tried before them. In Reg. v. Gazard[2] in 1838, Patteson J., before whom a question had been raised as to whether the chairman of quarter sessions should be examined by a grand jury as a witness upon a matter into which the grand jury were inquiring, said: "It is a new point, but I should advise the grand jury not to

[1] [1909] 1 K.B. 258; 25 T.L.R. 79; 21 Cox C.C. 756; 100 L.T. 78.

[2] 8 C. & P. 595.

"examine him. He is the president of a court of record, and it "would be dangerous to allow such an examination, as the judges "of England might be called upon to state what occurred before "them in court." And later in the case, in reference to another case cited before him, in which it was stated that this same thing had been done, he said [3]: "I think it is wrong, and it ought not to be done." It is clear, therefore, that in 1838 Patteson J. took the view that the judges of England ought not to be compelled to give evidence of what had taken place before them in court.

In 1844, in Reg. v. Morgan,[4] Gurney B. was clearly contemplating, as a proper possibility, the calling of a magistrate as a witness to testify to what had happened before the magistrates in a judicial or semi-judicial proceeding. In another case, also called Reg. v. Morgan [5] in 1852, the matter was carried a little further by Martin B., who said in terms that if a county court judge had been served with a subpoena to attend a trial as a witness in order to prove, apparently, the evidence given by somebody before him in a case that he had tried, he could have been compelled to go; adding that there was in that particular case no necessity to subpoena him.

In 1858, in Reg. v. Harvey,[6] the distinction implicit in the difference between what Patteson J. had said in 1838, and what had been said by Gurney B. and Martin B. in the two cases called Reg. v. Morgan,[7] became more obvious, for in that case Byles J. said that judges of the superior courts ought not, of course, to be called upon to produce their notes, and added that, if he were to be subpoenaed for such a purpose he would certainly refuse to appear. One must assume that what Byles J. meant by that was that he would in such a case apply to set aside the subpoena, and that in his view such an application would, or ought to, succeed; in other words, that he would be perhaps a competent, but certainly not a compellable witness. He went on to say that the same objection was not applicable to the judges of the inferior courts; the inferior court in question in this case being the county court. He saw no reason why they should not be called and especially where, as in that case, the judge was willing to appear. It seems, therefore, that in the middle of the nineteenth century, at any rate, the general view was that the judges of superior courts—that is to say the courts which now have become the High Court—were competent no doubt, but not compellable; but that all other judges, except presumably chairmen of quarter sessions, were both competent and compellable.

In Ramlochan v. The Queen,[8] in 1956, the Privy Council, upon an appeal from the Court of Criminal Appeal of Trinidad and Tobago, held that upon his second trial for the offence, the

[3] 8 C. & P. 595.
[4] 1 Cox C.C. 109.
[5] 6 Cox C.C. 107.
[6] 8 Cox C.C. 99.
[7] 1 Cox C.C. 109; 6 Cox C.C. 107.
[8] [1956] A.C. 475; [1956] 3 W.L.R. 117; [1956] 2 All E.R. 577.

1959

McKINLEY
v.
McKINLEY.

Wrangham J.

accused person could not as of right demand to see the judge's notes of evidence of the first trial; and that, perhaps, implied that he could not have caused a subpoena to be issued to the judge to testify with the aid of those notes. The position as it existed in the middle of the nineteenth century is, therefore, consistent with the latest decision in 1956, and is also, I think, consistent with the decision in Duke of Buccleuch v. Metropolitan Board of Works,[9] where the matter is discussed by Cleasby B.[10]

The only other authority on this that I know of is the unreported case, the name of which I believe to be Dawson v. Dawson[11]; but I have not had the advantage of seeing any report of the case, which does not, I understand, appear in any of the official law reports. I was given some information about the case from which it appears, assuming as I do that the information is correct, that the Master of the Rolls, in holding that the magistrates' clerk's notes of proceedings before the magistrates cannot be admitted in divorce proceedings under the Evidence Act, 1938, pointed out that other proper proceedings could be taken to prove that which it was being sought to prove by such production. The inference seems to be, if not irresistible at least very tempting, that what the Master of the Rolls was contemplating, although he did not say so in terms, was evidence from the magistrates' clerk; and if he had thought that it was undesirable that magistrates' clerks should come to give evidence with the aid of their notes as to what had taken place before the magistrates, it seems to me to be highly probable that in that case he would have said so.

The conclusion at which I have arrived after consideration of the authorities, is that there is no rule which prevents a magistrates' clerk from being compelled to attend and give evidence in a divorce proceeding if there is any relevant or admissible evidence which he can give; and that where he has evidence which he can give with the aid of his notes as to the proceedings which have taken place between the same parties upon the same or very similar issues, there is no reason why he should not be compelled to come and give such evidence. That, I think, disposes of the point which is really at issue between these parties in this appeal.

Two matters remain to be disposed of. First, it is highly likely that the magistrates' clerk, in order to avoid the necessity of coming to give evidence on subpoena in the circumstances which I have described, will provide the parties with his note, or a transcript of his note if it was in shorthand, before the divorce proceedings actually come on, in the hope that the note will be agreed between the parties to be an accurate record of what took place so that his attendance at the Divorce Court can be dispensed with. That is a practice which has been widespread and well recognised, and of fairly long standing. Whether it is desirable that rules should be made to define more clearly the position of the magistrates' clerks, the rights of parties in divorce proceedings, and the production of the magistrates' clerk's notes before the proceedings are actually heard or at any particular stage, is a matter which falls to be considered not by me, but by those who are in charge of such matters, and about that I express no opinion. It may also be that the burden upon magistrates' clerks of supplying notes or attending court is so heavy that some form of administrative readjustment will be necessary. That, again, is not a matter for me.

[9] (1872) L.R. 5 H.L. 418; 27 L.T. 1.

[10] L.R. 5 H.L. 418, 433.

[11] Unreported, C.A., May 20, 1955.

The second matter that has to be disposed of is the form of the subpoena which, in my judgment, should be allowed in these proceedings. For reasons into which it is not now necessary to enter in detail, the appellant in these proceedings issued the subpoenas both to the magistrates' clerk at Kingston-upon-Hull and to his assistant. It was his assistant who in fact acted as clerk to the stipendiary magistrate on the occasion upon which the relevant proceedings were heard.

If the clerk to the magistrates had thought fit to reveal to the appellant that a note of the proceedings existed in his possession, but that it would be handed to the assistant if the assistant were to be compelled to come to court I do not think that the appellant ever would have issued any subpoena to the clerk to the magistrates. As it is, it is now plain that the subpoenas to the clerk to the magistrates have become unnecessary—although I do not say they were unnecessary at the beginning. The subpoenas should therefore be set aside. The subpoenas to the assistant should stand and should stand subject to any argument about their form.

[His Lordship stated that, in his opinion, the assistant could not be compelled to bring five copies of his notes to court but only the notes which existed. The subpoena duces tecum against the assistant should be amended to order him to bring with him and produce his note of the proceedings.]

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Pearlman & Rosen, Hull; Williamsons, Hull.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

* PRACTICE DIRECTION (COSTS).

1960
Jan. 22.

Probate—Costs—Taxation—Bill to show item numbers—Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959 (R.S.C. (No. 3), 1959 (S.I. 1959, No. 1958), Sch. 2), Appendix 2.

Husband and Wife — Practice — Costs — Taxation — Bill to show item numbers—Supreme Court Costs Rules, 1959 (R.S.C. (No. 3) 1959 (S.I. 1959, No. 1958), Sch. 2), Appendix 2.

1960

PRACTICE DIRECTION (COSTS).

Bills drawn for taxation under Appendix 2 to the Supreme Court Costs Rules should show the item number in the Appendix under which each item of the bill is charged.

B. LONG,
Senior Registrar.

January 22, 1960.

[Note: This Direction will be included in the Compendium.]

[COURT OF APPEAL,]

C. A.

1959
Dec. 16.

Willmer and Harman L.JJ.

*DAWS v. DAILY SKETCH AND DAILY GRAPHIC LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[1959 D. No. 167.]

DARKE AND OTHERS v. SAME.

[1959 D. No. 848.]

Practice and Procedure—Consolidation of actions—Libel—Whether order for consolidation can be made on summons for directions in second action—Discretion—Principles of exercise.

On February 5, 1959, a police officer issued a writ for libel against the proprietors of a newspaper and the author of an article published in it. After the summons for directions had been taken out a second action was started, on June 25, against the same defendants in respect of the same article by a group of police officers who were associated with the plaintiff in the first action. The defences to the two actions were not the same. The same solicitors acted for the plaintiffs in both actions; those solicitors were informed that on the summons for directions in the second action the defendants were going to apply for an order consolidating the two actions, but no summons in the first action was issued. The master refused the application but on appeal the judge made an order consolidating the actions. The plaintiffs appealed:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that it was a fatal objection to the order consolidating the actions that it was made in the second action, and purported to direct how the first action should proceed without a summons being issued in the first action. Moreover, in the circumstances, there was not a common question of law or fact bearing sufficient importance in proportion to the rest of the action to render it desirable that the whole of the matters should be disposed of at the same time, and, accordingly, the judge had erred in principle in the exercise of his discretion.

Dictum of Scrutton L.J. in Horwood v. Statesman Publishing Co. (1929) 98 L.J.K.B. 450, 453; 45 T.L.R. 237 applied.

APPLICATION for leave to appeal out of time.

On January 22, 1959, the Daily Sketch and Daily Graphic Ltd. published an article by Peter Duffy. On February 5 Edmund

---

[Reported by Miss EIRA CARYL-THOMAS, Barrister-at-Law.]

Walter Daws, an officer in the metropolitan police force, issued a writ alleging that he had been libelled in the article. The statement of claim was delivered on February 27, the defence on March 31, and there was a summons for directions in May. On June 25 a second action was started against the same defendants in respect of the same article by Norman John Horatio Darke, Eric John Wallace, Stanley Wilfred Wheal, James Rennie Norman and George Stretton Downes, who were officers associated with Daws in the same department of the metropolitan police. In both actions there was a denial by the defence that the words were defamatory. In the first action the only other defence was as to damages, and included an allegation that an offer was made to publish an apology; in the second action there was an issue raised as to whether the words complained of referred to, or were capable of referring to, the plaintiffs or to any of them, and an issue as to damages but with no reference to any offer of an apology.

The same solicitors acted for the plaintiffs in both actions, and they were informed that the defendants were going to apply for an order consolidating the two actions on the summons for directions in the second action. No summons in the first action was issued. On October 22 Master Harwood refused the application, but on October 30, Havers J. allowed an appeal from the order of Master Harwood and made an order in the second action consolidating the two actions.

The plaintiffs applied for leave to appeal out of time against the order made by Havers J. At the hearing before the Court of Appeal the application was granted and the hearing was treated as the appeal, the plaintiffs alleging, inter alia, that the judge had no jurisdiction to make an order in the second action affecting the first action.

Gilbert Beyfus Q.C., L. J. Belcourt and H. S. A. Hart for the appellants.

Neville Faulks Q.C. and David C.-H. Hirst for the respondents.

The following cases, in addition to those which are referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Marchant v. Ford, Peter Davies Ltd.[1]; Evans v. Bartlam.[2]

WILLMER L.J. This is an application for leave to appeal, and to appeal out of time, against an order made by Havers J., whereby he allowed an appeal from Master Harwood and made an order for the consolidation of two actions. On both sides technical questions arise. The plaintiffs are technically out of time, and they, in their turn, raise a technical point against the defendants with which I will deal in one moment.

[1] [1936] 3 All E.R. 104.

[2] [1937] A.C. 473; 53 T.L.R. 689; 106 L.J.K.B. 568.

C. A.
1959
Daws v. Daily Sketch and Daily Graphic Ltd.
Willmer L.J.

The first action is an action by an officer in the metropolitan police force and is brought against the proprietors of a newspaper in respect of an article published in that newspaper whereby the plaintiff alleges that he was libelled. The second action is brought by a group of officers who are associated with the plaintiff in the first action in the same department of the metropolitan police. The second action is brought by those plaintiffs against the same defendants in respect of the same article.

The defences to the two actions are not the same. It is true that in both actions there is a denial that the words are defamatory. But in the case of the first action the only other defence is as to damages, and in connection with that it is pleaded that an offer was made to publish an apology in a form set out in the defence, which offer was not accepted by the plaintiff. With regard to the second action, however, there is an issue raised as to whether the words complained of in the article refer to, or are capable of referring to, the plaintiffs or to any of them. There is also in that case an issue as to damages, but that issue is not complicated, as in the first action, by any allegation that an offer of apology was made.

The first action, brought by Daws, I will for convenience refer to as action No. 167; and the second action, in which several other plaintiffs are joined, I will refer to as No. 848. The question arose on the summons for directions in action No. 848. There was a good deal of difference in time between the progress of the two actions. In the first action, No. 167, the statement of claim was delivered on February 27, 1959, and the defence was delivered on March 31. There was a summons for directions in that action some time in May. The writ in the second action was not issued until June 25, 1959, that is to say, after the summons for directions in the first action. The statement of claim was delivered on June 27, and the defence was delivered on July 16.

When it came to the summons for directions in the second action, No. 848, one of the reliefs asked for was an order consolidating the two actions. The same solicitors acted for both sets of plaintiffs, and there is no doubt that the solicitors appearing for all the plaintiffs were duly informed that the application for consolidation was going to be made on the summons for directions in action No. 848. But no summons in action No. 167 was issued. I make that observation, bearing in mind that a form of summons for use in such circumstances is provided in the Annual Practice (1960) and appears as Form No. 4D, 1 on p. 2374. No such summons was taken out. When the matter came before the learned master he declined to make any order consolidating the two actions.

On appeal, Havers J. took the other view. He apparently regarded the fact that notice had not been given in the first action, No. 167, as a mere technicality, and on the merits of the application he made an order consolidating the two actions. The order was in fact made in action No. 848. So far as I know, up to date no order has been made in action No. 167. In the absence of any summons in action No. 167, I do not see how any order could have been made in that action.

In those circumstances, the first point taken by the plaintiffs is that there was no jurisdiction in the judge to make any order at all affecting action No. 167. It has been argued before us very forcibly by Mr. Faulks, for the defendants, that that point is the merest technicality, that there is no merit in it at all, that the common solicitors knew all about it all the time, and that it would have been the easiest possible matter to cure, and, indeed, to cure even now, by drawing up an order in each of the two actions. But I have drawn attention to the provision of a form suitable for use in such a case as this, and I am bound to say that on this issue, in my judgment, the plaintiffs must succeed. I think it is a fatal objection, however unmeritorious it may be, that an order was made in action No. 848 purporting to direct how action No. 167 should proceed.

I confess that I dislike deciding an issue like this on a mere technical ground, and I am therefore consoled by the fact that I am now able to say that in my judgment, on the merits, the case is one in which the judge erred in the exercise of his discretion, and, as I see it, erred in principle in such a way as to entitle this court to interfere. The judge, we were told, relied very much upon the words used by Scrutton L.J. in Horwood v. Statesman Publishing Co.,[1] words which I think he was repeating from an earlier case of Payne v. British Time Recorder Co.[2]

The learned Lord Justice said[3] that the effect of the "latter "decisions is that you must look at the language of the "rules and construe them liberally, and that where there are "common questions of law or fact involved in different causes of "actions you should include all parties in one action, subject "to the discretion of the court, if such inclusion is embarrassing, "to strike out one or more of the parties. It is impossible to lay "down any rule as to how the discretion of the court ought to "be exercised. Broadly speaking, where claims by or against "different parties involve or may involve a common question of "law or fact bearing sufficient importance in proportion to the "rest of the action to render it desirable that the whole of "the matters should be disposed of at the same time the court "will allow the joinder of plaintiffs or defendants, subject to its "discretion as to how the action should be tried."

It seems to me, however, that when we look at the issues raised in this case we are far from finding here "a common "question of law or fact bearing sufficient importance in propor-"tion to the rest of the action to render it desirable that the "whole of the matters should be disposed of at the same time." The only issue in the two actions which is, strictly speaking,

[1] (1929) 98 L.J.K.B. 450; 45 T.L.R. 237.

[2] [1921] 2 K.B. 1, 16.

[3] 98 L.J.K.B. 450, 453.

C. A.
1959
DAWS v. DAILY SKETCH AND DAILY GRAPHIC LTD.
Willmer L.J.

common to both of them is the issue as to whether the words are defamatory at all, an issue which, as Mr. Beyfus suggested, might well be one which would not give the jury very much trouble. But there are very distinctive differences between the matters in issue in the two actions, having regard to the different defences put forward, to which I have already referred. In so far, therefore, as Scrutton L.J. was setting out any principle on which discretion should be exercised in what he said in Horwood's case,[4] I do not think that this case falls within that principle, and I am prepared to say that, in my judgment, the learned judge in this case erred in principle in the order he made.

The matter, however, does not quite rest there, for, thanks to the good sense of counsel who appear before us, there has been a certain amount of mutual concession, and both of them, I understand, are disposed to agree that, in lieu of an order for consolidation, it would be a proper case in which to make an order that the two cases be tried consecutively. That would involve action No. 848 being expedited so as to follow immediately after action No. 167. The only issue which appeared to remain between counsel, after having applied their minds to that suggestion, was that on one side it was said that the actions should follow each other so as to be tried by the same judge and jury, whereas on the other side it was said that that should be left to the discretion of the judge at the time, because it might be inconvenient to employ the same jury on the hearing of the second action as on the hearing of the first. As to that, I should have thought it was most important that the two actions should be dealt with by the same jury.

In those circumstances, and especially having regard to the close measure of agreement between counsel, I have come to the conclusion that this is a case in which leave to appeal should be granted, notwithstanding the fact that the plaintiffs are out of time, and that on the appeal the proper order should be that the appeal is allowed, the order for consolidation set aside and replaced by an order that the two actions be tried consecutively by the same judge and jury.

HARMAN L.J. I agree, and have nothing to add.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors: Edward Thompson & Hauser; Swepstone, Walsh & Son.

[4] 98 L.J.K.B. 450, 453.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

* PEPPER v. PEPPER.

1960
Jan. 18.

Lord Merriman P. and Collingwood J.

Husband and Wife—Justices—Maintenance—Attachment of earnings—Effect of order in subsequent proceedings as to quantum—Married Women (Summary Jurisdiction) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), s. 7—Maintenance Orders Act, 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 39), s. 6.

Husband and Wife — Maintenance — Justices — Jurisdiction — Wife's application for custody of and maintenance for child—No cross-complaint by husband—Whether original maintenance ordered for wife may be decreased.

Estoppel — Per rem judicatam — Husband and wife — Maintenance — Quantum—Attachment of earnings order—Subsequent proceedings.

In February, 1959, justices made an order in favour of a wife with maintenance for herself and two children of the marriage. On August 11, 1959, the husband having meanwhile made two unsuccessful applications for a decrease in the amount of the order, the wife's complaint for an attachment of earnings order under the Maintenance Orders Act, 1958, was heard, and after making the assessment of protected earnings and normal reduction rate as required by section 6 of that Act,[1] an order was made.

On August 13, 1959, the justices, on the wife's complaint for a variation of the original order by granting her the custody of and maintenance for a subsequently born child of the marriage, decreased the amount of the original order to conform with the assessment of the normal reduction rate. From that decision the wife appealed:—

Held, (1) that in the absence of a cross-complaint by the husband the justices had no jurisdiction to interfere with the original order.

Trathan v. Trathan [1955] 1 W.L.R. 805; [1955] 2 All E.R. 701 applied.

(2) That the assessment of the normal deduction rate in attachment of earnings proceedings under section 6 of the Act of 1958, as to which potential earnings were not relevant, did not constitute an estoppel as to the husband's means in the subsequent proceedings arising from the wife's complaint to vary; the appeal must be allowed and a rehearing ordered.

[1] Maintenance Orders Act, 1958, s. 6 (3): "An attachment of earnings order shall—(a) specify the normal deduction rate, that is to say, the rate at which, after taking into account any right or liability of the defendant to deduct income tax from payments made under the related maintenance order, the court making or varying the attachment of earnings order thinks it reasonable that the earnings to which that order relates should be applied from time to time in satisfying the requirements of the maintenance order, not exceeding the rate appearing to that court to be necessary for the purpose of—(i) securing payment of the sums falling due from time to time under the maintenance order; and (ii) securing payment within a reasonable period of any sums already due and unpaid under the maintenance order and any costs incurred in proceedings relating to the maintenance order which are payable by the defendant; (b) specify the protected earnings rate, that is to say, the rate below which, having regard to the resources and needs of the defendant and the needs of persons for whom he must or reasonably may provide, the court aforesaid thinks it reasonable that the relevant earnings within the meaning of the Schedule to this Act should not be reduced by a payment made in pursuance of the attachment of earnings order; . . ."

1960

Pepper
v.
Pepper.

Appeal from the Melton Mowbray justices.

On February 12, 1959, an order on the grounds of the husband's adultery and desertion was made in favour of the wife by the Melton Mowbray justices by which the wife was granted the custody of the two children of the marriage and the husband was ordered to pay the sum of £5 10s. for the maintenance of the wife and children. At that time the husband was a bus driver said to be earning £11 a week or thereabouts. The husband subsequently gave up his earnings as a bus driver and took employment as a farm worker, the advantage of which to him was that with the employment went a tied cottage, available for the occupation of himself and the woman with whom he was living, and who was pregnant by him.

On April 21, 1959, he made an application to reduce the amount of the order, on the ground that his wages, which he was earning as a farm worker, were only £7 6s. 1d. net, and he also applied for the remission of a certain sum off the arrears at the time. That application was dismissed. He applied again with a complaint to reduce, which was likewise dismissed on May 12, 1959, when the court must have had before it the fact that the husband was still in farm work and had not resumed his work as a bus driver.

On July 18, 1959, a third child of the marriage was born, and on August 7, 1959, the wife made a complaint seeking, on that ground, a variation of the original order granting her the custody of and maintenance for the third child, the return date for which was August 13, 1959. In the meanwhile, just after the child was born, the wife took out a summons for committal of the husband in respect of arrears, which were just under £60, the return date for which was July 28, 1959. Upon the suggestion of the justices' clerk that complaint was not proceeded with, and a complaint was taken out for an attachment of earnings order under the Maintenance Orders Act, 1958. That complaint was heard on August 11, 1959, and on that occasion the justices heard evidence which, in substance, agreed with what the husband was putting forward when he asked for a variation in his favour in April, 1959, that the gross wages were £7 16s. and the net wages £7 6s. 1d., and found that the "protected earnings" and the "normal deduc-"tion rate" under section 6 of the Maintenance Orders Act, 1958, were £4 16s. 1d. and £2 10s. respectively.

On the hearing of the wife's complaint for variation on August 13, 1959, the court proceeded on being informed about the protected earnings and the net wages, to recast the original order so that it conformed to the normal deduction rate, and varied the order for the wife down to £1, with 10s. in respect of each child, having in the meanwhile accepted the evidence that the third child was the child of the husband and that there were, therefore, three children to be paid for instead of only two.

From that decision the wife appealed.

Brian Woods for the wife.
G. D. Lane for the husband.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

LORD MERRIMAN P. referred to the facts and to the provisions of section 6 of the Maintenance Orders Act, 1958, remarking that it was the first occasion on which that Act had fallen to be considered by the court, and continued: It has been argued that if you apply to vary an order under section 7 of the Married Women (Summary Jurisdiction) Act, 1895,[1] or, to put it in concrete form, if the wife applies, as she did in this case, to add an additional figure, namely, for the third child, to the original order, it follows that magistrates may increase or diminish the amount of any weekly payment ordered to be made as long as they stay within the limits. I do not think that is the effect of the section, in that bald form, and I certainly do not think that when an application to vary is of a specific kind and for the express reason that a third child has been born, that automatically imports the right to tear up the original order and rewrite it altogether.

For my part, I think that this is a matter which this court has already decided, and I propose to hold that we are bound by the original decision. In Trathan v. Trathan,[2] Davies J. and I, sitting in this court, took what we thought was the strict view, and, if I may, I will read one passage from my own judgment, which was repeated, incidentally, in the later case of Bowen v. Bowen.[3] The actual point in Trathan v. Trathan[4] was that on an application to vary the justices had taken upon themselves the right to discharge the order, and I said[5]: " . . . it is quite plain on the " face of section 7 itself that, though these things are all put " together in one sentence, they do, in fact, raise quite separate " issues, and there must be, in my opinion, under the Magis- " trates' Courts Act, 1952, as there must have been under the " Summary Jurisdiction Act, a complaint which alleges that " there should be an alteration and upon what ground; or that " there should be a variation and upon what ground; or " that there should be a discharge, and again upon what " ground, though in that case at least the ground must be based " upon 'fresh evidence.'" That was, of course, to draw the distinction between complaints which are merely for variation of amount—with regard to which I need only say that it is common knowledge that the requirement of the words " upon fresh

[1] Married Women Summary (Jurisdiction) Act, 1895 (as amended), s. 7: " A court of summary jurisdiction . . . " may, on the application of the mar- " ried woman or her husband, and " upon cause being shown upon fresh " evidence to the satisfaction of the " court at any time, alter, vary or dis- " charge any such order, and may " upon any such application from time " to time increase or diminish the " amount of any weekly payment " ordered to be made . . . "

[2] [1955] 1 W.L.R. 805; [1955] 2 All E.R. 701.

[3] [1958] 1 W.L.R. 508; [1958] 1 All E.R. 770.

[4] [1955] 1 W.L.R. 805.

[5] Ibid. 812.

1960

PEPPER
v.
PEPPER.

Lord Merriman P.

"evidence" has been got rid of—and those cases in which discharge would almost necessarily involve the calling of fresh evidence. So here, this is a case which can only be brought upon fresh evidence, because it is the subsequent birth of the child since the order was made which entitled the wife to ask for the particular variation. But it is said that Davies J., who agreed absolutely with my judgment and said so,[5] has, in a passage I am going to read in a moment, said something which affords authority for the view that on any sort of application to vary, anything may be done by way of variation one way or the other. Davies J. said[6]: "For the reasons which my Lord has "given I agree that on an application by a wife for an increase "of the amount payable under an order the court has no power, "unless proper steps by a cross-summons are taken, to entertain "an application to discharge that order. I do not think it is "necessary to repeat the reasons that my Lord has given, or to "examine the statutes. I should like to add that I do not think "it is necessary to decide, for the purposes of this appeal, "whether on an application to increase the amount of an order, "the court has power to decrease it. I do not desire to express "any view about that, as I do not think it is necessary for "the purposes of this decision. For we are here concerned with "a case where the justices upon an application to increase have "purported to entertain an application to discharge, and for the "reasons that my Lord has given I am satisfied that that is "wrong." It seems to me that that passage is a very long way from affording any authority for the sort of case with which we are dealing here, which, I repeat, is an application to vary because of the "fresh evidence" that a child has subsequently been born, and which is said to give justices the opportunity to revise the whole order—maintenance for the wife, maintenance in respect of the other children, and, presumably, to alter the custody order in respect of the other children if they thought fit to do so. I do not agree, and I think that we are bound by the decision in Trathan v. Trathan[7] to hold that that point is not a good one.

[His Lordship then referred to the dates and facts of the various proceedings before the justices, and continued:] The procedure adopted by the justices on August 13, 1959, was clearly irregular, first, because I am of opinion still, as this court held in Trathan v. Trathan,[8] that any order such as was made by the justices on August 13, 1959, required a cross-complaint on the part of the husband, of which it is admitted there was none. Secondly, I do not think, even assuming that the justices had the technical right to act at all in connection with the alteration of the original order in the sense that I have mentioned, that they had, strictly speaking, the right to do so merely on the strength of what they or some other justices had heard in connection with

[5] [1955] 1 W.L.R. 812.
[6] Ibid. 813.
[7] Ibid. 805.
[8] Ibid.

the attachment of earnings order two days before. This matter must, therefore, go back to the justices and the husband must issue a complaint for reduction of the order, in whatever sense he can make good by evidence, and his evidence must be subject to being tested.

Although I agree that there is some force in the argument, I am not convinced that there is an estoppel as between these two parties about the husband's means merely because of the form the attachment of earnings order took two days before, but I do realise, and I think this must be stated plainly, that a great deal of what I have said, if strictly accurate so far as the Maintenance Orders Act, 1958, is concerned, may prove to be more or less academic. I say so for this reason: on any ordinary application to vary either up or down, and assuming that the application either way is supported by a proper complaint on proper grounds, the basic thing that has to be ascertained, not the only thing but the basic thing, in terms of the Married Women (Summary Jurisdiction) Act, 1895, is, what are the means of the parties, and now that we have got rid of the words "upon "fresh evidence" in connection with mere variations of amount up or down, if the original amount appears to be too much on the one hand or too little on the other hand, that is all that has to be decided, and there is ample authority for that which I do not propose to repeat. What is to be taken into account in the justices' court is, what the husband's earnings are, what his responsibilities are, whether the wife is earning money, and so forth, balancing one thing against another and arriving at a right figure.

I have said that, in my opinion, a finding under the attachment of earnings procedure is not necessarily binding on any such inquiry, but I am going to read the words governing the calculation of the "normal deduction rate" which appear in section 6 (3) (a): [His Lordship read the subsection and continued:] Pausing there, I wish to reserve the point which has been taken that, in this case, seeing that the related order was for a total sum of £5 10s., as soon as the justices went into the figures and saw that only £2 10s. was going to be available at all—(and I know in passing that it is suggested that they reserved the question of outstanding arrears to be dealt with on another occasion)—it at once became apparent that any order they might make would not secure "payment of the sums falling due from "time to time under the maintenance order," because by no known procedure can £2 10s. be made sufficient to pay £5 10s., or secure payment of the "sums already due and unpaid" under the maintenance order. I express no opinion upon that until I have heard the point properly argued, but I know that it is one of the points to be considered.

Under section 6 (3) (b) an attachment of earnings order shall "specify the protected earnings rate, that is to say, the rate "below which, having regard to the resources and needs of the

1960

PEPPER
v.
PEPPER.

Lord Merriman P.

"defendant"—and then I stress these following words—"and "the needs of persons for whom he must or reasonably may "provide, the court aforesaid thinks it reasonable that the "relevant earnings within the meaning of the Schedule to this "Act should not be reduced by a payment made in pursuance "of the attachment of earnings order." That is the sum of £4 16s. 1d. at which they arrived under the attachment of earnings procedure. When it is said in arriving at that that they have had "regard to the resources and needs of the defendant "and the needs of persons for whom he must or reasonably may "provide," that seems to me to be something very like a definition of, or at least a pointer to, the various factors which a court should take into account in considering the means of the parties, and it is much too late in the day for any court to say: "We only considered the husband and the wife. We ignored the "claims of the second or unofficial wife and the second or "unofficial family" as the case may be. It is too late in the day to say the court shall take that rigid view, and, therefore, it seems to me that the words "for whom he must or reasonably may "provide" would impel the court to consider the means of the parties, not, indeed, to prefer the paramour and her expected child to the needs of the wife and her children, but to take into account the fact, as was said in the Report of the Royal Commission on Marriage and Divorce,[9] that there is not the money to go round, and to find the fairest way they can of apportioning the money. That is why I say, at the end of it all, that when this rather tangled skein is sorted out and put on a regular basis the justices may get back very nearly to where we started with this, as I say, irregular order.

But that, of course, is the inevitable result so long as this attachment of earnings order holds the field. I want to make this plain, if it is not already plain from the words of the section itself, that I reject the suggestion that in an attachment of earnings case the justices have any right to consider the potential earnings of the defendant in some other occupation than that in which it is sought to attach his earnings. That will not do. The attachment of earnings procedure works by directing to a particular employer an order to pay out of the wages which he is paying to the husband in respect of a particular employment a specific sum either to or for the benefit of the wife, and in that calculation the question whether the husband has a potential capacity to earn greater wages does not come into the picture at all.

It may be that the proper course in this case, apart from putting the husband right in the way in which he can bring his side of the matter before the court, is that the wife may be advised, if it is possible, to get rid of this attachment of earnings order and go back to the ordinary enforcement procedure, and, if she is able, to base it not only upon his actual earnings but upon his potential earnings; but I express no opinion about that because it is not my business. It may be, and again I express no opinion, that although subsisting enforcement proceedings are got rid of by section 9 of the Maintenance Orders Act, 1958, if she reverts to the procedure of ordinary enforcement, then that notice will vacate the attachment of earnings order, and the matter might then be dealt with on that basis. But, as I say, we have so little real information about the way in which this matter stands from that point of view that I do not propose to lay down any dogmatic view on that subject.

[9] Para. 495.

I end, therefore, as I began, by saying that, in my opinion, in its present form this order cannot stand, and the wife's complaint must be remitted to the justices for the whole matter to be put in order, so far as it can be put in order, and dealt with on a proper basis.

COLLINGWOOD J. I agree. What the justices have in effect done is to substitute the figures which they have found to be the proper figures on inquiry under the attachment order for the original order which the wife had obtained in February of last year.

Mr. Lane, for the husband, has urged before this court that that is within their powers, because once a wife asks for a variation that opens the door to justices to vary either up or down and that they are not restricted to varying upwards, although that is the only thing the wife was asking for. If that is correct, what it involves is that every application by a wife for an increase in maintenance imports an implied application by the husband to reduce without there being any necessity for notice being given to the wife that such application is to be made.

In my opinion that is not correct, and that it is not correct is clear, I think, from the judgment of Lord Merriman P. in Trathan v. Trathan,[10] and I cannot see any justification for drawing the conclusion which Mr. Lane would have us draw from the reservation made by Davies J. in his judgment in that appeal.

In my opinion the justices were mistaken in the course which they took here. They had no power to vary the order in the way in which they did upon the application which was then before them, and I agree that the case should be remitted.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Barradale, Blacket Gill, Silkin & Young for Latham, New & Smyth, Melton Mowbray; Dawson & Co. for H. P. Rushton, Grantham.

E. J.

[10] [1955] 1 W.L.R. 805.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

1960
Feb. 9.

Lord Parker C.J. and Donovan J.

* In re WRING.

In re COOK.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Habeas Corpus—Criminal cause or matter—Prisoner serving sentence—Application by—Practice.

APPLICATIONS for writs of habeas corpus.

The applicants, Brian John Wring and Albert Samuel John Cook, both now serving sentences of imprisonment, applied to the Divisional Court for writs of habeas corpus. Wring had been sentenced to five years' imprisonment on September 25, 1958, at Bristol Assizes for shopbreaking, larceny and possessing explosives; Cook to four years' imprisonment on September 26, 1958, at Somerset Quarter Sessions for false pretences and receiving.

The applicants appeared in person.

LORD PARKER C.J. The court has considered these two applications made by prisoners in person for habeas corpus. The court is quite clear that there is nothing in the grounds raised which would enable this court to make the order.

The court would like to take this opportunity of setting out the position in regard to these applications. The Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division has repeatedly stated that habeas corpus is not to be regarded as a means of appeal against conviction or sentence. As the court stated in In re Featherstone [1]: "The court does not grant, and cannot grant, writs of habeas "corpus to persons who are in execution, that is to say, persons "who are serving sentences passed by courts of competent "jurisdiction. Probably the only case in which the court would "grant habeas corpus would be if it were satisfied that the "prisoner was being held after the term of the sentence passed on "him had expired." Accordingly, a prisoner who wishes to challenge either his conviction or his sentence should apply to the Court of Criminal Appeal or to quarter sessions, as the case may be. If the prisoner nonetheless persists in his desire to apply for habeas corpus, the courses open to him are: (a) to consult a solicitor about the possibility of instructing counsel to make an application on his behalf, or (b) to ask someone to make an application for him or arrange for one to be made, and in either case to swear the necessary affidavit, or (c) to apply to the local committee of the Law Society for legal aid for the purpose of making an application.

[1] (1953) 37 Cr.App.R. 146, 147.

There is no right of access to the Divisional Court otherwise than by the means described above. As a concession, however, the court is prepared to consider any written statement by the prisoner setting out the grounds on which he considers that he is unlawfully detained and sent by letter to the Master of the Crown Office. This is not an application, since it is not in accordance with the Supreme Court Rules, but the Divisional Court (or in vacation the vacation judge) does as a matter of practice consider the letter and statement in order to see whether the prisoner has an arguable point. If he has, the court arranges for the Official Solicitor to instruct counsel to make a formal application under the rules on the prisoner's behalf. If the court is of opinion that there is no arguable point, the prisoner is informed that the court sees no reason to depart from the formal procedure, leaving it to the prisoner to proceed in accordance with the rules. Prisoners will not be permitted to make such an informal approach more than once.

The Divisional Court has ruled that no applicant for a writ of habeas corpus can be heard in person unless some exceptional ground is shown for departure from the established practice: compare In re Greene.[2] A prisoner, therefore, is not produced for the purpose of making an application in person unless the court so directs.

These applications are refused.

Applications refused.

E. M. W.

[2] (1941) 57 T.L.R. 533.

[HOUSE OF LORDS.]

H. L. (E.)†

1960 Feb. 11.

VERNAZZA, In re.

* ATTORNEY-GENERAL . . . . . PETITIONER;

AND

VERNAZZA . . . . . RESPONDENT.

* VERNAZZA . . . . . PETITIONER;

AND

ATTORNEY-GENERAL . . . . . RESPONDENT.

PETITIONS for leave to appeal to the House of Lords from the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Vernazza.[1]

The Appeal Committee granted the petition of the Attorney-General and dismissed the petition of Vernazza.

† Present: VISCOUNT SIMONDS, LORD RADCLIFFE and LORD KEITH OF AVONHOLM.

[1] [1960] 2 W.L.R. 135; [1960] 1 All E.R. 183.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.

1960
Jan. 21, 22.

Lord Evershed M.R., Willmer and Upjohn L.JJ.

* In re BOULTON.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE v. ROBB.

[1959 B. 148.]

Revenue—Estate duty—Contribution to—Estate duty not claimed on assigned part of fund—Whether duty payable rateably out of whole fund—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 1, 9.

A testator, who died in 1914, directed his trustee to hold a fund upon trust to pay the income to his sister C. for her life and, in the event which happened, of her having no issue, the fund was to be held in trust for his sister M. for life and her issue; subject to such trusts, the testator directed that the trust fund should be held on trust in equal shares for such of three named cousins as should be living at the death or failure of the issue of the testator's last surviving sister, such cousins' issue to take their deceased parents' share per stirpes. All three cousins named in the will died before the sisters named in the will. All left issue who lived to take a share of capital. In 1950 the sister M. assigned her reversionary life interest to the trustees of the will (subject to the reservation to herself of an annual sum which was also subsequently similarly assigned) upon trust to pay the income of the fund to the same persons and in the same manner as it would have been payable under the will if she had died. By an assignment of 1951 C. assigned to R. (the only child of one of the then deceased cousins) one-third part of her life interest in the trust fund to the intent that such life interest should, so far as the law permitted, merge in the reversionary interest of R. C. died in 1958 and M. in 1959, both unmarried. On the death of C. estate duty was claimed on the two-thirds of the trust fund of which she was in receipt of the income at her death. The question raised was whether the duty ought to fall exclusively on the two-thirds of the fund or rateably on the whole fund:—

Held, assuming that the Estate Duty Office had rightly levied estate duty on two-thirds of the trust fund on the footing that the remaining third did not pass on the tenant for life's death, then the conclusion followed that under section 9 (1) of the Finance Act, 1894,[1] the burden of the duty fell to be borne by the two-thirds of the fund which attracted the levy.

Decision of Vaisey J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Vaisey J.

Matthew Ernest Boulton, by his will dated December 13, 1912, directed his trustees to hold the trust fund thereby constituted upon trust to pay the income to his sister, Clara Gertrude Boulton (hereinafter called "Clara"), during her life, and after her death for her issue, and in the event (which happened) of her having no children, upon the like trusts for his sister, Pauline Margaret Boulton (hereinafter called "Margaret"), and her issue (she had none) and, subject to trusts in favour of a third sister (which wholly failed), the testator by clause 19 of his will directed that subject to all the trusts thereinbefore contained the trust fund and the income thereof should be held in trust in equal shares for such of his cousins, Major-General Frederick Spencer Wilson Robb, Montagu Caesar Robb and Geoffrey Charles Napier Sturt (in the said will called Geoffrey Sturt), as should be living at the death or failure of issue of the testator's last surviving sister, or should have previously died leaving issue then living, such issue to take their parents' share in equal shares per stirpes, and if none of his said cousins should be living or have died leaving issue living at the time aforesaid, then in trust for such persons as the last survivor of his sisters should appoint. The testator died on July 14, 1914.

[1] Finance Act, 1894, s. 9: "(1) A "rateable part of the estate duty on "an estate, in proportion to the value "of any property which does not "pass to the executor as such, shall "be a first charge on the property "in respect of which duty is "leviable; . . ."

By an order made by Harman J. on December 6, 1948, in proceedings whereof the short title and reference to the record are "In re Boulton's Will Trusts, The Public Trustee v. Sturt, 1948 "B. No. 3174," it was declared that the ultimate trust contained in clause 19 of the will in favour of the testator's three cousins and their respective issue was a valid and effectual trust and, accordingly, the class of persons to take (subject to the respective life interests of Clara and Margaret) would be such of the said cousins as should be living at the death of the survivor of Clara and Margaret without leaving issue, and the issue then living (taking per stirpes) of such of the cousins as should be then deceased.

By an assignment dated January 2, 1950, Margaret directed the then trustees of the will, if she should survive Clara, to appropriate investments out of the trust fund sufficient by their income to produce £3,000 a year, and to hold the income of the appropriated fund upon trust for herself during her life. She assigned to such trustees all the income to arise during her life from the balance of the trust fund upon trust to pay it to the same persons and in the same manner as it would have been payable if she had died immediately before such instalment of income had commenced to accrue. By an assignment of March 27, 1955, Margaret assigned to the Public Trustee (the then sole trustee of the will), the income to which she might become entitled in the fund appropriated to produce £3,000, to the intent that such income should be held upon the trusts declared of the income assigned by the deed of January 2, 1950. The result of the two assignments was that Margaret wholly divested herself of her reversionary life interest in the fund.

By an assignment of July 17, 1951, made between Clara and Eustace Frederick Robb (hereinafter called "Major Robb") Clara assigned to Major Robb, the only child of Major-General Frederick Spencer Wilson Robb (one of the cousins named in the testator's will who was then dead), her life interest in one equal third part of the trust fund.

C. A.
1960
BOULTON, In re.

Clara died unmarried on February 8, 1958. The three cousins named in the testator's will all predeceased her leaving issue who survived her.

The Estate Duty Office, in consequence of Clara's assignment of July 12, 1951, claimed duty on her death in respect of two-thirds only of the trust fund. Such duty was estimated to exceed £170,000.

By this summons the Public Trustee, as sole trustee of the will, asked whether the estate duty leviable in respect of two-thirds of the trust fund by reason of Clara's death ought to fall on the two-thirds of the fund in which Major Robb was not interested in exoneration of the third in which he was interested, or ought to fall rateably on the whole fund.

When the summons was issued Margaret was alive; she died, unmarried, before the hearing on May 4, 1959.

The defendants to the summons were Major Robb (the only child of the cousin General Sir Frederick Spencer Wilson Robb), who was the first defendant, the children, or their successors in title, of Montagu Caesar Robb being defendants Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8, and the child and the children of a deceased child of the cousin Geoffrey Charles Napier Sturt being defendants Nos. 9, 10, 11 and 12.

Vaisey J. held that the estate duty leviable on two-thirds of the trust fund on Clara's death ought to fall for all purposes on the part of the trust fund in which Major Robb was not beneficially interested.

Esme Robb, a daughter of Montagu Caesar Robb, the 8th defendant, and the three grandchildren of Geoffrey Charles Napier Sturt, who took a one-sixth of the fund between them, being the 10th, 11th and 12th defendants, appealed.

John Pennycuick Q.C. and Hector Hillaby for the appellants, the 8th, 10th, 11th and 12th defendants.

E. I. Goulding for the plaintiff, the Public Trustee.

B. L. Bathurst Q.C. and Eric Griffith for Major Robb and for the 3rd, 4th, 5th, 6th and 7th defendants, who opposed the appeal.

The second defendant, a mortgagee, and the 9th defendant, a son of the cousin Geoffrey Charles Napier Sturt, were not represented.

The following cases were referred to in argument, which are not mentioned in the judgments: In re the Earl of Carnarvon's Settled Estates [2]; In re Northcliffe [3]; Public Trustee v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [4]; Berry v. Gaukroger [5]; In re Parker-Jervis [6]; In re Townsend [7]; In re Nickels [8]; Midland Bank Executor and Trustee Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners. [9]

[2] [1927] 1 Ch. 138.
[3] [1929] 1 Ch. 327.
[4] [1960] 2 W.L.R. 203; [1960] 1 All E.R. 1.
[5] [1903] 2 Ch. 116; 19 T.L.R. 445.
[6] [1898] 2 Ch. 643.
[7] [1901] 2 K.B. 331.
[8] [1898] 1 Ch. 630.
[9] [1959] Ch. 277; [1959] 2 W.L.R. 77; [1959] 1 All E.R. 180.

LORD EVERSHED M.R. The point raised in this appeal is one of novelty (as Mr. Pennycuick conceded in opening) and not free from difficulty. It might in certain circumstances be considered to have strange consequences.

By his will, dated in 1912, the settlor disposed of his residue by a somewhat elaborate scheme of trusts in favour of his two named sisters successively and their children (if they had any) and then, in the event (which happened) of both sisters dying without issue, disposed of his trust estate by the following language: that it was to be "held in equal shares for such of "them my cousins Major-General Frederick Spencer Wilson Robb "Montagu Caesar Robb and Geoffrey Sturt as shall be living at "the death or failure of issue of my last surviving sister or shall "have previously died leaving issue then living . . . ", and there followed directions defining the interests of that issue, should they take, as was again the fact.

It may be useful to make some reference to the pedigree in order to explain the position of the parties now before the court. The two sisters have been called (and I hope I may, without disrespect to their memory, continue to call them) by their Christian names, respectively Clara and Margaret. The first trust was to pay the whole income to Clara for her life, and, in the event (as happened) of her death unmarried, to pay the whole income to Margaret for the residue of her life. Margaret likewise died unmarried on May 4, 1959. All the three cousins named in clause 19 had predeceased that date. Those whom Mr. Pennycuick as appellant represents are certain of the issue of what I will call the Sturt stirps: one of the issue has taken no part in the dispute, and the remaining three are represented by Mr. Pennycuick, who also represents one member of Montagu Caesar Robb's family, a Miss Esme Robb. On the other side, and represented by Mr. Bathurst, are the remainder of the Caesar Robb stirps and the one child (still living) of General Robb, namely, Major Eustace Robb.

In the events which have happened, the corpus of the estate is now divisible in the shares indicated in the pedigree. Thus, Major Eustace Robb, as the sole member of General Robb's stirps, takes a third. The issue of Caesar Robb take between them another third, but not in equal proportions because they belong to two generations. That last observation applies also to the issue of Geoffrey Sturt.

But the complication and the present problem have arisen because of the dealings with their respective interests of the two sisters, Clara and Margaret. In point of time, the first transaction was one of Margaret, whereby she, by appropriate deed, provided that her life interest, when it came to enjoyment, should be held so that the persons who would have taken on each distribution date, were she then dead, should between them and in the appropriate proportions take the income of the estate,

C. A.
1960
Boulton, In re.
Lord Evershed M.R.

subject to the qualification that she retained for her personal enjoyment an annual sum of £3,000.

Then next came an assignment, dated July 12, 1951, by Clara, and it is that assignment which is particularly relevant to the present problem. After the date of that assignment Margaret, by a later deed in 1955, in effect, released the retained interest she had previously created in her own favour of £3,000 a year. Clara, after very long and elaborate recitals of the will and subsequent events in reference to the estate, then proceeded to assign to Major Robb all "the life interest of the assignor," that is Clara, "in one equal third part of the trust fund and in any "property hereinafter representing or substituted for the same." There followed a reference to certain specific property, which then in part represented the estate. The relevant clause of the deed finished: "To the intent that the life interest of the assignor "in the premises . . . hereby assured may so far as the law "permits forthwith merge in the reversionary interest of the "assignee in the same and be extinguished."

The intent was plain, and has, I conceive, been acted upon in practice, but as a matter of law was (as Mr. Pennycuick observed) strictly ineffective, for this reason. Major Robb, the assignee, only had at the date when Clara executed this instrument a contingent reversionary interest. In order to take any share of corpus he had to survive both Clara and Margaret. Therefore, in strictness, it was incompetent for Clara by this instrument to cause any merger of an appropriate part of the income interest in the estate with what Major Robb might take did he survive the date of distribution. That was the instrument, and I assume that, in accordance with it, from its date in 1951 until Clara's death on February 8, 1958, Major Robb received one-third of the income of the estate. There was, as appears from the evidence, no kind of appropriation of any part of the assets, and, therefore, it is correct to say that he received one-third of the total income, notwithstanding (as Mr. Griffith pointed out) that the actual terms of the assignment purported to relate to the income of one-third of the estate. When Clara died, Major Robb continued in fact to receive a similar share.

It will be recalled that by the joint effect of the two assignments made by Margaret, the income was then periodically distributed among the persons who would have been entitled to it had she died at the date of the income distribution, and at every relevant date there were representatives of all three stirps and Major Robb was the sole representative of the General's stirps. Thus he continued to enjoy a third of the income. Finally, when Margaret died, a similar state of affairs existed, so that Major Robb became entitled to one-third of the corpus.

This case relates to the estate duty which became leviable upon the death of Clara. So far as the evidence goes, it is apparent what happened and, as I think, what view the Estate Duty Office took of their right to charge duty. In paragraph 22 of the affidavit of Mr. Worthington of the Public Trustee Office, it is stated: "In consequence of the said assignment dated "July 12, 1951, estate duty has been claimed by reason of the "death of the said Clara Gertrude Boulton in respect of two-"thirds only of the residuary trust fund." The question is whether the duty should fall exclusively on the two-thirds of the fund in which Major Robb is not interested, in exoneration of the one-third of which (it may be said) he has at all relevant times enjoyed the interest; or whether the whole amount of duty ought to be borne rateably by the persons interested in the whole subject-matter of the estate.

The argument of Mr. Pennycuick is clear, and certainly founded upon legal propositions which may be difficult to controvert as such. What he says is this: Clara was only competent to dispose of that which she had, namely, an interest in the whole income of the estate during her life. She could, of course, dispose of the whole of it or any part of it she liked, and for such period as she chose. What she could not do was, by any such assignment, to cause the subject-matter of the trust estate to be severed into distinct proprietary subject-matters. Therefore, Mr. Pennycuick says, whatever the amount of the duty (and the office may be right or wrong in their assessment), it is a duty leviable upon the property, incapable of severance, and not in fact severed, which passed at her death. As Mr. Pennycuick stated clearly in his reply, the property which passed on Clara's death was the whole property. True, it is, that Major Robb enjoyed a third of the income of the property before Clara died, and it so happened that he enjoyed a similar fraction of the income immediately thereafter, and now has a right to a third of the corpus; but that fractional identity is accidental and does not affect the proposition.

It will be observed that the argument at once raises a somewhat alarming prospect which has, not unnaturally, impressed itself on the minds of those who have resisted Mr. Pennycuick's case; because it is said, or feared, that if that proposition is right and that, if the truth is that the whole property passed, it may well be that the Estate Duty Office's charge or levy has been so far for a less sum than it ought properly to have been. Mr. Bathurst said, I have no doubt quite correctly, that if as a result of anything that is said in this court that fear should be realised, then if Mr. Pennycuick won, what with the amount of the additional duty and the increased rate, everybody, including the appellants, would be worse off than they are now. Whether that is right or wrong is, of course, a matter irrelevant to the decision of this case. But the fear having been expressed, I have formed the view that perhaps the less I expatiate on this matter the better.

I do not at all dissent from the general proposition that, strictly speaking, and certainly to the eye of the conveyancer, a person having an interest such as Clara had in a trust fund like

C. A.
1960
Boulton, In re.
Lord Evershed M.R.

this cannot sever the trust fund into distinct properties. But I do not, with all respect to the argument, think that that is quite the problem which we have to decide. On the evidence it seems to me quite plain what has occurred. The Estate Duty Office have claimed to levy duty on two-thirds only of the residuary estate. They have taken a view which, whatever might be said against it by a conveyancer, at any rate corresponds quite manifestly with common sense and, I should be inclined to think, with justice. They have said: "If you look at the facts as they were "when Clara died, it appears that two-thirds of the estate then "passed and one-third did not; and the one-third did not pass "because Major Robb enjoyed both before and after the death "to exactly the same extent, one-third of the trust property or "its income." The claim, therefore, was one made, so far as I can see, in respect of two-thirds of this trust property and no more.

If that is right, what is the result? In my judgment, the result is that which section 9 of the Finance Act, 1894, enjoins; for by the terms of subsection (1) it is provided that: "A rate-"able part of the estate duty on an estate, in proportion to the "value of any property which does not pass to the executor as "such"—as this did not—"shall be a first charge on the pro-"perty in respect of which duty is leviable." It may be a question whether the duty was leviable in respect of something else, but I have little doubt that it was levied in respect of two-thirds, and, it seems to me, that the short answer to this case, therefore, is that the duty should be rateably borne by the two-thirds of the estate in respect of which it was levied. Mr. Griffith drew attention to the change in language between section 1 and section 9, which I note. Mr. Pennycuick's argument has been founded, as I have already said, on the proposition that you cannot avoid the circumstance that the property which passed was the whole property. I think, for my part, that there may be some help to be gained by considering later enactments in pari materia, including the terms of section 43 of the Finance Act, 1940, as amended. It does, at any rate, appear from that section that where someone with an interest such as Clara had disposes partly of such an interest, then the statute seems to contemplate that the subject-matter so disposed of will or may be the subject of exemption, as being in some sense a distinct item of tax subject-matter (I avoid using the word "property"). But however that may be, I confess that I take the view, as did the judge, that if you assume, as I think you must—and I am far from saying the assumption is not well-founded—that the Estate Duty Office have properly performed their duties in making a levy for tax, then they have levied tax on a two-thirds of the estate which excludes that fraction in which Major Robb was interested. If that premise is right, then it seems to me that the conclusion must follow under section 9 that the burden should be borne by the two-thirds which attracted the levy. Agreeing, therefore, with the judge in this respect, I would, without saying more, and for reasons which I have indicated, dismiss the appeal.

C. A.
1960
BOULTON, In re.

WILLMER L.J. I agree, and have nothing to add.

UPJOHN L.J. I also agree.

Appeal dismissed. Appellants to pay the party and party costs of the respondents. Plaintiff's excess costs over party and party costs to come out of the estate.

Solicitors: Radcliffes & Co.; Lawrence, Graham & Co.; Payne Hicks Beach & Co.; Wild, Collins & Crosse.

B. A. B.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.]

* REGINA v. CHAPMAN AND ANOTHER.

C. C. A.
1960
Feb. 2.
Lord Parker C.J., Cassels and Ashworth JJ.

Criminal Law—Sentence—Probation order—Breach—Charge of—Breach found by justices—Remand to quarter sessions—Whether certificate of justices conclusive—Procedure—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 58), s. 6 (4).

On February 6, 1958, the appellants were convicted of larceny at quarter sessions and put on probation for three years. In July, 1958, they were convicted at a magistrates' court of loitering with intent to steal, and one of the appellants was also convicted of larceny; as a result they were brought before quarter sessions and on July 15, 1958, the recorder made a new probation order for three years with a condition that they should not associate. They were informed by the recorder that if they met by chance they were not prohibited from conversing. In October, 1959, the appellants were brought before different magistrates' courts, where it was found that they were in breach of the latter probation order in that they had associated. Both appellants were remanded to quarter sessions under section 6 (4) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948,[1] the magistrates certifying that the appellants had failed to comply with the

[Reported by A. D. RAWLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

[1] Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 6 (4): "Where the court of summary "jurisdiction [commits the proba- "tioner to custody or releases him on "bail until he can be brought before "the court of assize or quarter "sessions] then—(a) the court shall "send to the court of assize or quarter "sessions a certificate signed by a "justice of the peace, certifying that "the probationer has failed to comply "with such of the requirements of the "probation order as may be specified "in the certificate, together with such "other particulars of the case as may "be desirable; and a certificate pur- "porting to be so signed shall be "admissible as evidence of the failure "before the court of assize or quarter "sessions; and (b) where the proba- "tioner is brought or appears before "the court of assize or quarter ses- "sions, and it is proved to the "satisfaction of that court that he "has failed to comply with any of the "requirements of the probation order, "that court may deal with him, for "the offence in respect of which the "probation order was made, in any "manner in which the court could "deal with him if he had just been "convicted before that court of that "offence."

C. C. A.
1960
REGINA
v.
CHAPMAN.

requirements of the probation order. At quarter sessions the original offences were put to the appellants, and it was also put to them that they had been found in breach of the probation order by the magistrates' courts. This they admitted. They were not asked whether in fact they had associated and their case throughout was that they had met accidentally. The recorder, taking the view that the findings of the magistrates' courts were conclusive, regarded the appellants as having been committed to him for sentence, and sentenced each of them to 12 months' imprisonment. On appeal:—

Held, that the certificate which had to be sent forward by the magistrates' court when this procedure was adopted was not conclusive; while the certificate was admissible as evidence it was for quarter sessions to be satisfied that a breach of the probation order had been committed; the breaches of the probation orders should have been put to the appellants and they should have been asked to say whether they admitted them or not. If they admitted the matters put to them, the court could then have proceeded to deal with them. If the appellants had denied the breaches, they should have been proved; and for that purpose quarter sessions could treat the matter as if it was an appeal from the magistrates, hear further evidence and come to their own conclusion in the matter. Accordingly, there was a mistrial at quarter sessions, and in the circumstances the sentences would be quashed.

Reg. v. Devine [1956] 1 W.L.R. 236; [1956] 1 All E.R. 548 applied.

APPEALS against convictions.

The appellants, Oliver George Chapman and James George Pidgley, were both convicted at Andover Borough Sessions on February 6, 1958, of larceny of a handbag and its contents, and were put on probation for three years. In July of 1958 they were convicted at a magistrates' court of loitering with intent to steal, and one of them, Pidgley, also of larceny, and as a result they were brought before quarter sessions. The recorder on July 15, 1958, then made a new probation order for three years with a condition that they should not associate with each other, and at the same time he told them that if they met by chance they were not prohibited from conversing and what he was dealing with was true association. On October 15, 1959, Chapman, and on October 22, 1959, Pidgley, were brought before magistrates' courts and those courts adjudged that each of them had been in breach of that last probation order in that they had associated. Having done that, they remanded the appellants to quarter sessions. On October 27 the matter came before the recorder at quarter sessions again, when he sentenced each of them to 12 months' imprisonment.

At quarter sessions the original offences were put to the appellants, and it was also put to them that in Pidgley's case the Ringwood Magistrates' Court, and, in Chapman's case, the Salisbury and Amesbury Magistrates' Court, had found that they were in breach of the probation order by associating with each other, and they admitted that those magistrates' courts had so found. They were never asked in fact whether they admitted that they had associated, and it was clear that their case throughout was that they never did associate in the true sense of the word, but they had in fact met accidentally and were conversing, a matter which the recorder originally told them would not constitute a breach of probation. Not only were they not asked whether they had associated, but the recorder took the view that it was impossible for him to go behind the findings of the two magistrates' courts; he treated the findings of the magistrates' courts as conclusive and regarded the appellants as having been committeed to him for sentence.

F. H. L. Petre for the appellants.
Martin Tucker for the Crown.

No cases, other than that referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument.

LORD PARKER C.J., after stating the facts, continued: The question is whether the procedure adopted by the learned recorder was right, and that depends on the true construction of section 6 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948. By subsection (3) it is provided: "If it is proved to the satisfaction of the court before "which a probationer appears or is brought under this section "that the probationer has failed to comply with any of the "requirements of the probation order, that court may without "prejudice to the continuance of the probation order, impose on "him a fine not exceeding £10 . . . or may . . . (b) if the proba-"tion order was made by a court of assize or quarter sessions, "commit him to custody or release him on bail (with or "without sureties) until he can be brought or appear before the "court of assize or quarter sessions." Pausing there, both magistrates' courts in this case had it proved to their satisfaction that each appellant had failed to comply with the requirements of the probation order. They did not exercise their right to fine the appellants, but they then remanded them to quarter sessions under paragraph (b). Subsection (4) goes on: "Where the court "of summary jurisdiction deals with the case as provided in "paragraph (b) of the last foregoing subsection then—(a) the "court shall send to the court of assize or quarter sessions a "certificate signed by a justice of the peace, certifying that the "probationer has failed to comply with such of the requirements "of the probation order as may be specified in the certificate, "together with such other particulars of the case as may be "desirable; and a certificate purporting to be so signed shall be "admissible as evidence of the failure before the court of assize "or quarter sessions; and (b) where the probationer is brought or "appears before the court of assize or quarter sessions, and it is "proved to the satisfaction of that court that he has failed to "comply with any of the requirements of the probation order, "that court may deal with him, for the offence in respect of "which the probation order was made, in any manner in which

C. C. A.
1960
REGINA
v.
CHAPMAN.

"the court could deal with him if he had just been convicted "before that court of that offence."

The real question here is whether the certificate which has to be sent forward by the magistrates' court when this procedure is adopted is conclusive so that quarter sessions cannot go behind it. In the judgment of this court, it is not conclusive. It is not said to be conclusive but merely admissible. Further, by paragraph (b) of subsection (4) it is the court of quarter sessions that has to be satisfied that the probationer has failed to comply with the requirements. It is suggested that they can be satisfied that the requirements of the probation order have been fulfilled by looking at the certificate and the certificate alone, but as a matter of construction, that is clearly wrong, because paragraph (b) is in the form "where the probationer is brought or "appears before the court of assize or quarter sessions, and it is "proved to the satisfaction of that court." Paragraph (a) has already provided that where the probationer is to appear before quarter sessions there has to be a certificate, and yet the paragraph goes on to say that quarter sessions must be satisfied. It is clear from the framework of section 6 (4), taken as a whole, that Parliament never intended that the certificate of the justices should be final and conclusive. Indeed, looking at the matter from a rather broader angle, if that were right, and the certificate is conclusive, then it would follow that there was no machinery in the nature of appeal from a finding of the magistrate that there had been a breach of probation. It seems to this court that under paragraph (b) while the certificate is admissible, it is for the court of quarter sessions to be satisfied, and for that purpose they can treat the matter as if it was an appeal from the magistrates, hear further evidence and come to their own conclusion in the matter.

It follows that in such a case as this the procedure laid down in Reg. v. Devine [1] is applicable. It is true that Devine's case was dealing with a case of a probationer being brought before the court that had originally sentenced him; in other words, it was not a question of going to magistrates first, but the court there laid down the proper procedure as this [2]: "Where a defendant "is brought before a court for breach of a probation order, when "he is arraigned before the court the breach should be put to him "in the clearest possible terms and he should be asked to say "whether he admits it or not. The way in which it should be "put to him is as follows: he should be told the court at which "he was convicted; the offence of which he was convicted and "the terms of the probation order. He should then be told the "grounds upon which it is alleged that he has broken the terms "of the probation order. If the order has been broken by the "commission of a further offence, he should be told the court at "which he appeared, the offence with which he was charged and

[1] [1956] 1 W.L.R. 236; [1956] 1 All E.R. 548; 40 Cr.App.R. 45.

[2] [1956] 1 W.L.R. 236, 237; 40 Cr.App.R. 45, 46.

"the adjudication of the court. If he admits the matters put to "him, the court can then proceed to deal with him. If he denies "those matters they must be proved and it being a trial albeit "without a jury the defendant must be asked if he desires to give "evidence and call witnesses. After all the evidence has been "heard the court must pronounce whether it finds the breach "proved. It is, therefore, desirable that the proceedings should "begin by the matter being put clearly to the defendant and for "him to be asked whether he admits the allegation."

It seems to this court that that procedure is equally applicable to such a case as the present, where the matter has been in the first instance before a magistrates' court. It follows that in this case there has been a mistrial at quarter sessions from the outset. It is just as if a trial proceeded without prisoners being asked to plead, and in those circumstances it seems to this court that the proceeding was a nullity, and it would be open to this court to send the matter back for a retrial. It is to be observed, however, that these appellants have already been in prison since October 27 last, and, having regard the nature of the alleged breach, the court feels that justice would be done in this case if they merely quashed the sentence and did not send the matter back to quarter sessions. Accordingly, the appellants are now discharged.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Woodford & Ackroyd, Southampton; Registrar, Court of Criminal Appeal.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

* TAYLOR AND OTHERS v. MUNROW (DISTRICT AUDITOR).

1960
Jan. 28.

Lord Parker C.J., Cassels and Ashworth JJ.

Local Government—Powers—Duty to exercise statutory discretion—Resolution by local authority to bear whole of rent increases of derequisitioned properties—Whether periodic reviews called for—Requisitioned Houses and Housing (Amendment) Act, 1955 (3 & 4 Eliz. 2, c. 24), s. 4 (4).

Housing — Requisitioned houses — Recoverable rent — Rent increases in respect of requisitioned properties released to owners—Payment of increases by local authority—Whether duty of local authority to make periodic reviews—Requisitioned Houses and Housing (Amendment) Act, 1955, s. 4 (4).

The Requisitioned Houses and Housing (Amendment) Act, 1955, provides, by section 4 (1) and (2), that, where a local authority serves on the owner of a requisitioned dwelling a notice inviting him to accord to the licensee of the dwelling the status of a statutory tenant, and the owner gives notice of acceptance, the Rent Acts shall apply to the dwelling as if the licensee had retained possession by virtue of those Acts after the expiration of a tenancy at a rent equal to the standard rent as determined in accordance with the provisions of subsection (3). By subsection (4): "Except so far

1960

Taylor
v.
Munrow.

"as the local authority may from time to time determine, the rent "recoverable by the landlord of any such dwelling . . . from the "licensee or any statutory successor of his shall not exceed the rent "last payable by the licensee to the local authority under the "licence; and where the rent so recoverable . . . falls short of "the rent which would be recoverable apart from this subsection, the "local authority shall pay to the landlord an amount equal to "the difference."

A local authority, acting under the provisions of the Requisitioned Houses and Housing (Amendment) Act, 1955, from time to time derequisitioned numerous houses and in respect of many of them made payments to the owners in accordance with section 4 (4). Such houses became subject to the provisions of the Rent Act, 1957, relating to increase of rent. The local authority were duly notified of and had acceded to many rent increases but they carried out no general review of rents paid by the tenants of their derequisitioned properties and made no determination under section 4 (4), with the result that they themselves became liable to make additional payments to the owners. On October 9, 1957, the local authority resolved "that the council bears the full cost of any increases in "rent between the operative date of any valid notices received and "the date on which the council is able to make a formal decision," and on March 19, 1958, they resolved that ". . . the whole of the "valid rent increases under the Rent Act, 1957, in regard to all "tenancies of formerly requisitioned properties released to owners "under section 4 of the Requisitioned Houses and Housing (Amend-"ment) Act, 1955, be borne by the council." In passing the latter resolution the council approved and adopted a report and recommendation of the housing management committee from which it appeared that two of their reasons for that decision were that, as it was impossible to give consideration to individual cases without investigating the question of the tenant's income, which they were not prepared to do, the matter should be dealt with as one of policy, and that, as they considered the basis on which the rents of the properties were originally fixed was fair and reasonable, they saw no reason for raising them and were satisfied that by meeting the whole of the increases they would not be placing an unduly heavy burden on the rates. The district auditor considered that the local authority, by omitting to make determinations under section 4 (4) of the Act of 1955 consequent upon the coming into operation of the Rent Act, 1957, or to make such inquiries as might properly and reasonably have justified that omission, acted in a manner which was contrary to law, and had thereby incurred expenditure which he fixed at £200, and disallowed and surcharged jointly and severally upon 23 members of the council. On appeal by six of those members:—

Held, that the proper performance of the duty of a local authority towards the general body of ratepayers called for periodic reviews under section 4 (4) of the Act of 1955, and not only the rent but also the tenant's general ability or inability to pay were relevant considerations; that the council, in making arbitrary determinations without carrying out any such review, had acted in a manner which was inconsistent with that duty; and that, therefore, the resulting payments were contrary to law, and the district auditor was right in disallowing the £200 and surcharging it on the appellants.

Roberts v. Hopwood [1925] A.C. 578; 41 T.L.R. 436 applied.

Appeal under section 229 (1) of the Local Government Act, 1933, from a decision of a district auditor.

The appellants, Charles Arthur Taylor, David Goldhill, Hilda Mary Lane, John Lawrence, Philip Gerald Sheridan and Albert William Stallard, members of the St. Pancras Urban District Council, appealed from a decision of W. D. Munrow, the district auditor for the metropolitan borough of St. Pancras, dated January 20, 1959, in auditing the accounts for the year ending March 31, 1958, disallowing £200, part of an item debited to the Requisitioned Properties Revenue Account in the Housing General Ledger and described as "Contributions under section 4 (4)," included in the total expenditure in respect of requisitioned properties carried to the General Rate Fund Revenue Account, and surcharging that sum jointly and severally upon them and other members of the council.

The facts sufficiently appear from the judgment of Lord Parker C.J.

Ralph Millner for the appellants.

R. J. Parker for the district auditor.

The following cases were cited in argument: Reg. v. Roberts, Ex parte Scurr [1]; Roberts v. Hopwood [2]; and Pentecost v. London District Auditor. [3]

LORD PARKER C.J. This is an appeal from a decision dated January 20, 1959, of the district auditor for the metropolitan borough of St. Pancras, who surcharged 23 councillors of the St. Pancras Urban District Council jointly and severally with £200 which he found to have been unlawfully paid. Only the present six appellant members of the council have appealed.

The matter now comes before this court on appeal under section 229 of the Local Government Act, 1933, and the duties of the district auditor so far as they are relevant to this case are to be found in paragraphs (a), (b) and (d) of section 228 (1). That subsection, so far as it is material, reads as follows: "It shall be "the duty of the district auditor at every audit held by him— "(a) to disallow every item of account which is contrary to law; "(b) to surcharge the amount of any expenditure disallowed upon "the person responsible for incurring or authorising the expendi- "ture," and "(d) to surcharge the amount of any loss or "deficiency upon any person by whose negligence or misconduct "the loss or deficiency has been incurred."

The district auditor found that sums of not less than £200 ought to be disallowed in the accounts for the year ending March 31, 1958, as being contrary to law. He then went on under paragraph (b) to surcharge that sum upon the persons responsible for incurring or for authorising the expenditure, whom

[1] [1924] 2 K.B. 695; 40 T.L.R. 769.

[2] [1925] A.C. 578; 41 T.L.R. 436.

[3] [1951] 2 K.B. 759; [1951] 2 T.L.R. 497; [1951] 2 All E.R. 330.

1960

TAYLOR
v.
MUNROW.

Lord Parker C.J.

he held to be the 23 councillors, and under (d) he held that the loss or deficiency had arisen through their negligence.

It is necessary to state the position in a little detail in order to show how this decision came about. Prior to 1955, there was power in the Minister of Health to requisition premises under regulation 51 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939. In practice that power was delegated to the town clerks including to the town clerk of the St. Pancras Borough Council, and houses were thus requisitioned in the borough and used for housing persons. Those persons were not tenants in the strict sense but were licensees, and the payments that they made under the licence, whether you call them rent or not, were arrived at, broadly speaking, as the equivalent to the maximum rents payable under the Rent Acts or, if there was no controlled tenancy, the rent payable for comparable properties. Considerable discretion had to be exercised in fixing the rents to meet the circumstances. It might be, for instance, that some licensees were being housed in rather expensive property—what one might perhaps refer to as luxury flats—whereas the premises which they normally occupied, and which they may well have had to leave owing to enemy action, were of quite a different character. In such a case the licensee was only called upon to pay the rent which he would have paid for premises of the type which he normally occupied. Alternatively, it might be that for administrative reasons a very small family would be housed in rather large premises, when, again, they would not be asked to pay more by way of rent under the licence than they would pay for premises of the type and size they would normally occupy.

In 1955 the position was changed by the Requisitioned Houses and Housing (Amendment) Act, 1955. Under that Act the power of the Minister of Health, who had then become for this purpose the Minister of Housing and Local Government, was brought to an end, but his rights of occupation were transferred to the local authorities. Section 1 (1) provides: "On the commencement of "this Act, any power of the Minister to retain possession of "requisitioned houses shall be terminated, and the right to "possession of every such house shall vest in the appropriate "local authority." The appropriate local authority were permitted by subsection (2) to retain the possession of requisitioned premises until March 31, 1960, that is, this year.

It was also provided by that Act that the requisitioned premises might be derequisitioned and handed back to the owner, the landlord, if he was prepared to accord the sitting licensee, broadly speaking, the status of a statutory tenant, Thus, by section 4 (1) it is provided: "Any local authority may, subject to such "directions, if any, as may be given by the Minister, and shall, "if so required by the Minister, serve on the owners of such "requisitioned dwellings as may be decided by the authority or "specified by the Minister, as the case may be (being dwellings "of which possession is retained under this Act) a notice inviting

"those owners to accord to the licensees of the dwellings the "status of statutory tenants in consideration of payments to be "made by the local authority in accordance with this section by "way of compensation for loss of the right to vacant possession "on the release of the dwellings."

Section 4 (2) provides: "If within the period specified "in that behalf in any such notice of invitation the owner gives "to the local authority notice of acceptance in such form as may "be so specified, then— . . . (b) as from the expiration of that "period, the Rent Acts shall apply to the dwelling as if the "licensee had retained possession by virtue of those Acts after "the expiration of a tenancy at a rent equal to the standard rent "specified in subsection (3)," upon certain terms. Subsection (3) then set out what the standard rent should be.

The material provision for the purposes of these proceedings is section 4 (4), which provides: "Except so far as the local autho-"rity may from time to time determine, the rent recoverable by "the landlord of any such dwelling in respect of any period before "April 1, 1965, from the licensee or any statutory successor of "his shall not exceed the rent last payable by the licensee to the "local authority under the licence; and where the rent so recover-"able in respect of any such period falls short of the rent which "would be recoverable apart from this subsection, the local "authority shall pay to the landlord an amount equal to the "difference." Accordingly, put quite shortly, unless and until the local authority otherwise determines, the landlord, while he will get the full standard rent from someone, will only be able to get from the ex-licensee the rent which the ex-licensee had been paying under the licence. The difference between that and the standard rent as fixed by the subsection was to be borne by the local authority. Pausing there, the standard rent as fixed by section 4 (3) might be lower or might be higher than the rent being paid under the licence. If it was higher than that being paid under the licence, then by subsection (4) until the local authority otherwise determined the difference was to be borne by the local authority. On the other hand, in cases where it was lower, the landlord was only entitled to recover that lower rent, and, accordingly, an ex-licensee whose standard rent was lower than he had been paying would, in effect, have a reduction in rent and pay less.

The question with which we are concerned in these proceedings is the duty of the local authority under section 4 (4) to review the position, and as to the matters which they are entitled to consider on such a review. It is to be observed, first, that these derequisitioned premises, having become subject to the Rent Acts, were, amongst other things, subject to the Housing Repairs and Rents Act, 1954, under which provision was made, broadly speaking, for an increase of rent for improvement in the property. These premises also in due course become subject to the Rent Act, 1957, which, quite generally throughout the country, raised

1960

Taylor v. Munrow.

Lord Parker C.J.

the standard rents which landlords were entitled to get from their tenants.

This council made no determination whatsoever under section 4 (4) of the Act of 1955, and, when the Act of 1957 was passed, and the matter was brought to their attention not only by Ministry circular but by the town clerk, they refused to determine otherwise within the meaning of subsection (4) and continued to bear the difference, a difference which had been increased in some cases by the exercise by landlords of their powers under the Housing Repairs and Rents Act, 1954, and also increased by reason of their powers under the Rent Act, 1957.

Perhaps the two most relevant resolutions of the council—certainly those relied upon by the district auditor—are those passed on October 9, 1957, and March 19, 1958. On October 9, 1957, the council had before them a report of the housing management committee of September 16. They had various cases before them in which they were told that notices of rent increases had been served by the landlord, and perhaps it is relevant that under the Act of 1957 notices of increase in rent which landlords had to serve on their tenants were required also to be served on the local authority. As a result of that meeting the council adopted and approved the recommendation of the housing committee, which was in these terms: "That the council "bears the full cost of any increases in rent between the operative "date of any valid notices received and the date on which the "council is able to make a formal decision."

On March 5, 1958, the position was again reviewed by the housing management committee, and they recommended by seven to four, as appears in the council's minute: "That, having "regard to the foregoing observations on the position generally, "the whole of the valid rent increases under the Rent Act, 1957, "in regard to all tenancies of formerly requisitioned properties "released to owners under section 4 of the Requisitioned Houses "and Housing (Amendment) Act, 1955, be borne by the council." In putting forward that recommendation they put forward a number of reasons, to which I must refer later. The matter came before the full council on March 19, 1958, the motion was put to the vote, a division was taken and by 26 to 20 the recommendation of the housing management committee was adopted.

The district auditor has given his reasons in a long document of some seventeen pages, to which are appended various schedules and various extracts from the transcript of the evidence which he heard. In my judgment, the district auditor's reasons, if I may say so, are most admirably stated and, as will appear later, not only am I not satisfied that they are wrong but I feel very inclined to adopt them as they stand. He came to the conclusion that this council did not have what I may call an absolute discretion under section 4 (4) of the Act of 1955, but a discretion under which they were bound to act reasonably, preserving a balance between the duty which they owed to the general body of ratepayers and the duty they owed to these particular tenants. He went on to hold that this council had never really faced the problem at all within the ambit of their duty, and that the sums which had been paid under section 4 (4) were, to the extent of £200 at least, paid in breach of their duty and, accordingly, were in law unlawful payments. Upon that he surcharged the councillors and found them guilty of negligence as well.

The first question that arises is the extent of the duty of a council where by statute they are given a discretion. The classic authority on the matter is to be found in Roberts v. Hopwood,[1] often referred to as the Poplar case. The Poplar Borough Council had power under the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, to "employ . . . such . . . servants as may be necessary, and may "allow to such . . . servants . . . such . . . wages as [the council] "may think fit." The council in that case had fixed a minimum wage of £4 for every employee, regardless of the nature of the work he was to do, and regardless of the fact that the cost of living had fallen during the year from 176 per cent. to 82 per cent. above the pre-war level. It was held in the House of Lords: "That the discretion conferred upon the council by the statute "must be exercised reasonably, and that the fixing by the "council of an arbitrary sum for wages without regard to existing "labour conditions was not an exercise of that discretion." It was also held: "That an expenditure upon a lawful object might "be so excessive as to be unlawful, and that to the extent by "which the amount exceeded legality the auditor was bound to "disallow it and surcharge the excess upon the persons "responsible."

I find it unnecessary, at this stage, to read any passages from the speeches in that case. It is enough to say that the nature of the duty must, of course, be ascertained from the words of the section in question and their context, but it was clearly held there that where the matter is something with which the auditor can deal by way of surcharge, in other words when it is paying money out of a fund provided by the general body of ratepayers, the council must preserve a balance between the duty owed to that general body of ratepayers and the duty owed to the particular ratepayer in respect of whom the payment is made. Accordingly, whatever the exact wording of the section may be—and it is pointed out by Mr. Millner in his able argument that the wording here is quite different from the wording of section 113 (4) of the Housing Act, 1957, where periodical review is provided for—I am quite satisfied that under those words a periodic review is necessary if their duty is to be performed.

Mr. Parker, in his argument for the district auditor, has indicated a number of different matters which may from time to time arise, all of which, if their duty is to be performed, must necessitate a reconsideration of the matter. It may be that on

[1] [1925] A.C. 578.

1960

Taylor v. Munrow.

Lord Parker C.J.

de-requisition there ought to be a consideration. Certainly the council must keep abreast of what is happening from time to time and collect information to see what is the position. As the sub-section provides, the benefit of it devolves upon a statutory successor. It is said that the statutory successor may be a son in very affluent circumstances, and that, if the duty owed to the general body of ratepayers is to be properly borne in mind, the council must consider at any rate the fact that that statutory successor is in very different financial circumstances. Again, it is said by Mr. Parker that whenever the controlled rent is raised, whether it be under the Housing Repairs and Rents Act, 1954, or, as in most of these cases, under the Rent Act, 1957, there must be a review. Indeed, it is only right to say that the council themselves realised that the passing of the Act of 1957 and the notices served by landlords as a result did call for a consideration of the matter.

The reasons which the council gave are set out in that minute to which I have referred of March 19, 1958. They said that they felt that they had a moral obligation to treat these tenants in the same way as they treated their council tenants. They drew attention to the fact that the de-requisitioned property was in a very poor condition and provided a relatively low standard of accommodation. They went on to say that the tenants formed a particularly unfortunate section of the population. Finally, they said: "We consider that the basis on which the rents of "these properties was fixed originally was a fair and reasonable "one, and we see no reason for raising them; having regard to "the fact that 75 per cent. of the cost will normally be met by the "Exchequer until March 31, 1960, we are satisfied that by "meeting the whole of these increases the council will not be "placing an unduly heavy burden on the rates." Those reasons were introduced by this statement: "We consider that it is "impossible to give consideration to individual cases without "investigating the question of the tenants' income, and this we "are not prepared to do. In these circumstances we have agreed "that the matter should be dealt with as one of principle."

So far as the reasons are concerned, the district auditor went through each one of them in great particularity, and has made it—to me, at any rate—abundantly clear that there is nothing whatsoever in those reasons; in fact, the district auditor's criticism of them and the facts he found are barely criticised. Indeed, it is, I think, admitted that the real reason for the decision arrived at by the council was twofold: (1) that as a matter of policy they would never adopt what is referred to as a means test, and (2) that they thoroughly disliked the action of Parliament in passing the Rent Act, 1957, and raising rents generally throughout the country.

Whatever the council may say as to having taken into consideration the general body of ratepayers, at the end of the day, if I may use that expression, it is a matter of what is the true inference behind their determination. There are two passages which I will read, one, if not both, of which clearly created an impression on the district auditor. The first is in the evidence of Councillor Lawrence: "We feel very strongly about it. As "far as we are concerned we consider that this is the crux of "the whole business. There is definite interference stemming "from three borough councillors who, for the purpose, have "transformed themselves into ratepayers; they raised objection "at audit and tried to overthrow by this method decisions which "they have fought all the time and have been defeated in the "council. They do not object merely to the payments in respect "of the de-requisitioned tenants, they object to the whole of the "council's rent policy. Our attitude towards the derequisitioned "tenants arises from the policy of this council. We do not "believe that the circumstances at the moment justify a local "authority imposing rent increases on its tenants. That is our "political position, we honestly believe that, we fight for that, "and, bearing that in mind, the fact that we have refused to "impose or permit to be imposed rent increases on the derequisi-"tioned tenants follows consequentially."

Finally, almost at the end of his evidence, the district auditor asks: "Were you aware, when you came to the decision, that "the basis upon which you were dealing with derequisitioned "premises was not being followed by other borough councils in "London? (Councillor John Lawrence): No; on the contrary, I "discussed the matter with a councillor in south London and he "told me they were doing the same, and I congratulated him. "Subsequently I found they had not done the same; it was a "case of fifty-fifty and they lost their nerve. I am a member of "the Metropolitan Boroughs' Standing Joint Committee; this "problem of derequisitioned rents is constantly coming up, and "I only wish that all the Labour-controlled bodies in London "would take the same action as we, and protect the tenants from "the Rent Act."

If that be so, if that was the real reason behind these decisions of the council, in my judgment they were purely arbitrary decisions. They were not decisions arrived at through the council fulfilling their duty to the general body of ratepayers amongst others. In many ways the position is rather like that in Roberts v. Hopwood.[2] One could refer to a number of passages which bear out the similarity, but I will refer to a passage in the speech of Lord Sumner who, after referring to judgments of Lord Russell C.J. and Farwell L.J. in Thomas v. Devonport Corporation[3] and Rex v. Roberts,[4] said[5]: "One of the ways in which a "payment may be illegal, is, as Lord Russell C.J. says, that it is "not within the authority or not in accordance with the duty of "the council. By questions of policy I understand Farwell L.J.

[2] [1925] A.C. 578.
[3] [1900] 1 Q.B. 16, 21; 16 T.L.R. 9.
[4] [1908] 1 K.B. 407, 435; 24 T.L.R. 226.
[5] [1925] A.C. 578, 605.

1960

TAYLOR v. MUNROW.

Lord Parker C.J.

"to mean such matters as the necessity for a urinal and the "choice of its position, provided no public or private nuisance is "created"—and he refers to certain cases—"and similar ques-"tions of policy. The word, however, is policy, not politics, and "I can find nothing in the Acts empowering bodies, to which the "Metropolis Management Act, 1855, applies, which authorises "them to be guided by their personal opinions on political, "economic or social questions in administering the funds which "they derive from levying rates." Later he said[6]: "To my "mind a council acts for a collateral purpose, if it fixes by "standards of its own on social grounds a minimum wage for all "adults, and is not in so doing acting for the benefit of the whole "community."

It is perhaps worth adding a passage from the speech of Lord Atkinson who, dealing with the view taken by the council, said[7]: "Nobody has contended that the council should be bound by any "of these things"—by "these things" he was referring to trade union rates, the cost of living, and so on, in fixing wages—"but it "is only what justice and common sense demand that, when deal-"ing with funds contributed by the whole body of the ratepayers, "they should take each and every one of these enumerated things "into consideration in order to help them to determine what was "a fair, just and reasonable wage to pay their employees for the "services the latter rendered. The council would, in my view, "fail in their duty if, in administering funds which did not belong "to their members alone, they put aside all these aids to the "ascertainment of what was just and reasonable remuneration "to give for the services rendered to them, and allowed them-"selves to be guided in preference by some eccentric principles of "socialistic philanthropy." Then he said[8]: "A body charged "with the administration for definite purposes of funds con-"tributed in whole or in part by persons other than the members "of that body, owes, in my view, a duty to those latter persons "to conduct that administration in a fairly businesslike manner "with reasonable care, skill and caution, and with a due and "alert regard to the interest of those contributors who are not "members of the body. Towards these latter persons the body "stands somewhat in the position of trustees or managers of the "property of others."

I have come to the conclusion that the district auditor's findings were abundantly justified, and that it is quite impossible to say that he has gone wrong in law. In deference to Mr. Millner's argument I should refer to a number of points he made. He said, first, that the district auditor had misconstrued section 4 (4) of the Act of 1955, and the effect of the Act of 1957 on that section. He also said that the various Ministry circulars which had been brought to the attention of the council, to which I find it unnecessary to refer, had themselves misconstrued section 4 (4) of the

[6] [1925] A.C. 578, 606.
[7] Ibid. 594.
[8] Ibid. 595.

Act of 1955. He pointed out, as I have already said, that the wording here is quite different from the wording of the Housing Act, 1957, which calls specifically for periodic review. If I understand him aright, he seeks to say that the local authority have no duty at all to make any review except in so far as they think it should be done. That seems to me an absolute discretion which is not to be found there. Indeed, I think he really departs from that argument because he concedes, amongst other things, that the controlled rent from time to time must be a relevant consideration if one is making a determination. If, therefore, what was a relevant consideration, namely, the old controlled rent, has gone up, then one of the matters which was a relevant consideration originally has altered, and it must be necessary for the council then in the performance of their duty to make a review of the matter. In truth and in fact the wording of section 4 (4) calls for periodic review, although it does not say so in express words.

He then points to the fact that Parliament, when it passed the Rent Act, 1957, although it amended certain provisions of the Act of 1955, left subsection (4) of section 4 intact. I think, if I understand his argument, it is that if Parliament had intended that a rise in controlled rents should be an occasion upon which the local authority should review the matter under section 4 (4), it would have said so. I do not understand that argument. It is quite true that the Act of 1957 does not touch section 4 (4) at all. But all that that means is that whatever was the duty of the local authority before the Act of 1957, remained their duty after the passing of the Act of 1957. He then says that the council in this case were not acting unreasonably, that they were performing their duty, and that all they were doing was to put into action their bona fide policy, which was that on no account would they consider the ability to pay of individual tenants, and that there was no occasion for increasing the rents. I have already dealt with what I think was the real reason, and I think that whether you call it policy or politics matters not. The whole question is whether the action, be it policy or politics, was consistent with the duty the council owed to the general body of ratepayers.

There has been much talk about the means test, but I find it quite unnecessary to go into that matter. All that I think is being referred to by the district auditor is a general ability or inability to pay, and it seems to me that that must be a relevant consideration. Indeed, it is not without interest to see that this council, while going out of their way to say they would be no party to a consideration of ability to pay, have and do take that into consideration in fixing the rents of their tenants in council houses. I believe that the real reason as disclosed here is that they felt that the action of Parliament in the Rent Act, 1957, was wrong, and they were not going to allow landlords of derequisitioned premises to recover from the tenants any part of the general increase in rents provided for by that Act.

1960

Taylor v. Munrow.

Lord Parker C.J.

I should say this: that I think it is not unfair, in considering whether the council have acted reasonably in the performance of their duty, to consider two matters which have resulted from that action. I have already said that the standard rent fixed under the Act of 1955 might be lower than the rent being paid under the licence, in which case the tenant only paid the standard rent. So determined, however, were this council to consider not individual cases but the matter as one of principle, that they completely omitted to see that they were through the years paying the difference between the two amounts, namely, the full difference between the old standard rent and the new standard rent. They had no power to that under section 4 (4) at all, because all they had power to do was to pay the difference between the new standard rent and the amount which had been paid under the licence which, in these cases, was higher than the old standard rent. To that extent they missed entirely seeing that they were making ultra vires payments. Another thing that has resulted is this: it is found, and the council so stated, that in many cases these properties were in a state of disrepair and were cases in which tenants, if they applied, could get certificates of disrepair. If they got those certificates of disrepair, a landlord would not be able to get the full increase permitted by the Act of 1957 unless he did certain repairs or undertook to do those repairs. The council, however, decided that they would pay the full difference between the licence rent and the new standard rent which the landlord was demanding. That was the standard rent which he was not entitled to exact if the tenant took certain steps in the form of getting a certificate of disrepair. To that extent this policy of theirs resulted in what is really, however you look at it, a gift to the landlord, in that he was getting something he was not entitled to get if the tenant was encouraged to take, and did take, the appropriate steps. In my judgment, those are quite relevant matters to consider when one is asking oneself the question: Was this council performing its duty as laid down in Roberts v. Hopwood? [9]

There were two other small matters raised by Mr. Millner. He said, in the first place, that the district auditor was wrong in finding, as he did, that the tenants of these derequisitioned premises were a fair cross-section during the year of review of the council tenants generally. That was a matter of the construction of the evidence given, I think, by the housing manager, and I find no reason to say that the district auditor was wrong in making that finding. It is also said that, at any rate, he was wrong in finding that some of these tenants had the ability to pay more, and therefore was wrong in saying that there were excess payments to the extent of £200. I think he had ample evidence upon which he could arrive at that conclusion and, as the case emerged, it seemed quite clear that the £200 could be justified in whole, or

[9] [1925] A.C. 578.

1960

TAYLOR v. MUNROW.

Lord Parker C.J.

certainly to a large extent, by reason of the ultra vires payments to which I have referred, and payments made to landlords in cases where the council knew that if the tenants took steps to get certificates of disrepair they would not be entitled to them. Those two matters alone produce a figure in the neighbourhood of £200, and it seems to me quite idle to say that the district auditor could not find that at least £200 was an unlawful payment. Indeed, I think he was being very considerate to the councillors.

Finally, it is said that the district auditor was wrong in finding that the appellants were negligent. I find it unnecessary to go into that. Under paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 228 (2) of the Local Government Act, 1933, he was, as I have said, perfectly entitled to disallow this sum and to surcharge the appellants. It is unnecessary, therefore, to go on and consider the further question of whether this can be said to be a case of loss or deficiency through negligence. I do not propose to deal with that matter. Accordingly, in my judgment, the district auditor's reasons were right and this appeal should be dismissed.

CASSELS J. I agree.

ASHWORTH J. I also agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Gaster & Turner; Sharpe, Pritchard & Co.

J. F. L.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.]

C. C. A.

1960 Jan. 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29; Feb. 2.

Finnemore, Davies and Hinchcliffe JJ.

* REGINA v. DAWSON.
REGINA v. WENLOCK.

Criminal Law — Conspiracy — Complicated charge of — Undesirability —Whether one conspiracy—Substantive charges to be considered first.

Criminal Law—Fraud—Credit by, obtaining—Sale—Agreement for—Price paid—Goods not delivered (post, p. 175).

Criminal Law—Court of Criminal Appeal—Substitution of verdict—Alternative counts—Convictions on both—No rule that lesser charge should be preferred—Criminal Appeal Act, 1907 (7 Edw. 7, c. 23), s. 5 (2).

Criminal Law—Evidence—Previous testimony of accused—Bankruptcy proceedings, in—Admissibility—Larceny Act, 1916 (6 & 7 Geo. 5, c. 50), ss. 20, 43 (2), (3).

Criminal Law—Indictment—Need for few counts—Inclusion of charges rejected at preliminary inquiry—Undesirability—Conspiracy count joined with substantive counts—Undesirability.

D. and W. were convicted of conspiracy to cheat and defraud. The indictment included, in addition to the count for conspiracy,

C. C. A.

1960

REGINA
v.
DAWSON.

14 substantive counts for false pretences, obtaining credit by fraud, and fraudulent conversion, some of which had been rejected by the magistrate at the preliminary hearing. D. was charged on every substantive count and W. on two. The conspiracy alleged was that D and W., with four other accused, had conspired with four companies and other persons unknown between November 1, 1954, and December 31, 1957, to cheat and defraud such persons as might be induced to part with moneys and goods in connection with transactions relating to the purchase, sale and processing of orange juice concentrate, and the purchase, sale and conversion of buses, bogies and landing vehicles, and such persons as might be induced to discount bills of exchange accepted by D. or the companies, by false pretences and by fraudulent conversion, and by other false or fraudulent devices. D. was also convicted on nine other counts, two being alternative counts of false pretences and obtaining credit by fraud, and one of fraudulent conversion, contrary to section 20 (1) (iv) (a) of the Larceny Act, 1916. In relation to that charge the judge admitted in evidence answers given by D. in his public examination in bankruptcy. W. was convicted on the two substantive counts on which he was also charged. After a nine-week hearing the judge, in summing up, directed the jury to consider the whole case first and form a view of the conspiracy before proceeding to the substantive charges.

D. and W. appealed against their convictions:—

Held, (1) that where a charge of conspiracy in addition to substantive charges was laid, the jury should be directed to consider first the substantive charges (post, p. 171).

(2) That the conspiracy charged was not one but a number of conspiracies, and it was no more correct to charge several conspiracies (although called one conspiracy) in one count than it was to include other different charges in one count. Moreover, the inclusion of a long count of such a kind was highly undesirable and unnecessary, as it had lengthened the case enormously and worked injustice on at least one of the appellants. Accordingly, the convictions for conspiracy would be quashed (post, p. 172).

Observations of Sankey J. in Rex v. Luberg (1926) 19 Cr.App.R. 133, 137, and Rex v. Cooper and Compton (1947) 32 Cr.App.R. 102 applied.

Rex v. Meyrick and Ribuffi (1929) 21 Cr.App.R. 94, and Regina v. Hammersley (1958) 42 Cr.App.R. 207 distinguished.

Per curiam. Where there are substantive charges which can be proved it is, in general, undesirable to add a charge of conspiracy; it can work injustice on the defendants because evidence otherwise inadmissible on the substantive charges against certain defendants becomes admissible; it adds to the length and complexity of the case, so that the trial may become unworkable and impose an intolerable strain upon the court and jury (post, p. 170).

(3) That, although the Court of Appeal was not acting as a sort of super-jury, it had to see that the verdict was reasonable in view of the actual evidence including the documents on which much of the present case depended (post, p. 170).

W.'s convictions would be quashed.

(4) That where there were alternative counts in an indictment and the jury had convicted on both, there was no rule that the conviction should be treated as if it had been on the lesser charge. It was the duty of the court to look at the realities of the position and as here a false pretence had clearly been made out, the proper count on which to register the conviction was that charging the false pretence; accordingly, the conviction of D. on that count would be affirmed and that on the alternative count quashed (post, p. 173).

Rex v. Smith (1915) 11 Cr.App.R. 81, and Rex v. Johnson (1913) 9 Cr.App.R. 262 considered.

(5) That section 43 (2) of the Larceny Act, 1916,[1] did not apply to bankruptcy proceedings, but protection in relation to such proceedings was afforded by section 43 (3), and, accordingly, evidence of answers given by D. in his public examination on bankruptcy was inadmissible (post, p. 174); but that as the evidence admitted could have had no effect on the minds of the jury, and as there was clear evidence of fraudulent conversion, the court would apply the proviso to section 4 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, and confirm the conviction on that count (post, p. 175).

(6) That in the result the convictions of D. on three counts, for fraudulent conversion, false pretences and obtaining credit by fraud, would be affirmed, and the other convictions quashed. The appeal of W. would be allowed.

Per curiam. It is an undesirable practice, although such a course is permissible and in certain cases necessary, to include in an indictment charges which have been rejected by the magistrate at the preliminary hearing as it may cause hardship on the defendants, and the right to include such charges should be carefully watched.

APPEALS against conviction.

On January 6, 1959, the appellant, George John Frederick Dawson, was charged with the appellant, Albert Wenlock, and four other men, with conspiracy to cheat and defraud. The indictment also contained 14 substantive counts including four for false pretences, six for obtaining credit by fraud, one for fraudulent conversion and three for other offences. Dawson was charged on all 14 substantive counts and Wenlock on one count for false pretences and one for aiding and abetting Dawson in obtaining credit by fraud. All 14 counts related to the series of transactions described in the count for conspiracy. The count for conspiracy charged the appellants and the other accused with conspiring between November 1, 1954, and December 31, 1957, together with one George Ernest Barker (otherwise known as Arya), Michael Eaton Eland, Orchard Gold Ltd., Orchard Gold Producers Ltd., Smarden Fruit Juices Ltd., Bulk Containers Ltd. and with other persons unknown to cheat and defraud such persons as might be induced to part with moneys and goods in connection with transactions relating to the purchase, sale, barrelling, bottling and processing of orange juice concentrate, and the purchase, sale and conversion of buses, bogies and landing vehicles, and such persons as might be induced to discount or [1] Larceny Act, 1916, s. 43: "(2) No person shall be liable to be "convicted of any offence against "sections . . . 20 . . . of this Act "upon any evidence whatever in "respect of any act done by him, if "at any time previously to his being "charged with such offence he has "first disclosed such act on oath, in "consequence of any compulsory "process of any court of law or equity "in any action, suit, or proceeding "which has been bona fide instituted "by any person aggrieved. (3) In "any proceedings in respect of any "offence against sections . . . 20 . . . "of this Act, a statement or admission made by any person in any "compulsory examination or deposition before any court on the hearing "of any matter in bankruptcy shall "not be admissible in evidence "against that person."

C. C. A.
1960
REGINA
v.
DAWSON.

accept liability in respect of bills of exchange accepted by Dawson or by the companies, by false pretences and by fraudulent conversion, and by divers other false and fraudulent devices.

Both Dawson and Wenlock were convicted of conspiracy. Dawson was also convicted on three counts of false pretences (counts 2, 6 and 7), on five counts of obtaining credit by fraud (counts 4, 8, 9, 12 and 14, count 8 being an alternative count to count 7), and of fraudulent conversion (count 11). He was sentenced to six years' imprisonment on the conspiracy count and to lesser concurrent terms on the other nine counts. Wenlock was convicted on the two counts on which he was charged (counts 2 and 14), both of which concerned contracts for the sale of orange juice in which he had acted as an agent. He was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for conspiracy and to concurrent terms of one year's imprisonment on the other two counts.

The facts relating to the counts on which this case is reported are referred to in the judgment.

The trial lasted nine weeks. At the beginning of the summing up Judge Aarvold directed the jury " not to put blinkers on " but to look at all the circumstances of the case and make up their minds on the whole matter. In conclusion he said: " You may " think a good way to approach the problem would be by " considering the first count in the indictment first, that is the " count of conspiracy, and making up your minds whether it has " been proved that in this case there was a conspiracy in being, " was there a course of fraudulent conduct agreed by that list of " people. If there was not such a course of fraudulent conduct " then you would acquit everybody at once. If there was such a " course of fraudulent conduct you would have to consider who " took part in it, and when you made up your minds which, if " any, of the defendants had taken part in it, you would then " have to consider when they took part in that dishonest and " fraudulent conduct did they know that is what they were doing. " Were they willing participants in dishonest acts?

" When you have dealt with the first count of the indictment " in that way, the rest of the counts in the indictment may fall " into a very much smaller compass and be more simple to " decide. Because, of course, if you find any one is not taking " part in the fraudulent conduct, if there was such a thing, you " would acquit that person, and you would acquit that person of " all the counts in which he was involved.

" If you find a particular person was knowingly taking part in " dishonesty and fraud in the way it is suggested, then you would " have to turn to the particular count in the indictment with " which that particular person is concerned, and then you would " have to ask yourselves whether the other matters alleged have " been proved to your satisfaction.

" In the case of obtaining money or credit by false pretences, " you will ask yourselves whether it was the fraudulent conduct "of the person concerned which operated on the mind of the "person who parted with his money.

"You may think it simpler to consider after you come to your "decision on the conspiracy charge."

Dawson appealed against conviction and sentence on the grounds, inter alia, of misdirection in law by the judge in failing to direct the jury that alleged acts of misconduct in connection with an amorphous agglomeration of entirely separate transactions between different and unassociated people at different times and places could not be tried as one conspiracy; in directing the jury to consider the whole circumstances of the case first and then to proceed to consider the substantive counts; and that evidence had been admitted of various transactions when the magistrate had ruled at the preliminary hearing that no ground of complaint had been disclosed in relation to them. On counts 7 and 8 (which were in the alternative), he alleged misdirection by the judge in failing to direct the jury that they should not convict on both; on count 11, charging him with fraudulent conversion contrary to section 20 (1) (iv) (a) of the Larceny Act, 1916, that the judge had wrongly admitted answers given by him (Dawson) at his compulsory examination in bankruptcy, contrary to section 43 (2) and (3) of the Act.

Wenlock appealed against his conviction for conspiracy on the ground that the conspiracy count of the indictment was bad in law in that, although it purported to charge a general conspiracy to cheat and defraud over a period of three years, in reality a number of separate conspiracies were charged in one count; and that, to avoid a miscarriage of justice and prejudice in the minds of the jury, he should have been granted a separate trial confined to those persons charged with, and those acts in furtherance of a conspiracy dealing with transactions relating to the purchase and sale of orange juice. He appealed against his convictions on counts 2 and 14 on the ground of misdirection by the judge in regard to the evidence.

The case is reported on counts 1, 2, 7, 8, 11 and 14. Counts 4, 6 and 9, on which Dawson's convictions were quashed by the court, and count 12, on which the conviction was affirmed, do not call for report.

John Platts-Mills for Dawson.

James Burge for Wenlock.

Mervyn Griffith-Jones and John Charles Mathew for the Crown.

The following cases were cited in argument: Rex v. Luberg [2]; Rex v. West [3]; Rex v. Cooper and Compton [4]; Osborne v.

[2] (1926) 19 Cr.App.R. 133.
[3] [1948] 1 K.B. 709; 64 T.L.R. 241; [1948] 1 All E.R. 718.
[4] (1947) 32 Cr.App.R. 102; 63 T.L.R. 561; 2 All E.R. 701.

C. C. A.
1960
REGINA
v.
DAWSON.

Barton[5]; Regina v. Ingram[6]; Rex v. Johnson[7]; Rex v. Smith[8]; Rex v. Lurie[9]; Rex v. Laurens[10]; Rex v. Hooley[11]; Rex v. Meyrick and Ribuffi[12]; Regina v. Hammersley[13]; Regina v. Wickham[14]; Regina v. Boulton[15]; Regina v. Noel.[16]

Cur. adv. vult.

February 2. FINNEMORE J. delivered the following judgment of the court: These are appeals by George John Frederick Dawson, who was sentenced to six years' imprisonment and various lesser terms running concurrently, and Albert Wenlock, who was sentenced to two years' imprisonment in total, against their convictions and sentences at the Central Criminal Court. It is necessary to say that it was a case of very great length and considerable complexity which lasted, we are told, for nine weeks at the Central Criminal Court, and the appeal has taken two full weeks to hear in this court. It is also right to say here that we are indebted to counsel on both sides for having put their submissions to us so clearly. There was a mass of evidence which had to be considered. There were some 15 counts, one count for conspiracy to cheat and defraud, and 14 other counts dealing with various substantive charges. There was, we are told, obviously some difficulty in framing the charges because they changed from time to time before the accused were committed and, indeed, before the indictment itself was settled. There were several charges rejected by the chief magistrate at the preliminary hearing, some of which nevertheless appeared in the indictment. That course is permissible and in certain cases may be necessary, but we think it right to say, as has been said by other judges before us, that it is an undesirable practice and can easily in some cases work hardship on defendants, and the right to prefer in the indictment charges which the magistrate has rejected is one which ought to be very carefully regarded. This may be the reason (the difficulty of framing some of these charges) why count 1 charging the conspiracy to cheat and defraud was included.

I hope this judgment is not going to be unduly long, but we are anxious not to keep those concerned in suspense and, still more, we do not wish to raise false hopes which might easily be raised in view of the opinion we have formed on a number of the counts. I propose, therefore, to say at once what is the final result of our decision, and then briefly to indicate the reasons count by count.

[5] [1951] 66 T.L.R. (Pt. 1) 115.
[6] [1956] 2 Q.B. 424; [1956] 2 All E.R. 639.
[7] (1913) 9 Cr.App.R. 57.
[8] (1915) 11 Cr.App.R. 81.
[9] (1951) 35 Cr.App.R. 113; [1951] 2 T.L.R. 686; [1951] 2 All E.R. 704.
[10] (1915) 11 Cr.App.R. 215.
[11] (1922) 16 Cr.App.R. 171; 38 T.L.R. 724.
[12] (1929) 21 Cr.App.R. 94; 45 T.L.R. 421.
[13] (1958) 42 Cr.App.R. 207.
[14] (1839) 10 A. & E. 34.
[15] (1871) 12 Cox C.C. 87.
[16] [1914] 3 K.B. 848.

As far as Wenlock is concerned, his appeal will be allowed and the conviction quashed. Dawson's case is very different, and, while we are going to quash a number of convictions, we say at once that there are several counts upon which he was properly convicted which were serious cases of fraud, and the final result will be that we shall change the sentence overall from six years, to which he was sentenced, to one of four years.

Wenlock was convicted on only two counts, 2 and 14, plus the conspiracy. The first was in January, 1955, and the second in September, 1956. There was only one other matter in which he was concerned, count 5, on which there was an acquittal, which happened in April, 1955. With all the other charges he had nothing to do, either directly or indirectly. He was an agent trying to negotiate contracts, mostly on the Continent and in particular in Germany, a country from which we believe he originally came. We think Mr. Burge was right when he said that all the contemporary documents in this case, assuming they were genuine, go to prove Wenlock's bona fides, and there is no proof that we can see that these documents were not in fact genuine.

In count No. 2, the Shimwell contract, the whole case depended on an alleged contract signed by Wenlock as the agent for the Salvicta Co., and, in our view, there was nothing to show that that was not a genuine contract. The person who could have proved it to be not genuine—Mr. Berger from Salvicta—was not called, and we think there is no evidence that it was in fact other than a genuine contract as far as Wenlock was concerned. With regard to the second substantive charge on which he was convicted, count 14, it must be remembered that by that time he had fallen out with Dawson, had already issued two writs against him and written some rather violent letters. Again, the chief thing against him was what was alleged to be a mala fide contract in which he certainly drew what we may call a pro forma contract between the proposed seller, Pearson, and the buyer, F. C. Peterson, whose agent he was represented to be, but that was not in fact a contract, as Wenlock himself said at the interview; and fortunately for him, he had the good sense to write a letter immediately after saying in terms to Pearson: "Of "course this is not a contract." He wrote in the letter that it was the sort of contract he hoped and believed Peterson would be prepared to make, but he was not authorised to sign a contract and there would not be one until Peterson confirmed it from Germany. That seems to this court really to dispose of the contention that Wenlock was putting forward a bogus contract in order to deceive Peterson as part of a conspiracy. It would be a conspirator deliberately warning and putting the proposed victim on guard. The other matter which was alleged against him was that each of the proposed contracts, said to be the bait for the victim, went off for trivial reasons. This court does not think that was really made out, because the trivial reason in the Shimwell case was the failure to produce quickly the performance bond, the

C. C. A.
1960
REGINA
v.
DAWSON.

importance of which had been admittedly emphasised by Wenlock orally and also in letters. In the second case of Pearson there was a matter which was certainly not trivial. The German buyers found out that the orange juice was being emptied from tins into barrels and on that closed the contract, because by that time orange juice in tins was suspect and they were not prepared to go on with the contract under those circumstances.

We think that Wenlock is really a typical example of a man who was sunk by means of a mass of evidence about frauds of different kinds, with the great majority of which he had no connection either direct or indirect, and in which he took no part whatever, and in which his name was never even mentioned. What this court has to consider is whether we are acting as a sort of super-jury and trying to alter the verdict of the jury who saw and heard the witnesses, a verdict with which this court is extremely reluctant to interfere in any way, but we think we ought to say this: This court has the overall duty of seeing that there is no miscarriage of justice. It has to see that the verdict is reasonable in view of the actual evidence, and in this case we have ourselves seen the documents on which so much of the case depended. We want to make it quite plain that we are not in any way criticising the jury, nor are we criticising the judge, who, if we may say so, subject, of course, to some matters which were quite inevitable in a case of this great length, summed this case up quite fairly, and put quite properly to the jury the defences which had been put forward by the accused people. However, we have come to the view that the conviction of Wenlock on counts 2 and 14 and on the count for conspiracy is unsatisfactory and must be set aside and the appeal allowed.

With regard to the first count, for conspiracy, we feel that it is desirable to say something more. This court has more than once warned of the dangers of conspiracy counts, especially these long conspiracy counts, which one counsel referred to as a marathon conspiracy count. Several reasons have been given. First of all, if there are substantive charges which can be proved, it is in general undesirable to complicate and to lengthen matters by adding a charge of conspiracy. Secondly, it can work injustice because it means that evidence which otherwise would be inadmissible on the substantive charges against certain people becomes admissible. Thirdly, it adds to the length and complexity of the case so that the trial may easily be wellnigh unworkable, and impose a quite intolerable strain both on the court and on the jury. We would like to refer once again to what has been said, not once but numbers of times in this court. There is first Rex v. Luberg,[1] where Sankey J., giving the judgment of the court, referred to what was said by Cockburn C.J. in Regina v. Boulton.[2] Sankey J. said[3]: "There is the well-known case of Boulton and

[1] (1926) 19 Cr.App.R. 133.
[2] (1871) 12 Cox C.C. 87.
[3] 19 Cr.App.R. 133, 137.

"Others,[4] where Cockburn C.J., in summing up, refers to this "procedure and says[5]: 'I am clearly of opinion that where the "'proof intended to be submitted to a jury is proof of the actual "'commission of crime, it is not the proper course to charge "'the parties with conspiring to commit it; for that course "'operates, it is manifest, unfairly and unjustly against the "'parties accused; the prosecutors are thus enabled to combine "'in one indictment a variety of offences, which, if treated "'individually, as they ought to be, would exclude the possibility "'of giving evidence against one defendant to the prejudice of "'others, and deprive defendants of the advantage of calling "'their co-defendants as witnesses.'" That is the end of the quotation, and Sankey J. went on: "It is perfectly true that "that case was different from the present one. It is equally "true that since the decision in that case an Act of Parliament "has been passed which enables a prisoner to go into the witness-"box and give evidence. It is a perfectly admissible and proper "course to pursue, and a course which is often pursued, but we "think that if that course is pursued, great care and great caution "is necessary during the hearing of the evidence to be quite sure "that no evidence is given which is inadmissible, and great care "is required in the summing-up to keep all the several issues "perfectly clear." Again, he said[6] in regard to the summing-up: "The judge does not, I think, at the end of his long summing-"up"—which was not otherwise at all criticised—"in one way "put it quite correctly, where he says: 'That is the whole case "'and you must take it as a whole and not by bits.'" That is very like the direction given to the jury in the present case; they were told to look at the whole of the case, and having formed a view about the whole of the case, which really means the conspiracy, then to proceed to the substantive charges. We think the proper course is to proceed the other way, to deal with the substantive charges and then proceed to see how far the conspiracy count should be there at all and if it is made out.

On the other side we would refer to Rex v. Meyrick and Ribuffi,[7] and also to Reg. v. Hammersley,[8] fairly recent cases, but the difference is that in each of those cases the court held that there was only one conspiracy, even though people took part in it independently of one another, and I think in one case not even knowing the main person in the conspiracy. They were both conspiracies to defeat the ends of justice, and both dealt with bribes given to police officers in order to allow infringements of the law to take place.

The case of Luberg[9] and the quotation from Cockburn C.J. in Boulton's case[10] were again referred to in Rex v. Cooper and Compton,[11] and without going into it further, this court suggests

[4] 12 Cox C.C. 87.
[5] Ibid. 93.
[6] 19 Cr.App.R. 133, 139.
[7] (1929) 21 Cr.App.R. 94.
[8] (1958) 42 Cr.App.R. 207.
[9] 19 Cr.App.R. 183.
[10] 12 Cox C.C. 87.
[11] (1947) 32 Cr.App.R. 102.

C. C. A.
1960
REGINA
v.
DAWSON.

that when counsel have to deal with these problems they would do well to read again and bear in mind the judgment of this court delivered in that case by Humphreys J.

There is more than this in the present case, for this court, after very careful consideration of this point, is of opinion that this was not one conspiracy. Although conspiracy there may have been, it was a number of conspiracies. Dawson was dealing with orange juice; he was dealing with buses, bogies and landing vehicles; and he was dealing with bills of exchange, with different kinds of people at different times over a period of three years. The count charges conspiracy with some 12 men, of whom six were actually charged and three convicted. It is an odd circumstance that one person named Eland was included in the count as one of the conspirators, and in a later count as one of the victims, which illustrates again the great difficulties in which one is placed by these abnormally long conspiracy charges. In addition to the other matters we have mentioned, we are satisfied this was not one conspiracy, and it is no more correct to charge several conspiracies, though they are called one conspiracy, than it is to include several different charges, in one count. Again we wish to say that quite apart from that matter we think it is wholly undesirable, and in the present case it was obviously quite unnecessary, to have a long count of this kind, because it has lengthened the case enormously, and we think that in the result it plainly worked an injustice on one at least of the appellants before this court today. Therefore we quash the convictions on the first count.

Count No. 2 charges both Dawson and Wenlock. There were three false pretences alleged and two were abandoned by the prosecution. Mr. Maxwell Turner, who was conducting the case for the prosecution, said in the plainest terms that he accepted the view that the first and second false pretences may have ceased to operate on the minds of the persons concerned, and, therefore, the only matter which was concerned was the third false pretence that I have dealt with. It was this same false pretence which affected Wenlock: the Salvicta letter. As we think the genuineness of that letter was not disproved, and there was no false pretence, the conviction on count 2 also must be quashed against both Wenlock and Dawson.

[His Lordship considered counts 4 and 6, said that Dawson's convictions on those two counts would be quashed, and continued:] Counts 7 and 8 are very different. Mr. Platts-Mills made no sort of admission, but the real case on counts 7 and 8—that is why I take them together—was that the jury were wrong in convicting Dawson on both counts because they were alternative charges. That we take to be right. One was a charge of false pretences on which he was sentenced to five years' imprisonment, and the second, dealing with exactly the same matter, charged him with obtaining credit by fraud other than false pretences, on which he was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment. Mr. Platts-Mills developed his argument to say that if that mistake is made and a person is convicted on two alternative counts, the rule is that the court should act on the lesser of the two and pass the smaller sentence. We do not think that really is a rule. In Rex v. Smith,[12] Lord Reading C.J. said that no doubt the court could, and in a proper case would, treat the conviction as if it had been upon the lesser of the charges. It was not a direction or a rule, and in the previous case which is referred to in that case, Rex v. Johnston,[13] it was said that if the court is in doubt, then it should choose the lesser of the two charges of which the man has been convicted. We think it is the duty of the court to look at the realities of the position, and, in our view, there was the plainest possible evidence of false pretences. We think the false pretence count, which is 7, is the proper one on which the conviction should be registered and not as it happens in this case, the lesser offence contained in count 8. It was a false pretence in which a false letter, amongst other things, was handed to the man concerned, saying that the companies for whom the work was being done had many assets, including some £60,000 worth of stock and had negligible liabilities, when, in fact, the companies concerned were insolvent. There were other matters as well, but we think it is a plain case of false pretences, and we therefore affirm the conviction on count 7 upon which a sentence of five years was passed, which we think appropriate to reduce to a sentence of four years.

[His Lordship dealt with count 9, on which the conviction was also quashed, and continued:] Counts 11 and 12 we take together, and this is quite a different point. [His Lordship said that count 11 charged Dawson and another accused with fraudulent conversion of £1,600 entrusted to them by Veritas Investments and Finance Ltd. in order that it could be applied for payment to Bulk Containers Ltd. for locomotive bogies, diesel motors and gear boxes, and for the construction of diesel locomotives. Count 12 dealt with the same matter but the charge was one of obtaining credit by fraud from Veritas Investments and Finance Ltd. by the same pretence to the amount of £8,740. There was no doubt that this was a fraudulent transaction because the work of conversion was never carried out, and there were a number of false documents purporting to show that it was done. It had been argued by Mr. Platts-Mills on count 11 that the £1,600 had been paid to Dawson as part of the purchase price of goods so that it could not be entrusted and could not be converted. That was not a proper reading of the transaction. There was ample evidence on which the jury could find that £1,600 was paid for the purpose of work being done on the vehicles and the charge of fraudulent conversion was made out. There was also evidence on which the jury could find that credit had been obtained by fraud.] His Lordship continued:

There is, however, another point which arises on count 11,

[12] (1915) 11 Cr.App.R. 81.

[13] (1913) 9 Cr.App.R. 262.

C. C. A.
1960
Regina
v.
Dawson.

which charges an offence under section 20 (1) (iv) (a) of the Larceny Act, 1916. Mr. Platts-Mills raised two points. For some reason on this count—it applies only to this count—evidence was proffered and admitted of part of Dawson's public examination in bankruptcy, and Mr. Platts-Mills took two points on that, first on section 43 (2) and, secondly, on section 43 (3) of the Larceny Act, 1916. Subsection (2) provides: "No person shall be liable to be "convicted of any offence against sections . . . 20 . . . of this Act "upon any evidence whatever in respect of any act done by him, "if at any time previously to his being charged with such offence "he has first disclosed such act on oath, in consequence of "any compulsory process of any court of law or equity in any "action, suit, or proceeding which has been bona fide instituted "by any person aggrieved." He said that no proceedings could be taken on this matter and the count would fail. Mr. Griffith-Jones's answer to that is that that subsection does not apply to bankruptcy proceedings.

It seems to this court, having been referred to the relevant statutes, that that is the correct view. The Larceny Act, 1861, contained section 85 in which this provision first appeared. The interesting thing about it is, that having used very much the same words as I have just read from the Act of 1916, it added this: "or if he shall have first disclosed the same in any compulsory "examination or deposition before any court upon the hearing of "any matter in bankruptcy or insolvency." That would seem to "suggest that subsection (2) of section 43 of the Larceny Act, 1916, as I read it, would not apply to bankruptcy proceedings. But in the Act of 1861, special provision was made to give a similar protection to a man who first disclosed offences of this kind in the bankruptcy proceedings. The matter becomes, it seems to us, quite plain when we look at section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, because that section repeals this very provision, and it puts in its place a new subsection, section 27 (2): "A statement or "admission made by any person in any compulsory examination "or deposition before any court on the hearing of any matter in "bankruptcy shall not be admissible as evidence against that "person in any proceedings in respect of any of the misdemeanours "referred to in the said section 85." It appears to us to be as plain as anything can be, that the legislature repealed the protection of what is now subsection (2) of section 43 as applying to bankruptcy matters, and gave a new protection, section 27 (2), which is now subsection (3) of section 43 of the Larceny Act, 1916. Therefore, we think subsection (2) of section 43 had no application to the present case, but we do think subsection (3) applies, and we think that this evidence was in fact inadmissible.

We have to consider another matter which was also urged on this point by Mr. Griffith-Jones: Did this evidence in fact have any real effect upon the jury? We do not know why it was ever thought to be necessary, much less desirable, to tender it, or why it was allowed to be given, but we have read it and considered it and heard the arguments about it. We think it is a proper case in which we can say that we do not think the questions which were in fact admitted from the public examination could have had any real effect upon the jury, or could have influenced them in any way in coming to the verdict on this count. We therefore think it is right in the interests of justice to apply the proviso to section 4 of the Criminal Appeal Act, 1907, because we think no miscarriage of justice resulted from it. Therefore, we have affirmed the convictions on count 11 and also on count 12, and think the proper sentence on count 11 is four years' imprisonment to run concurrently with the other sentence, and on count 12, 12 months' imprisonment, also to run concurrently.

That leaves only count 14. In this count the major charge is against Dawson, Wenlock being charged with aiding and abetting him. As far as Dawson is concerned, the charge is again one of obtaining credit. What happened, shortly, was this. He sold to Pearson a quantity of orange juice which was seen by Pearson, or by someone on his behalf. It was tested by somebody on Pearson's behalf, and it was situated then either at Smarden or West Ferry. The contract was for 30,000 gallons, and if there was not that quantity of orange juice at the proper place where the sale took place, Dawson was to make it up with orange juice which he obtained elsewhere. £750 was paid, quite plainly, as it seems to us, as part of the purchase price, and the argument was, that inasmuch as there were not in fact 30,000 gallons in the place, and he therefore would have to get other orange juice to make up the quantity, it was in fact a case of his being given credit. We would refer to Osborne v. Barton[14] and Reg. v. Ingram[15] on this question, which arises on some other counts as well. We think the principles are not really difficult. If a person buys goods and the man to whom he sends the money does not send the goods back to him or hand them over, it does not mean that the purchaser has given him credit. He may be guilty of other frauds, but he is not guilty of obtaining credit. On the other hand, if by arrangement a purchaser hands over to a person the purchase-money for the goods with the arrangement between them that the goods are not going to be delivered until some time in the future, then that may be a case, as in Reg. v. Ingram,[15] of credit being enjoyed by the person who has to supply the goods. We do not think this case was that at all. We do not think in any real sense it can be said that under this count, whatever else he may have done, Dawson in fact obtained credit. Therefore, the conviction on count 14 is also quashed.

The result is that the appeal of Wenlock is allowed and the conviction quashed. With regard to Dawson, on count 7 and count 11 there is a sentence of four years' imprisonment to run [14] (1951) 66 T.L.R. (Pt. 1) 115.

[15] [1956] 2 Q.B. 424; [1956] 2 All E.R. 639.

C. C. A.
1960

REGINA
v.
DAWSON.

concurrently, and on count 12 a sentence of 12 months' imprisonment, also to run concurrently, to date from the original date.

Appeal of Wenlock allowed with costs of the preliminary hearing, the trial and of the appeal.
Appeal of Dawson allowed in part.

Solicitors: G. B. Hemming & Son; Eric H. Davis & Co.; Director of Public Prosecutions.

E. M. W.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

1959
Dec. 1, 21.

Pearson J.

* GREEN v. BOWES-LYON.

[1959 G. No. 1240.]

Landlord and Tenant — Reversionary tenancy — Agreement for future tenancy—Distinction—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954 (2 & 3 Eliz. 2, c. 56), ss. 28, 65 (3).

R. held certain premises under a very long lease. W. held a sub-lease of the whole of the premises from R. for a term expiring on April 4, 1959. The plaintiff held a sub-lease of the ground floor and basement of the premises from W. for a term expiring on April 1, 1959. The defendant held a sub-lease of the ground floor only from the plaintiff for a term expiring on March 31, 1959. Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, did not apply to W.'s tenancy. The plaintiff occupied the basement for business purposes and therefore Part II of the Act applied to her tenancy. The defendant occupied the ground floor for business purposes and therefore Part II of the Act applied to her tenancy also. By an instrument dated March 19, 1958, and called a reversionary lease, R. granted the defendant a lease of the ground floor of the premises for a term of seven years from April 5, 1959.

In an action by the plaintiff for one quarter's rent due on June 24, 1959, the defendant contended that section 28 [1] of the Act

---

[Reported by A. D. RAWLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

[1] Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, s. 28: "Where the landlord and "tenant agree for the grant to the "tenant of a future tenancy of "the holding, or of the holding with "other land, on terms and from a "date specified in the agreement, the "current tenancy shall continue until "that date but no longer, and shall "not be a tenancy to which [Part II] "of this Act applies."

S. 65 (3): "Where by virtue of "any provision of this Act a tenancy "(in this subsection referred to as 'the "'continuing tenancy') is continued "beyond the beginning of a reversionary tenancy which was granted "(whether before or after the commencement of this Act) so as to "begin on or after the date on which "apart from this Act the continuing "tenancy would have come to an end, "the reversionary tenancy shall have "effect as if it had been granted "subject to the continuing tenancy."

Sch. 6, para. 3: "(1) Any notice applied, that the instrument of March 19, 1958, was an agreement between the landlord and the tenant for the grant to the tenant of a future tenancy of the holding on terms and from a date, viz., April 5, 1959, specified in the agreement, and that the defendant's tenancy was the "current tenancy" referred to in section 28 of the Act, and that it was continued by section 24 of the Act only until April 5, 1959, and no longer, and was not, therefore, a tenancy to which Part II of the Act applied; and that the defendant was not the plaintiff's sub-tenant but the sub-tenant of R. under the instrument dated March 19, 1958, which bound the interest of the plaintiff, giving her a right to compensation under the Act. The plaintiff contended, inter alia, that the instrument of March 19, 1958, was a reversionary lease within the meaning of subsection (3) of section 65, so that the position was governed by that subsection:—

Held, that a reversionary lease was something that created an estate, whereas an agreement for a future tenancy created merely a set of contractual rights and obligations. The instrument of March 19, 1958, was not an agreement for a future tenancy within the meaning of section 28 of the Act: it was a reversionary lease, and therefore the position was governed by section 65 (3) of the Act. The plaintiff's tenancy continued indefinitely, until determined under the Act, by virtue of section 24 of the Act, as did the defendant's tenancy from the plaintiff. By virtue of section 65 (3) of the Act the reversionary tenancy created by the instrument of March 19, 1958, had effect only subject to the defendant's continuing tenancy. On that basis, the defendant had a continuing tenancy from the plaintiff and was the plaintiff's sub-tenant. Accordingly, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the rent claimed in the action.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, Olga Mary Green, by a specially indorsed writ, sued to recover £187 10s., being one quarter's rent due on June 24, 1959, in respect of the ground floor shop at 64, South Molton Street, London, W.1., from the defendant, Edith Katherine Bowes-Lyon.

The facts and the issue arising are set out in the judgment.

Charles Lawson for the plaintiff.
John Wilmers for the defendant.

"given by the competent landlord "under Part II of this Act to terminate the relevant tenancy, and any "agreement made between that landlord and the tenant as to the "granting, duration, or terms of a "future tenancy, being an agreement "made for the purposes of the said "Part II, shall bind the interest of "any mesne landlord notwithstanding "that he has not consented to the "giving of the notice or was not a "party to the agreement.

"(2) The competent landlord shall "have power for the purposes of "Part II of this Act to give effect to "any agreement with the tenant for "the grant of a new tenancy beginning with the coming to an end of "the relevant tenancy, notwithstanding that the competent landlord will "not be the immediate landlord at "the commencement of the new "tenancy, and any instrument made "in the exercise of the power conferred by this sub-paragraph shall "have effect as if the mesne landlord "had been a party thereto."

Sch. 6, para. 4: "(1) If the "competent landlord, not being the "immediate landlord, gives any such "notice or makes any such agreement "as is mentioned in sub-paragraph "(1) of the last foregoing paragraph "without the consent of every mesne "landlord, any mesne landlord whose "consent has not been given thereto "shall be entitled to compensation "from the competent landlord for any "loss arising in consequence of the "giving of the notice or the making "of the agreement."

1959

Green
v.
Bowes-Lyon.

The following cases, not referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Wheeler v. Mercer [2]; Martinali v. Ramuz [3]; Cornish v. Brook Green Laundry.[4]

Cur. adv. vult.

December 21. Pearson J. read the following judgment: In this case the facts are not in dispute, and there is no oral, but only documentary, evidence. The issue arises under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954. It is common ground that the defendant is somebody's sub-tenant of the ground floor shop of 64, South Molton Street, but she is claimed as sub-tenant by the plaintiff on the one side, and by a Mr. Rye on the other side, and the real dispute is between the plaintiff and Mr. Rye. In form, the action is a claim by the plaintiff against the defendant for £187 10s. rent due on June 24, 1959, and the defence is that the defendant is not the plaintiff's sub-tenant and, therefore, does not owe any rent to the plaintiff.

Mr. Rye holds a very long lease of the whole of the premises, 64, South Molton Street. On April 5, 1945, he demised the whole premises to a Mr. Wells for a term of 14 years from April 4, 1945, so that the term would expire on or about April 4, 1959.

On February 18, 1946, Mr. Wells demised the ground floor and basement of the premises to Mr. Alvine for a term of 10 years from February 1, 1946. That term would have expired on or about February 1, 1956, but there was a supplemental lease on January 11, 1956, from Mrs. Wells, widow and successor in title of Mr. Wells, to the plaintiff, who together with another lady then held the residue of the term which had been granted by the lease of February 18, 1946. By this supplemental lease Mrs. Wells demised the ground floor and basement of the premises to the plaintiff from February 1, 1956, for a term of three years and 59 days, expiring on April 1, 1959.

On March 19, 1958, Mr. Rye granted to the defendant an instrument which purported to be a reversionary lease. There was a recital that the lessor was the superior landlord of the whole of the premises, 64, South Molton Street. There was also a recital that by an underlease of April 5, 1945, between the lessor of the one part and Mr. Wells of the other part, the whole of the building was let to Mr. Wells from April 4, 1945, for a term of 14 years expiring on April 4, 1959. That is the underlease to which I have already referred. There was a further recital that the interest of Mr. Wells had now passed to his widow, Mrs. Wells. There was also a recital that the lessee, that is to say, the defendant, was the sub-tenant of the ground floor only upon which she carried on the business of the sale of light refreshments and farm produce. Then the instrument provided as follows: "The lessor conditionally upon the "lessee obtaining a lease of the demised premises until the 1st "day of April, 1959, hereby demises"—in effect, a ground floor shop—"for a term of seven years from the 5th day of April, "1959," at a stated rent. The defendant thus had to fulfil a condition in order to have the benefit of the instrument. She obtained an underlease from the plaintiff who, as I have said, had the supplemental lease of the ground floor and basement. By the underlease dated June 17, 1958, the plaintiff demised the ground floor shop to the defendant from June 17, 1958, to March 31, 1959. That has been treated as a fulfilment of the condition, no question being raised as to the apparent slight discrepancy in dates between "until the 1st day of April, 1959," and "until the 31st day of "March, 1959."

[2] [1956] 1 Q.B. 274; [1955] 3 W.L.R. 714; [1957] A.C. 416; [1956] 3 W.L.R. 841; [1955] 3 All E.R. 455; [1956] 3 All E.R. 631.

[3] [1953] 1 W.L.R. 1196; [1953] 2 All E.R. 892.

[4] [1959] 1 Q.B. 394; [1959] 2 W.L.R. 215; [1959] 1 All E.R. 378.

Early in 1959, therefore, the position at common law, if we disregard for the moment the effect of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, would be this: (1) Mr. Rye as head lessor has a very long lease of the whole of the premises; (2) Mrs. Wells holds from Mr. Rye a sub-lease of the whole of the premises expiring on April 4, 1959; (3) the plaintiff holds from Mrs. Wells a sub-lease of the ground floor and basement expiring on April 1, 1959; (4) the defendant holds from the plaintiff a sub-lease of the ground floor expiring on March 31, 1959; (5) the defendant has the instrument being or purporting to be a reversionary lease commencing on April 5, 1959, which is evidently timed to take effect immediately after the expiration of Mrs. Wells's lease, although it has also the curious effect of leaving a gap of four days between the expiry of the defendant's sub-lease from the plaintiff and the commencement of the reversionary lease.

Next comes the impact on this situation of Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954. Subsection (1) of section 23 provides: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, this Part of this "Act applies to any tenancy where the property comprised in the "tenancy is or includes premises which are occupied by the tenant "and are so occupied for the purposes of a business carried on by "him or for those and other purposes." Subsection (3) defines "the holding."

The plaintiff was occupying the basement for business purposes, so that the property comprised in her tenancy of the ground floor and basement included premises occupied by her for business purposes, and therefore Part II of the Act applied to her tenancy. Moreover, the defendant was occupying the ground floor for business purposes, and therefore Part II of the Act, prima facie at any rate, applied to her tenancy. Mrs. Wells, as I understand the position, was not occupying any part of the premises for business purposes, and was not personally occupying any part of it at all, and so Part II of the Act did not apply to her tenancy.

Then we come to section 24 and the opening words of subsection (1) are: "A tenancy to which this Part of this Act applies

1959

Green
v.
Bowes-Lyon.

Pearson J.

" shall not come to an end unless terminated in accordance with " the provisions of this Part of this Act."

The effect of that section was to continue the plaintiff's tenancy of the ground floor and basement beyond April 1, 1959, indefinitely, until it should be terminated in one of the several ways provided by the Act. Similary, the defendant's tenancy was, prima facie at any rate, continued indefinitely until terminated in one of the ways provided by the Act. The question now arises: How is the defendant's position affected by the instrument dated March 19, 1958? That is really the issue in this case.

The plaintiff's contention is that the instrument is what it calls itself, namely, a reversionary lease, and that therefore the position is governed by section 65 (3), which provides: " Where by " virtue of any provision of this Act a tenancy (in this sub- " section referred to as ' the continuing tenancy ') is continued " beyond the beginning of a reversionary tenancy which was " granted (whether before or after the commencement of this " Act) so as to begin on or after the date on which apart from " this Act the continuing tenancy would have come to an end, " the reversionary tenancy shall have effect as if it had been " granted subject to the continuing tenancy." If that subsection applies, then the continuing tenancy is the defendant's sub-lease from the plaintiff which was originally timed to expire on April 1, 1959, but was continued by section 24 indefinitely. On that basis the reversionary tenancy created by the instrument of March 19, 1958, is to have effect only subject to the defendant's continuing tenancy, which is her sub-lease from the plaintiff, and the defendant is the plaintiff's sub-tenant and owes her the rent claimed in this action.

The defendant's contention, on the other hand, is based on section 28, which provides: " Where the landlord and tenant " agree for the grant to the tenant of a future tenancy of the " holding, or of the holding with other land, on terms and from " a date specified in the agreement, the current tenancy shall " continue until that date but no longer, and shall not be a " tenancy to which this Part of this Act applies."

The defendant's contention is that the instrument dated March 19, 1958, which is called a reversionary lease, is in truth an " agreement between the landlord and the tenant for the grant " to the tenant of a future tenancy of the holding . . . on terms " and from a date specified in the agreement . . . " within the meaning of section 28. If that is right, then the defendant's sub-lease from the plaintiff was the " current tenancy " referred to in section 28, and it continued only until April 5, 1959, and no longer, and was not, therefore, a tenancy to which Part II of the Act applied. Then, on that basis, it is said that the agreement binds the interest of the plaintiff under paragraph 3 (1) of the Sixth Schedule to the Act, and that paragraph 4 (1) of that Schedule gives the plaintiff a right to compensation.

The question in the end is a very simple one: is the instrument of March 19, 1958, a reversionary lease or is it an agreement for the grant of a future tenancy? Having regard to its name and provisions I hold that it is a reversionary tenancy and not an agreement for the grant of a future tenancy. It creates an estate and not merely a set of contractual rights and obligations.

The nature of a reversionary lease is explained in Woodfall on Landlord and Tenant, 25th ed., p. 286: "A lease may be limited to take effect either immediately or from a future date. "It is provided by the Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 205 (1) "(xxvii), that 'a term of years absolute' includes a term of years "taking effect either in possession or in reversion.

"Reversionary leases. All leases which are not to take effect "in possession immediately, but from a future day, are con- "sidered as reversionary leases, within the meaning of powers "to grant leases in possession and not in reversion. In legal "acceptance a lease for years in reversion, and a future interest "for years, are one and the same; a future lease and a lease in "reversion are synonymous. But strictly speaking, a reversion- "ary lease is one granted for a term which is to commence from "or after the expiration or other determination of a previous "lease."

In my view, this instrument is a reversionary lease which was granted for a term which was to commence from and after the expiration of the previous lease. The previous lease from Mr. Rye to Mr. Wells was expiring on April 4, and this instrument granted a reversionary lease commencing on April 5. The difference between the reversionary lease referred to in section 65 (3) and the agreement for a future tenancy referred to in section 28 is the difference between something which creates an estate and something which creates merely a set of contractual rights and obligations.

I therefore hold that the defendant was on June 24, 1959, the plaintiff's sub-tenant under the sub-lease dated June 17, 1958, which was being continued under section 24 of the Act. Accordingly, the rent claimed in this action is due from the defendant to the plaintiff. It is unnecessary to venture a decision or express an opinion on the interesting points which were discussed at the trial as to the application to the facts of this case of the definition of "landlord" contained in section 44 of the Act. Nor is it necessary to deal with the correspondence which was exhibited on affidavits. In the result, there will be judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed.

Judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

Solicitors: Tringhams; Layton & Co.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

1959
Nov. 16, 17, 18, 19, 20.

Sachs J.

* BLACK v. BLACK (MAY Intervening).

Practice Note.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Evidence—No evidence adduced by one party seeking decree—Jurisdiction of court.

Defended petition for divorce.

The husband, by his petition dated June 24, 1957, prayed for a declaration that his marriage was validly dissolved by a decree of divorce granted to the wife on January 8, 1953, by a Pennsylvanian court, and, in the alternative, for divorce, in the exercise of the court's discretion in respect of his adultery, on the ground of desertion by the wife from June 16, 1951. The wife, by her answer dated September 24, 1957, denied desertion, admitted withdrawing from cohabitation with the husband on June 16, 1951, but pleaded just cause for so doing; she alleged that the husband, by not opposing the granting to her of the Pennsylvanian decree, consented to her thereafter living separate and apart from him; she charged the husband with desertion and adultery with the intervener; she cross-prayed for divorce. The wife, who resided in the United States, did not give evidence in the suit, either in person or in any other way. It was submitted that the court could not pronounce a decree in favour of a party without receiving evidence from that party. The case is reported solely on the judge's ruling on that point.

P. Goodenday for the husband and intervener.
Joseph Jackson for the wife.

Sachs J. referred to the pleadings and the facts, held that the husband had established his charge of desertion, and continued: Now I will turn to the wife's cross-prayer. The first point taken was that the court ought not or could not (I am not sure which) give relief to a wife who had not appeared in person nor given evidence on commission or tendered her evidence in some such way. I will merely say that, in my view, the court has jurisdiction to hear and determine any petition or cross-prayer of a person who seeks a decree, in a cause even if that person is not called as a witness nor tenders evidence on commission or otherwise.

On the other hand, it seems to me equally clear that this jurisdiction will not be exercised in favour of the applicant save in really exceptional cases, because otherwise the court would very often be prevented from inquiring fully into the matter.

I am inclined to the view that this is an exceptional case.

[Reported by D. R. Ellison, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

I think it would be unreal to expect a wife in such financial circumstances as have so far been put before the court to come to this country and incur additional expense in order merely to fortify a position which is already completely secured in her own country. As regards the question of tendering evidence on commission, I am told that the giving of evidence by the wife otherwise than in person was, during the interlocutory proceedings, strongly opposed. Suffice it to add that one often realises how little use, in cases such as the present, evidence may be when it is not backed by the appearance of the witness, so that his or her demeanour can be observed. Here the real issue is whether the husband was guilty of the adultery charged, and on that issue there is no contest whatsoever, and I am prepared to consider the wife's prayer on its merits.

In so far as any question of discretion arises under the proviso to section 4 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, I see no reason to exercise it in favour of the wife, and a reason of considerable strength for exercising it against her. In those circumstances I do not propose to embark upon the question whether the conduct of the wife was, in law, conduct conducing. Still less need I consider the question whether the wife connived at the husband's adultery.

Having thus explained that I would not be prepared to exercise my discretion in favour of the wife, I now turn to the question of whether I should exercise it in favour of the husband. Having taken into account all the facts of the case, including the husband's desire to marry the intervener, I have without hesitation come to the conclusion that I should exercise my discretion in his favour.

The result will, accordingly, be a decree nisi to the husband on his petition, the wife's cross-prayer being rejected.

Decree nisi for husband.

Solicitors: Alec Woolf & Turk; Oswald Hickson, Collier & Co.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

* OHOCHUKU v. OHOCHUKU.

1959
Oct. 27.
Wrangham J.

Husband and Wife — Divorce — Jurisdiction — Residence, based on — Polygamous marriage in Nigeria—Subsequent ceremony at register office in England — Jurisdiction of English court — Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 18 (1) (a).

The parties, whose domicile at all material times was Nigerian, were validly married in Nigeria. The marriage was polygamous. The parties subsequently came to England and went through a

[Reported by D. R. ELLISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

1959

Ohochuku
v.
Ohochuku.

second ceremony of marriage at a London register office. After being ordinarily resident in England for upwards of three years, the wife petitioned for divorce on the ground of cruelty. The charge of cruelty was established:—

Held, that as the Nigerian marriage was polygamous, and as the English courts will not assume jurisdiction to dissolve a polygamous marriage, the wife was entitled to a decree nisi of dissolution of the marriage celebrated in London.

Petition for divorce.

On January 1, 1949, the parties, who were Nigerians, went through a ceremony of marriage in Nigeria. According to an expert in Nigerian law whose evidence was accepted, the ceremony was valid by Nigerian law and was polygamous. Later, the parties came to England and on July 24, 1953, went through a ceremony of marriage at a London register office. After being ordinarily resident in England for upwards of three years, the wife petitioned for divorce on the ground of cruelty.

P. H. Ripman for the wife.

The following cases were cited in argument: Hyde v. Hyde and Woodmansee [1]; Baindail (orse. Lawson) v. Baindail [2]; Thynne v. Thynne.[3]

Wrangham J. Although this is an undefended divorce suit it is one in which a point of some little interest and difficulty arises.

The parties are Nigerians. I am not satisfied on the evidence that the husband ever abandoned his Nigerian domicile of origin, so that this court only obtains jurisdiction to dissolve the marriage by virtue of section 18 (1) (a) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950.

The history of the matter is that, on January 1, 1949, the parties, who are Nigerians and formerly lived in Nigeria, there entered into a union which was the result of a ceremony which by the law of Nigeria would be described as a ceremony of marriage. The wife described to me, in evidence, what that ceremony consisted of. Dr. Elias, who is qualified to give evidence about Nigerian law, testified to me, and I accept his testimony, that under Nigerian law the ceremony described by the wife would amount to a marriage, and that that marriage would be potentially polygamous, that is to say, Nigerian law would permit the husband to marry other women besides the one whom he married in that ceremony. The parties ultimately came to England, first the husband and then the wife, and on July 24, 1953, not long after the wife's arrival in England, they went through a ceremony of marriage at a register office in London. The reason for that was not that they had any particular doubt about the validity of the ceremony which they had gone through in Nigeria but that the wife found it desirable to have a marriage certificate which she could show for practical purposes in England. Subsequently, there was trouble between husband and wife, to which I need not refer further than to say that the wife has satisfied me that her husband treated her with cruelty, and that she is entitled to a decree nisi of dissolution of marriage. The only question is, which marriage is it that has to be dissolved? Recent authorities have shown that it is important that the court which dissolves a marriage should make it clear in the decree what marriage it has dissolved. That raises the question whether this court has jurisdiction to dissolve the Nigerian marriage or only the marriage celebrated in London.

[1] (1866) L.R. 1 P. & D. 130.
[2] [1946] P. 122; [1946] 1 All E.R. 342; 62 T.L.R. 263.
[3] [1955] P. 272; [1955] 3 W.L.R. 108, 465; [1955] 3 All E.R. 129.

It is established by authority, to which I need not refer, that an English court will not assume jurisdiction to dissolve a polygamous marriage. Polygamous marriages are recognised now by the courts for various other purposes but they are not recognised for that purpose. This marriage in Nigeria was a polygamous marriage.

I have considered whether the fact that the parties were of the Christian faith, and would therefore regard this ceremony as monogamous because the obligations of their faith so required, makes any difference for this purpose. It is relevant in this connection to note that Dr. Elias proved before me that whether the parties were Christian or not, Nigerian law would recognise a subsequent union between the husband and another woman as being a lawful marriage; in other words, it would not forbid polygamy even if that were contrary to the religious tenets of the spouses.

In those circumstances, I have come to the conclusion that whatever might be the effect on the marriage for other purposes and in other courts of the parties being Christians, in this court and for this purpose the Nigerian marriage must be regarded as a polygamous marriage over which this court does not exercise jurisdiction.

I therefore pronounce a decree nisi for the dissolution not of the Nigerian marriage but of the marriage in London. I am told that, in fact, that will be effective by Nigerian law to dissolve the Nigerian marriage; but that forms no part of my judgment. That is for someone else to determine and not for me. There will, therefore, be a decree nisi of dissolution of the marriage celebrated on July 24, 1953. I ought to add, there being one child of the marriage, that I am satisfied that proper arrangements have been made for looking after that child. The arrangements made are in accordance with those agreed between the parties and approved by a stipendiary magistrate in London by whom the matter has already been considered.

Decree nisi.

Solicitors: Marshal & Co.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

1959
Nov. 23, 24, 25, 26, 27.

Lord Merriman P. and Collingwood J.

* THE SEISTAN.

Shipping — Court of formal investigation — Report — Expression of censure in rider signed by one assessor—Absence of notice of charge against officer censured—Irregularity.

Natural Justice—Opportunity to meet charge—Notice of charge—Court of formal investigation—Expression of censure without previous notice of charge against officer censured.

A court of formal investigation, consisting of a commissioner assisted by three assessors, inquired into the circumstances attending the loss of the Seistan at Bahrein on February 19, 1958. The finding of the court was that the most probable cause of the loss of the Seistan was spontaneous combustion of toe-puff material in No. 5 lower hold, thereby originating a fire which spread to the No. 5 'tween-deck where it caused the detonation of explosives therein. The report of the court was signed by the commissioner and the three assessors, the annex thereto was unsigned, and the questions and answers were signed by the commissioner and two assessors. The third assessor had added to the questions and answers a rider in the following terms: "I concur in the above but in my opinion the "advice given by the chief officer, Mr. Jones, as to flooding the lower "hold offered the better chance of a quicker extinction of the fire. "The conduct of the chief engineer in misinforming the chief officer "regarding No. 5 bilge line non-return valve was reprehensible."

Prior to the formal investigation, no notice had been given to the chief engineer of the possibility of any charge being made against him, nor was his conduct adversely criticised at the hearing. Accordingly, he was not made a party, nor was any application made on his behalf for him to be made a party.

On a rehearing of so much of the case heard at the formal investigation as related to the conduct of the chief engineer, the Divisional Court found that there was no justification for censuring the chief engineer in connection with the answer which he gave to the chief officer, or otherwise in connection with the casualty:—

Held, that in the absence of any charge against the chief engineer and of any opportunity to meet any such charge, the expression of censure by one assessor in the rider was wholly irregular, irrespective of the merits of the case.

Rehearing by order of the Minister of Transport and Civil Aviation under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 475, of part of the case heard by a court of formal investigation.

A court of formal investigation, consisting of a commissioner assisted by three assessors, inquired into the circumstances attending the loss of the Seistan at Bahrein on February 19, 1958. The finding of the court was that the most probable cause of the loss of the Seistan was spontaneous combustion of toe-puff material in No. 5 lower hold, thereby originating a fire which spread to the No. 5 'tween-deck, where it increased until a temperature was reached which caused the detonation of explosives therein. This finding was incorporated in the report of the court, which was signed by the commissioner and the three assessors. Then followed the annex, which was unsigned, and the questions and answers, which were signed by the commissioner and two of the assessors. One of the questions (No. 32) read: "Was the loss of the Seistan caused or contributed to by the "wrongful act or default of anyone?" and the answer given to this question was "No." A rider had been added, however, by the third assessor in the following terms: "I concur in the above "but in my opinion the advice given by the chief officer, Mr. "Jones, as to flooding the lower hold offered the better chance "of a quicker extinction of the fire. The conduct of the chief "engineer in misinforming the chief officer regarding No. 5 bilge "line non-return valve was reprehensible."

[Reported by B. D. J. Walsh, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Prior to the formal investigation, which commenced on February 10, 1959, no notice had been given to the chief engineer, Mr. George Robertson, of the possibility of any charge being made against him, nor was his conduct adversely criticised at the hearing. Accordingly, he was not made a party to the proceedings nor was any application made on his behalf for him to be made a party.

On the application of the chief engineer, the Minister of Transport and Civil Aviation, on May 27, 1959, ordered a rehearing of such part of the case heard at the formal investigation as related to the conduct of the chief engineer.

R. F. Stone for the chief engineer.
Peter Bucknill for the Minister of Transport and Civil Aviation.

Two assessors sat with the court.

The following authorities and cases were cited in argument: Temperley's Merchant Shipping Acts, 5th ed., p. 305; McMillan's Shipping Inquiries and Courts, pp. 18, 20, 21, 96, 105 and 118; The China [1]; The Chelston [2]; The Royal Star. [3]

Cur. adv. vult.

LORD MERRIMAN P. read the following report of the court: This is a rehearing by order of the Minister of Transport and Civil Aviation, dated May 27, 1959, of a formal investigation into the loss of the M.V. Seistan on February 19, 1958, at Bahrein. The finding of the court was that the most probable cause of the loss of the Seistan was spontaneous combustion of toe-puff material in No. 5 lower hold, thereby originating a fire which spread to the No. 5 'tween deck where it increased until a temperature was reached which caused the detonation of explosives therein.

The matter to be reheard is restricted to so much of the case heard at the formal investigation as relates to the conduct of the

[1] [1899] Shipping Gazette.
[2] [1920] P. 400; 36 T.L.R. 688.
[3] [1928] P. 48; 44 T.L.R. 163.

1959

The Seistan.

chief engineer, George Robertson, between February 17 and 19, 1958. By an order for directions dated June 19, 1959, it was ordered that the court of rehearing should be a Divisional Court of this Division, and that the court should be assisted by one Elder Brother of the Trinity Corporation and one nautical assessor, and that oral evidence should be heard. We have had the advantage of hearing the evidence of the chief officer, Jones, and the chief engineer, Robertson; and the case has been very well presented by counsel.

In the course of the hearing of the investigation no charge was made against the chief engineer, and no notice was given to him of the possibility of any such charge. He was not made a party, nor was there any reason why he should have applied to be made a party.

During the hearing Robertson became seriously ill. Accordingly, a discussion took place on February 19, 1959, about the best way of dealing with his inability to attend. Two statements signed by him had already been taken, and a third statement was taken on that day.

The commissioner said that in view of the medical certificate he did not intend to press for the presence in the witness-box of Robertson, and added that he thought that the medical certificate obviated any complaint that could be made by anyone that Robertson was not called, and stated specifically that he would not draw any adverse inference if in those circumstances he was not called.

Some confusion was caused by the fact that the original report has been put together and copied in the wrong order. It is now accepted that the proper order is: report, annex, questions and answers and the rider. The report itself was signed by the commissioner and the three assessors. Then followed the annex, which was not signed, the questions and answers, which were signed by the commissioner and two of the assessors; and, finally, what has been called the rider was added by Captain Parfitt, the third assessor, in the following words: "I concur in the above "but in my opinion the advice given by the chief officer, Mr. "Jones, as to flooding the lower hold offered the better chance "of a quicker extinction of the fire. The conduct of the chief "engineer in misinforming the chief officer regarding No. 5 bilge "line non-return valve was reprehensible."

Having regard to the absence of any charge against the chief engineer, and the consequent lack of any opportunity to meet any such charge, this expression of censure by one assessor in the rider was wholly irregular whatever view may be taken of the merits.

It is obvious, however, that the real object of this rehearing is to inquire into the merits of the censure.

As to the merits, the evidence satisfies us that on February 19, 1958, the chief officer wished to use the method of flooding No. 5 hold, to extinguish the fire. The first sentence of the rider shows that Captain Parfitt accepted the view that flooding, as against steam-smothering, was the preferable method. We find that on the instructions of the master, the chief officer inquired of the chief engineer whether he could assist in flooding No. 5 hold through the bilge line. The chief engineer replied: "No, because "of the non-return valves in the bilge line." At that time the chief officer knew that the master had ordered that No. 4 hold should be pumped dry and kept dry, and also, as was the fact, that this order had not been countermanded. He also knew that if the bilge line were used for flooding No. 5 hold it would be impossible also to use it for pumping out No. 4 hold, both holds being on the same bilge line. There were also other possible disadvantages, in flooding through the bilge line, upon which we need not enlarge. The chief officer accepted without demur the above answer from the chief engineer, and at once asked him what alternative assistance the chief engineer could give. To this the chief engineer replied that he would give the maximum pressure possible on the deck service line to flood No. 5 hold.

The earlier flooding of No. 5 hold and 'tween deck had been done by the general service pump and the fire emergency pump with one hose through the port ventilator and another through the starboard ventilator. Accordingly, the chief engineer ordered steam for the more powerful ballast pump, and two additional hoses were attached, making two in each ventilator, that is, four in all. The nozzles were removed from all the hoses and the hoses were introduced into the ventilators in such a manner as to allow the water to flow direct into No. 5 lower hold.

This method of flooding was in operation for about one hour, and was working to the complete satisfaction of the chief officer, who stated that he received every possible assistance from the chief engineer and the engine room staff.

If the rider is taken to imply that the chief engineer's answer caused retardation of the flooding of the hold, we are convinced that the implication is unjustified. On the contrary, we go further; we are convinced that, taking all the relevant factors into account, the method of flooding adopted was at least as efficacious as flooding through the bilge line would have been, so far as speed is concerned.

It should be noted that Mr. Bucknill satisfied us that it had been assumed before the investigation started that the chief engineer thought that he could not use the bilge line for flooding No. 5 hold because he was under the mistaken belief that the non-return valves were in the hold itself, instead of being, as is the fact, in the tunnel. Some colour was lent to this assumption by the fact that in earlier ships of the same line this had been the case. It was not until the chief engineer's statement, taken during the inquiry on February 19, 1959, was seen that this assumption was shown to be unfounded. In that statement the chief engineer said: "I was, of course, quite aware that the non-"return valve to No. 5 was situated in the tunnel and was

1959

The Seistan.

"accessible for removal if necessary, and that the hold could have "been flooded by the bilge line." But he added that the reason why this was not done was the master's requiring No. 4 to be kept pumped out.

Mr. Bucknill made it clear that, on behalf of the Ministry, he had not challenged this statement.

In any case, even if the chief engineer had made this assumed mistake the question would still remain whether it had any bearing on the casualty. For the reasons already given we are convinced that the chief engineer's answer to the chief officer had no adverse effect on the course of events.

It remains, however, to consider why the method of flooding which was in process for about an hour on the morning of February 19, with the approval of the chief officer, who had reported to the master, was abandoned in favour of a resumption of the method of steam-smothering. This decision was made after a conference in which the marine superintendent, representing the owners at Bahrein, took part. We are satisfied that the dominating factor was the belief that the earlier attempts at steam-smothering had been effective in extinguishing, or at least in damping down, the fire before it broke out again in No. 5 hold.

We find as a fact that the decision taken by the master together with the marine superintendent was to resort again to steam-smothering for a consecutive period of 24 hours, and then, if that proved ineffectual, to beach the vessel and flood her.

The fact that the explosion occurred during this period has, in our opinion, no bearing upon the question with which we are concerned.

Our conclusion on the matter is that there was no justification for censuring George Robertson, the chief engineer, in connection with the answer he gave to the chief officer, or otherwise in connection with this casualty. That is signed by all of us.

No order as to costs.

Solicitors: Treasury Solicitor; Ingledew, Brown, Bennison & Garrett.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.

1960
Feb. 2.

Hodson, Willmer and Devlin L.JJ.

* SAMSON v. SAMSON.

Husband and Wife—Property—Act of 1882, s. 17—Wedding presents—To whom?—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 17.

Husband and Wife—Property—Act of 1958, s. 7—Wedding presents—To whom?—Matrimonial Causes (Property and Maintenance) Act, 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 35), s. 7.

A wife made a claim under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and the Matrimonial Causes (Property and Maintenance)

Act, 1958, to one-half of the wedding presents in chattels and money received by her husband and herself on the occasion of their marriage, asserting that there was a prima facie presumption of law that wedding presents should be regarded as gifts made jointly to the spouses. The registrar made an order to the effect that gifts to the spouses from their respective relatives and friends should be their respective property; and, in particular, that as the larger part of the gifts in money had come from the husband's side, there should be a relatively small payment to the wife. On appeal:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that there was no such principle of law as contended for by the wife, and that in the circumstances the registrar had exercised his discretion rightly in drawing inferences from the origin of the gifts.

Per Hodson L.J. I do not think that, as a matter of law, any intention is to be attributed to the donor. Where there is evidence of intention on the part of the donor, it may well be that wedding presents may be found to have been given to one spouse, or the other, or to both; but where no intention is clear, the court is fully entitled, in my judgment, to draw the inference that money and gifts in kind originating from one side of the family were intended for the husband, and those from the other side, from friends of that party, were intended for the wife. Another possible position may arise—that property which is given at the time of the wedding to one spouse or the other may become joint property by the conduct of the parties (post, p. 195).

Newgrosh v. Newgrosh (cited in Rimmer v. Rimmer [1953] 1 Q.B. 63, 68; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 767; [1952] 2 All E.R. 863, C.A.) and observations of Lord Goddard in Hichens v. Hichens [1945] P. 23, 26; 61 T.L.R. 302; [1945] 1 All E.R. 451, C.A. considered.

APPEAL from Mr. Registrar Forbes.

The appellant wife, Ruth Rayner Samson, and respondent husband, Samuel Israel Samson, were married in October, 1956, but matrimonial differences led to a separation, and proceedings were taken pursuant to section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and section 7 of the Matrimonial Causes (Property and Maintenance) Act, 1958, to determine the ownership of the gifts in chattels and money received by the spouses on marriage. The amount of money received was £1,023, of which £175 came from the wife's side and the remainder from the husband's side, and this was paid into the husband's banking account. From this the husband spent £135 on the honeymoon, with the wife's knowledge and consent, and further sums, of which the wife claimed to have had no knowledge, in connection with the occupation of a flat which became the matrimonial home; these sums were £725 paid ostensibly for the purchase of some furniture which was in the flat, £94 for decorations and £17 for solicitors' costs. The husband claimed the return of all the gifts which had come from his family and friends. The wife claimed that all the wedding presents, including gifts of money, were given to the spouses jointly, and that she was entitled to a one-half share of the whole.

The registrar held that gifts from the husband's side belonged to the husband and vice versa; on this basis he made an order for the delivery of certain chattels in both directions and for the

C. A.
1960
Samson
v.
Samson.

payment by the husband to the wife of £135, representing the wife's share of £175 less a deduction of the wife's fair share of the money expended with her knowledge and consent. The wife appealed.

G. V. Owen for the wife.
H. S. Law, for the husband, was not called upon.

The following cases which were cited in argument are not referred to in the judgments: Jones v. Maynard [1]; Cobb v. Cobb [2]; Fribance v. Fribance (No. 2) [3]; Hunt v. Hunt.[4]

Hodson L.J. This is an appeal from Mr. Registrar Forbes, who made an order on May 7, 1959, under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, in a dispute between husband and wife. The order which he made was for delivery of certain chattels (set out in schedules), in both directions—some to be delivered by the wife to the husband and some by the husband to the wife. He further declared, pursuant to the provisions of section 7 of the Matrimonial Causes (Property and Maintenance) Act, 1958 (which for the first time enabled the court to deal with money claims between husband and wife and extended the powers conferred by the Act of 1882), that the wife was beneficially entitled to the sum of £135 which the husband had had in his possession or under his control; and ordered that the husband should pay to the wife that sum by instalments of £5 a month. Against that order the wife has appealed, her submission being that the articles in question and the money involved in this case originally consisted of wedding presents, and it is submitted on behalf of the wife that there is a presumption of law that wedding presents ought to be regarded as gifts jointly to the spouses and that, in making an order which admittedly is a discretionary order under the section, the court ought to start with the presumption which I have mentioned, then exercising its discretion after having employed the presumption of law.

I might perhaps deal with the exercise of discretion first. It does not arise in this case; but assuming that the argument for the appellant is right, namely, that a sum of money (it is the money of which I am particularly thinking) was given jointly to the husband and the wife by way of a wedding present or by way of an engagement present before the wedding, it would not necessarily follow that, in the exercise of its discretion, the court would make an order for the repayment of such money. If the money had (as here), for example, been expended in part in the purchase of a home or in obtaining the assignment of a tenancy

[1] [1951] Ch. 572; [1951] 1 T.L.R. (Pt. 1) 700; [1951] 1 All E.R. 802.
[2] [1955] 1 W.L.R. 731; [1955] 2 All E.R. 696.
[3] [1957] 1 W.L.R. 384; [1957] 1 All E.R. 357.
[4] (1908–9) 25 T.L.R. 132.

of a flat, and time had elapsed, it might well be that the court would hold its hand in ordering the repayment of the money.

In dealing with the matter of discretion generally, I think it is worth while to refer to the language of Jenkins L.J. in a case in which he gave a dissenting judgment, In re a Debtor.[1] Although the judgment was a dissenting judgment on the matter which had to be decided, the passage which I propose to read is of general application and does not, in my opinion, run counter to anything else that has been said in this court upon this topic. He said: "The other cases bearing upon section 17 of the Married "Women's Property Act, 1882, to which we were referred were "cited on the question how far the making of any order under "section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and "the terms of any order so made were matters for the discretion "of the court. It was agreed in discussion that none of these "cases by any means goes the length of saying that the judge "charged with dealing with such an application can disregard a "claim of legal right, but admittedly the cases do show that in "matters concerning property jointly acquired or jointly used, "the court may have a wide discretion to deal with it in such "manner as will be fair and equitable as between the parties "having regard to the whole history as to the acquisition and "use of the chattels in question, and, indeed, to all the surround-"ing circumstances of the matrimonial life of the parties." He then went on to refer to another decision of this court, Rimmer v. Rimmer,[2] where the Master of the Rolls cited an unreported case, Newgrosh v. Newgrosh,[3] in which Bucknill L.J., affirming a decision of Willmer J., said: "That gives the judge a wide "power to do what he thinks under the circumstances is fair and "just. I do not think it entitles him to make an order which is "contrary to any well-established principle of law, but, subject "to that, I should have thought that disputes between husband "and wife as to who owns property which at one time, at any "rate, they have been using in common are disputes which "may very well be dealt with by the principle which has been "described here as 'Palm Tree Justice.' I understand that to "be justice which makes orders which appear to be fair and just "in the special circumstances of the case." That passage again refers to the respect which must be paid to principles of law.

The whole argument for the appellant in this case depends on her being able to satisfy the court that there is some principle of law which has not been observed by the registrar, the principle being the principle that wedding presents belong to both spouses jointly. I will refer to the history of this matter shortly. The marriage was of short duration. The parties were married in October, 1956. Before the marriage, some gifts in kind and

[1] [1958] Ch. 81, 91; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 184, 191; [1957] 2 All E.R. 551.

[2] [1953] 1 Q.B. 63, 68; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 767; [1952] 2 All E.R. 863.

[3] (1950) 100 L.J. 525.

C. A.
1960
Samson
v.
Samson.
Hodson L.J.

money were given to both, and £100 in cash went into the husband's banking account. There was never more than one banking account, although the wife had power to draw upon it after the marriage. The total amount of the money that went into the banking account, including the engagement gifts, was £1,023, out of which the honeymoon expenses of £135 were paid—that was with the concurrence of both parties. They lived in furnished flats at first, and eventually obtained a flat in a house at St. John's Wood at a rental of £300 a year. The husband then drew out £725 from the banking account, which was in his name, as a premium for the assignment of the tenancy. The wife (as the registrar found) knew nothing about that.

The contention of the wife is that prima facie she is entitled now, on the basis which I have stated, to half the money in the banking account and half the wedding presents. The finding of the registrar in which this matter is dealt with is as follows: "The total"—that is, the total in the bank—"amounted to "£1,023 of which £175 came from the relatives and friends of "the wife, and the balance from the relatives and friends of the "husband. There is no evidence that any of the donors knew "both spouses equally well. . . . So far as the items contained "in the respective lists of the husband and wife are concerned, "there will be an order that the presents received by the hus-"band from his relatives and friends are his property, and those "received by the wife from her relatives and friends are the "property of the wife, and particulars thereof will be set out in "the order. I do not consider there is sufficient evidence to "support the view that any particular present came from a donor "who knew both the spouses."

No doubt it is a principle of law that a gift must be considered by reference to the intention of the donor; but there is no authority in this country for the further proposition that there is some particular principle of law applicable to wedding presents. We were referred to one American decision of a New York court (we were told it was the equivalent of the English county court) which appears to lay down such a principle.[4] But apart from that there is no guidance in that direction to be obtained, so far as the researches of counsel go, from decisions in this country. The matter was mentioned by Lord Goddard in a decision of Hichens v. Hichens,[5] where, upon an inquiry ordered on a summons under section 17 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the question of jurisdiction to hear the summons arose; and obiter in his judgment Lord Goddard said this about wedding presents: "As everybody knows, it is often difficult to decide questions of "property between husband and wife according to their strict "rights. The matter very often comes up with regard to wed-"ding presents, which in one sense are given to both spouses. "One often has to solve the problem by saying that if a present

[4] Avnet v. Avnet (1952) 124 N.Y. Supp. (Pt. 2) 517.

[5] [1945] P. 23, 26; 61 T.L.R. 302; [1945] 1 All E.R. 451.

"was given by a friend or relation of the wife's, the property "should be given to the wife, and that it should be given to the "husband if it was a present from a friend or relation of his." If I may say so, with respect, that seems to be eminently sound sense, but it does not purport to be a declaration of law. The part which is relied upon by Mr. Owen, for the appellant, is the phrase "which in one sense are given to both spouses." But I do not regard that relative clause as detracting from the general drift of what Lord Goddard was saying in the passage which I have read.

The guidance which Lord Goddard gave in that case was followed by one of the county court judges, Judge Cave, in a more recent case, which is referred to in the Law Journal,[6] and the registrar has cited in his judgment the report of what the judge is said to have done. There, there were proceedings of this character, and the wife "sought an order for the return of "articles given to her as wedding presents and other articles "claimed as having been bought out of her pre-war savings." The claim included a silver tea service and linen. "His Honour, "without wasting time over argumentative details, expressed the "view" (which was described by the Journal as a "common "sense" view) "that a wedding present is usually given to a "relative and not to the stranger marrying the relative. He "dissented from the view that wedding presents became the "joint property of husband and wife." That is to say, he dissented from the view that they so became as a matter of law.

I entirely agree with the observations which purport to have fallen from the judge's lips. I do not think that, as a matter of law, any intention is to be attributed to the donor. Where there is evidence of intention on the part of the donor, it may well be that wedding presents may be found to have been given either to one spouse or to the other, or to both; but where no intention is clear the court is fully entitled, in my judgment, to draw the inference (which was drawn in this case) that money and gifts in kind originating from one side of the family were intended for the husband and those from the other side, from friends of that party, were intended for the wife.

Mr. Owen has rested, here and below, on the omnibus submission to which I have referred, and has not sought to say that in any particular case the evidence indicated that the gift was intended for joint use or for the use of his client in particular. He relied—and, in my judgment, was unable successfully to rely—on the proposition of law that the inference which I have stated should be drawn in his favour. He has recognised that there is another possible position which does not arise in this case but which may arise in other cases—that property which is given at the time of the wedding to one spouse or the other may become joint property by the subsequent conduct of the parties. That position is illustrated by the Newgrosh case,[7] to which I have [6] (1945) 95 L.J. 222. [7] 100 L.J. 525.

C. A.
1960
Samson v. Samson.
Hodson L.J.

made reference. There it appears from the material which is available from the report (and it is very little) that there was in dispute a suite of furniture for a bedroom and another for a sitting room or drawing room: one was said to have been given to the one spouse and one to the other. The parties lived together: they used that furniture for both rooms: and the judge decided, in the circumstances of that case, that the order which he would make would be made upon the basis that this was mixed property which had become joint property.

I have said what I have in order to indicate that what has been said in this case does not cover every case. I am only at pains to reject the supposed proposition of law that wedding presents are joint wedding presents to both spouses. So far as this case is concerned, I see no reason to suppose that there is any criticism to be levelled at the registrar for the way in which he dealt with this matter—either the way in which he drew the inference from the origin of the gifts or the way in which he disposed of the chattels and the money in question in this case. I would, therefore, dismiss this appeal.

Willmer L.J. I have reached the same conclusion, and for the same reasons; and I desire to add nothing further.

Devlin L.J. I also agree.

Appeal dismissed, with costs.

Solicitors: Millward, Ladsky & Co., Wembley; Philip Taylor & Co.

F. R. D.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.
1960
Feb. 4, 9.
Lord Goddard, Upjohn L.J. and Diplock J.

* LOWE v. LOMBANK LTD.

[Plaint No. P. 5.]

Hire-Purchase—Hire-purchase agreement—Implied statutory condition—Fitness for purpose—Acknowledgment by hirer of fitness of car—Whether hirer estopped from alleging that implied statutory condition broken—Hire-Purchase Act, 1938 (1 & 2 Geo. 6, c. 53), s. 8 (2), (3).

Estoppel—Conduct, by—Motor-car—Hire-purchase—Signature of hire-purchase documents unread—Effect.

The plaintiff, a widow of 65 years of age, agreed to purchase a motor-car on hire-purchase terms for £223, the sum of £158 8s. being obtained from the defendants, a hire-purchase company. The hire-purchase agreement dated June 9, 1958, entered into between the defendants and the plaintiff, consisted of a printed form and provided for the repayment of the sum advanced to the defendants by 24 monthly instalments. Clause 8 provided that the only warranties should be those implied under the Hire-Purchase Acts, 1938 and 1954, in respect of hire-purchase transactions within the Acts. Clause 9 (ii) provided that the hirer acknowledged that he had examined the goods and that they were of merchantable quality and, further, that he had "not made known to the owners expressly "or by implication the particular purpose for which the goods are "required," and that the goods were fit for the purpose for which they were in fact required. When the plaintiff signed the hire-purchase agreement she did not read it and had not seen the car, but the salesman assured her that it was "perfect" or nearly so. The car was brought round to her later that day but not left with her. When it was delivered she signed a delivery receipt which contained a statement that she asknowledged that she had read the hire-purchase agreement "made" between the defendants and herself and, further, that she had examined the goods and that they were in good order and condition. The car, in fact, was not roadworthy, and the plaintiff claimed damages for breach of the implied condition of fitness for purpose in section 8 (2) of the Hire-Purchase Act, 1958 [1]:—

Held, (1) that on the true construction of the hire-purchase agreement the plaintiff had by implication made known to the defendants that she required the car for the purpose of driving about in, and that the defendants were not entitled to rely on clause 9 (ii) of the agreement, which was an attempt to evade the provisions of section 8 (2) and (3) of the Hire-Purchase Act, 1938 (post, p. 204).

(2) That the plaintiff was not estopped by signing the delivery receipt from relying on the breach of the implied condition that the car was reasonably fit for use as a means of transport, since the defendants had failed to prove the three requirements necessary to establish estoppel, namely: that the statement in the receipt was clear and unambiguous; that the plaintiff had intended that the defendants should act upon it; and lastly, that the defendants had believed the representation in the receipt to be true and had acted upon it.

(3) The plaintiff was accordingly entitled to damages.

APPEAL from Judge Harold Brown sitting at Southport County Court.

[1] Hire-Purchase Act, 1938, s. 8 (1): "In every hire-purchase agreement there shall be—(a) an implied warranty that the hirer shall "have and enjoy quiet possession of "the goods; . . . (d) except where "the goods are let as secondhand "goods, and the note or memorandum "of the agreement made in pursuance "of section 2 of this Act contains a "statement to that effect, an implied "condition that the goods shall be of "merchantable quality, so, however, "that no such condition shall be "implied by virtue of this paragraph "as regards defects of which the "owner could not reasonably have "been aware at the time when the "agreement was made, or, if the "hirer has examined the goods or a "sample thereof, as regards defects "which the examination ought to "have revealed.

"(2) Where the hirer expressly or "by implication makes known the "particular purpose for which the "goods are required, there shall be "an implied condition that the goods "shall be reasonably fit for such "purpose.

"(3) The warranties and conditions set out in subsection (1) of "this section shall be implied notwithstanding any agreement to the "contrary, and the owner shall not be "entitled to rely on any provision in "the agreement excluding or modifying the condition set out in sub-"(2) of this section unless he proves "that before the agreement was made "the provision was brought to the "notice of the hirer and its effect "made clear to him."

C. A.
1960
Lowe
v.
Lombank
Ltd.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Nancy Lowe, a widow of 65 years of age, in the summer of 1958 wanted to purchase a motor-car, her own being too old for use. Her son got in touch with a motor-car dealer, one Charles Brown, who said that he had a Standard motor-car which she could have for £223, and that he would allow her £45 for her old car and arrange hire-purchase finance. Charles Brown's brother, George Brown, called on the plaintiff and assured her that the Standard car was in perfect or almost perfect condition. She had not then seen the car but on that assurance she agreed to purchase it. The next day, June 9, 1958, George Brown called on the plaintiff bringing with him a printed form of hire-purchase agreement. The plaintiff at the time was busy preparing luncheon. She signed the agreement without reading it and paid to George Brown £40 which, with other payments she had made and the allowance for the old car, brought her initial payment to £95. A balance was left due of £158 8s., which sum included the hire charge and purchase fee of £30 8s.

The hire-purchase agreement dated June 9, 1958, was expressed to be made between the defendants, Lombank Ltd., called "the "owners," of the one part and the plaintiff, called "the hirer," of the other part. Thereby the owners agreed to let and the plaintiff to hire the goods in the schedule, being the Standard car. Provision was made for the payment of the sum of £158 8s. by 24 monthly instalments, and there were other clauses usual in a hire-purchase agreement of this character. It was provided by clauses 8 and 9 as follows:

"8. The owners do not let or supply the goods or any part "thereof with or subject to any condition or warranty express "or implied by statute or otherwise as to the capacity, age, "quality, description, state, condition or fitness for any purpose "or otherwise whatsoever save in the case of the hire-purchase "price in the schedule hereto, not exceeding £300 when the only "warranties shall be those implied under the Hire-Purchase Acts, "1938 and 1954, in respect of hire-purchase transactions within "the provisions of those Acts but subject to the exclusion of "warranties by reason of clause 9 hereof.

"9. If the hire-purchase price shown in the schedule hereto "does not exceed £300 but not otherwise the following provisions "shall take effect: . . . (ii) The hirer acknowledges that he has "examined the goods prior to the signing of this agreement and "that there are no defects in the goods which such examination "ought to have revealed and that the goods are of merchantable "quality. The hirer further acknowledges and agrees that he "has not made known to the owners expressly or by implication "the particular purpose for which the goods are required, and "that the goods are reasonably fit for the purpose for which "they are in fact required."

On the same day the car was brought round to the plaintiff's house but it was not left, because she was told some adjustment was required. The car was handed over at a later date when the plaintiff signed a delivery receipt in the following terms: "Delivery receipt. Lombank Limited, Lombank House, Curzon "Street, Park Lane, London, W.1. I/We acknowledge and "agree that I/We have read the hire-purchase agreement made "between us and fully understand the terms and conditions "thereof before signing. I/We confirm and I/We have examined "the goods described in the schedule to the agreement and ack-"nowledge that the same is/are in good order and condition and "to my/our satisfaction in every respect and that I/We have "taken delivery of the said goods at this date." At the foot of the form there were the words: "This form should not be signed "until delivery of the goods has been taken."

When the plaintiff used the car she found, and the county court judge held, that the car was unroadworthy. The car's defects would not have been apparent to a layman. The plaintiff spent considerable sums on trying to put the car into good condition.

On November 6, 1958, she wrote complaining to the defendants that they had warranted that the car was perfect, and asking for damages. The defendants by letter of November 12, 1958, replied stating that: "We would, however, point out that "in this instance we are acting purely as bankers, and have at "no time either expressed or implied any warranty in respect "of the vehicle concerned in our contract." The defendants required the plaintiff to continue her payments under the agreement. The facts are more fully stated in the judgment of the court.

On January 5, 1959, the plaintiff started these proceedings in which she claimed rescission of the agreement and the return of the moneys she had paid, alternatively, damages.

The defendants in their defence denied that the Browns were their agents, and alleged that under the terms of the agreement any express or implied condition, statement or warranty was excluded, except warranties implied under the Hire-Purchase Acts, 1938 and 1954, but subject to the exclusion of warranties by clause 9 of the agreement.

The judge held that nobody explained the hire-purchase agreement to the plaintiff when she signed it. It was too late for her to claim rescission of the agreement; if she was to obtain relief it must be in damages. He held that the Browns were not the defendants' agents to make representations on their behalf. He further held that since the plaintiff's attention had never been drawn to the provisions of clauses 8 and 9 of the agreement, she was not estopped from relying on the implied condition of reasonable fitness imported by section 8 (2) of the Hire-Purchase Act, 1938, but he held that the plaintiff was estopped by the receipt which she had signed from complaining of the condition of the car. He, accordingly, entered judgment for the defendants. If he were wrong he assessed the damages at £160.

The plaintiff appealed. The defendants by a cross-notice

C. A.
1960
Lowe
v.
Lombank
Ltd.

sought to support the decision on the ground that the plaintiff was estopped from saying that she had made known, expressly or impliedly, the purpose for which she required the car.

R. M. Bingham Q.C. and J. Jaffé for the plaintiff.
T. G. Roche Q.C. and Stephen Terrell for the defendants.

The following cases were cited in argument and are not referred to in the judgment: Karsales (Harrow) Ltd. v. Wallis [2]; Wallis, Son & Wells v. Pratt and Haynes.[3]

Cur. adv. vult.

February 9. Lord Goddard. Diplock J. will deliver the judgment of the court.

Diplock J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of Judge Harold Brown in the Southport County Court dismissing her claim against the defendants, a hire-purchase finance company, for damages for breach of the statutory condition, enacted in section 8 (2) of the Hire-Purchase Act, 1938, that a car which she acquired on hire purchase from the defendants was reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was required.

The plaintiff, who was a widow aged 65, was minded to buy a second-hand car to replace an ancient vehicle which she then owned. She got in touch through her son with a motor-dealer, Charles Brown, who owned a 1947 Standard car. On June 8, 1958, Charles Brown's brother, who was acting on his behalf, offered the Standard car to her at the price of £223 and told her that he could get hire purchase and would allow £45 for the car she then owned. He assured her that the Standard car was in perfect or almost perfect condition, and on this assurance she agreed to proceed with the transaction. The name of the hire-purchase finance company with whom the hire purchase was to be arranged was not at this stage mentioned. She gave George Brown, at his suggestion, £10 to clinch the bargain.

On the following day, June 9, George Brown came when the plaintiff was busy preparing lunch. She did not see the car, but was presented by George Brown with a printed form of hire-purchase agreement issued by the defendants, which, no doubt like many other hirers, she signed without reading. It will be necessary for this court to read it with some care later. She paid him £40, which, together with the £10 already paid and the allowance of £45 on her old car, made up the initial payment of £95 referred to in the hire-purchase agreement, and undertook to pay the balance of £158 by 24 monthly instalments. On the same evening the Standard car was brought round by George and Charles Brown to the plaintiff's house, when she saw it for the first time. They did not leave it with her, but took it away on the excuse that some minor adjustment was required. It was handed over to her at some later date, which the county court judge was not able to fix with certainty, and the plaintiff then signed a document headed "Delivery receipt," which was presented to her for signature by one of the Browns. This document, which bears the date June 9, 1958, although it was signed at a later date, will also require careful scrutiny.

[2] [1956] 1 W.L.R. 936; [1956] 2 All E.R. 866.
[3] [1911] A.C. 394.

The judge accepted the evidence of a motor-engineer called by the plaintiff that so far from being "perfect" or "almost "perfect" the car was utterly unroadworthy and indeed a danger to its occupiers and other road users at the time of this transaction. The principal defects were in the engine, steering and brakes. There was evidence that these were defects which would not be apparent to a layman upon inspection and, although there is no specific finding to this effect, it would appear, from the fact that the county court judge acquitted George Brown of fraud, that he accepted this.

These defects became progressively apparent after the car had been delivered, but it was not until November 6, 1958, that the plaintiff through her solicitors complained to the defendants, to be met with the reply that the defendants were "acting purely "as bankers" and "have at no time either expressed or implied "any warranty in respect of the vehicle concerned in our con-"tract." They concluded with a demand for continued payment of current instalments.

On January 5, 1959, the plaintiff started proceedings against the defendants claiming damages for fraud, based on the misrepresentations of George Brown or, alternatively, for breach of the implied condition of fitness under section 8 (2) of the Hire-Purchase Act, 1938. She claimed in the alternative rescission of the hire-purchase agreement of June 9, 1958, but this claim, in view of the delay, was not pressed at the trial. The county court judge was not prepared to find that George Brown was fraudulent. He described him as a "careless optimist," and we have not been asked to reverse this finding. The only questions on this appeal are: (1) whether the hire-purchase agreement was subject to the implied condition that the car should be reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was required, that is, for use as a means of transport, and (2) if so, whether the plaintiff is estopped from relying upon the defects which in fact existed in the car as constituting a breach of that implied condition.

The county court judge answered the first question in the affirmative, and the second also in the affirmative, and, accordingly, gave judgment for the defendants, but, in case he were wrong, assessed the damages at £160.

The common law, as Mr. Roche points out, subject to some restrictions based on public policy, permits persons to make whatever contractual bargains they please and will enforce those bargains. This general principle, of which the underlying

C. A.
1960
Lowe
v.
Lombank
Ltd.

assumptions are that persons entering into contracts are of equal bargaining power and read and understand what they sign, ignores the fact that under modern conditions many transactions, particularly of hire purchase, are entered into by ignorant persons whose only choice is either not to enter into the transaction at all or to enter into it upon the terms of a standard agreement drafted by the hire-purchase company containing numerous clauses, printed in minuscule characters, which the hirers do not in fact read and, if they did, would be incapable of understanding. To meet this abuse of bargaining power by hire-purchase finance companies Parliament in 1938 enacted the Hire-Purchase Act, 1938, containing a number of provisions for the protection of the small hire-purchaser, that is, the hire-purchaser of goods whose hire-purchase price did not exceed £100. In 1954, with the fall in the value of money, this protection was extended to goods whose hire-purchase price did not exceed £300. It applies, therefore, to the hire-purchase agreement under consideration in the present appeal.

Section 8 (2) of the Act of 1938 reads as follows: "Where the "hirer expressly or by implication makes known the particular "purpose for which the goods are required, there shall be an "implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such "purpose."

Subsection (3), so far as is relevant, reads ". . . the owner "shall not be entitled to rely on any provision in the agreement "excluding or modifying the condition set out in subsection (2) "of this section unless he proves that before the agreement was "made the provision was brought to the notice of the hirer and "its effect made clear to him."

The judge has found as a fact—indeed it was undisputed on the evidence—that no provision in the hire-purchase agreement excluding or modifying the implied condition was brought to the notice of the plaintiff. Prima facie, therefore, if the hirer did expressly or by implication make known that she required the Standard car for use as a means of transport, the statutory condition applies and, upon the facts as found by the county court judge, was manifestly breached.

Mr. Roche's first contention, which does not appear to have been advanced before the county court judge, so that no cross-examination was directed to it, is that the plaintiff did not make known either expressly or by implication to the defendants that she required the Standard car for use as a means of transport. She made it known expressly to Brown, the dealer, but the county court judge held, in our view rightly, that, in view of an express clause in the hire-purchase agreement, Brown was not the agent of the defendants for the purpose of receiving this information.

It is at first sight a bold contention that, when a widow, for she is so described in the hire-purchase agreement, negotiates with a motor-dealer for the hire-purchase of a second-hand car, she does not by implication make known that she requires it as a means of transport, and such contention is even bolder when the hire-purchase agreement proferred by the defendants for her signature requires her by clause 2 (d) "to keep and maintain "the goods and all parts thereof in good order repair and condi- "tion and to replace all missing or unfit parts of the goods," by clause 2 (j) "to pay punctually all licence duties, taxes, fees, "registration charges and all other payments in respect of the "goods or the user thereof," and by clause 3 provides that the plaintiff may terminate the hiring upon returning with the goods "all necessary licences, registration books or certificates, "insurance policy or certificate and other documents relating to "the goods." Furthermore, the delivery receipt, of which more anon, which on their own evidence the defendants require their hirers to sign before they themselves sign the hire-purchase agreement, contains an acknowledgment that the goods are in good order and condition. We agree with the county court judge that the plaintiff in fact plainly made known to the defendants by implication that she required the car for the purpose of driving about. Notwithstanding this, it is contended by Mr. Roche that clauses 8 and 9 of the hire-purchase agreement negative this implication.

Clause 8 reads as follows: "The owners do not let or supply "the goods or any part thereof with or subject to any condition "or warranty express or implied by statute or otherwise, as to "the capacity, age, quality, description, state, condition or fit- "ness for any purpose or otherwise whatsoever save in the case "of the hire-purchase price in the schedule hereto not exceeding "£300 when the only warranties shall be those implied under "the Hire-Purchase Acts, 1938 and 1954, in respect of hire- "purchase transactions within the provisions of those Acts but "subject to the exclusion of warranties by reason of clause 9 "hereof."

This clause draws a distinction between condition and warranty. It excludes both, whether express or implied by statute or otherwise, where the hire-purchase price in the schedule exceeds £300, but does not purport to exclude any conditions, as distinguished from warranties, where the hire-purchase price in the schedule does not exceed £300. Section 8 of the Hire-Purchase Act, 1938, draws a like distinction between conditions referred to in subsection (1), paragraphs (b) and (d), and subsection (2) to be implied by statute, and warranties referred to in subsection (1), paragraphs (a) and (e), to be implied by statute, and clause 8 of the hire-purchase agreement does not, upon its true construction, purport to exclude the condition implied by section 8 (2) of the Act of 1938, upon which the plaintiff in this case relies. Even if it did, it would be ineffective to do so, because it was never brought to the notice of the plaintiff.

Clause 9 of the hire-purchase agreement, so far as is relevant, reads as follows: "If the hire-purchase price shown in the

C. A.
1960
Lowe
v.
Lombank
Ltd.

"schedule hereto does not exceed £300 (but not otherwise) the "following provisions shall take effect: . . . (ii) The hirer ack-"nowledges that he has examined the goods prior to the signing "of this agreement and that there are no defects in the goods "which such examination ought to have revealed and that the "goods are of merchantable quality. The hirer further acknow-"ledges and agrees that he has not made known to the owners "expressly or by implication the particular purpose for which "the goods are required, and that the goods are reasonably fit "for the purpose for which they are in fact required."

This curiously drafted clause was never brought to the notice of the plaintiff and its effect was not made clear to her. Nor, despite Mr. Roche's efforts, has it been made clear to us. It is expressed to be an acknowledgment, that is to say, a representation, by the plaintiff that she had not made known by implication that the car was required for a particular purpose, that is, as a means of transport, and also an agreement that she had not made that purpose known to the defendants. In so far as it was a representation, it could operate only as an estoppel preventing the plaintiff from asserting the contrary, but Mr. Roche expressly disclaims reliance upon it as an estoppel, no doubt for the very good reason that there was no evidence (and it is difficult to see how there could have been truthful evidence) that the defendants believed in the truth of the representation. To call it an agreement as well as an acknowledgment by the plaintiff cannot convert a statement as to past facts, known by both parties to be untrue, into a contractual obligation, which is essentially a promise by the promisor to the promisee that acts will be done in the future or that facts exist at the time of the promise or will exist in the future. To say that the hirer "agrees" that he has not done something in the past means no more than that the hirer, at the request of the owner, represents that he has not done that thing in the past. If intended by the hirer to be acted upon by the person to whom the representation is made, believed to be true by such person and acted upon by such person to his detriment, it can give rise to an estoppel: it cannot give rise to any positive contractual obligation. Although contained in the same document as the contract, it is not a contractual promise.

There lies the fallacy in Mr. Roche's contention. Whether or not the plaintiff made known to the defendants by implication the particular purpose for which she required the car is a pure question of fact as to the state of knowledge of the defendants to be inferred in the light of all the circumstances, including the terms of the contract itself. On this issue, the rule of construction relied on by Mr. Roche that you cannot imply in a contract a promise, which is inconsistent with an express promise, is irrelevant, for the inference to be drawn from the terms of the contract that the defendants knew the particular purpose for which the plaintiff required the car is not an implied promise, nor is the representation in clause 9 (ii) of the contract an express promise.

We reach this conclusion without reluctance, for clause 9 (ii) is clearly an attempt, which only the size of the print in which it is set out prevents one calling blatant, to evade the provisions of section 8 (2) and (3) of the Hire-Purchase Act, 1938.

We turn now to the defence based on estoppel. As already mentioned, the plaintiff on some date after June 9, 1958, signed a so-called "delivery receipt" at the request of Brown, which was forwarded in due course by him to the defendants. It reads as follows: "Delivery receipt. Lombank Limited, Lombank "House, Curzon Street, Park Lane, London, W.1. I/We ack-"nowledge and agree that I/We have read the hire-purchase "agreement made between us and fully understand the terms "and conditions thereof before signing. I/We confirm that I/We "have examined the goods described in the schedule to the "agreement and acknowledge that the same is/are in good order "and condition and to my/our satisfaction in every respect and "that I/We have taken delivery of the said goods at this date." At the foot of the form there are the words: "This form should "not be signed until delivery of the goods has been taken."

This form, says Mr. Roche, when signed by the plaintiff constitutes a representation by her that the car was in good order and condition upon delivery and that the defendants are entitled to rely upon that representation as an estoppel.

In order to found an estoppel on this statement in the delivery receipt, which is in a printed form drafted and supplied by them, the defendants must show: (1) that it is clear and unambiguous; (2) that the plaintiff meant it to be acted upon by the defendants or at any rate so conducted herself that a reasonable man in the position of the defendants would take the representation to be true and believe that it was meant that he should act upon it (see Citizens' Bank of Louisiana v. First National Bank of New Orleans [1]); (3) that the defendants in fact believed it to be true and were induced by such belief to act upon it.

In our view the alleged estoppel fails to satisfy any of these requirements. It is not clear and unambiguous. Indeed, upon its true construction, an acknowledgment that goods are in good order and condition following immediately upon the statement that the person so acknowledging has examined the goods seems to us to be, at the very lowest against the defendants, at least capable of meaning that they are in good order and condition, so far as such inspection is reasonably capable of revealing, that is, free from patent defects. The defects relied upon by the plaintiff were latent, not patent, and thus not clearly covered by the representation.

As regards (2), it is not suggested that the plaintiff herself, who was described by the judge as having a very trustful disposition and not very businesslike, had any idea of the mechanics

[1] (1873) L.R. 6 H.L. 352.

C. A.
1960
Lowe
v.
Lombank
Ltd.

of hire purchase or intended the respondents to take any action as a result of the signature of the delivery receipt.

Did she then so conduct herself that a reasonable man would believe that it was meant that he should act on the representation as to the condition of the goods contained in the delivery receipt? The action in fact taken by the defendants after the delivery receipt had been sent them was to affix their signature to the hire-purchase agreement of June 9, 1958, and to purchase the car from Brown. The courts, both civil and criminal, are becoming familiar with the mechanics of hire purchase, though the legal relationship between the hirer, the dealer and the hire-purchase company at various stages in the transaction still involves many problems which have not been authoritatively solved; but no one would suppose that the ordinary small hirer like the plaintiff was aware of the mechanics of the transaction as between the dealer and the hire-purchase company or of the legal relationships involved, nor, indeed, were the defendants themselves, unless their letter of November 12, 1958, in which they said "in this "instance we are acting purely as bankers," was dishonest and not, as we prefer to think, merely ignorant.

The representation by the plaintiff as to the condition of the car was made in a document prepared by the defendants, addressed to them, referring expressly to a hire-purchase agreement made between them and the plaintiff—not an offer by the plaintiff which was yet to be accepted by them—and acknowledging receipt of the goods the subject-matter of the hire-purchase agreement. There is much to be said for the view that, in authorising the dealer to proffer upon delivery of the goods a document couched in these terms, the defendants, when the goods are in fact delivered against signature of the delivery receipt, accept by conduct the plaintiff's offer constituted by her signature of the hire-purchase agreement, so that a binding contract is thereupon made; or at least that the defendants by their conduct are estopped from denying that such a contract then exists. If so, there is no further action apart from what they are already contractually bound to do that the defendants can take on the faith of the representation. It is not, however, necessary to reach a final decision on this point. It is sufficient for the purposes of the present case to say that, having regard to the terms of the delivery receipt with its reference to a hire-purchase agreement already made by the defendants and to the fact, known to the defendants, that it was obtained upon delivery of the goods, a reasonable man in the position of the defendants would not believe that the representation as to the condition of the goods contained in the delivery receipt was meant to be acted upon by him by entering into the very agreement referred to as having been already concluded or by taking steps to acquire from the dealer a right to possession of or title to the goods of which possession had already been delivered up to the plaintiff.

Finally, the defendants have, in our view, failed to establish that they in fact signed the hire-purchase agreement on the faith of the truth of the plaintiff's representation as to the condition of the car. The defendants' area manager, who was called, never said so. He did give evidence that the hire-purchase agreement was not in fact signed until after the delivery receipt had been forwarded to them and that this was the usual practice. Mr. Roche, however, relies upon a finding by the county court judge that "the defendants would not have made any advance to the "dealer or execute the hire-purchase agreement unless and until "the delivery receipt had been signed by the plaintiff." We will assume, since the notes of evidence are compressed, that there was evidence to justify this finding. But it is far from being a finding that the defendants acquired the car from the dealer or executed the hire-purchase agreement because they believed the representation as to the condition of the goods in the delivery receipt was true. It is consistent with the view, which we regard as much more probable, that the defendants required the delivery receipt to be signed by the plaintiff, before the hire-purchase agreement was executed by them, because of their belief that the obtaining of such a receipt enabled them to evade the provisions of section 8 (2) and (3) of the Hire-Purchase Act, 1938, irrespective of whether the statement in it as to the condition of the car was true or not.

For all these reasons we are of opinion that the county court judge was right in holding that the hire-purchase agreement was subject to the implied condition that the car was reasonably fit for use as a means of transport, and that there was in fact a breach of such condition, but that he was wrong in holding that the plaintiff was estopped from relying upon that breach.

The appeal will be allowed and, in lieu of judgment for the defendants, judgment will be entered by the plaintiff for £160, being the damages as assessed by the county court judge.

LORD GODDARD. The appeal will be allowed with costs here and below.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors: Mawby, Barrie & Letts for John P. Bonney & Adler, Southport; Victor Mishcon & Co.

B. A. B.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.

1960
Feb. 2.

Hodson, Willmer and Harman L.JJ.

* CORFE v. CORFE.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Husband and Wife—Divorce—Evidence—Adultery—Denial of adultery in answer—Verified by affidavit—Not denied in evidence-in-chief—Whether cross-examination thereon permissible—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 32 (3).

Husband and Wife—Practice—Pleading—Affidavit in support—Whether evidence at hearing—Cross-examination—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (3).

Where a charge of adultery is denied in the answer to a petition for dissolution of marriage and verified by the affidavit in support thereof, the denial becomes "evidence in the proceedings" within the meaning of section 32 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, and the party making it can be cross-examined on such denial notwithstanding that the adultery was not denied in the party's evidence-in-chief.

APPEAL from Wallington J.

A husband petitioned for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery and desertion. By her answer the wife denied the adultery and cross-petitioned for a decree on the ground of her husband's desertion. The wife's denial was verified by the affidavit in support of her answer. At the trial, the wife did not deny the adultery in her evidence-in-chief, but an objection on her behalf to cross-examination on the allegation of adultery was not sustained by the judge. In the Court of Appeal Hodson and Willmer L.JJ. made observations in their judgments in respect of that objection, which they held had been correctly disallowed. This Practice Note relates solely to those observations.

A. A. Edmondson for the wife.

N. A. Miscampbell for the husband.

HODSON L.J. The wife did not, in her evidence-in-chief, deny the adultery at all; and when she was cross-examined about certain letters, objection was taken on her behalf that she, not having given evidence in denial of her adultery, could not be cross-examined, by reason of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950. That objection was not sustained before the judge, and it now appears to me that it would not have been sustainable, for this reason: although the wife did not give any evidence-in-chief of her own denial of adultery, she had, in answer to the petition for divorce sworn an affidavit verifying the denial of adultery, and that is evidence "in the proceedings," so that the provision in section

32 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, is not contravened. [His Lordship read section 32 (3) of the Act of 1950.[1]]

The wife, having sworn the affidavit, had given evidence "in "the same proceedings" denying the adultery; and the cross-examination upon the letters can only have been directed to establishing the proof of adultery. The wife, having been cross-examined, did not in terms deny the adultery, but maintained the position throughout that it could not have happened because the man in question was impotent.

WILLMER L.J. Counsel on behalf of the wife sought in the first instance to get rid of the finding of adultery which the judge made against the wife. In that he was not successful. Objection was taken to the judge having allowed the wife to be cross-examined about the letters which she had received from a man, on the ground that the answers to those questions might or would be such as to tend to show that she had committed adultery. The wife had not, in examination-in-chief, given any evidence in denial of adultery. The judge, however, allowed that cross-examination to take place, and it has been contended before us that he was in error in doing so. It seems to have been overlooked, however, that the wife had, by swearing to the truth of the statements made in her answer, already denied on oath the charge of adultery; and in those circumstances (although that is not the reason given by the judge) I find it hard to see how it would have been right to exclude that line of cross-examination. In the result, the wife having been so cross-examined, the judge came to the conclusion that she was not a witness of truth, and he did not accept her evidence.

Solicitors: Baines & Baines for Edward A. Simans, Birkenhead; Gibson & Weldon for S. Leslie Black, Liverpool.

I. G. R. M.

[1] Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 32 (3): "The parties to any proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery and the husbands and wives of the parties shall be competent to give evidence in the proceedings, but no witness in any such proceedings, whether a party thereto or not, shall be liable to be asked or be bound to answer any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery unless he or she has already given evidence in the same proceedings in disproof of the alleged adultery."

[HOUSE OF LORDS.]

H. L. (Sc.)† 1960 Jan. 20; Feb. 18.

* BROWN . . . . . Appellant;

AND

ROLLS ROYCE LTD. . . . . Respondents.

Negligence—Safe system of work—Dangerous substance—Standard of care—Dermatitis contracted—Contact with oil—Precautionary system—Onus of proof.

Negligence—Onus of proof—Safe system of work—Failure to follow usual precautions.

Fact or Law—Negligence—Standard of care—Always a question of fact.

Judicial Precedent—Question of fact—Jury question—Decision of judge on it not a precedent.

In an action for damages brought by an employee in a factory against his employers the following facts were found by the court: From 1952 to 1955 the employee worked as a machine oiler, so that his hands were constantly in contact with oil. In 1954 he contracted dermatitis as a result of this contact. The employers did not supply barrier cream, as to the value of which in regard to dermatitis there were strong differences in medical opinion. They relied on their medical officer for advice on the precautions to be taken against dermatitis, and, on his advice, barrier cream was not one of the precautions required in their system. He exercised proper care and skill in advising on the precautions to be taken and was not at fault in so doing. Rozalex No. 1 barrier cream was commonly supplied by employers to men doing work of this kind, but there was no evidence as to what, if any, other precautions they took. It was not proved that barrier cream was an effective precaution against dermatitis for men engaged in similar work to this employee, nor that it would probably have prevented him from contracting dermatitis:—

Held, that on these facts the employers had not failed in their duty to the employee, since their conduct satisfied the test of "the "conduct and judgment of a reasonable and prudent man." The onus was on the employee to show that they had been negligent and that their negligence had caused the injury. It was not right to create an artificial division of the onus of proof by taking some of the findings of fact separately so as to suggest that they raised a presumption of negligence which the employers must rebut.

Per Lord Denning. The legal burden of proof, properly so called, which is imposed by the law itself, must be distinguished from the provisional burden which is raised by the state of the evidence (post, p. 215).

Paris v. Stepney Borough Council [1951] A.C. 367; [1951] 1 T.L.R. 25; [1951] 1 All E.R. 42, H.L. applied.

Decision of the First Division of the Court of Session, 1959 S.L.T.(Notes) 73 affirmed.

Appeal from the First Division of the Court of Session.

In this appeal from the First Division of the Court of Session (Lord President Clyde, Lord Russell and Lord Sorn, Lord Carmont dissenting) the appellant, John Brown, sought to have reversed an interlocutor pronounced by their Lordships on May 29, 1959, reversing an interlocutor pronounced by the Sheriff-Substitute at Glasgow (Mr. N. M. L. Walker) on November 10, 1958. The appellant raised an action of reparation against the respondents, Rolls Royce Ltd., on September 26, 1957. He contended that he had contracted industrial dermatitis in consequence of their negligence in failing to provide a barrier cream for his use while engaged in his employment with them. In their defence they contended that he had not in fact contracted industrial dermatitis. They also contended that they had taken all reasonable precautions to protect their employees against dermatitis and that there was no duty on them to provide barrier cream. Their second plea in law was that the appellant "not "having suffered loss, injury or damage through the fault of the "[respondents], the [respondents] should be assoilzied." After sundry procedure proof was heard before the Sheriff-Substitute on July 9, 10, 11, 14 and 28, 1958, he held that the appellant had contracted industrial dermatitis and that the respondents were at fault in not providing a barrier cream for his use. He assessed damages at £300. The respondents appealed against his interlocutor and the appeal was heard by the First Division on May 19, 20, 21 and 22, 1959. By interlocutor dated May 29, 1959, the First Division allowed the appeal and assoilzied the respondents.

† Present: Lord Reid, Lord Radcliffe, Lord Cohen, Lord Keith of Avonholm and Lord Denning.

The interlocutor of the First Division, so far as material, was in the following terms: "Edinburgh, 29th May, 1959. The Lords "having considered the Record in the Appeal: Find in fact (1) "that from 1952 till 1955 the pursuer was employed by the "defenders as a machine oiler; (2) that owing to the nature of his "work his hands were constantly in contact with oil; (3) that in "the spring of 1954, he contracted industrial dermatitis caused "by contact with oil; (4) that the defenders supplied ample "washing facilities; (5) that they did not supply barrier cream; "(6) that there are strong differences of opinion in the medical "profession as to the value of barrier cream in regard to derma-"titis; (7) that the defenders relied on their medical officer, "Dr. Collier, for advice on the precautions to be taken against "dermatitis; (8) that on the advice of the said Dr. Collier the "defenders did not include barrier cream as one of the pre-"cautions required in their system; (9) that the said Dr. Collier "exercised proper care and skill in advising on the precautions "to be taken against dermatitis, and was not at fault in so doing; "(10) that Rozalex No. 1 barrier cream is commonly supplied by "employers to men doing such work as the pursuer was doing, "but there is no evidence as to what, if any other precautions "their employers take; (11) that it is not proved that barrier "cream is an effective precaution against the contracting of der-"matitis by workmen engaged in similar work to the pursuer; "(12) that it is not proved that barrier cream would probably "have prevented the pursuer from contracting dermatitis; "(13) that the pursuer is still suffering from the disease and the

H. L. (Sc.)
1960
Brown
v.
Rolls Royce
Ltd.

"prospects of an early recovery are not good; and (14) that he "was off work owing to the disease from July 25 to September 19, "1955, and his net loss of wages during that period was approximately £39; Find in law that the defenders were not at fault "in not supplying barrier cream; sustain their 2nd plea-in-law, "recall the interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute dated September 10, 1958, except in so far as it certifies witnesses and the "employment of counsel, allow the appeal, assoilzie them from "the crave of the initial writ and decern."

F. C. Watt Q.C. and J. R. Hamilton (both of the Scottish Bar) for the appellant.

M. Kissen Q.C. and J. A. Forsyth (both of the Scottish Bar) for the respondent company were not called on to address their Lordships.

Besides the cases referred to in their Lordships' opinions, Morris v. West Hartlepool Steam Navigation Co. Ltd.[1] was cited in argument.

Their Lordships took time for consideration.

Feb. 18. Lord Reid. My Lords, I have had an opportunity of reading the speeches which my noble and learned friends are about to deliver. I agree with them and I find it unnecessary to add anything. I move, your Lordships, that this appeal be dismissed.

Lord Radcliffe. My Lords, for my own part, I take the same view. I have had the opportunity of reading the speeches prepared by my noble and learned friends, who will deliver them later, and I am in full agreement.

Lord Cohen. My Lords, the appellant contracted industrial dermatitis caused by contact with oil while he was in the employment of the respondents and he avers that the said dermatitis was caused or aggravated by the fault and negligence of the respondents. He instituted proceedings in the sheriffdom of Lanarkshire at Glasgow claiming £500 damages, and on September 10, 1958, recovered judgment for damages assessed at £300. The respondents appealed to the Court of Session and the matter came before their Lordships of the First Division. On May 29, 1959, they pronounced their interlocutor reversing by a majority the decision of the Sheriff-Substitute.

[His Lordship read the interlocutor and continued:]

The first point to be noted is that since the interlocutor appealed from reviewed the judgment of an inferior court founded on proof allowed and taken, section 40 of the Judicature (Court of Session) Act, 1825, makes it final as to findings of fact; it is subject to appeal only on points of law.

[1] [1956] A.C. 552; [1956] 1 W.L.R. 177; [1956] 1 All E.R. 385, C.A.

Mr. Watt, for the appellant, accepts that this is the position, but he submits that findings (1), (2), (3), (5) and (10), which I have quoted, discharge what he calls the preliminary onus of proof of the respondents' negligence, which he admits rests on the appellant, and alleges that the onus then passed to the respondents to show that they were not negligent. He says that the respondents have not discharged that onus.

I cannot think it is right to take some of the findings of fact in this way apart from the others and thus create an artificial division in the onus of proof. It seems to me that the authorities clearly show that it is for the pursuer in an action founded on negligence to show that the defenders have been negligent and that their negligence has caused the injury of which the pursuer complains. As Lord Keith of Avonholm said in Cavanagh v. Ulster Weaving Co. Ltd.[1]: "The ruling principle is that an "employer is bound to take reasonable care for the safety of his "workmen and all other rules or formulas must be taken subject "to this principle." Applying this ruling principle to the facts as found by the First Division, I arrive at the conclusion that the respondents have not failed in their duty to the appellant.

Mr. Watt relied on the first part of the well-known rule laid down by Lord President Dunedin in Morton v. William Dixon Ltd.[2] But that rule is only a prima facie guide, and as Lord President Clyde said in the present case: "There is no evidence "to prove that barrier creaming effective to prevent dermatitis. "Moreover, as Lord Normand said in Paris v. Stepney Borough "Council,[3] the rule does not detract from the test of the conduct "and judgment of a reasonable and prudent man." It seems to me impossible in face of findings (7), (8) and (9) to say that the respondents did not pass this test.

I have arrived at my conclusion on the facts found and stated in the interlocutor. If it were permissible to look at the judgments of the majority of the Court of Session, this conclusion would be reinforced by further facts stated by the Lord President and Lord Russell. The Lord President said that before Dr. Collier came on the scene in 1940 the respondents supplied barrier cream, and Lord Russell said the number of dermatitis cases had fallen from 353 in 1941 to three or four by 1957.

I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD KEITH OF AVONHOLM. My Lords, the appellant, who is pursuer in this action, appeals against an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session which recalled an interlocutor of one of the Sheriff-Substitutes of Lanarkshire at Glasgow, pronounced in the appellant's favour, after proof in the sheriff

[1] [1959] 3 W.L.R. 262, 273; [1959] 2 All E.R. 745, H.L. (N.I.).
[2] 1909 S.C. 807, 809.
[3] [1951] A.C. 367, 382; [1951] 1 T.L.R. 25; [1951] 1 All E.R. 42, H.L.

H. L. (Sc.)
1960
Brown
v.
Rolls Royce
Ltd.
Lord Keith
of Avonholm.

court. The case is thus one to which section 40 of the Judicature (Court of Session) Act, 1825, applies and appeal to your Lordships' House is competent only on points of law. It is unnecessary to refer to the record in the action further than to say that the action is one of damages by the pursuer against his employers for negligence in failing to supply him with barrier cream as a protection against the risk of getting industrial dermatitis through contact with oil, in the course of his employment.

[His Lordship read the interlocutor of the First Division and continued:]

The findings of fact contained in this interlocutor are, in my opinion, fatal to the success of this appeal. The argument for the appellant was that findings (1), (2), (3), (5) and (10) necessarily raised a presumption of negligence which the defenders had had to rebut. The keystone in this argument seemed to be the finding of common practice to supply barrier cream stated in finding (10). But I can draw no such inference from this finding. A common practice in like circumstances not followed by an employer may no doubt be a weighty circumstance to be considered by judge or jury in deciding whether failure to comply with this practice, taken along with all the other material circumstances in the case, yields an inference of negligence on the part of the employers. Reference was made to Lord Dunedin's well-known dictum in Morton v. William Dixon Ltd.[4] As has been said before in this House, Lord Dunedin was laying down no proposition of law; nor did he say that, if a practice was averred and proved which might have avoided the accident, this was necessarily conclusive of negligence on the part of an employer who had not followed the practice. The ultimate test is lack of reasonable care for the safety of the workman in all the circumstances of the case. That there were other material circumstances in this case is clear from findings (6) to (9) inclusive, with, in addition, findings (11) and (12). Your Lordships are not entitled to go beyond these findings, but it is clear from the opinions of the majority of the judges of the First Division, which were read to your Lordships, that these findings were not reached without a most careful examination of the evidence in the case. No doubt, as urged by counsel for the pursuer, it is not the care and skill of Dr. Collier that is directly in issue, but the care of the defenders for the safety of the pursuer. But absence of proper care on the part of Dr. Collier might have involved the defenders in vicarious liability. To put it at its lowest, their employment of Dr. Collier and reliance on his advice was material evidence to be weighed on the question of the care exercised by the defenders for the safety of their workmen.

The appellant's (pursuer's) counsel also challenged findings (11) and (12) as having placed the onus on the wrong party. It was not for the pursuer, he said, to prove the efficacy of barrier cream, but for the defenders to disprove its efficacy. Here, again, his submission turned on the finding with reference to common practice by other employers. But it is impossible, in my opinion, to affirm that this finding per se must shift the onus. It is an element to be considered with the whole other evidence in the case. The whole evidence was before their Lordships of the First Division and it was for them to draw conclusions on how matters of onus lay. The pursuer's action was based on negligence and the primary onus lay on him. The findings in question have a direct bearing on the question of negligence and, in my opinion, cannot be disturbed by your Lordships. The findings in fact in the interlocutor appealed against, in my opinion, amply support the finding in law that the defenders were not in fault in not supplying barrier cream.

[4] 1909 S.C. 807, 809.

I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD DENNING. My Lords, the difference between the judges of the Court of Session turned on the onus of proof. The majority of them (the Lord President, Lord Russell and Lord Sorn) thought that the burden was on the pursuer to prove that the defenders were negligent and that, looking at the case at the end of the day, the pursuer had not discharged that burden. The minority (Lord Carmont) thought that, once the pursuer proved that the defenders had not followed the common practice of the trade in supplying barrier cream, the burden shifted to the defenders, so that they would not escape liability unless they proved (not as a mere probability but as matter of reasonable certainty) that, even if they had adopted the common practice and supplied barrier cream, it would have done no good.

This difference of opinion shows how important it is to distinguish between a legal burden, properly so called, which is imposed by the law itself, and a provisional burden which is raised by the state of the evidence. The legal burden in this case was imposed by law on the pursuer. In order to succeed he had to prove that the defenders were negligent and that their negligence caused the disease, see Bonnington Castings Ltd. v. Wardlaw, Lord Reid[5] and Lord Tucker.[6] In order to discharge the burden of proving negligence, the pursuer proved that "barrier cream was com-"monly supplied by employers to men doing such work as the "pursuer was doing." This was a cogent piece of evidence and raised no doubt a "presumption" or a "prima facie" case, in this sense, that, if nothing more appeared, the court might well infer that the defenders were negligent, and in that sense it put a burden on the defenders to answer it. But this was only a provisional burden which was raised by the state of the evidence

[5] [1956] A.C. 613, 620; [1956] 2 W.L.R. 707; [1956] 1 All E.R. 615, H.L.

[6] [1956] A.C. 613, 624, H.L.

H. L. (Sc.)
1960
Brown
v.
Rolls Royce
Ltd.
Lord Denning.

as it then stood. The defenders might answer it by argument, as indeed they did, by pointing out that "there is no evidence as "to what, if any, other precautions these employers take": or the defenders might answer it by calling evidence themselves, as indeed they did, by proving that they "relied on their medical "officer, Dr. Collier, who exercised proper care and skill" and they carried out the precautions advised by him. In this way a provisional burden may shift from one party to the other as the case proceeds or may remain suspended between them. But it has no compelling force. At the end of the day the court has to ask itself—not whether the provisional burden is discharged—but whether the legal burden has been discharged, that is to say: Has the pursuer proved that the defenders were negligent?

If the view of Lord Carmont were right it would mean that, once the pursuer proved that the defenders had not followed a precaution usually observed in the trade, there was a compelling presumption that they were negligent, and there was a legal burden of the defenders to rebut it. This would introduce a new proposition of law for which I find no warrant in the judgment of Lord Dunedin in Morton v. William Dixon Ltd.[7] As my noble and learned friend, Lord Keith of Avonholm said in Cavanagh v. Ulster Weaving Co. Ltd.[8]: "Lord Dunedin was laying down . . . "no principle of law but stating the factual framework within "which the law would fall to be applied." Nor do I find any warrant for it in the speech of Lord Normand in Paris v. Stepney Borough Council.[9] Lord Normand there said that "if there is "proof that a precaution is usually observed by other persons, a "reasonable and prudent man will follow the usual practice in the "like circumstances." That is not a proposition of law at all, but only a proposition of good sense. It is on a par with the propositions about protective clothing discussed by your Lordships in Qualcast (Wolverhampton) Ltd. v. Haynes.[10] If the defenders do not follow the usual precautions, it raises a prima facie case against them in this sense, that it is evidence from which negligence may be inferred, but not in the sense that it must be inferred unless the contrary is proved. At the end of the day the court has to ask itself whether the defenders were negligent or not. It is sufficient if there is a greater probability on one side or the other: but if at the end of the case the evidence is so evenly balanced that the court cannot come to a determinate conclusion, the legal burden comes into play and requires the court to reject the case of negligence alleged against them. The majority of the Court of Session here held that the defenders were not at fault

[7] 1909 S.C. 807.
[8] [1959] 3 W.L.R. 262, 274, H.L. (N.I.).
[9] [1951] A.C. 367, 382.
[10] [1959] A.C. 743; [1959] 2 W.L.R. 510; [1959] 2 All E.R. 38.

in not supplying barrier cream: and I can see no error of law in their findings.

I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: Evill & Coleman for Thos. J. Addly, Son & Co., S.S.C., Edinburgh, and L. & L. Lawrence, Glasgow; Claremont, Haynes & Co. for Simpson & Marwick, W.S., Edinburgh, and Gartshore, Scott, Sons & Co., Glasgow.

F. C.

[BRISTOL ASSIZES.]

* QUINTAS v. NATIONAL SMELTING CO. LTD.

1959
Nov. 17, 18, 26.

Devlin J.

[1956 Q. 1532.]

Factory—Dangerous machinery (fencing)—Fence, extent of duty to—Handrail three feet high—Gap of 18 inches—Overhead travelling cable way—Buckets suspended from cable—Whether cable way "machinery" requiring to be fenced—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 14 (1).

Words and Phrases—"Machinery"—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 14 (1).

The defendants were the occupiers of a factory in which they operated an overhead travelling cable way, known as the ropeway, for the purpose of transporting material from one part of the factory to another. The ropeway was supported by stanchions, on each side of which there ran a cable, and along these cables, one going one way and the other the reverse, there were large buckets constantly in motion. The buckets were spaced at intervals of 110 feet and travelled at a maximum speed of 3 miles per hour. When they were travelling at that speed, a given spot on the route of the ropeway would be passed by a bucket about twice in a minute. For most of its route the ropeway was sufficiently high above the ground to obviate the need for any protection for men working or passing underneath. But at one point it crossed the flat roof of a building, containing a crushing plant, which was 18 feet above ground level. The bottom of the bucket passed 4 feet above the level of that roof and so persons on the roof were in danger. Part of the flat roof of the crushing plant was occupied by a small building known as the magnet house. Access to the magnet house was obtained by a door which opened on to a corner of the flat roof. A man emerging from this door and turning left had to walk only a few paces to get to the door of the magnet house, and this walking space was fenced in by a handrail about 3 feet high and consisting of posts and two rails. At the material time there was a gap of 18 inches in this handrail. It had been cut to allow some equipment through and never replaced. Just before the accident the plaintiff, who was employed by the defendants, and who had finished a job in the magnet house, walked through the gap out to the edge of the roof to attract attention so that he could send a message to

---

[Reported by A. D. RAWLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

1959

Quintas
v.
National Smelting
Co. Ltd.

his foreman and, standing in the route of the ropeway, he was struck by a bucket and thrown from the flat roof to the ground below, sustaining injuries. In an action against his employers for damages for, inter alia, breach of statutory duty, the plaintiff contended that the ropeway was "machinery" within the meaning of section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and that the part of it which crossed the roof of the crushing plant was dangerous and was not securely fenced as required by that section:—

Held, (1) that the whole of the ropeway must be regarded as one piece of apparatus and as machinery within the meaning of the Act. Accordingly, such parts of it as were dangerous to persons beneath it required to be fenced.

(2) That the fence must not merely guard against accident but must be such as took into account human weaknesses which included, as well as forgetfulness and inadvertence, an inclination sometimes to run minor risks and to take short cuts. The fence need not, however, be constructed so as to keep out a determined man. In this case the fence was not of proper construction, even without the gap of 18 inches which had been cut in it, and was not in compliance with section 14 (1) of the Act.

Dicta of Lord Porter in Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons Ltd. [1948] A.C. 477, 486; 64 T.L.R. 384; [1948] 2 All E.R. 386; and Lord Morton in John Summers & Sons Ltd. v. Frost [1955] A.C. 740, 758; [1955] 2 W.L.R. 825; [1955] 1 All E.R. 870 applied.

(3) That on the facts, the plaintiff's own negligence was the main cause of the accident, and his contributory negligence was to be assessed at 75 per cent.

Action.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

Dudley Collard and W. J. Ward for the plaintiff.

W. L. Mars-Jones Q.C. and H. E. Park for the defendants.

No cases, other than those cited in the judgment, were referred to in argument.

Cur. adv. vult.

November 26. Devlin J. read the following judgment: The plaintiff, Nicholas Quintas, is a Spaniard who has been resident for some time in this country. At the time of the accident to which this action relates he was a man in the late thirties and employed as a fitter by the defendants, the National Smelting Co. Ltd., at their works at Avonmouth. On June 28, 1955, he was thrown or flung from the flat roof on which he was standing down on to the ground below, a distance of about 18 feet. He landed on his heels and sustained very severe injuries to his feet, and also some injury to his elbow which aggravated an existing condition of osteo-arthritis.

This accident occurred because the plaintiff was struck by a large and heavy bucket which was being carried overhead on an apparatus which is known as a ropeway. It consists of an overhead cable, and to this cable buckets are attached at various intervals, 110 feet apart normally, and the buckets are pulled along the cable by means of another cable referred to as the pulley cable.

They go up loaded on one side of the pillars or supports that are erected to hold the cable, and come back on the other side. This is a system which runs for a considerable length through the defendants' factory, and it is used for moving materials to and fro for the purposes of their manufacturing process. The speed is not great, at a maximum speed it is 3 miles per hour, but if anyone were standing in the way of a bucket, a heavy bucket moving at 3 miles per hour, he would undoubtedly be knocked down, and if standing on the edge of the roof, as the plaintiff was, he would be knocked over the edge of the roof; and that is what happened to the plaintiff.

It is not at every point on the route of this ropeway that an accident of this sort could occur. The overhead ropeway, as one might expect, is some height above the ordinary ground level of the factory, so that the buckets ordinarily travel at a height where they are not likely to do injury to anybody. But at this particular point the overhead ropeway crossed a piece of flat roof, and that roof was 18 feet above the ground; the consequence was that the bottom of the bucket was only 4 feet above the top of the flat roof, and it was on that flat roof that the plaintiff was standing. It is the roof of a plant called the crushing plant. On top of that roof there is a sort of penthouse building which occupies only a part of it, and that building is called the magnet house. In order to get there you have to get up on top of the crushing house roof, and you do that by means of an internal staircase which allows you out on to the roof by means of a door. If you turn sharply left you enter the door of the magnet house. If you went straight on you would walk on the open piece of flat roof, and if you turned to the left after you got past the magnet house you would find another area of the flat roof, and it is across that area that the ropeway travels. It clearly was not intended that people should go out on to this flat roof unless they had some good reason for doing so, and the photographs show rails fitted. They are not very elaborate, but consist of posts and two rails, fitted at the corner where a man comes out on to the roof from the internal staircase and turns into the magnet house; those rails are fitted on the corner, and they rail off the route which a person will take to get to the magnet house.

I am satisfied that this part of the roof was dangerous, and therefore the defendants had a duty in respect of it which they owed to the plaintiff. They did, in fact, as I have indicated, erect a railing so that anybody who came up through the internal staircase going to the magnet house would be diverted, if I may put it that way, from walking on to the roof as a whole. It was a simple railing, it was not something that anybody could not cross with the utmost ease, but it was there more as a form of warning than anything else; it showed people that the roof was not something which was to be walked upon at large But at this time there was a gap in it. Some time previously, and it has not been clearly ascertained when, somebody wanted to get a heavy piece of machinery up by the route I have described and found themselves impeded by the railing, and, accordingly, 18 inches of the railing was cut off so there was a gap of 18 inches between the wall of the magnet house and the end of the railing. That, of course, anybody could go through, and it might well have suggested to somebody who did not know what the position was, that there was no particular reason why he should not cross. In other words, it might well have destroyed the warning effect which the ordinary intelligent man would otherwise get from seeing the railway.

1959

Quintas v. National Smelting Co. Ltd.

Devlin J.

On the morning of the accident, June 28, 1955, the foreman fitter under whom the plaintiff worked, a Mr. Jakeways, had instructed the plaintiff to change a conveyor belt in the magnet house. The conveyor belt is an elaborate thing, it is fairly wide and it weighs 19 pounds. It had to be got up into the magnet house, and that work was given by the foreman to a rigger called Carter, who had two other men working under him. The job was done on the morning of the day in question, and the plaintiff then went down to report it to the foreman. He went to the foreman's office for that purpose and Mr. Jakeways sent him back again, according to the plaintiff, to await Mr. Jakeways' coming so that he could satisfy himself that the work had been properly done by inspecting it. According to Mr. Jakeways it was because there was something further to be done, and it was Mr. Jakeways' intention to inspect it after that had been done. There is a minor conflict of evidence about that, just as there is a minor conflict of evidence about how long Mr. Jakeways waited before he came out. The plaintiff said three-quarters of an hour and Mr. Jakeways said twenty minutes. I do not think it matters very much. The point is that Mr. Jakeways delayed long enough for the plaintiff to become rather impatient. It was getting past the middle of the day. Again there is a conflict of evidence as to precisely what time it was, and again I do not think it matters very much except to say that it was after a quarter to two. The plaintiff, having waited at least up to that time, and maybe the time was later, became impatient and he wanted to find out what the foreman was doing. Instead of going down as he might have done in the same way as he had when he reported to the foreman, by the internal staircase to which I have referred, he decided to go out on to the roof and look down over the edge and call someone and ask that someone to go and tell the foreman that he was still waiting. The foreman's office was about 90 feet away from this point. That is what the plaintiff did, and it was while he was standing on the edge calling to someone, perhaps after he had called someone, perhaps after that someone was already on the way, that he was struck on his back by a bucket, and knocked off the roof in the circumstances which I have already recounted.

It is in those circumstances that he brings his claim for damages.

[His Lordship, finding as a fact that the plaintiff knew that it was dangerous to work or stand under the ropeway at this point, held that the main cause of the accident was the plaintiff's own negligence, and that the defendants were not in breach of any duty at common law, and continued:] But the plaintiff alleges a breach of section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937. He contends that the ropeway was machinery within the meaning of that section, that the part of it which crossed the roof of the crushing plant was a dangerous part, and that it was not securely fenced as required by the section. The question of whether a ropeway of this sort is "machinery" within the meaning of the section appears to be a novel point upon which counsel were not able to find any clear authority, and I therefore reserved my judgment upon it.

The defendants submit that the ropeway is simply a means of transport which is to be compared with a railway, the only difference being that while in the case of a railway the vehicle moves on the rails, in the case of the ropeway it is suspended from them. The plaintiff submits that the ropeway is more justly to be compared with a conveyor belt, the only difference being that it operates over the whole factory instead of in a particular workshop. The only authority that counsel could find on the point is Parvin v. Morton Machine Co. Ltd.,[1] in which the House of Lords decided that the Factories Acts did not extend to machinery manufactured in the factory. Lord Normand, who gave the first speech, put the question[2] as being whether the Acts "apply to "machines or machinery manufactured in the factory or only "to machines or machinery for use in the factory in the processes "of manufacture or as ancillaries to these processes." While Lord Normand was not there giving a conclusive definition of the machinery to which the Acts apply, I have no doubt that he chose his words carefully. The transport of materials for use in the processes of manufacture is something ancillary to those processes. I do not think that it follows from this, as the defendants suggest, that every truck on a factory railway or every vehicle within the factory which is carrying material is a machine for the purposes of the Acts. Even if it did so follow, it does not also follow that the machine would have to be "fenced." No doubt a vehicle in motion may be a dangerous thing; but section 14 does not require that the machine as a whole should be securely fenced but that every dangerous part of it should be. Normally, the dangerous parts of a vehicle are covered in. The defendants invited me to regard the buckets as separate pieces of machinery and to compare them with any other form of vehicle; there was nothing dangerous about a bucket, they said, except its motion. But, in my judgment, the whole of the ropeway must be regarded as one piece of apparatus and as machinery within the meaning of the Act. This does not, of course, mean that every part of it has to be fenced, but only those parts, such as the one I am

[1] [1952] A.C. 515; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 682; [1952] 1 All E.R. 670.

[2] [1952] A.C. 515, 520.

1959

Quintas v. National Smelting Co. Ltd.

Devlin J.

considering in this case, where there is danger to those underneath.

Have the defendants discharged their obligation of securely fencing? It would be easy to say that as there was a gap in the handrail they clearly had not. But I think that that would be to take too superficial a view of the problem. The gap was really immaterial. If it had been made good, a man could still have got through the fence just as easily as if the gap was there. The real question is whether there was a duty on the defendants to erect a fence that would prevent, or at least seriously hinder, a man from going where he wanted to go. If the defendants could have discharged their duty by mending the handrail then I should hold that their failure to do so did not contribute to the damage, for I am sure that a complete handrail would not have kept the plaintiff out.

Here, again, there does not seem to be a wealth of authority. It is clear that by a secure fence is meant one which is designed to prevent contact. But does that mean accidental contact, whether or not involving some degree of carelessness, or does it extend to deliberate contact? In Carroll v. Andrew Barclay & Sons Ltd.[3] Lord Porter said[4]: "Fencing, in my opinion, means "the erection of a barricade to prevent any employee from "making contact with the machine." It must be remembered that his Lordship was speaking in a case in which the point was not the strength of the fence but whether it was necessary to fence against the ejection of dangerous materials from the machine. But the word "barricade" is not likely to have been chosen without thought, and the dictum affords valuable guidance as is shown by Lord Morton's reference to it in John Summers & Sons Ltd. v. Frost.[5] Lord Morton said that there must be[6] "complete protection against contact"; but he added: "I do "not suggest that the fence must be so constructed that it cannot "be climbed over, or broken down, by an employee who is deter-"mined to get at the machinery."

From these dicta it is clear, as it is clear also from the general principles that underly the interpretation of the Factories Acts, that the fence must not merely guard against accident but must be such as takes into account human weaknesses which include, as well as forgetfulness and inadvertence, an inclination sometimes to run minor risks and to take short cuts. Some degree of recklessness (as well as carelessness) has to be foreseen. The fence need not be constructed so as to keep out a determined man, but I think it must be such as will deter a man who, in pursuit of a short cut, is willing to run a minor risk. The fence in this case, whether complete or broken, was not of that construction;

[3] [1948] A.C. 477; 64 T.L.R. 384; [1948] 2 All E.R. 386.

[4] [1948] A.C. 477, 486.

[5] [1955] A.C. 740; [1955] 2 W.L.R. 825; [1955] 1 All E.R. 870; sub nom. Frost v. John Summers & Sons Ltd. [1954] 2 Q.B. 21; [1954] 2 W.L.R. 794; [1954] 1 All E.R. 901.

[6] [1955] A.C. 740, 758.

it was nothing more than a line that demarcated a dangerous or forbidden area and, as such, it was an insufficient compliance with the section.

I consider the plaintiff should himself bear three-quarters of the responsibility for his accident and there will, therefore, be judgment for him for one-quarter of the sum of £8,700 which I have already assessed as damages.

Judgment for the plaintiff for £2,175 with costs to the time of payment into court by the defendants.

Solicitors: W. H. Thompson; Gascoin & Co.

[PRIVY COUNCIL.]

* UNIVERSITY OF CEYLON . . . . APPELLANT;

AND

E. F. W. FERNANDO . . . . . RESPONDENT.

J. C.†
1960
Feb. 16.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF CEYLON.

Natural Justice—Opportunity to meet charge—Whether accused entitled to question witnesses—University—Allegation of pre-knowledge of examination paper—Inquiry under domestic statute.
Education—University—Discipline—Domestic commission of inquiry—Duty to comply with natural justice.

After the respondent, a student of the appellant University of Ceylon, had sat for the final examination for the degree of Bachelor of Science, an allegation was made to the Vice-Chancellor that the respondent had had prior knowledge of the content of a passage in the German language which had to be translated in one of the papers. A commission of inquiry consisting of the Vice-Chancellor and two others, acting under clause 8 of the statute of the University, which required the Vice-Chancellor to be "satisfied," inter alia, that any candidate had prior knowledge of the content of any paper, found that the allegation against the respondent was substantiated and, as required by clause 8, reported their finding to the Board of Residence and Discipline, who suspended the respondent indefinitely from all University examinations.

In an action by the respondent for, inter alia, a declaration that the finding of the commission of inquiry and the decision of the Board of Residence and Discipline were null and void, he alleged that the finding of the commission was contrary to the principles of natural justice in that, inter alia, the evidence of the various witnesses, including that of the person who had made the allegation, was taken in his absence, and he was not aware of the evidence led against him or of the case he had to meet. He was questioned about the matter by the commission. In evidence he denied the allegation:—

---

† Present: VISCOUNT SIMONDS, LORD TUCKER, LORD JENKINS, LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST and the RT. HON. L. M. D. DE SILVA.

J. C.

1960

Ceylon University v. Fernando.

Held, that in the absence in clause 8 of any express requirement as to the procedure to be followed at the inquiry, it must comply with the elementary and essential principles of fairness, which must as a matter of necessary implication be treated as applicable in the discharge of the Vice-Chancellor's admittedly quasi-judicial functions under clause 8, or, in other words, with the principles of natural justice. The Vice-Chancellor was not bound to treat the matter as a trial, but could obtain information in any way he thought best, and it was open to him, if he thought fit, to question witnesses without inviting the respondent to be present, but a fair opportunity must have been given to him to correct or contradict any relevant statement to his prejudice. That last condition had on the facts of this case been complied with, in that the respondent had, by letter from the Vice-Chancellor and at interviews with the commission of inquiry, been adequately informed of the case he had to meet, and had been given at the interviews an adequate opportunity of meeting the case alleged against him (post, p. 234).

The fact that the commission failed to volunteer the suggestion that the respondent might wish to question the person who had made the allegation against him—or to tender her unasked for cross-examination by the respondent—was not an omission sufficient to invalidate the proceedings of the commission as failing to comply with the requirements of natural justice in the circumstances of the present case. Here the mode of procedure adopted by the Vice-Chancellor in bona fide exercise of the wide discretion as to procedure reposed in him under clause 8 sufficiently complied with those requirements (post, p. 235).

Dicta in De Verteuil v. Knaggs [1918] A.C. 557, at 560; 34 T.L.R. 325; Local Government Board v. Arlidge [1915] A.C. 120, at 132; Byrne v. Kinematograph Renters Society Ltd. [1958] 1 W.L.R. 762, at 784; [1958] 2 All E.R. 579, and Board of Education v. Rice [1911] A.C. 179, at 182; 27 T.L.R. 378 applied.

Osgood v. Nelson (1872) L.R. 5 H.L. 636 considered.

Judgment of the Supreme Court of Ceylon (1956) 58 N.L.R. 265 reversed.

Appeal (No. 17 of 1958) from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Ceylon (Weerasooriya and T. S. Fernando JJ.) (November 28, 1956) reversing a judgment of the District Court of Colombo (Kariapper A.D.J.) (August 31, 1954) which had dismissed the claim of the present respondent for a declaration (and other relief) that the appellant University of Ceylon had wrongfully suspended him from all examinations.

The following facts are taken from the judgment of the Judicial Committee: This appeal arose out of an action brought by the respondent E. F. W. Fernando as plaintiff against the appellant University of Ceylon as defendant for (inter alia) a declaration to the effect that a decision of the Board of Residence and Discipline of the University to suspend the plaintiff (a student of the University) from all University examinations for an indefinite period, and the finding of a commission of inquiry set up by the Vice-Chancellor, on which such decision was based, were null and void.

The action was heard in the District Court of Colombo by Kariapper A.D.J., who by a judgment and decree dismissed it with costs. The plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court of Ceylon, and that court (Weerasooriya and Fernando JJ.), by a decree dated December 13, 1956, giving effect to a judgment delivered on November 28, 1956, allowed his appeal and granted the declaratory relief claimed with costs. From that judgment and decree the University now appealed to the Board.

The circumstances leading up to the plaintiff's suspension from all University examinations, and the unfortunate litigation which had ensued, were as follows: The examinations procedure of the University was prescribed by its "General Act" No. 1, Chapter VIII, Part I, clause 8 of which Part provided that "where the "Vice-Chancellor is satisfied that any candidate for an examina- "tion has acquired knowledge of the nature or substance of any "question or the content of any paper before the date and time "of the examination, or has attempted or conspired to obtain "such knowledge, the Vice-Chancellor may suspend the candi- "date from the examination or remove his name from any pass "list, and shall report the matter to the Board of Residence and "Discipline for such further action as the Board may decide to "take." By clause 14: "Where any matter is reported to the "Board of Residence and Discipline under this Part, the Board "may (1) remove the name of the candidate from any pass list; "or (2) suspend the candidate from any University examination "for such period as the Board may decide, or indefinitely; or "(3) order that the candidate be suspended from the University "for such period as the Board may decide, or indefinitely; or "(4) do all or any of these acts." These clauses may conveniently be referred to as clause 8 and clause 14 respectively.

The plaintiff, who had been a student in the faculty of science in the University since 1948, presented himself at the end of March, 1952, as an examinee for the final examination in science, section B, Zoology, for the degree of Bachelor of Science, and completed the full examination in both theory and practical work. There were five papers in theory and two in practical work, and the plaintiff sat for Zoology Paper V, the last theoretical paper, on April 4, 1952. That paper was in two sections, consisting of (1) an essay, and (2) a passage in German and a passage in French, one of which the candidate was required to translate into English with comments thereon, 10 marks being allotted for the translation of and comments upon the selected passage, and 90 marks for the essay. The plaintiff chose the passage in German for his translation and comments, for which he was awarded eight marks. He appeared to have done well in all his papers and to have attained in the examination as a whole a standard which would normally have been held sufficient to place him in the first class.

After the examination was over, a woman student, Miss Balasingham, who had also been reading Zoology and had taken the examination at the same time as the plaintiff, made to Mr. Sivaprakasapillai, a lecturer in the engineering faculty and Miss Balasingham's brother-in-law, certain allegations concerning the plaintiff which, if true, were only explicable on the footing that the plaintiff had acquired knowledge of the German passage in Zoology Paper V before the examination. Those allegations were passed on by Mr. Sivaprakasapillai to Sir Ivor Jennings, the Vice-Chancellor, it would seem in the first instance through Professor Pereira and Mr. Keerthisinghe, the senior lecturer in Zoology, though that was not important.

J. C.
1960
Ceylon University v. Fernando.

The Vice-Chancellor took a serious view of Miss Balasingham's allegations, which not only implicated the plaintiff but also suggested the possibility of negligence or misconduct on the part of some member or members of the staff of the University. On that aspect of the matter some embarrassment was caused by the circumstance that Professor Fernando, who was responsible for the German passage in Zoology Paper V, was the plaintiff's uncle. In those circumstances the Vice-Chancellor decided (as their Lordships thought quite rightly) that the matter called for action under clause 8.

To assist him in satisfying himself of the truth or falsity of the allegations the Vice-Chancellor set up a commission of inquiry, consisting of himself, Professor Mylvaganam, Dean of the Faculty of Science, and Mr. Keuneman Q.C., a member of the Council of the University, who was to lead the inquiry. That body seemed to have met on three occasions, viz., on May 21 and June 3, 1952, and on one other occasion between those two dates. The plaintiff attended on two of those three occasions, viz., on May 21 and June 3. Prior to the first meeting the Vice-Chancellor wrote to the plaintiff a letter dated May 16, 1952, which, omitting formal parts, was in these terms: "Dear Mr. Fernando, An allegation "has been made to me in writing that you had acquired know-"ledge of the content of one or more of the papers set at the "Final Examination of Science, Section B, Zoology, before the "date of the examination. Since this is a very serious allegation "which may affect not only you but also one or more of the "members of the University staff, I have consulted Mr. A. E. "Keuneman Q.C., who agrees that the allegation is sufficiently "circumstantial to justify a formal inquiry.

"I have therefore appointed a commission consisting of Mr. "Keuneman, the Dean of the Faculty of Science, and myself, "and have asked Mr. Keuneman to take the lead in the inquiry. "He has asked that a meeting be held in the Board Room, "College House, on Wednesday, 21st May, at 5 p.m., and that "you be requested to attend. I should be glad if you would "attend on this occasion and would report to Mr. Blok, who is "acting as secretary to the commission. Yours sincerely, Sgd. "Ivor Jennings, Vice-Chancellor."

The reference in this letter to "one or more" of the papers set at the final examination appeared to have been due to the fact that Miss Balasingham had alleged fore-knowledge on the part of the plaintiff of the contents of another paper besides Zoology Paper V. At the outset of the inquiry the commission came to the conclusion that there was no substance in this additional charge, which accordingly was not pursued.

In the course of their meetings the commission questioned (in addition to the plaintiff himself) Miss Balasingham and a number of other persons, including Professor Fernando and various lecturers and students, but none of them in the presence or hearing of the plaintiff. The second appearance of the plaintiff before the commission, that was, his appearance on June 3, was in response to a letter from the Vice-Chancellor inviting him to attend on that day and to bring with him all the exercise books he had used during his course, which he accordingly did. There seemed to have been a good deal of discussion regarding one particular book, in which Dr. Cruze (one of the lecturers in Zoology) had corrected drawings of the veinous system of rats, but in the end the commission decided that it threw no light on the matter.

Miss Balasingham appeared to have adhered before the commission to the story she had originally told to Mr. Sivaprakasapillai, which, to quote from the Report made by them at the conclusion of their inquiry, was to this effect: "3. Miss Balasingham states that, owing to Mr. Fernando's behaviour, she suspected that there was something in one of his notebooks which he did not wish the other students to see. On one occasion he left the book on the bench in the Section B laboratory and went out of the room. She seized the opportunity to glance through the book and saw a list of German words, in some cases with English equivalents. There were about 30 words and she copied nine of them into her own notebook, which she produced. She could remember only one of the words which she had not copied, Zitronensaft, a word which appeared almost at the end of the list. This word appears at the end of the German passage in Paper V. The other nine words appear in the passage, and in the order in which they are shown in the list in Miss Balasingham's book, except that the order of the eighth and ninth words is changed. The passage, with the ten words underlined, was as follows:—"

After setting out the German passage, with the crucial words underlined, the Report continued: "4. This list in Miss Balasingham's book was apparently not shown to anyone until our inquiry began. It was then shown to Mr. Sivaprakasapillai and was produced to us at our request. A large part of our inquiry was necessarily directed towards ascertaining whether the list really was in the notebook before the examination began. In our opinion it was. The following factors are relevant:

"(1) Miss Balasingham was able to describe the copying with a wealth of circumstantial detail, of no direct relevance to the story as such, which carried conviction. If the story was invented, it was a remarkably successful invention.

"(2) Another student, Miss Y. de Silva, was sitting next to Miss Balasingham on the occasion when the copying is said

J. C.
1960
Ceylon University v. Fernando.

"to have been done. Miss de Silva denies that she saw Miss "Balasingham copying, but she admits that Miss Balasingham "told her about the list before the examination. Miss de Silva "is a second-year student in Zoology, and we believe that she "could have told us more. Another student, Mr. C. H. Fernando, also admits that Miss Balasingham told him about the "list before the examination."

The Report went on to say: "(3) Miss Balasingham's "behaviour immediately after the examination was entirely consistent with her story . . ." and to give reasons for that view.

Satisfied as they were of the truth of Miss Balasingham's story, the commission of inquiry at the end of the Report expressed their findings to be to the effect that: "(1) Mr. E. F. W. Fernando "acquired knowledge of the nature or substance of the German "question in Zoology Paper V before the date and time of the "examination and must therefore be reported to the Board of "Residence and Discipline . . . under clause 8; (2) There was "no evidence as to the manner in which this knowledge came "to Mr. E. F. W. Fernando."

By a letter dated July 21, 1952, the Vice-Chancellor informed the plaintiff that the Board of Residence and Discipline had found him guilty of an examination offence in connection with the Final Examination in science held in 1952 and had suspended him indefinitely from all University examinations.

After considerable correspondence between the plaintiff and the Vice-Chancellor in which the plaintiff sought without success a review of the decision of the Board of Residence and Discipline, the plaintiff on May 19, 1953, began the present action, in which, as already mentioned, he failed at first instance but succeeded on appeal.

1960. Jan. 11, 12. Dingle Foot Q.C. and C. Fletcher-Cooke Q.C. for the appellant University.

The respondent did not appear and was not represented.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Weinberger v. Inglis [1]; Rex v. Electricity Commissioners [2]; Maclean v. The Workers' Union [3]; Nakkuda Ali v. Jayaratne [4]; Errington v. Minister of Health. [5]

February 16. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord Jenkins, who said: To their Lordships' regret, the plaintiff, it may be for financial reasons, has not appeared to support the decision in his favour pronounced by the Supreme Court, and although counsel for the University have done their best to make up for this by presenting the plaintiff's side of

[1] [1919] A.C. 606; 35 T.L.R. 399.
[2] [1924] 1 K.B. 171; 39 T.L.R. 715.
[3] [1929] 1 Ch. 602; 45 T.L.R. 256.
[4] [1951] A.C. 66; 66 T.L.R. (Pt. 2) 214.
[5] [1935] 1 K.B. 249, 264; 51 T.L.R. 44.

the matter as well as their own, their Lordships have felt some anxiety in dealing with this not altogether easy case in the plaintiff's absence. [His Lordship then stated the facts set out above and continued:] In his amended plaint dated July 24, 1953, the plaintiff alleged that the decision of the commission of inquiry was null and void for a number of reasons. He claimed that the decision was contrary to the principles of natural justice on five grounds, two of which consisted of allegations of bias or disqualification against Professor Mylvaganam by reason of his alleged relationship to Miss Balasingham and Mr. Sivaprakasapillai, and the fact that he was a member of the board of examiners and of the scrutinising committee. The third ground was to the effect that by reason of the first "the maxim that justice should not "only be done but also appear to be done" had been violated. The fourth ground comprised the substance of the plaintiff's case and was to the effect that the evidence of the various witnesses who appeared before the commission of inquiry, including the evidence of Miss Balasingham, was taken in the absence of the plaintiff, who was not aware of what evidence was led against him, and that in the circumstances one of the essential elements of natural justice was not observed, inasmuch as the plaintiff was not aware of the case he had to meet. The fifth ground was to the effect that the evidence of the various witnesses was not taken entirely before all the three members of the commission of inquiry, and that such evidence was acted on by the commission, and that this circumstance was also a violation of the elementary principles of justice. The plaintiff further alleged that there was no evidence upon which the commission of inquiry could reasonably find the charge against the plaintiff proved, that the finding arrived at against the plaintiff was one which had not been arrived at in conformity with clause 8, and that the finding and decision were therefore void and of no effect.

The allegations of bias or disqualification against Professor Mylvaganam as a member of the commission of inquiry were rejected in both courts as without substance. The allegation to the effect that there was no evidence upon which the commission could reasonably find the charge against the plaintiff proved was (so far as open to the court) clearly ill-founded. The allegation to the effect that the finding was not arrived at in accordance with clause 8 turned on the fact that the Vice-Chancellor appointed two other persons to sit with him as a commission of inquiry to investigate the matter, instead of proceeding to investigate it alone. It was held in both courts that this procedure was not open to objection, inasmuch as this was merely a method, which the Vice-Chancellor was free to adopt if he chose to do so, of satisfying himself of the truth or falsity of the charge, and the Report was a report by him for the purposes of clause 8 although signed by the two other members of the commission as well as himself. The plaintiff having taken no steps to appeal against the decision of the court below on these matters of complaint, their Lordships need say no more about them.

J. C.
1960
CEYLON UNIVERSITY v. FERNANDO.

There remain the complaints to the effect that the evidence, including that of Miss Balasingham, was taken in the absence of the plaintiff who was not aware of the evidence led against him or of the case he had to meet; and that the evidence of certain witnesses was taken by the Vice-Chancellor in the absence of the other members of the commission.

As to these, it is not in dispute that the plaintiff was not present, and was not invited to be present, at the examination of any of the witnesses, or that the Vice-Chancellor did in fact interview two witnesses, namely, Professor Fernando and Dr. Cruze, in the absence of the other members of the commission. Their Lordships may add that it is also admitted that the plaintiff did not at any stage question Miss Balasingham and was never offered an opportunity of doing so.

On the other hand, it is not in dispute that the plaintiff was interviewed and questioned at length about the matter by the three members of the commission on May 21 and June 3, 1952.

Before the trial judge and in the Supreme Court it was argued for the University that the Vice-Chancellor's functions under clause 8 were administrative and not of the kind described, for want of a better term, as "quasi-judicial," and, accordingly, that the Vice-Chancellor's action in the matter was not open to review by the court. It was, however, argued further that if, contrary to this contention, the Vice-Chancellor's functions under clause 8 were quasi-judicial, the Vice-Chancellor's letter of May 16, 1952, coupled with the information given to the plaintiff at the two interviews, sufficiently apprised him of the nature of the complaint, that he was at these interviews given sufficient opportunity to state his case in rebuttal of it, and, accordingly, that there had been no such breach of the so-called principles of natural justice as was necessary to warrant the intervention of the court in such a case.

The trial judge was of opinion that the functions of the Vice-Chancellor in the matter were administrative and not judicial, and consequently that the court had no jurisdiction to interfere, but went on to hold that if he was wrong in this, and such functions were of a quasi-judicial character, the principles of natural justice had been sufficiently complied with by the commission.

The Supreme Court took the opposite view, holding that the Vice-Chancellor's functions were not administrative but quasi-judicial, and that the mode of inquiry adopted had violated the principles of natural justice, with the result that the court could and ought to declare the Report of the commission of inquiry, and the consequential decision of the Board of Residence and Discipline under clause 14, to be null and void.

At the hearing before their Lordships Mr. Dingle Foot, for the University, disclaimed the contention that the Vice-Chancellor's functions under clause 8 were administrative and not quasi-judicial, but submitted that, on the footing that these functions were quasi-judicial, the claims of natural justice had been fully satisfied.

Accordingly (apart from a subsidiary question as to the jurisdiction of the courts in Ceylon to grant declaratory relief in such a case), the present appeal resolves itself into the question whether this inquiry was conducted with due regard to the rights accorded by the principles of natural justice to the plaintiff as the person against whom it was directed.

These rights have been defined in varying language in a large number of cases covering a wide field. Their Lordships do not propose to review these authorities at length, but would observe that the question whether the requirements of natural justice have been met by the procedure adopted in any given case must depend to a great extent on the facts and circumstances of the case in point. As Tucker L.J. said in Russell v. Duke of Norfolk [1]: "There are, in my view, no words which are of universal "application to every kind of inquiry and every kind of domestic "tribunal. The requirements of natural justice must depend on "the circumstances of the case, the nature of the inquiry, the "rules under which the tribunal is acting, the subject-matter "that is being dealt with, and so forth." In the earlier case of General Medical Council v. Spackman [2] Lord Atkin expressed a similar view in these words: "Some analogy exists, no doubt, "between the various procedures of this and other not strictly "judicial bodies, but I cannot think that the procedure which "may be very just in deciding whether to close a school or "an insanitary house is necessarily right in deciding a charge "of infamous conduct against a professional man. I would, "therefore, demur to any suggestion that the words of Lord "Loreburn L.C. in Board of Education v. Rice [3] afford a com-"plete guide to the General Medical Council in the exercise of "their duties."

With these reservations as to the utility of general definitions in this branch of the law, it appears to their Lordships that Lord Loreburn's much quoted statement in Board of Education v. Rice [3] still affords as good a general definition as any of the nature of and limits upon the requirements of natural justice in this kind of case. Its effect is conveniently stated in this passage from the speech of Viscount Haldane L.C. in Local Government Board v. Arlidge,[4] where he cites it with aprpoval in the following words: "I agree with the view expressed in an analogous case "by my noble and learned friend Lord Loreburn. In Board of "Education v. Rice [5] he laid down that, in disposing of a ques-"tion which was the subject of an appeal to it, the Board of

[1] (1948) 65 T.L.R. 225, 231; [1949] 1 All E.R. 109, 118.
[2] [1943] A.C. 627, 638; 59 T.L.R. 412; [1943] 2 All E.R. 337.
[3] [1911] A.C. 179, 182.
[4] [1915] A.C. 120, 132–133.
[5] [1911] A.C. 179, 182.

J. C.
1960
Ceylon University v. Fernando.

"Education was under a duty to act in good faith, and to listen "fairly to both sides, inasmuch as that was a duty which lay on "every one who decided anything. But he went on to say that "he did not think it was bound to treat such a question as though "it were a trial. The Board had no power to administer an oath, "and need not examine witnesses. It could, he thought, obtain "information in any way it thought best, always giving a fair "opportunity to those who were parties in the controversy to "correct or contradict any relevant statement prejudicial to their "view."

From the many other citations which might be made, their Lordships would select the following succinct statement from the judgment of this Board in De Verteuil v. Knaggs[6]: "Their "Lordships are of opinion that in making such an inquiry there "is, apart from special circumstances, a duty of giving to any "person against whom the complaint is made a fair opportunity "to make any relevant statement which he may desire to bring "forward and a fair opportunity to correct or controvert any "relevant statement brought forward to his prejudice."

The last general statement as to the requirements of natural justice to which their Lordships would refer is that of Harman J. (as he then was) in Byrne v. Kinematograph Renters Society Ltd.,[7] of which their Lordships would express their approval. The learned judge said this: "What then are the requirements of "natural justice in a case of this kind? First, I think that the "person accused should know the nature of the accusation made; "secondly, that he should be given an opportunity to state his "case; and, thirdly, of course, that the tribunal should act in "good faith. I do not myself think that there really is anything "more."

Turning now to the actual terms in which the Vice-Chancellor is invested with the quasi-judicial function here in question, it is to be observed that all that clause 8 provides is that where the Vice-Chancellor is satisfied that any candidate has acquired knowledge of the nature or substance of any question or the content of any paper before the date and time of the examination "the "Vice-Chancellor . . . shall report the matter to the Board of "Residence and Discipline . . ." The clause is silent as to the procedure to be followed by the Vice-Chancellor in satisfying himself of the truth or falsity of a given allegation. If the clause contained any special directions in regard to the steps to be taken by the Vice-Chancellor in the process of satisfying himself he would, of course, be bound to follow those directions. But as no special form of procedure is prescribed it is for him to determine the procedure to be followed as he thinks best, but, to adapt to the present case the language of the judgment of this Board in De Verteuil v. Knaggs,[8] subject to the obvious implication that some form of inquiry must be made, such as will enable him fairly to determine whether he should hold himself satisfied that the charge in question has been made out.

[6] [1918] A.C. 557, 560; 34 T.L.R. 325.

[7] [1958] 1 W.L.R. 762, 784; [1958] 2 All E.R. 579.

[8] [1918] A.C. 557, 560.

As was said by Lord Shaw of Dunfermline in Local Government Board v. Arlidge,[9] of the authority there concerned, it "must do its best to act justly, and to reach just ends by just "means. If a statute prescribes the means it must employ "them. If it is left without express guidance it must still act "honestly and by honest means." In the present case no shadow of doubt is cast upon the honesty and bona fides of the Vice-Chancellor or of those who sat with him in the commission of inquiry.

So far as the plaintiff is concerned, it appears to their Lordships that he must be taken to have agreed, when he became a member of the university, to be bound by the statutes of the university, including clause 8, and in the event of clause 8 being put in operation against him could not insist on the adoption by the Vice-Chancellor of any particular procedure beyond what the clause expressly or by necessary implication requires. In the absence of any express requirement he is thrown back on the necessary implication that the Vice-Chancellor's procedure will be such as to satisfy the requirements indicated in the passages from De Verteuil v. Knaggs,[10] Local Government Board v. Arlidge,[11] and Byrne v. Kinematograph Renters Society Ltd.,[12] to which their Lordships have just referred, and thus to comply with those elementary and essential principles of "fairness" which must as a matter of necessary implication be treated as applicable in the discharge of the Vice-Chancellor's admittedly quasi-judicial functions under clause 8, or in other words, with the principles of natural justice.

The question then is whether the Vice-Chancellor did in the course he took satisfy those principles.

The plaintiff's contention to the effect that he was not adequately informed of the case he had to meet, and was not given any adequate opportunity of meeting it, and that the course taken by the Vice-Chancellor or the commission of inquiry in these respects failed to satisfy the requirements of natural justice, depended almost entirely on the admitted fact that Miss Balasingham and the other witnesses were not questioned in the presence and hearing of the plaintiff, who consequently was not able to question them on the statements they made. The further admitted fact that two witnesses were questioned by the Vice-Chancellor alone and not by all three members of the commission does not, their Lordships think, add anything to this basic complaint.

But this did not, in their Lordships' view, in itself involve any violation of the requirements of natural justice. To adapt Lord

[9] [1915] A.C. 120, 138.
[10] [1918] A.C. 557, 560.
[11] [1915] A.C. 120, 132.
[12] [1958] 1 W.L.R. 762, 784.

J. C.
1960
CEYLON UNIVERSITY v. FERNANDO.

Loreburn's words in Board of Education v. Rice,[13] the Vice-Chancellor was not bound to treat the matter as if it was a trial, had not power to administer an oath, and need not examine witnesses, but could obtain information in any way he thought best.

It seems to their Lordships to follow that inasmuch as the Vice-Chancellor, when the alleged offence under clause 8 was brought to his notice, was not bound to treat the matter as a trial but could obtain information about it in any way he thought best, it was open to him, if he thought fit, to question witnesses without inviting the plaintiff to be present.

But, while there was no objection to the Vice-Chancellor informing himself in this way, it was undoubtedly necessary that before any decision to report the plaintiff was reached, he should have complied with the vital condition postulated by Lord Loreburn, which adapted to the present case may be stated as being to the effect that a fair opportunity must have been given to the plaintiff to correct or contradict any relevant statement to his prejudice.

The university's contention is that this condition, which resolves itself into the two requirements that the plaintiff should be adequately informed of the case he had to meet, and given an adequate opportunity of meeting it, was complied with in its first branch by the letter of May 16, 1952, and what plaintiff was told at the first interview on May 21, 1952, and in its second branch by what passed at that interview and at the second interview on June 3.

As to what took place at the two interviews, the trial judge accepted the evidence of the Vice-Chancellor in preference to that of the plaintiff. The Vice-Chancellor's evidence, and indeed the plaintiff's own admission, make it abundantly plain that at the outset of the first interview the plaintiff was told that Miss Balasingham had made this charge against him and the nature of the charge was explained to him in detail.

[His Lordship then referred to relevant passages from the Vice-Chancellor's and the respondent's evidence, and continued:] Their Lordships are satisfied that there is no substance in the complaint made by the plaintiff to the effect that the reference in the letter of May 16, 1952, to "one or more of the papers set "at the final examination" left him under the impression that some additional charge was being made against him, the precise nature of which was not sufficiently explained. Apart from the fact that (according to the plaintiff) Mr. Keuneman asked him towards the end of the first day "how he had fared in his practical "examination?" nothing was said to suggest that the commission was in any way concerned with anything other than the German translation. It must, therefore, have been clear to the plaintiff (as the fact was) that the only charge which was being pursued related exclusively to that matter.

[13] [1911] A.C. 179, 182.

Their Lordships are, accordingly, satisfied that the plaintiff was adequately informed of the case he had to meet.

As to the adequacy of the opportunity of meeting the case alleged against him afforded by the two interviews, the plaintiff in his evidence complained that the interviews were not fairly conducted in the respects that he was plied with questions which he was not given a chance of answering fully and was prevented from saying all he wanted to say. The trial judge rejected these complaints and accepted the Vice-Chancellor's evidence to the effect that the two interviews were fairly conducted. Their Lordships see no reason for dissenting from this finding.

Their Lordships are therefore satisfied that the interviews, so far as they went, were fairly conducted and gave the plaintiff an adequate opportunity of stating his case. But it remains to consider whether in the course they took the interviews must be held to have fallen short of the requirements of natural justice on the ground that the plaintiff was given no opportunity of questioning Miss Balasingham. She was the one essential witness against the plaintiff, and the charge in the end resolved itself into a matter of her word against his. In their Lordships' view this might have been a more formidable objection if the plaintiff had asked to be allowed to question Miss Balasingham and his request had been refused. But he never made any such request, although he had ample time to consider his position in the period of 10 days or so between the two interviews. There is no ground for supposing that if the plaintiff had made such a request it would not have been granted. It therefore apears to their Lordships that the only complaint which could be made against the commission on this score was that they failed to volunteer the suggestion that the plaintiff might wish to question Miss Balasingham, or, in other words, to tender her unasked for cross-examination by the plaintiff. Their Lordships cannot regard this omission, or a fortiori the like omission with respect to other witnesses, as sufficient to invalidate the proceedings of the commission as failing to comply with the requirements of natural justice in the circumstances of the present case.

Counsel for the university very properly referred their Lordships to passages in Osgood v. Nelson [14] and in other authorities which tend at first sight to state the requirements of natural justice more favourably to the party charged than do the authorities to which their Lordships have so far referred; see in particular the references to cross-examination in Osgood v. Nelson.[15] But their Lordships are satisfied that when the facts and circumstances of these cases are looked into they contain nothing to justify the conclusion that the requirements of natural justice were not sufficiently observed on the facts and in the circumstances of the case now before them.

In conclusion, their Lordships would observe that they are at [14] (1872) L.R. 5 H.L. 636. [15] Ibid. 646, 660.

J. C.
1960
CEYLON UNIVERSITY v. FERNANDO.

a loss to understand how the Supreme Court, while apparently accepting the trial judge's favourable assessment of the reliability of the evidence of the Vice-Chancellor, found it possible to reach the conclusion that not even the gist of Miss Balasingham's evidence was communicated to the plaintiff. Their Lordships would also venture the criticism that the Supreme Court tended to regard the case much as if it involved an appeal from or rehearing of a trial held before the commission rather than an invocation of the limited jurisdiction of the court to restrain the abuse of quasi-judicial proceedings, where the sole issue is whether the result, be it right or wrong, was arrived at with due regard to the principles of natural justice.

The plaintiff might have fared better if the charge against him had been tried in accordance with the more meticulous procedure of a court of law, which would have included as of course the tendering of Miss Balasingham for cross-examination. But that is not the question. The question is whether, on the facts and in the circumstances of this particular case, the mode of procedure adopted by the Vice-Chancellor, in bona fide exercise of the wide discretion as to procedure reposed in him under clause 8, sufficiently complied with the requirements of natural justice. In their Lordships' opinion it has not been shown to have fallen short of those requirements.

Their Lordships' conclusion on the merits of the case makes it unnecessary for them to consider the university's submission to the effect that the court had no jurisdiction to grant the declaratory relief sought by the plaintiff.

For these reasons their Lordships are of opinion that this appeal should be allowed, the decree of the Supreme Court of Ceylon dated December 13, 1956, set aside and the decree of the District Court of Colombo dated August 31, 1954, restored, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty accordingly.

The plaintiff must pay the costs of the present appeal and also the costs of the action in the District Court and of the appeal to the Supreme Court.

Solicitors: Stephenson, Harwood & Tatham.

C. C.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

1960
Feb. 8, 9, 10.

Hewson J.

* JODLA v. JODLA.

Husband and Wife — Nullity — Wilful refusal to consummate — Just excuse—Husband aware that subsequent religious ceremony an essential pre-condition to matrimonial cohabitation—Refusal to arrange ceremony.

The parties entered into a ceremony of marriage at a register office. They were both Roman Catholics and fully appreciated that their faith did not countenance matrimonial relations between them until there had been a religious ceremony, which the husband, therefore, promised to arrange. In fact he did not arrange such a ceremony although repeatedly requested by the wife, who was at all times, subject to the ceremony taking place, willing to render the husband his full matrimonial rights. On proceedings by both parties for a decree of nullity on the ground of the other's wilful refusal to consummate the marriage:—

Held, that by his refusal to proceed with the arrangements for the religious ceremony the husband had given the wife just excuse to refuse to have sexual intercourse with him; the wife's requests to him to make such arrangements constituted an implied request for sexual intercourse which the husband had refused without just excuse, thereby wilfully refusing to consummate the marriage; the wife was, therefore, entitled to a decree.

Horton v. Horton (1948) 64 T.L.R. 62; [1947] 2 All E.R. 871, H.L. applied.

DEFENDED PETITION for nullity of marriage.

In October, 1957, the husband, who although of Polish nationality was at all material times domiciled in England, met the wife, who was also Polish, and who had come to England from Poland on a visit to her brother, and, after the introduction, the two parties became friendly and continued to meet each other. About November 23, 1957, the wife's visa was due to expire; she was distressed at the prospect of an almost imminent departure from England, and as the husband wanted her to stay, they discussed marriage and the prospects of marrying before the expiration of the visa.

They were both Roman Catholics and, according to the evidence, the husband was a devout and practising member of the Roman Catholic Church. A day or two later they consulted a Roman Catholic priest, who informed them that no church wedding would be possible within the few days remaining, and suggested that they should be married by licence in a register office, and as soon as convenient after that ceremony, they should see him about arranging a church ceremony. It was completely understood between the parties that there could be neither cohabitation nor consummation of the marriage pending that ceremony. Some days before the register office wedding which, in fact, took place on November 28, 1957, the husband said that he would ask for two weeks' holiday, and the church ceremony would take place. The intention of the parties appeared to be that this ceremony should take place somewhere about Christmas, to be followed by two weeks' holiday together. As the parties left the register office after the ceremony the husband told the wife's brother that a church ceremony would take place. In fact the husband never made arrangements for such a ceremony.

After the ceremony at the register office the parties spent the evening at the home of a mutual friend, where the husband had, in anticipation of the marriage, rented a double room. At the end of the evening the wife said she was returning to her brother's house, where she had been living. The husband did not demur to

1960

JODLA
v.
JODLA.

that, nor did he request intercourse then, nor did he ask her to stay with him in the double room. He accompanied his bride to her brother's and made no attempt to dissuade her from going in.

In the event, although during the following months the husband visited the wife frequently, the parties never cohabited or shared a bed. The husband, according to the evidence, seemed to have accepted that situation and never expressly asked the wife to have sexual intercourse with him. On several occasions the wife taxed the husband with not making arrangements for the church ceremony. On one such occasion in early January, 1958, when the husband complained to the wife that she was not looking after him as a wife should, she replied that he had not arranged the church ceremony so that they could live together. Thereafter the parties drifted apart.

By his petition the husband prayed for a decree that the marriage be declared null and void on the ground of the wife's wilful refusal to consummate the marriage. The wife, by her answer, denied the charge and cross-prayed for a decree on the ground of the husband's wilful refusal. It was common ground that the marriage had not been consummated.

D. N. Keating for the husband.
Norman Lermon for the wife.

HEWSON J. referred to the facts and continued: In all the circumstances I find it quite impossible to believe that the husband was unaware of the Roman Catholic view that marriage is a sacrament in the church of which he is a professed member, and did not countenance consummation even where there had been a register office ceremony until there had also been a church ceremony. I am further convinced that he well knew his wife's views on that matter, that there would be no consummation until after such church ceremony as the Roman Catholic church provides to follow a register office wedding, and accept the wife's evidence that after the church service had been performed in accordance with the rites of the Roman Catholic church, she was fully prepared to live with her husband as man and wife in the fullest sense.

There is no doubt that the wife's behaviour during the months following the ceremony of marriage was consistent with her professed principles, and to some degree the husband's omission expressly to request intercourse is significant in the light of his professed religion.

The real point in this case is that each says that the other wilfully refused to consummate the marriage, and to be a wilful refusal there must, in my view, be a refusal without just excuse, and for this proposition I was referred by both counsel to Horton v. Horton.[1] Unfortunately, neither counsel has been able to assist me with any other authority or refer me to any authority that would help me in deciding this point, and I must do the best I can on the realities of the particular circumstances of this case.

[1] (1948) 64 T.L.R. 62; [1947] 2 All E.R. 871, H.L.

By his refusal to proceed with the church ceremony, the necessity for which as a pre-condition to matrimonial cohabitation was understood by both, the husband in the particular circumstances of this case, made it impossible for the wife, with a good conscience, to live with him as husband and wife, and this refusal, or this failure to proceed with the church ceremony, was, in this case, a just excuse for her to refuse sexual intercourse, even if it had ever been requested. There is no evidence that the husband ever requested intercourse in terms, and it seems to me, on the facts, that it is really unnecessary to find that one way or the other because if he had, or if it could be implied that he had requested intercourse, she, nevertheless, had a just excuse for refusing until there had been a church ceremony.

I will now turn to the other side of the picture. By his own refusal to proceed with the church service, the husband put it out of the power of the wife to request intercourse. He expressed no intention of ever making it possible. She, as I have found, on several occasions, requested him to do something about the church service, after which she would have been willing to have intercourse, and they would have lived together as husband and wife in the fullest sense. Such requests in the circumstances of this case, in my view, constitute an implied request for intercourse, and to live wholly as husband and wife. These requests were refused without any just excuse on the part of the husband. It, therefore, follows that the wife is entitled to a decree of nullity on the ground of wilful refusal on the part of the husband to consummate the marriage.

Decree nisi.

Solicitors: S. Z. Kmiecik & Co.; Martin, Nicholson, Hortin & Nash.

E. J.

[PRIVY COUNCIL.]

J. C.†
1959
Dec. 16.

* WILFRED ISAAC . . . . . APPELLANT;

AND

HOTEL DE PARIS LTD. . . . . RESPONDENT.

ON APPEAL FROM THE FEDERAL SUPREME COURT OF TRINIDAD.

Licence or Tenancy—Exclusive occupation—Payment of rent—Whether conclusive of tenancy—Hotel premises—Permissive occupation under business arrangement.

† Present: LORD DENNING, LORD BIRKETT, the RT. HON. L. M. D. DE SILVA.

J. C.

1959

Isaac
v.
Hotel de
Paris Ltd.

The respondent company, who owned an hotel, were also the lessees of two floors of premises on the other side of the street which they called the P. hotel and used in connection with their hotel. The company subsequently let the appellant, who had helped with the running of their hotel, into occupation of the first of the two floors of the P. hotel in order to establish a night bar. The appellant took out a licence for the bar in his own name and put in a stock of liquor at his own expense. Differences having arisen as to the position of the appellant, some of the terms of a proposed contract—which was never in fact concluded—were that the appellant was to pay the outstanding balance of the price of certain shares in the respondent company which he had contracted to buy; was to remain in occupation of the first floor of the P. hotel where the night bar was being operated; was to pay all expenses in connection with the running of the P. hotel, including the monthly rent which the respondent company had to pay to its lessor, and was to retain for himself all profits he made from the business carried on at the P. hotel in lieu of the dividends on his shares in the respondent company if he acquired them.

Some of those terms were acted upon, and the appellant remained in occupation, the rent being paid to the respondent company expressly as "rent," and accepted without acknowledgment or receipt by the company. Thereafter, no contract having been executed as anticipated, and the balance due on the shares not having been paid, and the appellant having failed to remove his stock and other materials from the P. hotel on seven days' notice, the respondent company began proceedings claiming possession of the P. hotel. The appellant pleaded that he was a tenant of both floors of the P. hotel at a monthly rent:—

Held, that the respondent company was entitled to possession. The appellant was originally put into occupation of the first floor of the P. hotel for the purpose of establishing and managing a night bar as a servant or agent on behalf of the company, with no right or interest of his own. The relationship between the parties after the terms of the unconcluded contract had been acted upon was not that of landlord and tenant but that of licensor and licensee. The circumstances and conduct of the parties showed that all that was intended was that the appellant should have a personal privilege of running a night bar on the premises, with no interest in the land at all, and the notice requiring him to remove his stock was sufficient to end the licence.

Neither exclusive possession nor payment and acceptance of rent was, in the case of premises not subject to rent restriction legislation (as in this case) conclusive of the existence of a tenancy where they could be otherwise explained.

Errington v. Errington and Woods [1952] 1 K.B. 290; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 231; [1952] 1 All E.R. 149, C.A.; Cobb v. Lane [1952] 1 T.L.R. 1037; [1952] 1 All E.R. 1199, C.A.; and Clarke v. Grant [1950] 1 K.B. 104; 65 T.L.R. 241; [1949] 1 All E.R. 768, C.A. considered.

Further, the appellant, in remaining in possession, as he was permitted to, after the expiry of the notice to remove his stock, was there at sufferance liable to be turned out whenever the respondent company thought fit to do so, and during that period acceptance of the payments of rent did not in the circumstances evince any intention on the part of the company to waive its right to immediate possession.

Judgment of the Federal Supreme Court of the West Indies affirmed.

APPEAL (No. 37 of 1958) from a judgment of the Federal Supreme Court of Trinidad (May 27, 1958), dismissing an appeal by the present appellant from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Trinidad and Tobago (December 6, 1957).

The following introductory statement is taken from the judgment of the Judicial Committee, where the facts are fully set out: In the City of the Port of Spain in the Island of Trinidad there was an hotel called the Hotel de Paris. It was situate at No. 7, Abercrombie Street, and it was owned by the plaintiff company, Hotel de Paris Ltd. (respondent). On the other side of the street at No. 10, Abercrombie Street, there was a building which was owned by Manoel Fernandez. He let the ground floor of it to a bank. But he let the two floors above it on a lease to the plaintiff company at a rent of $250 a month. The plaintiff company used those two floors for some time as bedrooms in connection with their hotel. They called it the Parisian Hotel. In or about December, 1955, the plaintiff company let the defendant Isaac (appellant) into occupation of the Parisian Hotel, or part of it, and they now sought to get him out. The Supreme Court of Trinidad and Tobago (Clement Phillips Ag.-J.) made an order for possession against the defendant. The Federal Supreme Court (Hallinan C.J., Rennie and Archer JJ.) affirmed the decision. The defendant now appealed to Her Majesty in Council.

1959. Nov. 16, 17, 18. Dingle Foot Q.C. and Ralph Millner for the appellant.

Bernard Gillis Q.C. and J. Lloyd Eley for the respondent.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Addiscombe Garden Estates Ltd. v. Crabbe [1]; Winter Garden Theatre (London) Ltd. v. Millenium Productions Ltd.[2]; Connecticut Fire Insurance Co. v. Kavanagh [3]; Greene v. Chelsea Borough Council.[4]

Dec. 16. The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD DENNING. The contest before their Lordships turned mainly on what was the correct legal relationship between the plaintiff company and the defendant. Was the defendant a tenant? or was he in the premises merely under a licence to be there? Had his interest, whatever it was, been validly determined? And if it had been determined by a proper notice, had it been revived by subsequent acceptance of rent?

All these issues will not become clear until their Lordships have stated the facts. The plaintiff company has an issued capital of 64 shares. In September, 1955, one Attie Saffie Joseph bought

[1] [1958] 1 Q.B. 513; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 980; [1957] 3 All E.R. 563, C.A.

[2] [1948] A.C. 173; 63 T.L.R. 529; [1947] 2 All E.R. 331, H.L.

[3] [1892] A.C. 473; 8 T.L.R. 752.

[4] [1954] 2 Q.B. 127; [1954] 3 W.L.R. 12; [1954] 2 All E.R. 318, C.A.

J. C.
1959
Isaac
v.
Hotel de
Paris Ltd.

all these 64 shares and thus gained control of the company. He was acquainted with the defendant Isaac and agreed to sell him 15 of these shares (roughly a quarter interest in the company) for $4,687.50. The agreement was put into writing dated October 1, 1955. Under it the defendant was to pay a deposit of $1,000 down and the balance by six monthly instalments of $614.59 each. It contained a provision that, if the defendant made default, he was to forfeit his deposit of $1,000 together with any further instalments not exceeding $2,000 in all.

The defendant duly paid the $1,000 and he also paid near enough the first two monthly instalments due on November 1 and December 1, 1955. So it looked at this time as if he would acquire a fair stake in the company. He had had some experience in the hotel trade and he helped with the running of the Hotel de Paris. Then he suggested that repairs should be done to the Parisian Hotel on the other side of the road, that a night bar should be established in the Parisian Hotel and that he should be put in charge of it on behalf of the plaintiff company. Joseph agreed.

Accordingly, about December, 1955, the plaintiff company let the defendant into occupation of the first floor of the Parisian Hotel. The defendant got a licence to use it as a night bar. He took the licence in his own name and put in a stock of liquor at his own expense. He put up a signboard with the words "Wilfred "Isaac and Hotel de Paris Annexe—Night Bar." This looked as if the defendant was proposing to operate it on his own account. Joseph remonstrated. The defendant thereupon promised to account to the company for his expenditure and receipts from the night bar: and he did so account. The position at this time, as the trial judge found, was that the defendant was installed at the Parisian Hotel for the purpose of managing a night bar on the company's behalf.

In February, 1956, the relations between Joseph and the defendant Isaac became strained: and on February 17, 1956, the two men with their lawyers met to try to settle their differences. At this meeting the parties agreed upon terms which were afterwards to be embodied in a written contract between them. Their Lordships are of opinion that no concluded contract was reached at the meeting. Everything was subject to a contract later being signed. A draft contract was prepared by Joseph's lawyer, but it was not approved by the defendant's lawyer. So it never materialised.

Nevertheless, although no concluded contract was reached, some of the terms of the proposed contract were acted upon: and their Lordships must draw attention to them. They accept for this purpose the findings of the trial judge. The first term was an important term which was never implemented: "(a) The defen-"dant was to pay the balance due for the purchase of the shares." But the next three terms were acted upon. They were these: "(b) The defendant was to remain in occupation of the first floor " of the Parisian Hotel where the night bar was being operated. " (c) The defendant agreed to pay all expenses incurred in connec- " tion with the running of the Parisian Hotel, including the " monthly rent of $250 which the plaintiff company paid its land- " lord, Manoel Fernandez." (These words were under-lined by the trial judge.) " (d) The defendant would retain for himself all " profits he made from the business carried on at the Parisian Hotel, in lieu of the dividends on his shares if he acquired them."

It was no doubt anticipated by both parties that a contract would be drawn up and that the defendant would then pay the balance due on the shares. Meanwhile, the defendant remained in occupation and acted just as if a contract had been concluded. He ran the night bar. He paid all expenses. He took all the profits. And he paid $250 a month to the plaintiff company. It was expressly paid as " rent." For instance, on April 3, 1956, the defendant sent " the sum of $250.00 being the rent to April 1, " 1956, for Parisian Hotel." No receipt or acknowledgment was ever given, but it was undoubtedly accepted by the plaintiff company.

Towards the end of April, 1956, however, seeing that no contract had been executed and the balance due on the shares had not been paid, Joseph gave notice to the defendant that he intended to forfeit the sums of money already paid for the shares. And by a letter dated May 7 or 8, 1956, he wrote to the defendant: " Re Agreement for purchase of shares in Hotel de Paris Limited. " I have to refer to previous correspondence passing between us " on the above-mentioned subject and to inform you that your " deposits made under the above agreement have been forfeited. " You are required to remove and take away such stock and other " materials as you have at the Parisian Hotel within seven (7) " days of the date hereof, and I am to warn you that if you fail " to do so I shall be obliged to take such steps as may be neces- " sary to have them removed therefrom." (A question was raised before their Lordships whether this letter was ever properly proved. Joseph said he served it on the defendant. He kept a copy of it. The original should have been in the possession of the defendant. But no notice to produce had been given. This might have raised a nice point, but for the fact that the copy formed one of a bundle of agreed documents which were tendered and admitted in evidence without objection. That is enough to overcome the want of notice to produce.)

Notwithstanding that notice, the defendant did not remove his stock or other materials. But the plaintiff company took no steps to have them removed. Everything went on as before. The defendant remained in occupation, paying the expenses and taking the profits. And he paid $250 a month to the plaintiff company. These were expressly paid as " rent due at Parisian Hotel." The plaintiff company accepted the payments but gave no receipts.

On October 19, 1956, the plaintiff company issued a writ asking for a declaration that they were entitled to possession of the

J. C.
1959
Isaac
v.
Hotel de
Paris Ltd.

Parisian Hotel and an order for possession. The defendant in his defence claimed that he was a tenant at a monthly rent of $250.00. Even after the issue of the writ, everything went on as before. The defendant remained in occupation and paid $250 a month to the plaintiff company. These were expressly paid as "rent for the Parisian Hotel," but no receipts were given.

On December 6, 1957, the Supreme Court of Trinidad made an order for possession, but still the defendant stayed on. On May 27, 1957, the Federal Supreme Court affirmed the order, but still he stayed on. The order has not yet been executed. Their Lordships were told that the defendant is still there awaiting the outcome of this appeal.

At the trial the defendant alleged that in December, 1955, there was an oral agreement whereby Joseph, on behalf of the plaintiff company, sublet both floors of the Parisian Hotel to the defendant at a rent of $250.00. The judge rejected the evidence of the defendant and his witness on this point. He held that originally the defendant was put into occupation of the first floor for the purpose of establishing and managing a night bar on behalf of the company; in other words, as a servant or agent on behalf of the company, with no right or interest of his own. The Federal Supreme Court upheld this finding and their Lordships think it clearly right.

But what was the position after February 17, 1956? It was submitted by Mr. Dingle Foot that there were all the indicia of a monthly tenancy. There was not only exclusive possession but there was also the payment and acceptance of rent. (Furthermore, the defendant paid the disbursements, and so forth.) Mr. Dingle Foot admitted that these would not be decisive to establish the tenancy in the case of premises within the Rent Restriction Acts such as Marcroft Wagons Ltd. v. Smith [1] and Murray Bull & Co. Ltd. v. Murray,[2] but it was altogether different, he said, in the present case where the premises were not subject to rent restriction legislation. The only proper inference here was a monthly tenancy. Their Lordships cannot accept this view. There are many cases in the books where exclusive possession has been given of premises outside the Rent Restriction Acts and yet there has been held to be no tenancy. Instances are Errington v. Errington and Woods [3] and Cobb v. Lane,[4] which were referred to during the argument. It is true that in those two cases there was no payment or acceptance of rent, but even payment and acceptance of rent—though of great weight—is not decisive of a tenancy where it can be otherwise explained, see Clarke v. Grant.[5] As Lord Greene M.R. said in Booker v. Palmer [6]: "There is one

[1] [1951] 2 K.B. 496; [1951] 2 All E.R. 271.

[2] [1953] 1 Q.B. 211; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 1003; [1952] 2 All E.R. 1079.

[3] [1952] 1 K.B. 290; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 231; [1952] 1 All E.R. 149, C.A.

[4] [1952] 1 T.L.R. 1037; [1952] 1 All E.R. 1199, C.A.

[5] [1950] 1 K.B. 104; 65 T.L.R. 241; [1949] 1 All E.R. 768, C.A.

[6] [1942] 2 All E.R. 674, 677, C.A.

"golden rule which is of very general application, namely, that the "law does not impute intention to enter into legal relationships "where the circumstances and the conduct of the parties negative "any intention of the kind."

It appears to their Lordships that the law on this matter was correctly interpreted and applied by Archer J. in the Federal Supreme Court when he said: "It is clear from the authorities "that the intention of the parties is the paramount consideration "and while the fact of exclusive possession together with the "payment of rent is of the first importance, the circumstances in "which exclusive possession has been given and the character in "which money paid as rent has been received are also matters "to be considered. The circumstances in which Isaac was "allowed to occupy the Parisian Hotel show that Joseph never "intended to accept him as a tenant and that he was fully aware "of it. The payments he made were only part of the disburse-"ments for which he made himself responsible and the so-called "rent was in the nature of a reimbursement of the rent payable "by the plaintiff."

Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that the relationship between the parties after February 17, 1956, was not that of landlord and tenant, but that of licensor and licensee. The circumstances and conduct of the parties show that all that was intended was that the defendant should have a personal privilege of running a night bar on the premises, with no interest in the land at all. It was at first only a privilege to be there pending the execution of a formal contract. Later, when the contract fell through, and notice was given to him to remove his belongings, even that privilege came to an end. The notice of May 7 or 8, 1956, would not, of course, have been sufficient to end a tenancy, but it was quite sufficient to end a licence, see Ministry of Health v. Bellotti.[7]

But what about the position after May 15, 1956, when the notice expired? The defendant remained in possession carrying on as before. He was still permitted to be there both before and after the issue of the writ. He was in a sense still a licensee. But he was not, in the opinion of their Lordships, in such a privileged position that he could demand or expect yet another notice before being turned out. He was there at sufferance liable to be turned out whenever the plaintiff company thought fit to execute its right to do so: just as in the old days a tenant by sufferance was. And during this period it should not be taken against the company that it accepted his monthly payments of so-called rent. Better to have something in hand than lose all in the long-drawn course of court proceedings. True it is that, a year after the issue of the writ, on October 23, 1957, when giving evidence on an application by the defendant for a licence, Joseph said: "Hotel de Paris are subletting to Isaac. Isaac pays $250

[7] [1944] K.B. 298; 60 T.L.R. 228; [1944] 1 All E.R. 238, C.A.

J. C.
1959
Isaac v. Hotel de Paris Ltd.

"a month rent. He is not in default." But it must be remembered that a layman may in cases of this kind easily put the wrong label on to a legal relationship. Joseph put it better later in his evidence on that occasion when he said: "I do not know "how long the case will last so I must cash his cheques." The acceptance of the payments did not in these circumstances evince any intention to waive the company's right to immediate possession.

Their Lordships find themselves in full agreement with the Supreme Court of Trinidad and the Federal Supreme Court. They will humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed. The appellant must pay the costs.

Solicitors: T. L. Wilson & Co.; Malcolm Slowe & Co.

C. C.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

* In re LANGTON, DECD.

C. A.
1960
Feb. 12.
Hodson, Willmer and Devlin L.JJ.

LANGTON v. LLOYDS BANK LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[1957 L. 1159.]

Practice and Procedure—Pleadings—Amendment—Red ink—Whether necessary—R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 10; Ord. 28, r. 8.

In an amended pleading the amendments need not be indicated in red.

In a Probate action the plaintiff, acting in person, delivered an amended statement of claim printed in black. A registrar, who considered that the amendments should have been in red, made an order directing the plaintiff to deliver his amended statement of claim "in proper amended form" within 28 days. The plaintiff refused to do this, considering that his pleading complied with the requirements of Order 28, r. 8.[1] Later, another registrar made an order dismissing the action for want of prosecution, "the plaintiff "having refused and continuing to refuse to deliver an amended "statement of claim." This order was affirmed by the judge in chambers. On appeal:—

Held, allowing the appeal, that the plaintiff was not in default in delivering an amended pleading in black.

Appeal from Stevenson J. in chambers.

In a Probate action the plaintiff, acting in person, delivered an amended statement of claim which was printed in black. On

[1] R.S.C., Ord. 28, r. 8: "An indorsement or pleading may be "amended by written alterations in "the copy which has been delivered, "and by additions on paper to be "interleaved therewith if necessary, "unless the amendments require the "insertion of more than 144 words in "any one place, or are so numerous "or of such a nature that the making "them in writing would render the "document difficult or inconvenient to "read, in either of which cases, the "amendment must be made by "delivering a print of the document "as amended."

October 28, 1958, Mr. Registrar Russell made an order directing the plaintiff to "deliver his amended statement of claim in proper "amended form within 28 days," on the ground that the amendments were not indicated in red. The plaintiff having failed to comply, an application was made by the fourth defendant, a beneficiary, to have the action dismissed for want of prosecution, and on April 20, 1959, Mr. Registrar Wilkinson made an order to that effect, "the plaintiff refusing and continuing to refuse to "deliver an amended statement of claim." Stevenson J. in chambers affirmed this order. The plaintiff appealed.

The plaintiff in person. The matter is governed by Ord. 28, r. 8, which does not require that amendments should be in red.

J. A. Armstrong for the executors. I can only refer to Ord. 19, r. 10,[2] which requires that pleadings should be delivered "in "the manner now in use." There can be no doubt that in 1883 the practice was to deliver amendments in red, as has always been the constant practice. The plaintiff has also held up the proper prosecution of the action by repeated and premature applications for discovery.

H. S. Law for the fourth defendant.

No cases were cited in argument.

HODSON L.J. This is an appeal from an order of Stevenson J. made in chambers on May 8, 1959. He dismissed an appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar Wilkinson, dated April 20, 1959, which was framed in this way: "It is ordered that this action be and "the same is hereby dismissed with costs, the plaintiff having "refused and continuing to refuse to deliver an amended state-"ment of claim." The order of the registrar was made upon a summons issued by the fourth defendant for dismissal of the action for want of prosecution, the plaintiff not having delivered his amended statement of claim "in proper amended form" as required by an order of Mr. Registrar Russell in chambers on October 28, 1958. So the basis upon which this action was dismissed was not the basis that the plaintiff had not prosecuted his action, except in the sense that he had refused and continued to refuse to deliver an amended statement of claim.

Mr. Registrar Wilkinson was, no doubt, in a difficult position, because on October 28, 1958, Mr. Registrar Russell had ordered that "The plaintiff do deliver his amended statement of claim in "proper amended form within 28 days from today." So far as the jurisdiction of the court is concerned, and the rules as to amendment, the plaintiff was not in default. It is true that under Ord. 28, r. 2 (which provides for a plaintiff amending his statement of claim "once at any time before the expiration of the

[2] R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 10: "Every "pleading or other document required "to be delivered to a party, or be-"tween parties, shall be delivered in "the manner now in use to the solici-"tor of every party who appears by a "solicitor. . . ."

C. A.
1960
Langton, decd., In re.
Hodson, L.J.

"time limited for reply"), the rules only provide for such an amendment once without leave. But the point was never taken that the plaintiff required leave to amend his statement of claim; and the parties—all of them, the first and second defendants, who are the executors of the will of the deceased whose estate is the subject-matter of this action, and the fourth defendant, who issued the summons—have never taken the point that the plaintiff's statement of claim was in any sense out of order or that the amendment was wrongly made: the point was taken by the registrar himself. In my judgment (and, indeed, it is conceded in this court), there was no power to the registrar to make such an order. There is nothing in the statement of claim (which I need not read) which involves a departure from the rules; and, as I have said already, no point was taken by either party to that effect.

The order of Mr. Registrar Wilkinson was appealed to the judge, the plaintiff asking for the order of the registrar to be set aside, but apparently not directing his argument to the point which he raised in this court. The order of Mr. Registrar Russell being, as I think, in so far as it directed the plaintiff to "deliver "his amended statement of claim in proper amended form within "28 days from today," a nullity, and the subsequent orders having sprung from that, it seems to me that this appeal must be allowed. It is quite true that the plaintiff must prosecute this action. He has, we are told (we have not heard him about this), delayed the action by repeated applications for discovery, which have been refused owing to their having been made prematurely; but unless the action is prosecuted by the plaintiff it will be, on an application to the court for that purpose, dismissed for want of prosecution. But the ground upon which this dismissal was made was wrong: the action must therefore proceed, and the order of the judge reversed.

The appeal will therefore be allowed.

Willmer L.J. I agree; and I desire to add nothing beyond this, namely, to express the hope that the order we are now making will enable the parties to get the dispute between themselves settled with expedition.

Devlin L.J. I also agree.

Appeal allowed. Fourth defendant to pay appellant's costs here and below. First and second defendants' costs to be costs in the action.

Solicitors: Baker & Nairne; Barlow, Lyde & Gilbert.

F. R. D.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

* ROSSAGE v. ROSSAGE AND OTHERS.

C. A.

1959
Jan. 21.

Hodson, Ormerod and Willmer L.JJ.

Practice—Interlocutory proceedings—Meaning—Infant—Application to suspend access by mother—Whether interlocutory proceeding—Admissibility of hearsay evidence in affidavits—Scandalous matter—Discretion of court to strike out—R.S.C., Ord. 38, rr. 3, 11.

Evidence—Affidavit—Scandalous hearsay allegations—Admissibility on application to suspend mother's access to child—R.S.C., Ord. 38, rr. 3, 11.

Some years after divorce proceedings the father made an application that the access of the mother to the child of the marriage should be suspended. The application was supported by certain affidavits consisting largely of scandalous imputations against the mother based on hearsay. The mother applied to have these affidavits removed from the file as being scandalous and irrelevant, and in breach of the Rules of the Supreme Court.[1] Barnard J. refused this application, stating that he could put irrelevant matters out of his mind. On appeal:—

Held, allowing the appeal, (1) that for the purposes of R.S.C., Ord. 38 the proceeding was not interlocutory, so that hearsay evidence was irrelevant.

Dicta of Cotton L.J. in Gilbert v. Endean (1878) 9 Ch.D. 259, 269 (C.A.) applied.

(2) That the proportion of irrelevant matter, which was also scandalous, was so great that the court ought not to be embarrassed by its presence on the file, nor ought the party implicated to be embarrassed by having to deal with it.

APPEAL from Barnard J.

Some years after the parties had been divorced the father made an application that the mother's limited right of access to the child of the marriage should be suspended. The application was supported by a number of affidavits, including one by the father and two by the managing clerk of his solicitors. These affidavits contained a number of imputations against the mother, much of which was hearsay, including as an exhibit the draft of an affidavit based on alleged statements of a man with a criminal record who claimed to have had immoral relations with the mother, but who, it was deposed, had refused to swear the affidavit unless he received a very substantial sum.

On an application by the mother to remove these affidavits from the file as scandalous and irrelevant, Barnard J. declined to do so, stating that he could put irrelevant matters out of his head when deciding the issue. The mother appealed.

[1] R.S.C., Ord. 38, r. 3: "Affidavits shall be confined to such facts as the witness is able of his own knowledge to prove. . . . Provided that on interlocutory proceedings . . . an affidavit may contain statements of information and belief, with the sources and grounds thereof."

R. 11: "The court or judge may order to be struck out from any affidavit any matter which is scandalous, and may order the costs of any application to strike out such matter to be paid as between solicitor and client."

C. A.
1959
Rossage
v.
Rossage.

Stephen Terrell for the mother. These affidavits are full of scandalous matter, and consist mostly of hearsay, which is inadmissible and irrelevant, as this is not an interlocutory proceeding for the purpose of Order 38: Gilbert v. Endean.[2] The proportion of inadmissible matter is so great that they should be removed from the file.

G. H. Crispin for the father. The judge did not find that the affidavits on the whole were scandalous and irrelevant; though they contained irrelevant matters, he was capable of putting such matters out of his mind when deciding the issue.

[Hodson L.J. That is the ordinary way of doing it, but this is a bit extreme.]

This is an interlocutory matter, so that such of the contents of the affidavits, being given on information and belief, is not irrelevant, and cannot be struck out.

The following cases, which were cited in argument, are not referred to in the judgment: In re Anthony Birrell, Pearce & Co.[3]; Cracknall v. Janson[4]; Kernick v. Kernick[5]; Osmaston v. Association of Land Financiers[6]; Warner v. Mosses[7]; Bozson v. Altrincham Urban District Council[8]; Millington v. Loring.[9]

Hodson L.J. This is an appeal from an order of Barnard J. dated December 17, 1958. The judge on that occasion had before him an application by a wife, the mother of the child concerned, to have removed from the file certain affidavits, the ground of the application being that those affidavits were scandalous and irrelevant to the issue before the court, and the issue before the court being whether the mother's access to this child (she not being the custodian of the child) should be suspended. The judge did not accede to the application.

The position with regard to affidavits is covered by the Rules of the Supreme Court. Order 38, r. 3, provides: "Affidavits "shall be confined to such facts as the witness is able of his own "knowledge to prove. The costs of every affidavit which shall "unnecessarily set forth matters of hearsay, or argumentative "matter, or copies of or extracts from documents, shall be paid "by the party filing the same. Provided that on interlocutory "proceedings or with leave under" (certain orders) "an affidavit "may contain statements of information and belief, with the "sources and grounds thereof."

There are five affidavits, which the court has read, and as to the last two there is, I think, no ground for saying that the contents of those affidavits are irrelevant—that is to say, the affidavits of a man called Smith and a man called Willis. The gist of the application really relates to the three other affidavits—an

[2] (1878) 9 Ch.D. 259.
[3] [1899] 2 Ch. 50.
[4] (1878) 11 Ch.D. 1 (C.A.).
[5] (1864) 12 W.R. 335.
[6] [1878] W.N. 101.
[7] [1881] W.N. 69 (C.A.).
[8] [1903] 1 K.B. 547.
[9] (1880) 6 Q.B.D. 190 (C.A.).

affidavit by the father of the child and two affidavits by the managing clerk to the firm of solicitors instructed by him, the position being that those affidavits contain material which is relevant, but they contain a great deal of material which is irrelevant—pure hearsay evidence which the court cannot take into account in the form in which it stands. The proportion of that material to the relevant material is so high that if this matter is to be disposed of with any regard to convenience it is clearly, I think, right that the matter should be dealt with by removing the whole of those affidavits from the file rather than by seeking, by expunging irrelevant matter, to put the affidavits in order.

I should say that in dealing with this rule it has been construed by the Court of Appeal in a way which draws a distinction between interlocutory proceedings generally and interlocutory proceedings where an issue has to be determined, such as arises in this case. The authority for that is contained in Gilbert v. Endean,[1] a decision of the Court of Appeal, which contains a passage from the judgment of Cotton L.J. which is in point. He is dealing with an earlier form of this rule: " . . . for the purpose " of this rule those applications only are considered interlocutory " which do not decide the rights of parties, but are made for the " purpose of keeping things in statu quo till the rights can be " decided, or for the purpose of obtaining some direction of the " court as to how the cause is to be conducted, as to what is to " be done in the progress of the cause for the purpose of enabling " the court ultimately to decide upon the rights of the parties. " Now many of the cases which are brought before the court on " motions and on petitions, and which are therefore interlocutory " in form, are not interlocutory within the meaning of that rule " as regards evidence. They are to decide the rights of the " parties, and whatever the form may be in which such " questions are brought before the court, in my opinion the " evidence must be regulated by the ordinary rules, and must " be such as would be admissible at the hearing of the cause. " In my opinion, therefore, on such applications, if an affidavit " on information and belief is made, the other side is not called " upon to answer it under the peril of its being said to him, ' You " ' have in fact admitted this by not denying it, and therefore " ' the court may act upon the admission.' But I must add this: " where in the court below the evidence not being strictly admis- " sible, not being that upon which the court can properly act, if " the person against whom it is read does not object, but treats " it as admissible, then before the Court of Appeal, in my " judgment, he is not at liberty to complain of the order on the " ground that the evidence was not admissible. But in such a " case the court does not act on the statement as being evidence " properly admissible, but because the party has by the course " which he adopted waived proof of the facts stated on informa- " tion and belief. I have said this because I think that the [1] (1878) 9 Ch.D. 259, 268.

C. A.
1959
Rossage v. Rossage.
Hodson L.J.

"matter is one of very considerable importance, and that the habit "of introducing into applications to decide the rights of parties "evidence on information and belief has done great injury in "many ways in the Chancery Division."

In my judgment, the standard to be applied is indicated by the rule as explained by the passage to which I have referred; and the judge quite clearly, from what we have been told of the matter, recognised that the material to which I have drawn attention (without saying what it is) was matter which he could not consider for the purpose of arriving at a decision in this case. However, he said that he was not going to remove it from the file because he was quite capable of shutting his mind to the irrelevant matter. But I do not think that that is a sufficient answer to the application in this case. The peril of leaving the affidavits on the file is indicated by the passage in the judgment of Cotton L.J. which I have read; and, indeed, it makes it almost impossible for the mother in this case to answer the affidavits unless they are cleaned up by the purge of the irrelevant and, indeed, scandalous matter.

There has been some discussion as to what is meant by "scandalous." It is quite clear that we cannot strike out matters in a pleading or an affidavit simply because they are scandalous, because scandalous matter may be relevant, and may be the very matters which have to be investigated by the court. But if, as here, the matters are plainly irrelevant, it seems there is no doubt that the court can strike them out, either by virtue of its inherent power or by virtue of the power contained in Order 38, r. 11—"The court or judge may order to be struck out from any affidavit "any matter which is scandalous, and may order the costs of any "application to strike out such matter to be paid as between "solicitor and client."

Within the meaning of those two rules, I am clearly of opinion that these matters are irrelevant and scandalous, and therefore they ought to be struck out. The court ought not to be embarrassed by their presence on the file; nor ought the party whom these statement tend to implicate to be embarrassed by having to deal with them.

I therefore would allow this appeal so far as the three first affidavits are concerned.

Ormerod L.J. I agree, and there is nothing I wish to add.

Willmer L.J. I, too, am of the same opinion.

Appeal allowed, with costs as between solicitor and client.
Leave to appeal.

Solicitors: Victor Mishcon & Co.; Nordon & Co.

F. R. D.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

* In re J. (AN INFANT).

[1959 J. No. 5157.]

1960
Jan. 26;
Feb. 4.

Cross J

Practice—Interlocutory proceedings—Meaning—Infant—Ward of court—Application to take out of jurisdiction—Whether interlocutory proceeding—Admissibility of hearsay evidence in affidavits—Discretion of court to strike out—R.S.C., Ord. 38, rr. 3, 11.

Evidence—Affidavit—Hearsay—Ward of court—Statement of information and belief—Whether admissible in application to take ward out of jurisdiction—R.S.C., Ord. 38, rr. 3, 11.

The mother of a ward of court, in an affidavit in support of her application by summons for leave to take the ward out of the jurisdiction to live with her abroad, stated: "The statement . . . "now produced and shown to me marked 'B.J.1' is in so far as "the same consists of matters of fact true to my knowledge and "in so far as it consists of matters of information or opinion true "to the best of my knowledge and belief." On a summons by the father for an order that the words "and in so far as it consists of "matters of information or opinion true to the best of my know-"ledge and belief," and certain passages in the exhibited statement be struck out on the ground that they were scandalous, irrelevant and argumentative or otherwise oppressive, and were in breach of the Rules of the Supreme Court,[1] it being agreed that the statements contained hearsay evidence which would be inadmissible at the trial of an action between the father and the mother:—

Held, (1) that the mother's summons was not an interlocutory proceeding within the meaning of the proviso to R.S.C., Ord. 38, r. 3, and the hearsay evidence was, therefore, inadmissible.

(2) That, nevertheless, the court had a complete discretion whether or not to strike out hearsay evidence improperly included in an affidavit, so that it could properly refuse to do so if it considered that that course was not necessary to enable the mother's summons to be properly heard, and that, accordingly, the evidence would be considered on that basis at the hearing of the application.

Rossage v. Rossage, ante, p. 249 applied.

Dicta of Cotton L.J. in Gilbert v. Endean (1878) 9 Ch.D. 259, 269 considered.

SUMMONS.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment: On November 19, 1959, the mother of a ward of court took out a summons asking that she should be at liberty to take the child out of the jurisdiction to live with her abroad. The summons was served on the father of the ward and on another person. In support of her application the mother, on November 26, 1959, swore an affidavit, paragraph 2 of which read as

[1] R.S.C., Ord. 38, r. 3: "Affi-"davits shall be confined to such facts "as the witness is able of his own "knowledge to prove . . . Provided "that on interlocutory proceedings ". . . . an affidavit may contain "statements of information and "belief, with the sources and grounds "thereof."

R. 11: "The court or judge may "order to be struck out from any "affidavit any matter which is scan-"dalous."

1960

J., In re.

follows: "The signed statement . . . now produced and shown "to me marked 'B.J.1' is in so far as the same consists of "matters of fact true to my knowledge, and in so far as it consists "of matters of information or opinion true to the best of my "knowledge and belief."

On November 30 the father applied to the court by summons for an order (1) that the words in paragraph 2 of the affidavit "and in so far as it consists of matters of information or opinion "true to the best of my knowledge and belief," and (2) a number of passages in the exhibited statement, should be struck out on the grounds that they "are scandalous, irrelevant and argumenta-"tive or otherwise oppressive and are in breach of the Rules of "the Supreme Court." The summons also asked for similar relief in connection with an affidavit sworn in support of the mother's application by another deponent and a statement exhibited to it. The master refused to make an order on the father's application and, at his request, adjourned it into court as a procedure summons.

Stephen Terrell for the father.
C. A. Settle for the mother.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Osmaston v. Association of Land Financiers [2]; Kernick v. Kernick [3]; Warner v. Mosses [4]; In re Jessop (a Solicitor).[5]

Cur. adv. vult.

February 4, 1960. Cross J. read the following judgment which, after stating the facts, continued: It is common ground between the parties that the exhibited statements in question contain hearsay evidence which would be inadmissible at the trial of an action raising issues between the father and mother as evidence of the truth of the facts alleged. On that basis I have been asked by counsel for both sides to decide two questions of principle before considering in detail the statements to parts of which objection is taken.

The first question is whether the mother's summons is an interlocutory proceeding within the meaning of the proviso to R.S.C., Ord. 38, r. 3. If it is, then there would be no objection to the inclusion of hearsay evidence in the affidavits or exhibited statements provided that the sources and grounds were given. [His Lordship read Ord. 38, r. 3, and continued:] Mr. Terrell admitted that for some purposes an application such as the mother's application in this case was an interlocutory proceeding. He agreed, for example, that an order made on it would be an interlocutory and not a final order for the purposes of appeal. Directions given in infancy cases are never irrevocable

[2] [1878] W.N. 101.
[3] (1864) 9 L.T. 800.
[4] [1881] W.N. 69, 135.
[5] (1910) 54 S.J. 543.

but are always liable to be varied in the light of changed circumstances. The only final order in such proceedings would be one directing that the child should cease to be a ward of court. But he argued that a proceeding might well be interlocutory for the purposes of appeal while not being interlocutory for the purposes of the admission of hearsay evidence.

In this connection he referred to a passage in the judgment of Cotton L.J. in Gilbert v. Endean,[1] where the Lord Justice said,[2] in connection with an earlier form of a rule in question: "But for the "purpose of this rule those applications only are considered inter-"locutory which do not decide the rights of parties, but are made "for the purpose of keeping things in statu quo till the rights can "be decided, or for the purpose of obtaining some direction of the "court as to how the cause is to be conducted, as to what is "to be done in the progress of the cause for the purpose of "enabling the court ultimately to decide upon the rights of the "parties. Now many of the cases which are brought before "the court on motions and on petitions, and which are therefore "interlocutory in form, are not interlocutory within the meaning "of that rule as regards evidence. They are to decide the rights "of the parties, and whatever the form may be in which such "questions are brought before the court, in my opinion the "evidence must be regulated by the ordinary rules, and must be "such as would be admissible at the hearing of the cause." Mr. Terrell pointed out that the mother's application here was not made for the purpose of keeping matters in statu quo or for the purpose of obtaining directions as to procedure. Therefore, he submitted, it should not be considered to be an interlocutory proceeding for the purpose of the admission of evidence. Mr. Settle, on the other hand, argued that while it was true that the mother's application was not made for the purpose of keeping things in statu quo, or for directions with regard to procedure, it was not an application upon which any rights of any parties would be decided. The only question to be decided would be what, in all the circumstances, would be in the best interests of the infant who is not himself a party at all. The parties in such a case are not asserting rights but merely submit to the judge what, in their view, is for the infant's benefit. The observations of Cotton L.J., therefore, said Mr. Settle, do not touch such a case as this, and as the proviso to the rule (which up to 1933 was confined to motions) now extends to all forms of proceeding, there is no reason why such an application as the mother's in this case should not be considered to be interlocutory for the purposes of evidence as well as for the purposes of appeal. He submitted that it was desirable that the judge who had to decide what, in all the circumstances, was in the best interests of the child should be able to consider any material which either side chose to put before him, and that he could safely be trusted not to attribute to any part of it more weight than it deserved.

[1] (1878) 9 Ch.D. 259. [2] Ibid. 268.

1960

J., In re.

Cross J.

I have set out the rival contentions because the point is one of some general importance and the case may go further, but so far as I am concerned the question is, I think, answered by the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in Rossage v. Rossage [3] to which Mr. Terrell called my attention. In that case Barnard J. had granted the custody of the child of the marriage to the father, and granted the mother certain rights of access. Later, the father applied to the court to have the mother's rights of access suspended, and in support of his application certain affidavits were filed which contained hearsay evidence. The Court of Appeal took the view that such evidence was inadmissible and ordered the affidavits to be removed from the file. Mr. Settle suggested that I need not consider that decision to be binding on me in this case because proceedings in the Divorce Division relating to the custody of and access to the children of the parties to the divorce proceedings can more easily be viewed as contests between parties claiming adverse rights than can wardship proceedings in this Division. I cannot accept this suggestion. I have always understood—and Mr. Settle did not refer me to any decision suggesting the contrary—that in custody proceedings in the Divorce Division, just as in wardship proceedings in this Division, the paramount consideration is always the welfare of the child. It would be curious if the rules as to the evidence admissible in such cases were different in the two Divisions, and, if any such distinction is to be drawn, it should, I think, be drawn by the Court of Appeal and not by me. On the first point, therefore, I hold that Mr. Terrell is right.

On the footing that the mother's application in this case is not an "interlocutory proceeding" within the meaning of the proviso to Ord. 38, r. 3, the other question which has been argued is how the court should deal with any matter which has been improperly included in the affidavits or exhibited statements. In Rossage v. Rossage [4] Barnard J., while holding that the passages in the affidavits to which objection was taken were not admissible in evidence, refused to strike them out, as he considered that he would be able to put them out of his mind when he heard the application. The Court of Appeal reversed his decision, and as in that case the proportion of inadmissible material in the affidavits was very high, the court did not simply strike out the inadmissible passages but directed the affidavits to be taken from the file. The matter objected to in that case was not only inadmissible and so irrelevant, but was also "scandalous" in the sense that it contained allegations of misconduct by the mother. The Court of Appeal, however, I think, took the view that even if hearsay evidence improperly contained in an affidavit is not "scandalous" in the ordinary sense of that word, the court nevertheless can, if it thinks fit, strike it out either under Ord. 38, r. 11, or under its inherent jurisdiction. But Mr. Terrell submitted to me not only that the court has jurisdiction to strike irrelevant matter out of an affidavit (which, indeed, Mr. Settle did not dispute) but that it ought always to strike out any matter the irrelevancy of which consists in the fact that it is inadmissible in evidence, however trivial the matter in question may be. He argued that if the records of the court are, as he put it, "defiled" by the presence of statements which are inadmissible in the evidence, court, on its attention being called to the fact, cannot properly refrain from striking it out. Mr. Settle, in his argument on this point, placed some reliance on the fact that in this case the evidence is in the form of statements exhibited to formal affidavits, and that such statements may be said not themselves to form part of the record of the court, but I do not propose to deal with Mr. Terrell's argument on any such narrow ground. Whether the material to which objection is taken on the ground that it is not admissible in evidence is contained in a statement exhibited to an affidavit, or in the affidavit itself, the court has, in my judgment, a complete discretion whether or not to strike it out, and a judge cannot be said to be exercising his discretion improperly merely because he decides not to strike out the matter in question. None of the cases cited by Mr. Terrell appears to me to support his submissions on this part of the case, and the case of Rossage v. Rossage [5] tells against it. In that case, when counsel for the father pointed out that Barnard J. had refused to strike out the passages in question because he thought that he was capable of putting them out of his mind when he came to decide the issue, Hodson L.J. said: "That is "the ordinary way of doing it; but this is a bit extreme." The hearsay evidence to which objection was there taken was most damaging to the mother, and one can well understand that the Court of Appeal should have thought that in the particular circumstances of that case it was desirable that it should be struck out altogether. But I find nothing in his judgment which suggests to me that Hodson L.J. went back on the view which is implicit in the interlocutory observation which I have quoted, namely, that there may be cases where the proper course for a judge to follow is to refuse to strike out hearsay evidence improperly included in an affidavit. It would, I think, be unfortunate if the law was otherwise. Inadmissible hearsay evidence may relate only to matters which are of little or no importance, even to matters the truth of which the other side may not dispute. Yet if Mr. Terrell's submission is right, the court would be bound to accede to an application to strike such matter out, and, I suppose, to give the applicants the costs of it, even though the application was quite unnecessary for the purpose of achieving justice in the case.

[3] Ante, p. 249.

[4] Ibid.

I propose, therefore, to deal with the present application on [5] Ante, p. 249.

1960

J., In re.

Cross J.

the basis, first, that the mother's summons is not an interlocutory proceeding within the meaning of the proviso to Ord. 38, r. 3, but, secondly, that I can properly refuse to strike out any of the passages to which objection is taken by the father if I consider that that course is not necessary for the purpose of enabling the mother's summons to be properly heard.

Summons adjourned to chambers.

Solicitors: Victor Mishcon & Co.; Jaques & Co.

M. G. T.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.

1960
Jan. 19, 20.

Ormerod and Devlin L.JJ.; Gorman J.

* JAQUIN v. HOLLAND.

[Plaint No. P. 76.]

Landlord and Tenant—Repairs—Covenant—Measure of damages for failure to yield up premises in "good and tenantable" repair—Diminution in value of reversion where premises immediately relet—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (17 & 18 Geo. 5, c. 36), s. 18 (1).

On the termination of a tenancy containing a covenant to keep and yield up the demised premises "in good and tenantable repair," the landlord spent £19 10s. in putting the premises into a lettable condition and the premises were immediately relet at the same rent as in the earlier tenancy. The premises were situated in an area where there was a high demand for houses to let. In an action by the landlord for damages for breach of the repairing covenant, the diminution in value of the reversion under section 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927,[1] was found to be £50, this sum being based upon the estimated reduction in selling value of the premises. It would have cost about £100 to put the premises in good and tenantable repair. It was contended for the tenant that in the circumstances the sum of £19 10s. represented the true measure of damage since the premises were immediately relet at the same rent subject to the payment of that sum or, alternatively, because the lettable value of the freehold should be taken into consideration:—

Held, (1) that the test for assessing the measure of damages for breach of a repairing covenant at common law was the amount that was necessary to put the house into a proper condition for letting in accordance with the terms of the covenant, so that it would be taken by a reasonable man wanting a house in reasonable condition, having regard to the nature and type of house involved.

Proudfoot v. Hart (1890) 25 Q.B.D. 42; 6 T.L.R. 305, C.A. applied.

[Reported by A. H. Bray, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

[1] Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, s. 18: "(1) Damages for a breach of a "covenant or agreement to keep . . . or "to leave . . . premises in repair at "the termination of a lease, . . . shall "in no case exceed the amount (if "any) by which the value of the "reversion (whether immediate or "not) in the premises is diminished "owing to the breach. . . ."

(2) That the damages so assessed would have been over £50, and, applying section 18 (1) of the Act of 1927, £50—the amount by which the value of the reversion was diminished—was the sum to which the landlord was entitled. Even if one lease immediately succeeded another, there must always be a notional moment of time when the unincumbered freehold estate was vested in the landlord and the value of the reversion was therefore the value of the freehold as it had come back into the hands of the landlord before he let it again (post, pp. 266, 267).

Dictum of Lawrence L.J. in Hanson v. Newman [1934] Ch. 298, 304; 50 T.L.R. 191, C.A. applied.

Quaere, whether in determining the diminution in value of the reversion it was right to take into consideration the fact that there was a shortage of houses in the area.

APPEAL from Judge Glazebrook sitting at Sevenoaks County Court.

The plaintiff, Ursula Hope Jaquin, was the owner of a bungalow, 49, Oakdene Road, Sevenoaks, which, by a tenancy agreement dated March 18, 1958, she let to the defendant, Edward William Holland, for a period of one year at a rent of £265 per annum. By the agreement, the tenant agreed to "keep "the interior of the said premises . . . in good and tenant-"able repair (damage by accidental fire, storm or tempest "excepted) and to cultivate the garden in a proper manner," and also to "yield up the said premises at the end of the tenancy . . . "in good and tenantable repair. . . ."

The tenant entered into occupation of the bungalow in accordance with the terms of the agreement, but at the end of eight months of his tenancy, he wished to vacate the premises. This he was allowed to do, the landlord having found another tenant who was willing to take over the premises. The tenant vacated the premises on November 28, 1958.

After the premises were vacated, one Coles, a surveyor appointed on behalf of the landlord, inspected the premises and made a schedule of dilapidations which totalled £102 16s. The tenant employed one Platts as surveyor, who also prepared a schedule of dilapidations, but the two surveyors were unable to agree the amount of dilapidations. As a result the landlord commenced proceedings in the county court claiming damages for breach of the covenant to repair, the particulars given being those set out in the schedule of dilapidations. The defence was a denial that there was a breach of covenant, but that if there was, the schedule was unreasonable and the cost of doing the required work was excessive. Further, the tenant pleaded section 18 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, claiming that the value of the reversion had not been diminished by the tenant's alleged breach of covenant.

The county court registrar (Mr. Registrar Leon) found that the tenant had been in breach of his covenant and that the proper sum to award in damages was £29 10s., being £19 10s. for repairs to the bungalow and £10, a sum which was not in issue on

C. A.
1960
Jaquin
v.
Holland.

appeal, being the amount required to put the garden into proper order. The landlord appealed to the county court judge under Order 37, r. 5, of the County Court Rules, 1936, who varied the finding of the registrar and held that the landlord was entitled to £60, being £50 in respect of damages for breach of covenant for non-repair of the bungalow and £10 for the garden. The tenant appealed.

John Drinkwater for the tenant.
John Gower for the landlord.

The following cases were cited in argument, in addition to those referred to in the judgments: Smiley v. Townshend[2]; Anstruther-Gough-Calthorpe v. McOscar[3]; Jones v. Herxheimer.[4]

Ormerod L.J. stated the facts, read section 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, and continued: The effect of that provision, shortly, appears to be that, whatever may be found to be the cost of doing the repairs rendered necessary by the failure of the tenant to observe his covenant for repair, the damages which the landlord is entitled to recover shall be limited to the diminution in the value of the reversion of the premises.

When the matter came before the registrar, the evidence which was called, apart from the evidence of the plaintiff herself, was the evidence of the two surveyors, and, according to the findings of the registrar, set out in his judgment, the evidence of Coles, the surveyor called on behalf of the landlord, was that there was a want of repair which would cost £102 16s. to put right. According to the judgment, Coles said that he prepared his schedule on what he regarded as proper grounds, that is, on the footing that the premises be put into good and tenantable repair on his understanding of the covenant, and he said that he had put into the schedule every possible defect, and that, in his view, that was a correct interpretation of the covenant. Then the note of his evidence goes on: "He also said that with regard to selling the "property he would not advise any abatement in the asking price "in view of the condition of the house but he might so advise "during negotiations for a sale. He also said that the property "was lettable in the condition it was left because the demand was "so high." This was the registrar's summary of the evidence of Coles on these matters. The evidence of Platts, according to the registrar, was that in Platts' view no damages at all were payable by the tenant in respect of want of repair, because there had been no diminution in the value of the freehold reversion. According to the registrar, Platts came to that conclusion for two reasons: first, that the items of non-repair were trivial in themselves, and therefore not likely to affect the value, and secondly, that the demand for houses was so great in Sevenoaks that these matters were not likely to affect any price which might be procured for the sale of the house. But, according to the registrar again, Platts agreed that, if damages were to be paid, and if there had been liability on the tenant for these various items of non-repair, there were a number of items for which he would be liable, and those items are set out in the registrar's judgment by number in reference to the schedule of dilapidations. According to the registrar, the total of those items is £91 13s. 6d. Mr. Drinkwater, on instructions, has submitted that that figure of £91 13s. 6d. is not the correct figure, and that there is no evidence to justify it. But, whatever the figure was, it was certainly a substantial figure which may or may not have been as much as the registrar calculated it to be, £91 13s. 6d. In effect, according to the registrar, what Platts was saying was: "Here no damages should be paid because there has "been no diminution in the value of the reversion of the property. "But, if I am wrong about that, and there has been diminution, "then the amount of items for which I am responsible, I admit, "are the items set out by the registrar" which, according to the registrar, amount to £91 13s. 6d. That is the evidence of the two surveyors.

[2] [1950] 2 K.B. 311; 66 T.L.R. (Pt. 1) 546; [1950] 1 All E.R. 530, C.A.
[3] [1924] 1 K.B. 716; 40 T.L.R. 223, C.A.
[4] [1950] 2 K.B. 106; 66 T.L.R. (Pt. 1) 403; [1950] 1 All E.R. 323, C.A.

In addition, the landlord herself had said that she had spent the sum of £25 11s. 2d. (which is, as a matter of fact, a wrong figure, the correct figure being £19 10s.), on work on the house to put the house in what she called "presentable" condition, and that, after that, she had let the house in that condition for the same rent to the new tenant.

That is how the matter stood when the registrar had to consider his findings. He appears to have directed himself correctly on the rule he had to consider whether or not there had been a breach of the covenant in this case. That was the first matter to which he had to direct his attention. He founded his consideration of that point on Proudfoot v. Hart.[1] The rule, as expressed by Lord Esher M.R., is set out in the headnote which reads: "Under an "agreement to keep a house in 'good tenantable repair,' and so "leave the same at the expiration of the term, the tenant's "obligation is to put and keep the premises in such repair as, "having regard to the age, character, and locality of the house, "would make it reasonably fit for the occupation of a tenant of "the class who would be likely to take it." Both parties agreed that the present covenant came within that rule, and that before the registrar and the county court judge that rule was the one to be considered in deciding whether there had been a breach of this covenant. The registrar said: "I am quite satisfied on the "authorities that the test is the cost of putting the property "into a condition in which a reasonable tenant would be likely

[1] (1890) 25 Q.B.D. 42; 6 T.L.R. 305, C.A.

C. A.
1960
Jaquin v. Holland.
Ormerod L.J.

"to take the house having regard to its class, character and "locality." As to that, I think there can be no quarrel, and I do not think anybody has quarrelled with that part of the registrar's judgment. But he then goes on to say: "Here we "find a reasonable tenant actually taking the premises but with "certain work actually done. The cost of this work I calculate "at £25 11s. 2d., but I will hear the parties later as to the exact "amount of this calculation." A little later in his judgment he says: "But I have come to the conclusion that the tenant is only "liable for the work necessary to make the house lettable"—again, perhaps, that is a short way of putting the rule in Proudfoot v. Hart[2]—"I calculate the figure from the account at "£25 11s. 2d.; accordingly, that is the amount the defendant is "liable to pay to the plaintiff." What, in fact, the registrar did was to say: "Some work has been done on this house by the "landlord herself. That work having been done, she was able to "let the house. Therefore, the amount which she has spent on "the house has been sufficient to put it in a condition which "would enable it to be let to a reasonable tenant." So far as I know, there was no evidence before the court whether the tenant was a reasonable man or was not, or as to the considerations which had affected the mind of the tenant when he took the house. But the registrar appears to have taken the view that, if £25 was all that was necessary to put the premises into repair so that they could and would be taken by a tenant, the fact that a tenant had taken them was evidence that all that was necessary had been done, and, in those circumstances, that was all the tenant was liable to pay.

It has been contended on behalf of the landlord with considerable force that what the registrar has done is to take into account the property market, not at what might be regarded as a normal time, but at the present time when, as the evidence showed, there was a very great demand for houses, particularly houses to let, in this particular district. In consequence, the registrar found that the sum of £25 11s. 2d., which was later altered to £19 10s., was the figure which he should award as being the cost of putting these premises into repair.

The registrar then had to consider the further question whether that sum was a larger sum than the diminution in the value of the freehold reversion. It was contended on the one hand that the diminution in value was the sum of £102 contended for by the landlord's surveyor, and on the other hand, that there had been no diminution in value at all, and that was contended by the tenant's surveyor on the ground that the property would be sold whether this work was done or not for the same price. The registrar did not agree with either of the parties. He said: "My own view is that the truth lies somewhere between the two "views. I think the purchaser might ask for a reduction or the "vendor ask for something less. My view is that £50 is the proper "figure for the reduction in the selling price at the time of Mr. "Coles's inspection."

[2] (1890) 25 Q.B.D. 42, C.A.

Mr. Drinkwater submitted that that was not a finding that there had been a diminution in the value of the reversion to the extent of £50, as in this case it was never intended that this should go on the market. But that, I think, is not a proper view. It appears to me that there must be a moment of time when the freehold reversion, unincumbered, is vested in the landlord, and the question is: What is the value of the freehold reversion at that time? It appears to me that the finding of the registrar that there would be a reduction in the selling price of £50 at that time means that there would be a diminution of £50 in the value of the freehold reversion.

In those circumstances, the registrar having come to the conclusion that £19 10s., plus £10, was the proper figure, and that that was within the maximum sum of £50 which he found was the diminution in the value of the reversion, he gave judgment for that figure of £29 10s.

The county court judge varied the order of the registrar, and came to the conclusion that the proper figure to which the plaintiff was entitled was the sum of £50, plus the £10 for the damage to the garden. He said: "The registrar further found that the "premises had been relet at the same rent. From a common sense "point of view there is a great deal to be said for what the "registrar found. He says that in this case after spending "£19 10s. the premises were relet at the same rent. That, how-"ever, is not the diminution in value. Somebody might have "taken the premises as they were, without anything being done. "I think that the registrar made a mistake in going on to consider "the letting which had been made."

Mr. Drinkwater has argued that the sum of £19 10s. is the proper sum in that it was all that was necessary to put the premises into a lettable condition—and that is what the registrar has found—and that, as this was a covenant to which the rule in Proudfoot v. Hart[3] applied, a proper application of that rule showed that only a sum of £19 10s. was due in respect of this breach of covenant. Mr. Gower, on the other hand, argued that there was no evidence to justify the registrar in coming to the conclusion that £19 10s. was the proper figure. It was true that that was the amount which had actually been spent by the landlord in doing such repairs as she considered necessary to make the house presentable, and that she was then able to let the house at the same figure. But that was not the proper way to apply the test. The test was not one of whether the house could be let in all circumstances and whatever the pressure for houses might be in that particular area at any particular time. The real test to apply was the test of the amount that was necessary to put

[3] 25 Q.B.D. 42, C.A.

C. A.
1960
Jaquin
v.
Holland.
Ormerod L.J.

the house into a proper condition for letting in accordance with the terms of the covenant so that it would be taken by a reasonable man wanting a home in reasonable condition, having regard to the nature and type of house involved. He argued that the surveyor called by the landlord has said that the sum of £102 is necessary to put the house in proper repair. The surveyor called by the tenant has said that a lesser sum of £91, or some other approximate sum, would be necessary, if any sum was necessary at all—and the reason why it was not necessary was because, in these particular circumstances, there has been no diminution in the value of the freehold reversion. But the registrar has held—and nobody has quarrelled with his finding—that in fact there has been a diminution to the extent of £50. In those circumstances, says Mr. Gower, the amount to which the landlord is entitled is the sum of £50. But he would be entitled to a larger sum—either £90 or £100; whatever the registrar found in the circumstances necessary—were it not for the restriction imposed by section 18 of the Act of 1927. In view of that restriction and the registrar's finding, £50 is the largest sum in the circumstances which can be claimed by the landlord.

I think that all I need say is that I accept that view. It is not correct in a case of this kind to take the circumstances of letting and say that, because any house can be let almost in any condition at the present time, then there is no obligation on a tenant to perform his covenant to repair. The rule in Proudfoot v. Hart[4] is a guide as to the extent of repair which may be necessary in order to comply with a covenant of this kind. But it is a guide which calls in that useful individual, the reasonable man, acting in reasonable circumstances. In those circumstances, I think it must be clear from the evidence that a larger sum than the sum which the registrar had awarded would be the sum which would be payable.

I am therefore of the view that the figure which the registrar should have found is some figure larger than the sum of £50—how much larger matters not for the purposes of this case—but reduced to the sum of £50 because that is the sum which has been found by the registrar to be the diminution in the value of the reversion. In those circumstances it follows that the county court judge was right in varying the order of the registrar, and ordering that the sum which should be paid should be the sum of £50 plus the undisputed sum of £10 for the garden. In my judgment, therefore, this appeal should be dismissed.

Devlin L.J. Where, at the end of a tenancy, there is a claim for dilapidations, clearly the first thing that has to be done is to draw up a list of the work that it is necessary to do in order to put the premises into good and tenantable repair, these words being the words of the covenant in this case. The test that is very frequently applied in order to ascertain exactly what is meant by "good and tenantable repair," and therefore to ascertain exactly what work it is necessary to do, is the test that was laid down in Proudfoot v. Hart,[5] to which Ormerod L.J. has referred. We need not go into the question of whether or not that is the universal test. It has not been disputed in this case as being the appropriate test. Accordingly, in accordance with that test, the surveyors on both sides, for the landlord and for the tenant, drew up their lists of dilapidations, and, as I read the judgment of the registrar, the conclusion he arrived at was that the work that it was necessary to do, according to the evidence of the landlord's surveyor, came out at £102 16s.; whereas, according to the evidence of the tenant's surveyor, it came out at £91 13s. 6d.

[4] 25 Q.B.D. 42, C.A.

Having ascertained the amount of work that it is necessary to do in accordance with Proudfoot v. Hart,[6] and having put a figure on it, that does not necessarily conclude the matter, because section 18 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, provides that the damages are not to exceed the amount, if any, by which the value of the reversion in the premises is diminished. So that one has to go on to inquire to what extent the value of the reversion has been diminished. That inquiry the registrar made, and he came to the conclusion that the reduction in the selling price amounted to £50, that is to say, he appears to have held that, notwithstanding that it would cost at least £91 13s. 6d. in his view to put the premises into good and tenantable repair, the damage to the reversion did not amount to more than £50. He arrived at that conclusion because of the shortage of houses in Sevenoaks and the desirability of them from the point of view of buyers. Thus he was saying that a buyer who was making a bid for this house, if it were put on the market, would say to himself: "I will put up with £41 odd of damage to the house, which I "shall have to spend on repairs, because houses are short and it is "very desirable to get one." I am not at all sure—and I should like to guard myself against deciding it and reserve the point for consideration when it arises—whether that was the right thing to do. I can imagine, for example, a house that is worth £5,000, which is let, let us say, at a rental of £250 per annum, where at the end of the tenancy £50 worth of damage had been done, and £50 would have to be spent on it in order to put it into good and tenantable repair. That is an appreciable sum, if you look at it from the point of view of the rent the landlord is getting. It is 20 per cent. of the rent. On the other hand, if you look at it from the point of view of the capital value of the house, it may not matter very much. Even if there were no particular shortage or particular desirability of houses to be taken into consideration, I can still imagine that an auctioneer might be [5] 25 Q.B.D. 42, C.A. [6] Ibid.

C. A.
1960
Jaquin
v.
Holland.
Devlin L.J.

found who would say: "Well, where the damage is so small a "figure as £50, a prospective buyer, in making his bid, is likely "to disregard it altogether." I do not think that it necessarily follows from that that it is the intention of this Act that it should be disregarded altogether, or that a landlord will just have to put up with what is in effect a real loss. As I say, I would desire to reserve my opinion on that question. It does not arise here, and it does not arise because Mr. Gower, for the landlord, is not asking for the higher figure of £91. He is content, very sensibly, with the figure of £50 which has been found by the registrar as the reduction in the selling price. I say "very sensibly" because these are small figures, and there has been a good deal of litigation about them already. Although he contended before the county court judge that £91 was the right figure, the county court judge rejected it, but gave him still something more than the registrar gave him, that is to say, the sum of £50, and he has taken that sum of £50. So the question does not arise here.

I have said that the county court judge gave the landlord something more than the registrar had given him, and that is because the registrar, although he found the reduction in selling price to be £50, did not accept that reduction in the selling price as being the true measure of damage. The test that he propounded is set out in his judgment in the following words: "The "test is the cost of putting the property into a condition in which a "reasonable tenant would be likely to take the house having "regard to its class, character and locality. Here we find a "reasonable tenant actually taking the premises but with certain "work actually done. The cost of this work I calculate at"—I substitute the figure which ultimately emerged as being the correct one—"£19 10s." Therefore, he limited the damage to £19 10s.

The issue between the parties before us, therefore, has been simply whether it should be the reduction in the selling price of £50 which the registrar found, and that the county court judge adopted, or whether it should be the lower sum of £19 10s. Mr. Drinkwater has supported the registrar's judgment, and is asking us to reverse the conclusion of the county court judge. He is supporting the registrar's judgment on two grounds. First, he submits, as I understand it, that, as the premises were actually relet, and as on the particular facts of this case the reletting was, so to speak, stipulated for before the tenancy ended, that is to say, the landlord said that he would not agree to a surrender of the tenancy unless he could succeed in reletting the premises, therefore what fell back into the landlord's hands, and what is properly described as the reversion, is the new lease, and that, as the new lease was let at the same rent, subject to the payment of £19 10s., £19 10s. is the diminution in the value of the reversion. I think that that argument is unsound. There must always be a notional moment of time, even if one lease immediately succeeds the other, in which the estate finds its way back into the hands of the landlord, and the value of the reversion is therefore the value of the freehold as it has come back into the hands of the landlord before he lets it out again. That that is what is intended by the meaning of "reversion" in this section of the Act is, I think, made clear by the judgment of Lawrence L.J. in Hanson v. Newman.[7] He referred to the words of the Act—"shall in no case exceed the amount (if any) by which "the value of the reversion (whether immediate or not) in the "premises is diminished"—and he said[8]: "The expression "'whether immediate or not' in the above passage, is I think "explained by reference to the case of Joyner v. Weeks,[9] to which "our attention has been called. . . . A reversion may not be a "reversion in possession (i.e., it may not be immediate) by reason "of the freeholder having granted a reversionary lease, and in "that case the reversionary lease is to be disregarded in assessing "the damages." That is dealing with the position in which the landlord has already got a reversionary lease before the termination of the one which is being considered for the purpose of dilapidations. But, in my judgment, the position must be exactly the same whether the second lease is granted before the completion of the first lease or after it. It still has to be disregarded, and what has to be ascertained as the value of the reversion is the value of the freehold.

Alternatively, Mr. Drinkwater argued that, if "reversion" must be given this meaning as the value of the freehold, nevertheless the lettable value of the freehold is something which ought to be taken into account in valuing the reversion. That raises the point, although in a more acute form, which I have already referred to, as to how far market values ought to be taken into account in cases of this sort. In one sense it can be said that the lettable value of a house is a good enough guide to what its capital value is, and, if that is all that is meant by the argument, then I see no objection to it. But in this matter of repairs it may assume a very different aspect. Take again the example which I quoted, £5,000 being the value of a house with £50 to be spent on repairs. If one considered lettable value—and taking 5 per cent. of £50, it is only £2 10s.—it is extremely improbable that any tenant will say, if he is asked to take it again for £250: "No, I am only going to pay £247 10s., because I shall have "to spend £50 on repairs to it." Moreover, the length of the proposed tenancy might affect the rent. So I should have thought that in general the rent which could have been obtained for the house is not any very valuable guide to the value of the reversion. But clearly, in the way in which the test has been applied by the registrar in this case, it is a wrong one, because he has taken an actual letting which plainly—I think it is clear from the terms

[7] [1934] Ch. 298; 50 T.L.R. 191, C.A.

[8] [1934] Ch. 298, 304, C.A.

[9] [1891] 2 Q.B. 31; 7 T.L.R. 509, C.A.

C. A.
1960
JAQUIN v. HOLLAND.
Devlin L.J.

of his judgment—was only effected because of the shortage and desirability of houses in Sevenoaks. He has found in terms that the diminution of the selling price is £50. If he finds that, notwithstanding that, the house can be relet at an expenditure of only £19 10s., he must be finding that other considerations besides the diminution in the value of the reversion are affecting the tenant's mind, those other considerations being the shortage and desirability of a house in Sevenoaks. Those considerations, in my judgment, must be extraneous to the true principle on which the value should be arrived at.

Therefore, I agree that the county court judge took the right view, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

GORMAN J. I agree, and I desire to say this only. It is quite obvious that the registrar gave the most careful consideration to this matter. The registrar said: "I am quite satisfied on the "authorities that the test is the cost of putting the property into "a condition in which a reasonable tenant would be likely to "take the house having regard to its class, character and "locality." There is no question, therefore, that he correctly applied the test laid down in Proudfoot v. Hart.[10] But where, in my view, the registrar went wrong is in the next three or four lines of his judgment. He said: "Here we find a reasonable "tenant actually taking the premises but with certain work "actually done. The cost of this work I calculate at "£25 11s. 2d."—which was later reduced to £19 10s. In my view, the registrar, having stated correctly the principle to be applied, went wrong in restricting the figure, in the circumstances of this case, to the amount of work which had actually been done before the tenant would take possession of this house.

I have nothing further to add.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Neve, Beck & Co. for W. H. House & Son, Sevenoaks; Vallis & Struthers, Sevenoaks.

[10] 25 Q.B.D. 42, C.A.

[COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEAL.]

C. C. A.
1959
May 26.
Lord Parker C.J., Cassels and Winn JJ.

* REGINA v. DANGERFIELD.

Justices—Quarter sessions—Jurisdiction—Sentence—Borstal training—Whether jurisdiction in addition to disqualify from driving—Criminal Justice Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 58), s. 20 (5) (a)—Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2, c. 55), s. 28.

[Reported by Miss E. CARYL-THOMAS, Barrister-at-Law.]

C. C. A.
1959
REG.
v.
DANGERFIELD.

Justices—Committal to quarter sessions—Best method—Young person—Desirability of committal under section 29*—Magistrates' Courts Act,* 1952, ss. 28, 29.

The appellant, who was aged 17, was convicted by a magistrates' court on two charges of taking and driving away a motor-vehicle without authority, and on three charges of driving a motor-vehicle while uninsured, and was committed under section 28 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, to quarter sessions for sentence. He was sentenced under section 20 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, to Borstal training and disqualified from holding or obtaining a driving licence for five years, in effect, concurrently in respect of each of the five charges. On appeal:—

Held, that on a committal to quarter sessions for sentence under section 28 of the Act of 1952, the powers of quarter sessions under section 20 (5) (a) of the Act of 1948,[1] were limited to sentencing to Borstal training or, alternatively, to dealing with the offender in any manner in which the court of summary jurisdiction might have done; accordingly, quarter sessions could not sentence to Borstal training and disqualification at the same time; however, it was within the power of quarter sessions to provide that on four of the charges this offender should be sentenced to Borstal training concurrently, and on the fifth charge the sentence should be one that the magistrates could have imposed, namely, disqualification; the sentence should be varied accordingly.

Per curiam. In the case of an offender of not less than 17 years of age convicted on a summary trial under section 18 (3) or 19 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, of an offence triable by quarter sessions, it is simpler to commit him for sentence under section 29 of the Act of 1952, which is a general committal, rather than section 28, which is limited to committal for Borstal training.

APPEAL against sentence.

The appellant, Terence Edwin Dangerfield, aged 17, was convicted on December 31, 1958, at the Acton Magistrates' Court, on two charges of taking and driving away a motor-vehicle without the consent of the owner or other lawful authority, contrary to section 28 of the Road Traffic Act, 1930, and on three charges of using a motor-vehicle without insurance, contrary to section 35 of the Act. He was committed to Middlesex Quarter Sessions under section 28 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, and was sentenced under section 20 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, to Borstal training and disqualified from holding or obtaining a driving licence for five years. He appealed against that sentence, the main ground of appeal being that quarter sessions had no jurisdiction under section 20 (5) of the Act of 1948 to impose a sentence of disqualification in addition to a sentence of Borstal training.

M. D. L. Worsley for the appellant.

[1] Criminal Justice Act, 1948, s. 20 (5): "Where an offender is so committed for sentence as aforesaid, the following provisions shall have effect, that is to say:—(a) the appeal committee or court of quarter sessions shall inquire into the circumstances of the case and may—(i) if satisfied of the matters mentioned in subs. (1) of this section, sentence him to Borstal training; or (ii) in any case, deal with him in any manner in which the court of summary jurisdiction might have dealt with him; . . ."

C. C. A.

1959

Reg.
v.
Dangerfield.

No cases were cited in argument.

Lord Parker C.J. delivered the following judgment of the court: The appellant was convicted at the Acton Magistrates' Court of taking and driving away a motor-cycle without authority or insurance. He was committed to Middlesex Sessions under section 28 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, and was then sentenced by the chairman under section 20 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, to Borstal training and disqualified for five years.

Two points are taken by Mr. Worsley on an appeal against that sentence, first, a point of law that, in fact, the sentence was in a form which is not permissible, and secondly, that in any case Borstal training and disqualification for five years is too severe a sentence.

The court sees no reason to interfere with the sentence of Borstal training as a matter of principle. The appellant is a young man 17 years of age. He has been on probation for larceny. He has been to an approved school for two larcencies in dwelling-houses, fined for obstructing the police, fined for common assault and again fined in August, 1958, for obstructing the police. It appears that he is a man of very hot temper, and he must learn to control it. The chairman thought, and indeed the magistrates must have thought because they committed him under section 28 of the Act of 1952, that Borstal training was the appropriate sentence for him. The court, having considered the matter, sees no reason to interfere. That is the question of principle.

The point of law that arises is this: The magistrates committed the appellant to sessions under section 28 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952. It is, the court thinks, perfectly clear that when that is done the powers of sessions under section 20 of the Act of 1948 are limited, as subsection (5) in effect says, to sentencing the man to Borstal training or—and it is an alternative—to dealing with him in any manner in which the court of summary jurisdiction might have dealt with him. Accordingly, it is said that sessions cannot at one and the same time sentence a man to Borstal training and disqualify him. That, the court feels, is perfectly clear; but in the present case there were no less than five charges, and although in form the sentence of the chairman is wrong because he, in effect, gave the sentence of Borstal training and disqualification in respect of each concurrently, yet it was within his power, and therefore within the power of this court, to provide that on four of the charges he should be sentenced to Borstal training concurrently, and that on the fifth charge the sentence should be one that the magistrates could have inflicted, namely, disqualification. Accordingly, this court will vary the sentence to one of Borstal training on four of the charges concurrently, and five years' disqualification on the other.

I would like to add one further matter which is so often overlooked. In the case of a young man of 17, as the appellant was, it is possible for magistrates to commit him under section 29 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952. That is a general committal, not merely for Borstal, and then under section 29 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1948, sessions will have complete power to deal with the matter and are not limited in the way they are where their powers are derived from section 20 of the Act. Accordingly, as this court has said before, magistrates should remember that in the case of a boy over 17 it is simpler to commit him under section 29, rather than under section 28, of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952.

Sentence varied.

Solicitor: Registrar, Court of Criminal Appeal.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1960
Feb. 12, 16, 17.
Cross J.

In re* ALFRED HERBERT LTD. PENSION AND LIFE ASSURANCE SCHEME'S TRUSTS.

ALFRED HERBERT LTD. v. HANCOCKS AND OTHERS.

[1959 A. No. 877.]

Pensions Scheme—Construction—Amendment—Reservation by employers of right to discontinue, suspend or amend in the event of "unforeseen circumstances"—Whether power to amend beneficial interests of employees.

Contract—Construction—Power to amend terms unilaterally—Pensions scheme—"Unforeseen circumstances."

In 1939 a company introduced a contributory scheme of pensions and life assurance for staff employees. In the booklet setting out the rules of the scheme, which was issued to all employees, it was stated: "Change of scheme. While the company has every hope "of maintaining its contributions to the scheme, the right is reserved "in the event of unforeseen circumstances to discontinue the "scheme . . . or suspend or amend it from time to time. . . ." It was provided that if a member of the scheme died while in the service of the company and before going on pension, the normal pension age being attained on March 1 nearest to the sixty-fifth birthday, the life assurance benefit would be paid and the whole of his contributions would be returned. By an amendment made in 1955 it was provided that on such event the life assurance benefit applicable immediately prior to normal pension age would be paid together with a cash sum equivalent in value to five years' payments of the pension which would have been payable had the employee retired on the date of death. Another amendment made in 1955, with a view to saving estate duty, enabled an employee to nominate a beneficiary to whom the death benefit might be paid if he survived the employee; if the employee left no nominated beneficiary surviving it would be payable to the widow or widower of the employee, and if the employee left neither nominated beneficiary nor widow or widower surviving it would be payable to the employee's estate. The nominated beneficiary was to be either the employee's wife, husband, ancestors, or descendants, or such other person as the company considered to have a moral claim on the employee.

1960

Herbert (Alfred) Ltd. v. Hancocks.

An employee joined the company in 1897; he was married in 1907. He joined the scheme and after March 1, 1951, when he attained the normal pension age, he continued to work for the company, although he made no more contributions. He made no nomination under the amendment of 1955. On December 31, 1957, he stopped working for the company but it was agreed that he should be regarded as remaining in the company's employment until March 31, 1958, when he would begin to draw his pension. On February 3, 1958, he made a will appointing the second and third defendants as his executors and on March 28, 1958, he died. There thus became payable life assurance and pension benefits.

On a summons to determine, inter alia, whether on the true construction of the booklet the 1955 amendment as to nomination of beneficiaries was valid, and, if not, whether the benefits were payable to the widow, or to the executors of the deceased employee:—

Held, that, on its construction, the "Change of scheme" clause must be limited to the company's part of the contract and did not enable the company to vary the beneficial interests of the employees, and that, therefore, in the absence of a further contract between the company and the employee, the amendment of the scheme as to nomination of beneficiaries was not binding on the employee.

Adjourned summons.

On March 1, 1939, the plaintiff company, Alfred Herbert Ltd., introduced a contributory scheme of pensions and life assurance for staff employees. A booklet, dated February, 1939, was issued to employees setting out the rules of the scheme, in which it was stated: "Change of scheme. While the company has every hope "of maintaining its contributions to the scheme, the right is "reserved in the event of unforeseen circumstances to discontinue "the scheme after six months' notice, or suspend or amend it "from time to time on any anniversary of the starting date, "without prejudice, however to the pension benefits secured by "contributions already paid. Should the scheme be discontinued "no part of the benefits secured by the group policies shall be "retained by the company." The rules provided that if a member of the scheme died while in the service of the company and before going on pension, the normal pension age being attained on March 1 nearest to the sixty-fifth birthday, the life assurance benefit would be paid and the whole of the member's contributions would be returned. Each member was to receive a certificate of membership. On the back of the certificate were five paragraphs dealing with pension benefits, life assurance benefit, disability benefits, options and continuance of benefits, each paragraph containing a reference to the booklet. By an amendment made in 1955 it was provided that if a member died while in the service of the company at or after normal pension age and before going on pension, the life assurance benefit applicable immediately prior to normal pension age would be paid, together with a cash sum equivalent in value to five years' payments of the pension which would have been payable had the employee retired on the date of death. Another amendment made in the same year provided that an employee might nominate a beneficiary to whom the death benefit described in the pension, death, disability, early retirement and late retirement clauses was to be payable, and, if the beneficiary survived the employee the benefit would be so paid; if the employee left no nominated beneficiary surviving the death benefit was to be payable to the employee's widow or widower, and if an employee left neither nominated beneficiary nor widow or widower surviving, to the employee's estate. The beneficiary for this purpose had to be one or more of the following persons: the employee's wife, husband, ancestors or descendants, or such other persons as the company considered to have a moral claim upon the employee. Nominations and revocations or alterations were subject to the consent of the company and had to be made on a special form. All employees who were members of the scheme were given copies of the amendments but they were not asked to sign any form of consent adopting them.

The deceased, Laurence Ambrose Hancocks, joined the service of the company in November, 1897. In August, 1907, he married the first defendant, Annie Manilla Hancocks, but they later became estranged and on May 22, 1931, she obtained an order against him for the restitution of conjugal rights. He joined the scheme at its commencement and received a certificate of membership; on March 1, 1951, he attained the normal pension age but he continued to work for the company although he made no further contributions to the scheme. He did not ask for a form of nomination under the amendment of 1955 and neither assented to nor dissented from the amendments. On December 31, 1957, he stopped working for the company but it was agreed between them that he should be regarded as remaining in the company's employment until March 31, 1958, when he would begin to draw his pension. On February 3, 1958, he made a will appointing the second and third defendants as his executors and he died on March 28, 1958. As a result of the scheme and the amendment there became payable sums representing the life assurance benefits derived exclusively from the company's contributions and the pension.

The company, as trustee of the scheme, took out a summons to determine whether, inter alia, on the true construction of the booklet and in particular of the "Change of scheme" paragraph, the 1955 amendment as to nomination of beneficiaries was valid, and, if not, whether the benefits were payable to the widow or to the executors of the deceased.

E. F. R. Whitehead for the company.
P. R. Oliver for the widow of the deceased.
A. C. Sparrow for the executors.

The following case was cited in argument: Tatem Ltd. v. Gamboa.[1]

[1] [1939] 1 K.B. 132; [1938] 3 All E.R. 135.

1960

Herbert (Alfred) Ltd. v. Hancocks.

Cross J. stated the facts substantially as set out above and continued: The problem I have to consider is whether the amendment in 1955 with regard to nomination and widows was binding on the deceased. This amendment was made partly, I think, in consequence of the decision in In re J. Bibby & Sons Ltd. Pensions Trust Deed,[1] when the company realised that if they made a change on these lines, the result would be that that part of the death benefit which resulted from the company's contribution would not be subject to estate duty if the deceased made a nomination or left a widow, as the deceased would not be competent to dispose of it, and there would be no benefit purchased or provided by the deceased accruing on his death under section 2 (1) (d) of the Finance Act, 1894. A further reason for the change was that under the practice of the Estate Duty Office, even part of the death benefit which had been purchased or provided by a member would not be aggregable with the rest of the estate in the event of his making a nomination or leaving a widow. Mr. Sparrow, on behalf of the executors, first argued that the scheme, that is to say, the contractual arrangement between the employees and the company, did not include the part of the booklet headed "Change of scheme." He argued that the terms of the scheme were to be found exclusively in the certificate issued and that only those parts of the booklet were incorporated in the scheme which were in fact referred to in the certificate. I cannot accept that argument. I cannot attach such paramount importance to the certificate which is merely evidence of the fact that the employee had become a member of the scheme. It is quite natural, I think, that it should have indorsed on the back of it some of the main provisions of the scheme. The mere fact that there is no reference on the back of the certificate to the "Change of scheme" clause in the booklet does not seem to me to be very striking or very important. After all, when the chairman and governing director sent out the booklet, he asked the employees to study it and fill in their forms of application after reading it. It sems to me that as there is no contradiction between the certificate and the booklet there is no reason whatever for saying that the "Change of scheme" provision in the booklet was not part of the scheme. Had there been a contradiction, had one found something in the certificate or in the policy which contradicted the booklet, very different considerations would have arisen; but as things are I see no reason for not holding that the "Change of "scheme" provision in the booklet applied to and bound the deceased.

On that footing, one has to consider whether on the true construction of this "Change of scheme" provision this amendment with regard to nominations and widows was binding on members who did not assent to it. It is to be remembered that the power of amendment under the "Change of scheme" provision was only to arise "in the event of unforeseen circumstances." It might, I suppose, be argued on a strict construction of those words that the realisation by the company in 1955 that they could obtain estate duty benefits for the employees by making that change was not an unforeseen circumstance. It was not something new which had happened since 1939, but was a possibility which always existed although the company did not realise it. Mr. Sparrow, however, did not contend that the realisation that this estate duty advantage could be obtained was not an unforeseen circumstance. His argument on this branch of the case was that, though in the abstract it was an unforeseen circumstance, it was not the sort of unforeseen circumstance which is envisaged by the "Change of "scheme" provision. He argued that those provisions really were inserted for the benefit of the company, and were only intended to reserve a right to the company to get out of its obligations to continue the scheme or to contribute as much to the scheme if it became unable or unwilling to go on, and that, on their true construction, they were not intended to enable the company to vary the beneficial interest of the employees or the destination of their benefits against their will. The clause is loosely drawn, and the point is not entirely an easy one, but on the whole, my view is that Mr. Sparrow is right.

[1] [1952] W.N. 402; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 297; [1952] 2 All E.R. 483.

The clause starts: "While the company has every hope of "maintaining its contributions to the scheme"—that seems to me to strike the keynote of the clause. The company are saying: "We hope we shall be able to carry on with the scheme and to go "on contributing but perhaps we shall not be able or willing to do "so." The clause continues: "The right is reserved . . ." I attach some importance to those words. It seems to me that they are more apt to point to a right that the company is retaining for its benefit than a power of amendment in the general interest of the beneficiaries which is what Mr. Oliver says is covered by this provision. It proceeds: "the right is reserved in the event of unfore-"seen circumstances to discontinue the scheme after six months' "notice or suspend or amend it from time to time." Mr. Oliver says those words are wide enough to cover, for example, not only the reduction of the company's contributions but also an amendment of the beneficial interest. If one concentrates on the word "amend" alone, that is true enough; but the clause continues "amend it from time to time on any anniversary of the starting "date without prejudice, however, to the pension benefits secured "by contributions already paid." That, again, seems to me to strike the same note as the opening words. The company are saying that anything that has been earned up to date for the employee either by his contributions or ours—at all events anything that can be called pension benefit—is to remain secured to him notwithstanding the amendment. The insertion of those words to which I have last referred suggests that the scope of the proposed change is limited to the company's part of the contract, and that it was not intended by this clause to enable the company to change the beneficial interests however much it thought reasonable that such changes would be in the interests of the beneficiaries. Mr. Oliver conceded, of course, that even on his construction, the company could not change the beneficial interests in any way. They could not, for example, say that half the death benefit shall be paid to the chairman of the company or anything like that. But he says that any change of beneficial interest which the company bona fide considered was in the interests of the employees could be made. He was prepared to say that, if the company had thought that the estate duty position required it, they could even have omitted the power of nomination; provided, however, that if a man left a widow inevitably the death benefit should go to her and only to the estate if he did not leave a widow. The company might assume that ninety-nine men out of a hundred, if they left widows, would want the widows to get the money, and so it would not be unreasonable to make that change. I cannot myself give so wide a construction to this clause.

1960

Herbert (Alfred) Ltd. v. Hancocks.

Cross, J.

Assuming that I was against Mr. Sparrow on this point, there would come the further question whether even so the amendment could be valid against the deceased because of the words "without "prejudice, however, to the pension benefits secured by contribu- "tions already paid." On that question Mr. Oliver submitted that here the amount of the benefits is not being changed but only their destination, and that those words do not assist Mr. Sparrow. Alternatively, he submitted that "pension benefits" mean simply the pension and do not cover any part of the death benefit—either the life assurance part, or the return contributions, or a sum equivalent to a five years' pension. Had I been in favour of Mr. Oliver on the main point, I think that there would have been a great deal to be said for his argument on this point, but it is not necessary for me to arrive at any definite conclusion, because I have decided on the main point that this amendment was not capable of binding the deceased without his consent, and no one has suggested that he became bound by it by consenting to it in any way. In my judgment the 1955 amendments were not binding on the deceased.

There remains another point which I do not think the evidence enables me to determine, namely, if the amendment had not been made, then under the scheme as it stood the deceased's estate would only have been entitled to the life assurance benefits of £1,100 provided by the company and a return of the contributions. It is agreed that the sum of £2,040, five years' pension, the changed figure introduced by the 1955 amendments, is substantially more than the return of the contributions. Mr. Oliver argues that, even if he is wrong on the main point, Mr. Sparrow cannot have it both ways. He cannot both reject the 1955 amendments, so far as they relate to nominations and widows, and claim the benefit of the difference between the contributions and the five years' pension benefit. At first blush I think there is considerable force in that argument, but I think it may depend to some extent on what the practice of the company was before the 1955 amendments were made, whether these additional payments were covered by the insurance policy, when they became so covered, and whether the company paid any increased premiums in respect of them. This was not a point envisaged on the taking out of the summons, and I do not think that the evidence is sufficient to enable me to decide it.

Order accordingly.
Defendants' costs to be taxed on a common fund basis.

Solicitors: Warren, Murton & Co. for Pinsent & Co., Birmingham; Joynson-Hicks & Co. for R. A. Rotherham & Co., Coventry; Julius White & Bywaters for Penman, Johnson & Ewins, Coventry.

M. G. T.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

*ISAACS AND OTHERS v. MARKET BOSWORTH RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL.

1960
Jan. 18, 19.

Lord Parker C.J., Cassels and Ashworth JJ.

Rating—"Social welfare"—Organisation whose purpose is advanced—Trade union or trustees—Convalescent home and home for the aged—Trustees subject to strict control by executive council of union—Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 9), s. 8 (1) (a).

A hereditament consisting of buildings and grounds used as a convalescent home and home for old people was vested in trustees. The benefits of the homes were confined to the members of a trade union and their wives. The main objects of the union were not concerned with charity or the advancement of social welfare, but subsidiary objects included the provision of benefits of the type provided by the homes. The affairs and business of the union were administered by its executive council. The trustees were appointed under a trust deed which showed that they were subject to strict control by the executive council, which was empowered to exercise supervision and control of the management of the homes and to make rules for their day-to-day running. The trustees consisted of two officers and the trustees of the union, a trustee chosen by a ballot of union members and a trustee appointed by the executive council. The funds for the purchase of the land in and the erection of the buildings on the hereditament were largely provided by the union, and the union made a substantial annual grant to the trustees for the purposes of the administration of the homes. Alterations of the trust deed could be made only with the approval of the executive council.

On appeal by the rating authority against a decision of quarter sessions that the hereditament was entitled to rating relief under

---

[Reported by GROVE HULL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

1960

Isaacs
v.
Market
Bosworth
R. D. C.

section 8 of the Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955 [1]:—

Held, that the organisation for the purposes of which the hereditament was occupied was the trade union and not the trustees, and that, in consequence, the hereditament was not entitled to rating relief.

Dicta of Lord Simonds and Lord Denning in Skegness Urban District Council v. Derbyshire Miners' Welfare Committee [1959] A.C. 807, 823, 827; [1959] 2 W.L.R. 717; [1959] 2 All E.R. 258, H.L.(E.). applied.

Case stated by Leicester county justices sitting in quarter sessions at Leicester.

By a notice dated May 29, 1957, the respondents, the trustees of "Natsopa Memorial Homes" (hereafter referred to as "the "trustees"), appealed to quarter sessions under section 4 of the Poor Relief Act, 1743, against a rate made by the appellant rating authority on or about April 1, 1956, in respect of the financial year 1956–57 and further against the demand for payment thereon and the refusal of the rating authority in connection therewith to afford the trustees the relief to which the trustees claimed to be entitled under section 8 of the Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955, in respect of a hereditament at Bosworth Road, Wellesborough.

The justices heard the appeal on July 22 and 26, 1957, and found (inter alia) the following facts. The trustees were the trustees of a trust deed dated September 27, 1920, the trusts of which were varied by (inter alia) a deed of variation dated December 6, 1948. The hereditament was vested in the trustees in fee simple upon the trusts contained in the trust deed (as varied), and consisted of buildings and the grounds thereof used as a convalescent home and home for old people. The history and present operation of the homes was set forth in a pamphlet annexed to the case stated. The buildings included an administrative block, a dining hall, bedrooms, a conference hall, a sick bay, a chapel, accommodation for old people, and the necessary buildings for a laundry and other services.

Save for two unimportant exceptions, the homes were conducted for the benefit of members of the National Society of Operative Printers and Assistants ("Natsopa"—hereafter referred to as "the society") and their wives. The society was a registered trade union whose members were generally employed in the printing trade. A copy of the rules of the society was annexed to the case stated. The society had approximately 43,000 members in England and Wales. The affairs and business of the society were administered by its executive council, subject to the control and direction of the governing council of the society. The objects of the society were set forth in rule 2 of its rules. The main objects were concerned with conditions of employment and industrial disputes, but there were further objects referred to below.

[1] Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955, s. 8: "(1) This section applies to the following hereditaments, that is to say—(a) any hereditament occupied "for the purposes of an organisation "(whether corporate or unincorporate) "which is not established or conducted "for profit and whose main objects "are charitable or are otherwise concerned with the advancement of . . . "social welfare . . ."

The moneys for the erection and establishment of the homes were provided by the society, its members and friends. The trustees at the time of the hearing received an annual sum of £18,000 from the society, representing a contribution of 2d. per member per week. The trustees received some additional income from investments, the sale of garden produce and the Natsopa Co-operative Society, which ran a shop at the homes. The balance sheet showed an excess of income over expenditure for the year ending December 31, 1955, of £605.

There was convalescent accommodation at the home, for some 60 to 69 members of the society or members' wives, including members not recovering from illness but in need of a period of residence to prevent a breakdown of health. Applicants were normally admitted for a period of three weeks. Applications for admission in accordance with the society's rules were supported by a doctor's certificate. Only those qualifying under the rules were regarded as entitled to admission, but in practice there were sufficient vacancies for all such applicants, and applicants who were not qualified under the rules, e.g., members with less than 12 months' membership of the society, were sometimes admitted.

At all material times it had been the practice to hold at the homes the annual governing council meeting of the society lasting four days and attended by some 90 delegates, and two meetings of the executive council of the society of two days each, attended by some 30 members. Accommodation had been provided for persons attending these meetings at the homes at cost, but in future these meetings would be held elsewhere.

The trust deed dated September 27, 1920, set out the trusts on which the trustees held the hereditament. The primary purpose of the purchase was shown by the deed to be the provision of a memorial for the members of the society who fell in the First World War, but there were secondary purposes which included the provision of a convalescent home for members of the society recovering from illness of any kind and the provision of a home for aged members of the society who were no longer able to support themselves by working at their trade, and for their wives.

The rules referred to above included provisions as follows. Rule 2: "The objects of the society shall be . . . (h) to provide "superannuation for old members, and for members of the staff "or employees of the society. (i) To provide and maintain a "convalescent home for the benefit of members and wives." Rule 10: ". . . (3) The governing council shall have supreme "control and management of all the affairs and officers of the "society, and its decisions shall be final and binding upon all "members. (4) The powers of the governing council shall include

1960

Isaacs
v.
Market
Bosworth
R. D. C.

"the following . . . (i) do all things necessary in connection with "the management of the Memorial Home."

It was contended on behalf of the trustees that the hereditament was occupied by the trustees; that they were an unincorporated body established for the purposes of a war memorial and convalescent home for aged people; that in the "non-technical" sense the homes were a charitable or benevolent institution and there was an element of benevolence or bounty in the subscriptions which were contributed to the home; that the trustees were, by virtue of the deed of 1920, incapable of making a profit and were therefore a body not established or conducted for profit; that the benefits of the homes were provided for a section of the community consisting of the relevant branches of the printing trade; and that the main objects of the trustees were concerned with the advancement of social welfare.

It was contended on behalf of the rating authority that the hereditament was occupied for the purposes of the society; that under the provisions of the deed of 1920 and the rules of the society and in practice the homes were under the control of the society; that the objects of the society concerned with the provision of benefits were not its main objects; that the objects of the society in providing the benefits were not concerned with social welfare but were akin to those of an insurance company or friendly society; that the main objects of the society were not within section 8 of the Act; that if the hereditament were occupied for the purposes of the trustees, their main object was not concerned with the advancement of social welfare; and that the trustees could not be regarded as neither established nor conducted for profit.

The justices were of opinion that the hereditament was occupied by the trustees for the purposes of a memorial convalescent home and old people's homes; that the trust was not established nor were the homes and premises conducted for profit; that the main objects of the trust were the advancement of social welfare; and that accordingly section 8 of the Act applied to the hereditament. The justices, accordingly, allowed the trustees' appeal. The rating authority appealed.

F. A. Amies and R. St. G. Calvocoressi for the trustees.
S. W. Templeman for the rating authority.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument upon the point decided: Smith, Stone & Knight Ltd. v. Birmingham Corporation[2]; In re Amos, Carrier v. Price.[3]

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 19. Lord Parker C.J. I will ask Ashworth J. to give the first judgment.

[2] [1939] 4 All E.R. 116. [3] [1891] 3 Ch. 159; 7 T.L.R. 559.

ASHWORTH J. This is an appeal by way of case stated from a decision of the court of general quarter sessions for the county of Leicester, sitting at Leicester. The present appellants, who were the respondents in the court below, are the Market Bosworth Rural District Council, and the present respondents are conveniently referred to as the trustees of Natsopa Memorial Homes. Natsopa is the condensed title of the National Society of Operative Printers and Assistants, which is a well-known trade union; I shall refer to it as the society. In the court below the trustees appealed against a rate made by the rating authority, contending that the premises in question fell within the ambit of section 8 (1) (a) of the Rating and Valuation (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1955. The trustees were successful, hence the present appeal.

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] Throughout the deed of 1920 there are frequent references to the executive council, and it is, in my view, plain that the trustees are subject to strict control by that body. As examples, I refer to clauses 6 and 8. Clause 6 provides: "The home shall be managed by the "trustees under and subject to the direction and control of the "executive council," and goes on: "The executive council may "appoint a management committee consisting of not more than "10 or less than three persons being members of the society "whether members of the executive council or not to supervise "and control the management of the home . . ." Clause 8 provides: "The executive council shall have full power to make "rules and regulations dealing with all or any of the following "matters," and without setting them out they are incidental matters relating to the general day-to-day management of the home, such as the engagement and dismissal of officers and servants, the rights, duties, remuneration and terms of employment of such officers and servants and the qualification and selection of inmates. Lastly, there is a composite clause in these words: "Any other matters relating to the management discipline and "good government of the home."

The link between the executive council and the trustees which appears from that first deed is, in my view, further emphasised by the provisions contained in the deed of 1948, which provided a new clause 13 as to the appointment of trustees. Clause 13 (i) now reads: "The present trustees are the two trustees of the "society the president of the society, the general secretary of the "society one trustee chosen by the members of the society by "ballot and one trustee being a member of the society appointed "by resolution of the executive council . . ." Moreover, by this same deed a further sub-clause was added to clause 13 in these words: "The trustees shall nominate for the decision of the "executive council one of their number to be designated 'con-"'troller' of the memorial home services and such controller "shall act for and on behalf of all the trustees in all matters

1960

Isaacs
v.
Market
Bosworth
R. D. C.

Ashworth J.

"relating to the day to day administration of the memorial "home."

There is one further provision in the old deed to which reference should be made, and that is contained in clause 14, namely: "It shall be lawful for the trustees from time to time by deed "with the approval of the executive council to make such altera-"tions variations and modifications of the trusts powers and "provisions of these presents as having regard to the experience "acquired in the administration of the trust and the circum-"stances of the time may seem to be necessary desirable or "expedient but so that no such alteration variation or modification "shall in any way prejudice or affect the main object of the trust "namely the establishment and maintenance of the Natsopa "Memorial Home for the purposes hereinbefore expressed."

The governing council is dealt with in rule 10 of the rules, and by sub-rule (3) it is provided: "The governing council shall have "supreme control and management of all the affairs and officers "of the society, and its decisions shall be final and binding upon "all members." By sub-rule (4) (i) the powers of the governing council are made to include the following: "Do all things "necessary in connection with the management of the memorial "home." It is not necessary to refer in detail to the rules dealing with the home.

One further document was exhibited to the case, namely, the pamphlet describing the history and present operation of the homes, and there are the following statements in it which, in my view, are of considerable importance: "The necessary funds "for the purchase of the land and erection and equipment of the "building were raised by a grant of £1,000 from the society's "general fund, by a levy on the membership spread over three "years and by voluntary donations from friends. In the first "three years the levy produced £24,876, and voluntary donations "to date amount to £29,596. Maintenance was provided by "allocating to the home fund a percentage of each member's "weekly contribution to the society. The purposes of the homes "were set out in a trust deed dated September 27, 1920, which "placed the property in the possession of a board of trustees. "To ensure that the property was always to be used for the "purpose for which it had been created the deed provides," and then are set out four summary statements of the provisions. There follows this paragraph: "It will therefore be noted that the "property though vested in several trustees, is at the same time "under the complete authority of the executive council and is "created as a permanent memorial." That seems to me to emphasise still further the very close link which connects the trustees with the society.

I now turn to section 8 (1) of the Act of 1955. That reads as follows: "This section applies to the following "hereditaments, that is to say—(a) any hereditament occupied " for the purposes of an organisation (whether corporate or unin-

" corporate) which is not established or conducted for profit and
" whose main objects are charitable or are otherwise concerned " with the advancement of religion, education or social wel" fare . . . " I should state that it was not suggested that either the trustees or the society are an organisation established or conducted for profit, and that issue does not enter into this case.

The rating authority contend, first, that the organisation for the purposes of which the hereditament is occupied is the society, and that its main objects do not fall within the types mentioned in paragraph (a) of the subsection. Secondly, the rating authority contend that, even if the trustees are to be regarded as the organisation occupying the hereditament, the main object of the trustees is the provision of the convalescent home for the society, and their main objects do not fall within the qualifying types.

Section 8 of the Act has already been before the courts in a number of cases, and has at least twice been considered in the House of Lords, namely, in National Deposit Friendly Society Trustees v. Skegness Urban District Council [1] and Skegness Urban District Council v. Derbyshire Miners' Welfare Committee.[2]

So far as the first of the rating authority's contentions is concerned, it is, in my view, clear that one of the crucial issues is the question: What is the organisation for the purposes of which the hereditament is occupied? In the Derbyshire Miners' case Lord Simonds said [3]: " My Lords, I turn again to the relevant " section and note first the curious wording ' occupied for the " ' purposes of an organisation . . . whose main objects,' etc.
" It is by no means clear to me what is the ' organisation ' whose " main objects have to be considered. Is it the ' Social Welfare " ' Organisation ' set up under the Act of 1952 to which I have " already referred? Or is it the body of trustees who appear in " fact to manage the holiday centre, or is it a committee, whether " the Miners' Welfare Committee which has been mentioned or " some other committee? It is not a satisfactory way of disposing " of the case, but I see no alternative to saying that, whatever the " ' organisation ' may be, its main object is nothing else than the " provision of a holiday centre such as is described in the case.
" If so, the question is whether such a provision is concerned with " the advancement of social welfare." Lord Denning said [4]:
" Such being the facts, if I were asked: ' For what purpose is
" ' the land used? Is it used " for the advancement of social " ' " welfare " ? ' I should probably say ' Yes.' But I would " hasten to point out that the question is not ' For what purpose
" ' is the land used? ' The question is: ' For whose purpose is it " ' used? ' or more accurately: ' For the purposes of what " ' organisation is it used, or rather occupied? ' Many a holiday

[1] [1959] A.C. 293; [1958] 3 W.L.R. 172; [1958] 2 All E.R. 601.
[2] [1959] A.C. 807; [1959] 2 W.L.R. 711; [1959] 2 All E.R. 258.
[3] [1959] A.C. 807, 823.
[4] Ibid. 827.

1960

Isaacs
v.
Market
Bosworth
R. D. C.

Ashworth J.

"camp is used for similar purposes to this one. The holiday camps of Messrs. Butlin provide holidays at low cost for people who could not otherwise afford them, but they do not obtain relief from rates on this score. The reason is because that organisation does not qualify under section 8 (1) (a). Again, many convalescent homes obtain relief, but only if the relevant organisation qualifies. The convalescent home in National Deposit Friendly Society Trustees v. Skegness Urban District Council[5] did not get relief, because the friendly society did not qualify. And I would add that it is not always right to take the occupier and treat him as the 'organisation.' In the case of a members' club, the committee of management occupy the club house, but it is occupied, not for the purposes of the committee-men, but for the purposes of the club itself. The relevant organisation is the club itself—the unincorporated association—and in order to get relief from rates, the club itself must qualify under section 8 (1) (a)." It is to be noted that section 8 (1) (a) contains no reference to the occupier himself nor, as Lord Denning pointed out, does the section refer to the purpose of the occupation. In order to qualify for relief an occupier must show that his occupation is for the purposes of an organisation falling within the qualifying conditions.

In the course of what, if I may so, was a careful and persuasive argument, Mr. Templeman contended for the trustees that it was unnecessary to look beyond them since they are in fact the occupiers. He contended that they were an unincorporated organisation, and that their occupation was for the purposes set out in the trust deed, and that their main objects were either charitable, or at least concerned with the advancement of social welfare. He conceded that if the trustees could properly be described as bare trustees the relevant organisation would be the society, and that, as indeed is found in the case stated, their main objects were not such as to fall within the subsection; but he urged that these trustees are not bare trustees, and that they would have no right to act outside the powers and duties set out in the deed even if the executive council directed them to do so. In my view, the fact that contravention of the provisions of the trust deed may and, no doubt, would be prevented, does not provide conclusive evidence that the trustees are themselves the organisation for whose purposes the hereditament is occupied. For myself, I think that the approach suggested on behalf of the trustees is somewhat narrow, and that it does not take sufficiently into account the relevant operative words of the section "for the purposes of an organisation." If one keeps in mind the following factors: first, the provisions of the deed; secondly, the constitution of the trustees; thirdly, the rules of the society and, fourthly, the statements in the pamphlet—there is, in my view, cogent evidence to show that the organisation for the purposes of which the hereditament is occupied is, indeed, the society. I would go further: In my judgment the evidence on this first issue does not admit of any other conclusion but that the organisation for the purposes of which the hereditament is occupied is the society, and on this ground, in my view, the appeal should suceed. In these circumstances, I do not think it necessary to embark upon a discussion of the other issue, namely, whether occupation for the purposes of the trustees would itself justify a claim for relief.

[5] [1959] A.C. 293.

CASSELS J. I agree.

LORD PARKER C.J. I agree and have nothing to add.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors: Robinson & Bradley for Thomas Flavell & Sons, Hinckley; Shaen, Roscoe & Co.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

* HESZ v. SOTHEBY & CO.

1960
Feb. 4, 5;
March 1, 2.

Master
Diamond.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Open Court — Proceedings in — Master — Reference under R.S.C., Ord. 36B, rr. 2, 6.

The plaintiff issued a writ for the return of a picture which had been lost by auctioneers to whom he had taken it to be sold. On proceedings for summary judgment under R.S.C., Ord. 14, Master Lawrence gave the plaintiff leave to sign judgment for the return of the picture or its value, and damages to be assessed.

On February 4, 1960, Master Diamond began the hearing of the reference to assess the value of the picture and the damages.

Stephen Terrell for the plaintiff.
Robin Dunn for the defendants.

Feb. 4. Counsel pointed out that there were members of the public present in the room.

MASTER DIAMOND. This is a public proceeding.

Solicitors: Pritchard, Englefield & Co.; Farrer & Co.

[Reported by Miss EIRA CARYL-THOMAS, Barrister-at-Law.]

[BRISTOL ASSIZES.]

1959
Nov. 10, 11, 26.

Devlin J.

* PARKER AND ANOTHER v. CLARK AND ANOTHER.

[1958 P. No. 2349.]

Contract—Formation—Intention to create legal relationship—Family arrangement—Sharing home—Agreement by plaintiffs to leave their own home and share home of defendants and by defendants to devise their house to female plaintiff.

Contract—Termination—Family agreement—Sharing home—Promise of bequest by owners—Whether agreement for their lives.

Vendor and Purchaser—Contract—Memorandum in writing—Offer in writing—Loss of letter of acceptance—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. 5, c. 20), s. 40 (1).

The defendants, C. and Mrs. C., were an elderly retired married couple who, in 1955, were living in a large house which C. owned, called "Cramond." The female plaintiff, Mrs. P., was Mrs. C.'s niece, and lived with the male plaintiff, P., her husband, who had also retired, in their cottage, "The Thimble." The plaintiffs were 20 years younger than the defendants.

The defendants had very little domestic service and were not in good health, and the plaintiffs, with whom they were on very friendly terms, used often to visit them at "Cramond," sometimes with the object of assisting them when they were unwell. At the conclusion of one of these visits, C. suggested to P. that the plaintiffs should "come and live with us." P. later wrote to say that the plaintiffs approved of the idea, but that it would mean selling "The Thimble." On September 25, 1955, C. replied in a letter which was produced at the trial, saying that the major difficulty about what was to happen to "The Thimble" could be solved by his leaving "Cramond" and its contents to Mrs. P., her sister and her daughter, after the death of himself and Mrs. C. C. set out the maintenance expenses of "Cramond" (about £200) and continued: "If we go fifty-fifty on maintenance of house it would "cost you half of the £200 odd as set out and half the running "expense of food, drinks, etc., but I think it would be fair if your "share of the £200 was the same as you now pay at the "'Thimble' if it is less than £200. I would pay for a daily "woman four mornings a week, have a T.V. and a new car. You "could sell out and pay off your mortgage and invest proceeds to "increase your income. I hope your family vote for or against this "will be unanimous." P. replied in a letter which was not preserved, saying that he accepted C.'s offer and would sell "The "Thimble."

P. then sold "The Thimble" and on March 1, 1956, the plaintiffs moved to "Cramond." Later in 1957, however, C. told P. that the partnership was not working, and that the plaintiffs would have to find some other place to live.

On a claim for damages for breach of the agreement contained in the letter of September 25, 1955:—

Held, (1) that the language of the letter of September 25, 1955, and the reply thereto, taken with the surrounding circumstances, showed that the parties intended to enter into an agreement in the terms of the letter which was binding in law, and not a mere unenforceable family arrangement (post, p. 294).

[Reported by Grove Hull, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

Balfour v. Balfour [1919] 2 K.B. 571; 35 T.L.R. 609 distinguished.

Synge v. Synge [1894] 1 Q.B. 466; 10 T.L.R. 194; and dictum of Lord Lyndhurst L.C. in Hammersley v. De Biel (1845) 12 Cl. & Fin. 45, 78 applied.

(2) That, having regard to the exceptional circumstances of the defendants' age and state of health, there was sufficient in the language of the letter to show it was a term of the agreement that the plaintiffs should reside at "Cramond" for the period of the defendants' lives (post, p. 295).

(3) That the letter of September 25, 1955, was a sufficient note or memorandum in writing of the agreement to satisfy the provisions of section 40 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925,[1] since, although the agreement was not in existence when it was signed, its language showed an intention to contract and amounted to a contractual offer (post, p. 296).

Smith v. Neale (1857) 2 C.B.N.S. 67; and Reuss v. Picksley (1866) L.R. 1 Ex. 342 applied.

Dictum of Fry J. in Munday v. Asprey (1880) 13 Ch.D. 855, 857 not followed.

(4) That the defendants were, accordingly, in breach of contract; that P. and Mrs. P. were jointly entitled to damages for the loss of the value of the benefits of living at "Cramond" during the joint lives of the defendants; and that Mrs. P. was entitled to damages for the loss of prospect of inheriting a share in "Cramond" under C.'s will.

ACTION.

The plaintiffs, Dudley Alfred Parker and his wife Madeline Kate Parker, claimed damages in this action against the defendants, Herbert Thomas Clark and his wife Jane Edith Constance Clark, for breach of a contract made between the parties, in or about September, 1955.

By their statement of claim the plaintiffs alleged: (1) that it was agreed between the parties: (a) that the plaintiffs should cease to occupy and should dispose of their interest in a dwelling-house known as "The Thimble"; (b) that the plaintiffs should occupy jointly with the defendants and reside at a dwelling-house owned by the defendants, known as "Cramond," for the period of the lifetime of the survivor of the defendants; (c) that the parties should share the running costs of "Cramond"; (d) that the defendants should purchase a television set and a new car for the joint use of the parties; (e) that the defendants should make a valid and binding testamentary disposition giving "Cramond" and its contents jointly to Mrs. Parker, her daughter and sister; (2) that in pursuance of this agreement the plaintiffs performed their obligations under sub-paragraphs (a), (b) and (c),

[1] Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 40: "(1) No action may be brought "upon any contract for the sale or "other disposition of land or any "interest in land, unless the agree-"ment upon which such action is "brought, or some memorandum or "note thereof, is in writing, and "signed by the party to be charged "or by some other person thereunto "by him lawfully authorised."

1959

Parker
v.
Clark.

above, and the defendants performed their obligations under sub-paragraph (d), above; (3) that, in or about October, 1957, the defendants repudiated the agreement by wrongfully giving the plaintiffs notice to quit "Cramond" and determining the agreement, and by refusing to comply with sub-paragraph (e), above. The plaintiffs claimed damages in respect of this repudiation.

The defendants, by their defence, denied that they had made the agreement. They admitted that the plaintiffs resided at "Cramond" between March, 1956, and December, 1957, but denied the plaintiffs' other allegations. Further, they pleaded that the alleged agreement was not in writing and that there was no sufficient note or memorandum in writing thereof to satisfy the provisions of section 40 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925. Finally, the defendants pleaded that if the alleged agreement had been made, it was determined by the plaintiffs, or alternatively pursuant to an agreement, express or to be implied from all the circumstances, made in or about October, 1957, between the first plaintiff and the first defendant.

The following statement of facts is taken in substance from the judgment: The male defendant was a retired civil servant who owned a large house called "Cramond" in Torquay, where, in 1955, he lived with his wife. He was then aged 77 and his wife was 78. They had no children. Mrs. Parker, the female plaintiff, was Mrs. Clark's niece. Commander Parker, her husband, had retired from the Royal Navy and in 1955 lived with Mrs. Parker in a cottage which he owned, called "The Thimble," at Mayfield in Sussex.

The Parkers were on very friendly terms with the Clarks and visited them from time to time. Sometimes the invitations were in the nature of an S O S, as the Clarks were not in very good health and had little or no domestic service. On September 18, 1955, the Parkers were leaving "Cramond" after a visit when Mr. Clark suddenly proposed to Commander Parker that the Parkers should join forces and live with them. The words used were: "Come and live with us," and Commander Parker assumed, although the word "permanently" was not used, that that was what was meant.

The Parkers liked the idea, but Commander Parker was satisfied that it meant selling "The Thimble"; he was not prepared to let it. Accordingly, a few days later, he wrote to Mr. Clark, saying that if they came to live in Torquay they would have to get rid of their cottage. Mr. Clark replied in a letter dated September 25 in the following terms:

"My dear Dudley, Many thanks for your letter. The major "difficulty re what is to happen to the 'Thimble' can be solved "by our leaving 'Cramond' and its major contents (insured for "£3,000 and £3,000) to Madeline [Mrs. Parker], Mavis [her "sister] and Pamela [the Parkers' daughter] when we both pass "away and if you cannot maintain it they can sell out. Its "present value is £9,000 to £12,000 without contents. Maintenance at present costs Elect. £50, Tele. £10, Coal £21, Rates £113 13s. 4d., Water £8 11s. 4d. Total: £203 4s. 8d. My pension is £700 per annum and Connie [Mrs. Clark] has an annuity of £300 p.a. If I pass away Connie gets £300 widow's pension. This all disappears as we pass away. But I have some War Loan out of which I pay income tax and eventually death duties. The War Loan goes to my surviving brother and sisters. If we go fifty-fifty on maintenance of house it would cost you half of the £200 odd as set out and half the running expense of food, drinks, etc., but I think it would be fair if your share of the £200 was the same as you now pay at the 'Thimble' if it is less than £200. I would pay for a daily woman four mornings a week, have a T.V. and a new car. You could sell out and pay off your mortgage and invest proceeds to increase your income. I hope your family vote for or against this will be unanimous. B. & C."

On September 30 Commander Parker replied in a letter which was not preserved, saying that he accepted Mr. Clark's generous offer; that the family vote was unanimously in favour; and that he would dispose of "The Thimble." The Parkers then acted upon the arrangement and sold "The Thimble" for £3,900. Of this money £945 was used to pay off a secured advance and out of the balance £2,000 was lent to their daughter Pamela to enable her to buy a flat. Commander Parker told Mr. Clark what he had done and said that he could not call in the loan without dispossessing his daughter.

On March 1, 1956, the Parkers moved to "Cramond." They took with them enough furniture for the bedroom they were to occupy and also a few other pieces; the rest was stored. They found that Mr. Clark had engaged a daily woman and bought a television set, as he had promised. Shortly after their arrival Mrs. Clark told Mrs. Parker that the Clarks had decided not to charge the Parkers with their share of the rates. Apart from this, all the household expenses were shared. Housekeeping tasks and gardening were shared by the Parkers and the Clarks, and most of the work was done by the Parkers. Soon after the Parkers' arrival Mr. Clark, as promised in the letter of September 25, bought a new car. Neither of the Clarks drove, so that all the driving was done by Commander Parker. Mr. Clark paid all the running expenses, except that when the Parkers used the car for their own purposes they paid for the petrol.

About the time when he bought the car, Mr. Clark told Commander Parker that he would give the Parkers each £400 in order to save death duties on £800, but nothing came of this.

In August, 1956, Mr. Clark told Commander Parker that the car was a luxury and that he proposed to lay it up and then sell it. The Commander said that this was unreasonable, and reminded him of what he had said in the letter of September 25. Early in 1957 Mr. Clark made a will. He did not consult a

1959

Parker
v.
Clark.

solicitor, but made it out on a form. He stated in evidence that the will was in accordance with the terms of his letter of September 25, and left "Cramond" to the three beneficiaries there named, including Mrs. Parker. He later destroyed this will, but shortly after made another similar one. Commander Parker told Mr. Clark that he thought that it was unsatisfactory that the will was made on a purchased form and without legal guidance, and was not kept in a place of safety. Mr. Clark said nothing. In July, 1957, Mr. Clark told Commander Parker that he was considering selling "Cramond." The Commander said that this would mean that the Parkers would be without a home. Mr. Clark said nothing.

By the autumn of 1957 Mr. Clark had begun to regret the arrangement whereunder he had taken the Parkers into his home. Matters first came to a head on October 24 when, after another discussion about the car, Mr. Clark told Commander Parker that he thought the partnership was not working and that the Parkers would have to find some other place to live. Commander Parker protested strongly. He consulted a solicitor on November 1, and as the result of the advice which he received asked Mr. Clark to put on paper that he had told them to leave "Cramond." Mr. Clark replied that "Cramond" was not a common lodging-house. Commander Parker decided that he would make his contribution to the rates. He calculated that if he paid £41 5s. 4d., it would bring his total contribution up to what he had been paying at "The Thimble," which Mr. Clark had said in his letter of September 25 was to be its limit, and on November 4 he tendered a cheque for that amount to Mr. Clark, which Mr. Clark refused.

About the middle of November Mr. Clark asked Commander Parker when they intended to leave. The Commander replied that they had no intention of leaving and that he would have to have them evicted. Mr. Clark said: "There are other ways of "getting you out." About this time, Mr. Clark offered to pay the Parkers their expenses incurred in leaving "Cramond" and finding another place to live, and said that for this purpose he would set aside £150. Commander Parker told Mr. Clark that he did not trust him and would not accept his offer. A little later Mr. Clark offered, in addition to the £150, that he would pay for the expenses that the Parkers had incurred in moving their furniture to "Cramond," as well as the expenses for taking it away, and Commander Parker refused.

By the beginning of December the Parkers found the atmosphere unbearable and they decided that they would have to leave. Commander Parker told Mrs. Clark that they would accept Mr. Clark's last offer. She gave them a cheque for £150, and he handed to her the bill he had received for the furniture removal from Mayfield to Torquay and said that he would send the other bill when it arrived. On December 9 the Parkers left "Cramond." On January 7, 1958, Commander Parker wrote a friendly letter to Mrs. Clark in which he sent the further bill for the furniture.

There was no talk of any legal action, though Commander Parker described their situation as "anything but pleasant," and said that they felt very bitter over the loss of their cottage. The bills for the furniture removals were not discharged by the Clarks. No further action was taken by the plaintiffs until August 20, 1958, when a solicitor's letter was sent to the defendants putting forward a claim substantially in the terms of the statement of claim in the present action. No reply was received and on November 13, 1958, the writ was issued.

C. L. Hawser Q.C. and P. E. Lewis for the plaintiffs.
Hugh Park for the defendants.

November 26. DEVLIN J. read the following judgment: The plaintiffs in this case are suing on an unusual sort of contract. They are a married couple and they are suing another married couple upon an allegation that the defendants repudiated a contract whereunder the two couples were to share the running costs of the defendants' house, and whereunder the defendants' house was to be left by will in a manner that benefited the plaintiffs and their relatives. Such contracts are not easily proved in fact, and when proved are likely to run into legal difficulties such as those that are created by section 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925. This is the case here. Fortunately the facts are clear. There is not much conflict of evidence and, where there is, I have no hesitation in preferring that of the plaintiffs and their witnesses. The defendant couple are very old and are not very reliable. The plaintiffs gave their evidence very satisfactorily. In all relevant matters they told the truth carefully, not only when they were narrating facts but also when they were giving evidence about their own states of mind.

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] The relief claimed by the plaintiffs falls into two categories. It is accepted by both sides that, if there has been a breach of contract, the measure of damage is the value of that which the plaintiffs have lost by reason of the breach. The particulars of special damage set out in the statement of claim do not assist much in the assessment, for they specify chiefly costs incurred by the plaintiffs as the result of entering into the contract and as the result of its breach. The two categories are, first, the value to the plaintiffs of such benefits as are attributable to living at "Cramond" and, secondly, the value to the female plaintiff of the prospect of inheriting "Cramond" when the two defendants are dead. In the first category, the plaintiffs do not allege and have not proved that their share of the joint living expenses at "Cramond" was any less than their living expenses independently would have been. They do not rely on Mr. Clark's statement that he would not charge them rates as being contractually binding; and, accordingly, as I have already said, the cost of their living at "The Thimble" was the ceiling over their

1959

Parker
v.
Clark.

Devlin J.

contribution to the "Cramond" expenses. What they have lost consists therefore of the benefit of living at "Cramond" rent-free, and the value to them of the use of a car and a television set specially provided by Mr. Clark. The appropriate sum to cover these items is claimed by them as joint contractors.

In the second category the claim is for the estimated value of "Cramond" and its contents, which is put in the statement of claim at £12,000. In fact, for the purposes of this action, the value has been agreed as £13,000. But the whole of this amount cannot properly be claimed in the present action. By the terms of the letter the house and contents were to be left jointly to Mrs. Parker, her sister and her daughter. It may be that if the plaintiffs were claiming as trustees, and if they could establish that Mr. Clark's promised bequest was intended for the benefit of the sister and the daughter as well as an inducement to the Parkers, they could obtain judgment for the full value. But Mr. Hawser eventually abandoned the argument that, on the pleadings as they stood, he could recover sums for the benefit of the sister and daughter. It follows, therefore, that the damages in this category cannot exceed one-third of the value of the house and contents. This is the figure which, less certain deductions which I shall consider later, is claimed by Mrs. Parker in her own right.

The contract relied upon by the plaintiffs is said to be contained in the defendants' letter of September 25 and Commander Parker's acceptance thereof. In this part of the case, since Commander Parker and Mr. Clark were the contractual protagonists, it is convenient to refer to them simply as plaintiff and defendant. The defendants' first submission in answer to the claim is that the letters, construed in the light of the surrounding circumstances, show no intention to enter into a legal relationship or to make a binding contract. No doubt a proposal between relatives to share a house, and a promise to make a bequest of it, may very well amount to no more than a family arrangement of the type considered in Balfour v. Balfour,[1] which the courts will not enforce. But there is equally no doubt that arrangements of this sort, and in particular a proposal to leave property in a will, can be the subject of a binding contract. The latter proposal has been considered chiefly in relation to marriage contracts. In Synge v. Synge[2] it was held that the defendant, who promised in writing, as part of the terms of the marriage, to leave a house and land to the plaintiff, had thereby entered into a binding contract. Kay L.J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, noted[3] the dicta of Lord Lyndhurst L.C. in Hammersley v. De Biel[4]: ". . . the principle of law, at least of equity, is this "—that if a party holds out inducements to another to celebrate

[1] [1919] 2 K.B. 571; 35 T.L.R. 609.

[2] [1894] 1 Q.B. 466; 10 T.L.R. 194.

[3] [1894] 1 Q.B. 466.

[4] (1845) 12 Cl. & Fin. 45, 78.

"a marriage, and holds them out deliberately and plainly, and "the other party consents, and celebrates the marriage in conse-"quence of them, if he had good reason to expect that it was "intended that he should have the benefit of the proposal which "was so held out, a court of equity will take care that he is not "disappointed, and will give effect to the proposal." That is the principle which I apply here; and, indeed, a contract of marriage is not dissimilar to an agreement by two families to live together for the rest of their joint lives.

The question must, of course, depend on the intention of the parties, to be inferred from the language they use and from the circumstances in which they use it. On the plaintiff's side, I accept his evidence that he considered that he was making a binding contract. An important factor in this was that he disposed of his own residence. It does not matter for this purpose whether it was or was not a term of the contract that he should sell "The Thimble"; the important thing is that the contract required him to give up his occupation of "The Thimble," and that he was always quite clear, and made it quite clear, that he would not give up occupation unless he also gave up the ownership and parted with the property. He would not have done that, he says—and I believe it—unless he thought that he was securing another permanent home. There is, undoubtedly, in the arrangement a lack of formality, upon which Mr. Park greatly relies. This, I think, is largely explained by the relationship between the parties; it is easier to demand formal documents from a stranger than it is from a relative and friend. It is clear that the plaintiff constantly relied upon the letter as a sort of title to his rights; he kept it and referred to it whenever his rights were called in question. When on October 24, 1957, they were seriously threatened, he went forthwith and consulted a solicitor. He is not, in my judgment, the sort of man who would "think up" a legal action as an afterthought, when he found he was not getting what he wanted.

The plaintiff is not a moneyed man. On the strength of Mr. Clark's promise he, so to speak, put down £672 10s. That is the figure that is agreed as the expense which he incurred in giving up "The Thimble," on the assumption that he could repurchase "The Thimble" or a cottage like it. In addition to that, he tied up £2,000, so that he has never since been in a position to buy another property like "The Thimble," and has never in fact bought one. The defendant knew this, and had plenty of time to reflect upon it between September 25, 1955, when he wrote his letter, and March 1, 1956, when the plaintiffs arrived. If he had thought that all that his letter involved was an amicable arrangement terminable at will, I cannot believe that he would not have enlightened the plaintiff and, as a cautious man himself, have warned him against the folly of what he was doing. I cannot believe either that the defendant really thought that the law would leave him at liberty, if he so chose, to tell the Parkers when

1959

Parker
v.
Clark.

Devlin J.

they arrived that he had changed his mind, that they could take their furniture away, and that he was indifferent whether they found anywhere else to live or not. Yet this is what the defence means. The defendant gave several answers which show that this was not really his state of mind. He said that the object of the letter was to induce the Parkers to come to "Cramond"; and he agreed also that he made the will in fulfilment of the promise. I am satisfied that an arrangement binding in law was intended by both sides.

The defendants' second submission is that the agreement is not sufficiently clear in its terms to be capable of constituting a legal contract. No doubt, if the letter had been drafted by a lawyer he would have gone into much more detail and would, for example, have specified how the running expenses were to be determined and matters of that sort. An agreement of this kind made in general terms requires good will and co-operation from both sides if it is to be successfully worked. But it was, in fact, made to work for more than a year and a half, and the defendants fulfilled all its terms, even to the point of making a will to the required effect. Mr. Park has not argued that the contract was too imprecise in detail to be enforceable. But he has contended that two of the terms pleaded in the statement of claim are not sufficiently clearly set out in the letter of September 25.

The former of these is the first pleaded term, which alleges that the plaintiffs were to cease to occupy and dispose of their interest in "The Thimble." Mr. Park argues that there is nothing express or to be implied in the letter which requires the plaintiffs to sell "The Thimble." Mr. Hawser accepts this and agrees that the only term to be implied from the letter about "The Thimble" is that the plaintiffs should cease to occupy it. But the elimination of part of the term pleaded does not affect the relief for which the plaintiffs are asking. The main consideration for the defendants' promise was that the plaintiffs should come and live at "Cramond." This they have done. It may be that the request was also dependent upon "The Thimble" being sold; but if it was, they have done that also.

Mr. Park's second point is on the second term pleaded, and he submits that there is nothing in the letter specifying the period for which "Cramond" was to be shared, and therefore nothing which justified the contention in the statement of claim that it was "the period of the lifetime of the survivor of the defendants." On this view, no time being mentioned, the duration of the agreement would be subject to reasonable notice on either side. It is clear, I think, that it was intended as a long-term arrangement. But an agreement to last for life must be exceptional, and would certainly be improbable in the case of two young couples. Here, however, the circumstances are unusual. The defendants are both over 80 and, describing their condition in September, 1955, Mr. Clark said: "Both of us were in very bad health and neither of "us thought we had much chance to live long." Because the terms of the Clarks' offer were generous, one must not overlook the benefits which they were receiving from the arrangement. It is not easy nowadays to secure domestic assistance, especially in times of illness; and for the Clarks to have living with them permanently a couple 20 years younger, whom they believed to be congenial and who were obviously willing to help, was a great advantage and one which at market rates they might have had to pay a great deal for. I have already instanced the sort of things the Parkers did. While there was no bargain about it, I am sure that the Clarks expected this sort of help, and that the plaintiffs thought it natural and right to give it. The Clarks obviously wanted comfort and security for the rest of their lives, which they believed to be short. It would not have been much of a bargain to them if it had left the Parkers free to give notice before the end; it might be then that the need for their help would be most great. In these circumstances there is, I think, sufficient in the language of the letter to indicate that the agreement was to be for the duration of the defendants' lives. In offering the bequest of "Cramond" to the three women the letter says: "If you cannot maintain it they can sell out." This shows, I think, that the defendants expected that at the time of their deaths the plaintiffs would still be in residence.

Mr. Park's third submission is that section 40 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, has not been complied with, since the agreement was not in writing, nor was there any sufficient note or memorandum of it in writing. In fact, the whole agreement, which consists of the letter of September 25 and of Commander Parker's reply to it, was originally in writing. Mr. Hawser submitted that oral evidence of a written acceptance would be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute. But he did not pursue this argument, preferring to rely upon a contention that a written offer which contained all the terms of the contract was a sufficient note or memorandum of it for the purposes of the statute, and that the acceptance of the offer could be proved orally. Mr. Park submitted that the memorandum was not a good one unless the agreement was in existence before it was signed. For this proposition he relied upon Munday v. Asprey.[5] In this case the purchaser's solicitors sent the engrossment of a conveyance to the vendor's solicitors together with a letter in which they sought an appointment for completion. These documents were held not to be a sufficient memorandum, since they were only a statement of an expectation of a future contract. Mr. Park particularly relied upon the following dictum of Fry J.[6]: "The statute requires that a concluded agreement existing at the "time when the memorandum is signed should be proved by "the plaintiff, whereas the document, as I have said, shews no "actual existing agreement."

I think with great respect that, whether the case was rightly

[5] (1880) 13 Ch.D. 855.

[6] (1880) 13 Ch.D. 855, 857.

1959

Parker v. Clark.

Devlin J.

or wrongly decided, this dictum cannot be supported. It is contrary to a number of authorities, two of which, Smith v. Neale [7] and Reuss v. Picksley,[8] were cited by Mr. Hawser, which show that a written offer is capable of being a good memorandum, although the agreement cannot come into existence until after the offer has been accepted. I agree that a document which contains no more than a statement of all the terms of a proposed agreement would not be enough; and it may be that that is the way in which an engrossment of a contract ought to be regarded. The memorandum must not only contain a statement of all the terms but its language must be such as to show an intention to contract. Mr. Park has submitted that the letter of September 25 was not an offer, but merely a statement of terms proposed for consideration. But I think that the letter was an offer and expressed as such; the concluding sentence of the letter satisfied me of that.

The amended defence raises the plea that the plaintiffs themselves determined the agreement. This was not pursued by Mr. Park in argument, and is contrary to the evidence which I have accepted. The plaintiffs did agree to leave the house—presumably in their view as an alternative to being evicted—in exchange for £150 and the promise of further payments for furniture removal. They maintain that by so doing they did not intend to prejudice their rights and it has not been alleged that they did. In any event the further payments were never made.

Accordingly, I am satisfied that there has been a breach of contract and that the plaintiffs are entitled to damages under the two heads I have already particularised. "Cramond" is obviously a desirable and well-appointed house, since with its contents it is valued at £13,000, and I assess the benefit of living in part of it rent-free, together with the use of a car and a television set, at £300 a year. I shall take a multiplier of four as representing the value as in December, 1957, of that sum. This multiplier is based upon what cannot be much more than a guess about the expectation of life of the two defendants. But it need not be more than approximate, since a discounting figure, also based upon the same expectation of life, must be applied in order to value Mrs. Parker's prospects under the will. The value of those prospects must also be discounted by the fact that Mrs. Parker might have had to find a sum to pay death duties, and I must also allow for contingencies, such as that the house might have been destroyed before the will took effect. Mr. Clark apparently contemplated finding the death duties from some other source and the house was in fact insured. But Mr. Hawser admits that there was no legal obligation on Mr. Clark to do either of these things, and that his doing them cannot be put higher than an expectation. Taking these matters into account, I value Mrs. Parker's prospects under the will as at today at £3,400.

[7] (1857) 2 C.B.N.S. 67. [8] (1866) L.R. 1 Ex. 342.

There will, therefore, be judgment for both plaintiffs jointly for £1,200 and costs, and for Mrs. Parker separately for £3,400.

1959

PARKER v. CLARK.

Judgment for the plaintiffs.
Costs.

Solicitors: Shelton, Cobb & Co.; Pennington & Son for Hooper & Wollen, Torquay.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

* UNION OF INDIA v. COMPANIA NAVIERA AEOLUS S.A.

1960
Feb. 22.

McNair J.

[1960 I. No. 310.]

Shipping — Charterparty — Demurrage — Exceptions clause — Centrocon charter—"Time for loading or discharging . . . shall not count" during strike—Whether receivers liable for demurrage during strike period after expiry of laytime.
Ships' Names—Spalmatori.

A bill of lading covering a cargo of bulk wheat shipped on board a steamship for delivery at Bombay expressly incorporated the terms and conditions of the charterparty for the carriage of the wheat. The charterparty provided, inter alia: "At discharging port "receivers to pay demurrage, if incurred, . . . for all time used in "excess of allowed laytime. . . ." The bill of lading and the charterparty also incorporated the strike clause of the "Centro-"con" charterparty, which provided that if the cargo could not be loaded or discharged by reason of a number of causes, including a strike of any class of workmen essential to the loading or discharge "the time for loading or discharging, as the case may be, shall not "count during the continuance of such causes provided that a "strike . . . of the shippers and/or receivers' men shall not prevent "demurrage accruing if by the use of reasonable diligence they "could have obtained other suitable labour." It further provided that in case of any delay by reason of the excepted clauses no claim for damages or demurrage should be made by the charterers, receivers of the cargo, or owners of the steamer.

A strike broke out at the discharging port after the expiry of the laydays. It continued for eight days, and during that time the cargo could not be discharged as no other suitable labour was available. In a claim by the plaintiffs, the holders of the bill of lading and receivers of the cargo, for a declaration that they were not liable to pay the shipowners additional demurrage in respect of the strike period:—

Held, (1) that, on their true construction, the words "time for "loading and discharging" in the first part of the strike clause meant the time allowed for loading or discharging, and not the time used for loading or discharging, the clause being designed to cut out from the time for loading or discharging stipulated in other clauses of the charterparty time lost by reason of the excepted causes, and to provide that it should not count during the continuance of those causes.

1960

Union of India
v.
Compania Naviera Aeolus S.A.

(2) That the effect of the proviso was that where a strike of shippers and/or receivers' men broke out during the continuance of the laydays, such a strike should not prevent time counting.

(3) That the plaintiffs could not rely on the third part of the clause which was clearly in conflict with, and contrary to, the detailed provisions set out earlier, and was an inaccurate paraphrase of those earlier provisions. Accordingly, there was nothing in the charterparty to exclude the general rule as to the non-applicability of exceptions which come into play only during the demurrage period, and the plaintiffs' claim failed.

Rederiaktiebolaget Transatlantic v. La Compagnie Française des Phosphates de l'Oceanie (1926) 32 Com.Cas. 126, C.A. distinguished.

Moor Line Ltd. v. Distillers Co. Ltd., 1912 S.C. 514 considered.

Action.

The plaintiffs, Union of India, were the holders of a bill of lading issued by Louis Dreyfus Corporation on May 5, 1957, covering a shipment of about 9,950 long tons of wheat in bulk shipped on board the S.S. Spalmatori at Tacoma, Washington, for delivery at Bombay, India. The bill of lading provided that all terms, conditions and exceptions of the charterparty relating to the carriage of the wheat, made between Louis Dreyfus Corporation and the shipowners, Compania Naviera Aeolus S.A., the defendants in this action, and dated London, February 20, 1957, were to be considered fully incorporated therein, and if there was any conflict between bill of lading and charterparty, provisions of the charterparty were to govern. By clause 10 of the bill of lading all terms, conditions and provisions of, inter alia, the strike clause of the "Centrocon" charterparty were to apply.

The charterparty, which was on the approved Baltimore Form C, provided for the loading of the vessel at Puget Sound of a full and complete cargo of wheat in bulk for delivery at Bombay. It provided for the steamer to be loaded according to berth terms, with customary berth dispatch, and if detained longer than six weather working days of 24 consecutive hours, Sundays and holidays excepted, charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of £200 British sterling per day, or pro rata, provided such detention shall occur by default of charterers or their agents.

A typed addition at the end of the print provided, inter alia, that certain attached typed clauses were deemed to be fully incorporated in the charterparty, also the strike clause (No. 30) of the "Centrocon" charterparty. Of the attached clauses, the following were relied upon as being material on one side or the other of the argument in this case: Clause 8: "Cargo to be received at "destination at the average rate of 1,000 tons of 2,240 lb. per "weather working day of 24 consecutive hours (Sundays and holi-"days excepted even if used) but 500 tons per weather working day "of 24 consecutive hours (Sundays and holidays excepted even if "used) for any portion loaded in deep tanks, it being understood "that deep tanks are clean and suitable and always provided vessel "can deliver at these rates." Clause 9: "At discharging port "receivers to pay demurrage, if incurred, at the rate of £200

"British sterling per day or pro rata for part of a day, for all time "used in discharging in excess of allowed laytime. Receivers "to collect despatch, if earned, at discharging port at the rate of "£100 British sterling per day for each and every day or pro rata "for part of a day for all laytime saved in discharging." Clause 10: "Notification of the vessel's readiness to discharge must be "delivered at the office of the receivers, or their agents, at or "before 4 p.m. (or at or before 12 noon if on Saturday) vessel "also having been entered at the Custom House, and the laydays "will then commence at 8 a.m. on the next business day, whether "in berth or not."

The "Centrocon" strike clause provided, as far as material: "If the cargo cannot be loaded by reason of riots, civil commo-"tions or of a strike or lock-out of any class of workmen, essential "to the loading of the cargo . . . or if the cargo cannot be "discharged by reason of riots, civil commotions, or of a strike "or lock-out of any class of workmen essential to the discharge, "the time for loading or discharging, as the case may be, shall "not count during the continuance of such causes, provided that "a strike or lock-out of the shippers' and/or receivers' men shall "not prevent demurrage accruing if by the use of reasonable "diligence they could have obtained other suitable labour at rates "current before the strike or lock-out. In case of any delay by "reason of the before-mentioned causes, no claim for damages or "demurrage, shall be made by the charterers, receivers of the "cargo, or owners of the steamer. For the purpose, however, of "settling despatch rebate accounts any time lost by the steamer "through any of the above causes shall be counted as time used "in loading."

The following facts stated on the writ in this action were agreed: the plaintiffs were at all material times the holders of the bill of lading; the laydays at the discharging port had expired at 1356 hours on July 2, 1957; discharge of the cargo at Bombay from 0700 hours on July 5 to 1700 hours on July 13, 1957, was prevented by a strike of workmen essential to the discharge; other suitable labour could not be obtained at all.

The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that upon the true construction of the charter dated February 20, 1957, and of the bill of lading dated May 5, having regard to the facts set out above, they were not liable to the defendants for £1,638 6s. 8d. additional demurrage in respect of the period of 8 days 10 hours during which the strike continued.

J. F. Donaldson for the plaintiffs.
Michael Kerr for the defendants.

The following cases, other than those referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: S.S. Breynton (Owners) v.

1960

Union of India v. Compania Naviera Aeolus S.A.

*Theodoridi & Co.; Lilly & Co. v. Stevenson (D. M.) & Co.†; Szymonowski & Co. v. Beck & Co.‡

McNair J. stated the facts, read the bill of lading and the relevant clauses of the charterparty, and continued: After the typed clauses one finds a clause headed "Centrocon Strike "Clause." That is a clause which is lifted without alteration from the well-known Centrocon charterparty, which is known as the River Plate charterparty 14 Homewards, designed to cover the homeward trade from the River Plate. The "Centrocon" strike clause, as set out in this charterparty, provides as follows: "If the cargo cannot be loaded by reason of riots, civil commo- "tions or of a strike or lock-out of any class of workmen, essential "to the loading of the cargo . . . or if the cargo cannot be dis- "charged by reason of riots, civil commotions, or of a strike or "lock-out of any class of workmen essential to the discharge, the "time for loading or discharging, as the case may be, shall not "count during the continuance of such causes." So far those words may be conveniently described as the first part of the clause.

The clause then continues, in its second part, as follows: "Provided that a strike or lock-out of the shippers' and/or "receivers' men shall not prevent demurrage accruing if by the "use of reasonable diligence they could have obtained other "suitable labour at rates current before the strike or lock-out."

Then follow two other sentences referred to as the third and fourth parts of this clause, as follows: "In case of any delay by "reason of the before-mentioned causes, no claim for damages "or demurrage, shall be made by the charterers, receivers of the "cargo, or owners of the steamer. For the purpose, however of "settling despatch rebate accounts any time lost by the steamer "through any of the above causes shall be counted as time used "in loading."

On the agreed facts it is to be noted that the laydays at the discharging port had expired before any strike intervened: the laydays had expired at 1356 hours on July 2, before this strike intervened; but that from 0700 hours on July 5, namely three days later, up to 1700 hours on July 13, discharge was prevented by the strike.

It is a well-settled rule of construction, as set out in Scrutton on Charter Parties, in the 11th ed., at p. 342, and in the current (16th) edition at p. 353, that "When once a vessel is on demurrage "no exceptions will operate to prevent demurrage continuing to "be payable unless exceptions clause is clearly worded so as to "have that effect"; and that rule was referred to by Bankes L.J. in Rederiaktiebolaget Transatlantic v. La Compagnie Française des Phosphates de l'Oceanie[1]: "the ordinary rule that when "once a vessel comes on demurrage the time she is detained is "to be calculated by running days or calendar days as opposed "to charterparty days."[2]

* (1924) 19 Ll.L.Rep. 409.
† (1895) 22 Rettie 278.
‡ [1923] 1 K.B. 457, C.A.

[1] (1926) 32 Com.Cas. 126, C.A.
[2] Ibid. 129.

Mr. Donaldson, for the receivers of cargo, urges first that this "Centrocon" strike clause, in its present context, as incorporated into the Baltimore "C" Form, does make special provision to the contrary of the general rule, so that although the strike occurred during the demurrage period yet, nevertheless, the charterers are entitled to rely on it. That is a result, he urges, which arises from the first and second parts of the clause. Further or alternatively, he submits that even if that be not right then the like result would follow from consideration of the third part of the clause.

The first question, as it seems to me, for consideration is the meaning of the words "the time for loading or discharging." It is clear that those words are, in a sense, proleptic, but the choice merely lies between reading them as Mr. Kerr, for the shipowners, would ask me to read them, as being "time "stipulated for loading or discharging," or "time allowed for "loading or discharging," and reading them as Mr. Donaldson submits they should be read, as meaning "time used for loading "or discharging."

In my judgment, taking those words alone for the moment, and not considering what other meaning it may be necessary to assign to them by reason of the proviso, it seems to me to be perfectly clear that what is meant by "the time for loading or "the time for discharging" is the time allowed for loading or discharging, especially when one reads on in the sentence and sees it says that this time, so defined, "shall not count during the "continuance of such causes." That seems to me to assume that this strike clause is designed to cut out time from the time for loading or discharging which has been stipulated or arranged for by other clauses of the charterparty, that shall not count during the continuance of certain causes. Although in clause 8 of the typed clauses the obligation as to discharging is not expressed in the words "time for discharging to be" so much, but by the phrase, "Cargo to be received . . . at the average rate "of 1,000 tons" and so on, it is quite clear to me at least that clause 8 is defining a time for discharging; and the strike clause, when one comes to it, says that that time for discharging, the number of days, will not count during the continuance of the exception causes.

It is said, however, that when one gets to the proviso, a different meaning must be given to it by reason of the used words "shall not prevent demurrage accruing." It is quite true that in certain contexts the words "and demurrage shall not accrue" have been held to be sufficient, in the judgment of the Court of Appeal, to exclude the general rule to which I referred earlier in my judgment as to the non-applicability of exceptions which come into play only during the demurrage period, i.e., after the vessel has once come on demurrage. Such a case was the case to which

1960

Union of India v. Compania Naviera Aeolus S.A.

McNair J.

I referred earlier, Rederiaktiebolaget Transatlantic v. La Compagnie Française des Phosphates de l'Oceanie,[3] where the charterparty provided, inter alia, "laydays not to count during the period "of such delay or hindrance and demurrage not to accrue"; and it was held there by Bankes and Scrutton L.JJ., that, in that very special charterparty, to quote the language of Scrutton L.J., the ordinary rule was excluded. But it is to be observed there that in that clause not only were the words "demurrage not to accrue" used, but there were also the words "laydays not to count," so it is easy to understand how the result was arrived at, and it was held that the intention of the draftsman, as shown by the words used, was that the exception should apply both during the laydays and during the demurrage period.

In my judgment there is no need, on the words of this proviso, to reach the same conclusion. Once it is accepted, as I think it must be, that, according to the proper canon of construction, the proviso must be read as a qualification on or exception from what has gone before, then it follows, it seems to me, that the proviso is dealing with some qualification against the non-counting of the laydays; and although it is true it does not use the phrase again in the proviso "laydays" it expresses the same thought by the use of the words "shall not prevent demurrage accruing."

The working of the proviso is well illustrated by the following example: Time for discharging, 10 days. On the ninth day a strike breaks out and continues until the twelfth day. Were it not for the proviso, the laydays would not start to run again until the end of the twelfth day; but the proviso says that in a particular class of strike, namely, a strike of receivers' men when other suitable labour is available, it is not to have that result. It says that such a strike, in such circumstances "shall not prevent "demurrage accruing." It might equally have said, "shall not "prevent time counting." It is merely expressing the same thought in different language.

In my judgment it expresses that thought in reasonably clear language. But if I am wrong in thinking that the language is quite clear I think that the same result in law would follow, namely, that at any rate it has not been stated in clear terms that the general rule shall not apply.

Accordingly, on my constructions of the first two parts of the clause, the construction contended for by the plaintiffs does not commend itself to me.

Before passing to the third and fourth parts I should mention that I am assisted in the construction of the words "time for "loading or discharging" which I have arrived at by the judgment of Lord Salvesen in Moor Line Ltd. v. Distillers Co. Ltd.[4] In that case the clause corresponding to the present clause I have construed reads as follows: "If the cargo cannot be discharged "by reason of a strike or lock-out of any class of workmen

[3] 32 Com.Cas. 126.

[4] 1912 S.C. 514, 519.

"essential to the discharge of the cargo, the days for discharging "shall not count during the continuance of such strike or lock-"out." It was argued on behalf of the shipowners that the words "days for discharging" covered both the laydays and demurrage time. The contrary was argued on behalf of the cargo interests. Lord Salvesen then said [5]: "The pursuers maintained that 'days "'for discharging' included the 10 days for which the charterers "were entitled to detain the ship on paying the stipulated rate of "demurrage. I cannot so read them. 'Days on demurrage' are "not 'laydays' or 'days for discharging.'"

The second way in which the case is put on behalf of the receivers is that whether or not they are right on the first and second sentences of this clause, yet the plain words of the third part are sufficient for them in this case. Those words are: "In "case of any delay by reason of the before-mentioned causes, no "claim for damages or demurrage, shall be made by the char-"terers, receivers of the cargo, or owners of the steamer." Neglecting for the moment the exclusion of claims by the charterers and receivers of cargo, and confining the clause only to claims by the owners of the steamer, it would then read: "In "case of any delay by reason of the before-mentioned causes, no "claim for damages or demurrage shall be made by the . . . "owners of the steamer." That is quite plainly in conflict with, and contrary to, the detailed provisions which have been set out earlier. Taken literally, that third sentence would mean that if there had been any delay at all, say only a couple of days, by reason of the strike, then the owners were to be disbarred from making any claim for damages or demurrage at all. Quite plainly it cannot mean that. It seems to me this third sentence, if any sense is to be given to it at all, is merely an inaccurate paraphrase of the detailed provisions which have gone before it.

It may be, that in so far as it excludes claims by the owners for demurrage, it is merely leading up to the fourth part of the clause dealing with dispatch money, which in effect says, at any rate so far as time used in loading is concerned, that even though the receivers get the benefit in their loading time allowance of any strikes they cannot claim as days saved so that they earn dispatch upon any day where no work has been possible because of strikes during the laydays.

It is clear that this method of lifting a clause from one charterparty into another may create difficulties. This Centrocon strike clause is, of course, designed for fitting into the language of the Centrocon charterparty. It would not be permissible for me, on this occasion, to read on, to found my judgment in the present case upon other parts of the Centrocon charterparty, so I refrain from referring to the terms of that charterparty in any detail, observing merely that certain of the linguistic difficulties arising in this Centrocon strike clause, when engrafted on to the Baltimore Form

[5] 1912 S.C. 514, 519.

1960

Union of India v. Compania Naviera Aeolus S.A.

McNair J.

"C," do not arise when the clause is read in its natural and native context.

Accordingly, in my judgment, the plaintiffs are not entitled to the declaration for which they ask, and as I understand it has been agreed that if they fail to get that declaration from the court they will regard themselves as liable for the amount of demurrage claimed, there is no need for me to make further order than that the court does not grant the declaration prayed for. The action is dismissed, with costs.

Judgment for the defendants with costs.

Solicitors: William A. Crump & Son; Holman Fenwick & Willan.

E. M. W.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1960
Feb. 25.

Roxburgh J.

* In re C. S. C. (An Infant).

[1960 No. 121.]

Adoption—Adoption order—Child in possession of mother on three occasions—Whether "continuously in the care and possession" of applicants—Refusal of consent by mother—Duty of justices to consider possible legitimation of child—Whether power to order applicants to retain child pending appeal—Adoption Act, 1958 (7 Eliz. 2, c. 5), ss. 3 (1), 35 (3).

Adoption—"Care and possession" of applicant for three months—Whether "continuous"—Child spent three nights with mother—Adoption Act, 1958 (7 Eliz. 2, c. 5), s. 3 (1).

Adoption—Discretion of court—Possibility of legitimising child—Relevance—Putative father willing to marry mother after divorce.

Adoption—Appeal to High Court—Stay pending appeal—No power to stay refusal of order—Adoption Act, 1958, s. 35 (3).

By section 3 (1) of the Adoption Act, 1958: "An adoption order "shall not be made in respect of any infant unless he has been con- "tinuously in the care and possession of the applicant for at least "three consecutive months immediately preceding the date of the "order. . . ."

By section 35 (3) of the Act of 1958: "Where . . . an application "for an adoption order made by any person in respect of an infant "placed in his care and possession by . . . [an adoption] society "or [local] authority is refused by the court . . . that person shall, "within seven days after the date on which . . . the application "[was] refused . . . cause the infant to be returned to the society "or authority. . . ."

On December 22, 1959, a juvenile court heard an application for an adoption order under the Adoption Act, 1958. The adoption had been arranged by the local authority. The evidence given on the hearing of the application showed that, during the three months immediately preceding the hearing, the child had been in the care and possession of the mother, on one occasion, for two consecutive nights and, on another occasion, for a night and a day. The putative father of the child gave evidence to the effect that, when the mother, who was married to a third party, was divorced, he would marry her. By the operation of section 1 (1) of the Legitimacy Act, 1959, which repealed section 1 (2) of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, any such marriage would legitimate the child. The mother refused to consent to the adoption but the juvenile court granted the application and dispensed with the consent of the mother. On appeal:—

---

[Reported by Miss V. A. Moxon, Barrister-at-Law.]

Held, that the child had not been "continuously in the care and "possession" of the applicants within the meaning of section 3 of the Adoption Act, 1958, for three consecutive months immediately preceding the date of the order, and that, therefore, the adoption order must be discharged.

Per curiam. In deciding whether they ought to exercise their discretion to make an adoption order, the justices should consider, in connection with the welfare of the child, whether legitimation was not preferable to adoption.

Where the court does not make an adoption order, it has no power to stay the operation of section 35 (3) of the Adoption Act, 1958, and authorise the applicants to retain the child pending an appeal.

APPEAL from Berkshire justices sitting at Abingdon.

On December 22, 1959, a juvenile court heard an application for an adoption order. The adoption had been arranged by the local authority and the mother refused to consent to the granting of an adoption order. The putative father of the child, giving evidence, said that he was free to marry the mother, and that when she was divorced he would marry her immediately. He and the mother were living together as man and wife and had had possession of the child on three occasions.

The female applicant gave evidence, inter alia, that on November 29, 1959, the mother took the child so that the putative father could see it would be no good for them to have it and promised to bring him back that evening. She took him at 5.50 p.m. At 3.30 p.m. next day, she came to the female applicant and said: "[the putative father] will go the whole hog "to keep the baby." The child was returned to the female applicant on the following day. She also said that the mother had had the child for the night on three occasions.

The mother gave evidence, inter alia, that she had had the child on three occasions and that the date of the second occasion was November 2, 1959, when she had the child for one day and one night.

The justices granted the application and dispensed with the consent of the mother, who appealed to the High Court.

Michael Browne for the mother.

C. A. Settle for the applicants.

The argument was heard in camera and judgment was given in open court.

1960

C. S. C., In re.

Roxburgh J. I am giving judgment in open court, because matters of public importance seem to me to arise, namely, that justices are not alive, as far as I can discover, to all the pitfalls in the exercise of the important jurisdiction which they have in connection with adoptions. In my judgment I shall refer to the mother as Mrs. A., to the putative father as Mr. B., and to the adopters as Mr. and Mrs. C.

This is one of those cases in which the mother constantly changed her mind. It is not necessary for me to deal in detail with that aspect of the case, because that was not the ground of the justices' decision; and, in the view that I take of the law applicable, it is not a material matter for me to consider. The point has arisen before, in In re Adoption Act, 1950,[1] in the Court of Appeal, and, in dealing with the question of the mother who gives and withdraws her consent more than once, Jenkins L.J. said: "The question of what amounted to the unreasonable withholding of consent, particularly by a mother, had been the subject of some judicial discussion. All one could do was to decide each case according to its particular facts, with the guidance of such broad general principles as could be derived from the authorities. The mere fact that a child would be materially better off if adopted than he could hope to be if he remained the child of his true parents did not suffice in itself to make the withholding of consent unreasonable, but that did not mean that that possible element in a case should be wholly ignored. So, too, the mere circumstance that a child was handed over to proposed adopters for a probationary period of three months in itself could not render the parents' withholding of consent unreasonable. Further, the mere fact that a documentary consent under section 4 of the Act had been given and subsequently withdrawn did not amount to an unreasonable withholding of consent."

That is the first matter to which I want to draw attention, namely, that that is the present position of the law with regard to the withholding of consent by a mother.

The second is much more technical, but nonetheless important. Justices must remember that as long as there is a statutory appellate court in these matters, they must so conduct the proceedings as to comply with the Adoption (Juvenile Court) Rules, 1958, and make the proceedings intelligible to the appellate court. Rule 8 provides for the appointment of a guardian ad litem of an infant, and rule 9 provides that the guardian ad litem on completing his investigations shall make a confidential report in writing to the court. Commenting on that in the case of In re J. S. (An Infant)[2] I said[3]: "It seems to me quite plain that the parties have no right to see the reports except in so far as the justices or the judge think fit to disclose their contents at the

[1] The Times, July 29, 1958.

[2] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1218; [1959] 3 All E.R. 856.

[3] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1218, 1221.

"hearing. On the other hand, it must be the duty of the justices "in a case of an appeal to forward to the judge's clerk the confiden-"tial reports for the information of the statutory court of appeal "which exists for the hearing of these cases." No such report has been forwarded to me by the clerk to the justices; and although, were I going to decide the case on that ground, I should have had to adjourn it in order to interrogate the clerk as to whether there was any such report in the possession of the justices or their clerk, I do not propose to take that course for two reasons. One is because I have some reason to think that the answer would be in the negative; and secondly, I am proposing to decide the case on another ground. Nonetheless that point is an important point. It might even have been of itself enough to compel me to allow this appeal; and that would have meant putting the parties to great expense because the court did not comply with the rules.

But the matter does not stop there. Section 3 (1) of the Adoption Act, 1958, contains a clear and important provision: "An "adoption order shall not be made in respect of any infant unless "he has been continuously in the care and possession of the "applicant for at least three consecutive months immediately "preceding the date of the order, not counting any time before "the date which appears to the court to be the date on which the "infant attained the age of six weeks."

My complaint is not that the justices may have reached a wrong conclusion in law upon the true construction of that provision; but that they never considered whether that section had been complied with at all, and that, accordingly, they left me with a most confusing and unsatisfactory account of the evidence in relation to that matter, upon which they themselves have made no findings at all.

The fourth point is the effect of the Legitimacy Act, 1959, upon these problems. I would not blame the justices for overlooking that question altogether and therefore exercising their discretion on what appears to me to be a wrong principle, in the sense that they omitted to consider at all something that was very important, because, in fact, I am not sure that I should have thought of it unless counsel had drawn my attention to it; but that does not make it unimportant.

Very often the putative father does not want the child, and that was the position in In re Adoption Act, 1950,[4] to which I have briefly referred; but here he said: "My relationship with "[the mother] is that as soon as she is free to marry me I will "marry her. For the past two years I have been living with her "as man and wife. I am divorced. When [she] is divorced I "will marry her immediately. I am the father of [the child]. "I have seen him on numerous occasions. On three occasions "we have had possession of [the child] away from [Mrs. C.]." There was no cross-examination about that; and there is no reason

[4] The Times, July 29, 1958.

1960

C. S. C., In re.

Roxburgh J.

why the justices should have rejected that evidence. The importance of that is this: supposing that marriage takes place, by the operation of the Legitimacy Act, 1959, which repeals section 1 (2) of the Legitimacy Act, 1926, any such marriage would legitimate this child, and, of course, it is always important to consider, in connection with the welfare of the child, whether legitimation is not to be preferred to adoption.

The justices never considered that point, because nobody asked them to do so, but their failure to do so seems to me entirely to vitiate the exercise by them of the discretion, which they purported to exercise under the Adoption Act, 1958.

Section 5 (1), under which they purported to act, provides: "The court may"—and I draw attention to that; it is a pure discretion, and the matter that I have just been speaking of is clearly one of the matters which has to be considered—"dispense "with any consent required by paragraph (a) of subsection (1) of "section four of this Act"—which includes the consent of the mother—"if it is satisfied that the person whose consent is to be "dispensed with—(a) has abandoned, neglected or persistently "ill-treated the infant; or (b) cannot be found or is incapable of "giving his consent or is withholding his consent unreasonably." By subsection (2) under which the justices acted: "If the court "is satisfied that any person whose consent is required by the "said paragraph (a) has persistently failed without reasonable "cause to discharge the obligations of a parent or guardian of "the infant the court may dispense with his consent. . . ."

Justices therefore first have to consider whether the case comes within subsection (2) at all. The justices did consider that in this case, and they came to the conclusion that it did. Whether or not there was any evidence to justify their conclusions on that part of the case is a matter which I do not intend to explore; but what is quite certain is that, having reached that conclusion, they still had a further duty, namely, to consider the question whether they ought to exercise their discretion; and, in that connection, they undoubtedly would have had to take the question of possible legitimation into consideration, had they realised that there was such a possibility.

It is true that in this case there may be some question of domicile; and if a certain state of affairs in relation to domicile was disclosed, the legitimation might not be possible. That being so, I am not going to decide the case on that point, but I draw attention to the importance of it, nonetheless.

I now come back to the matter on which I do propose to decide the case; it is a short point, namely, the requirements of section 3 of the Adoption Act, 1958.

[His Lordship referred to the evidence of continuous care and possession, and continued:] I do not see how, in the light of the admission by Mrs. C. and the evidence of Mr. B. that the child had been away for three nights, I can reject the evidence of Mrs. A. on that point, even though the justices did not regard her as a truthful witness; not only was there that amount of corroboration to which I have already referred, but there was no cross-examination directed to this point. In other words, this part of her evidence had never been challenged. I am not suggesting that the third case was within the three-month period, but Mrs. A. gives the date of the second occasion as November 2, 1959, so that there were three nights—two consecutive nights, plus one which had preceded it—within the period of three months.

It is true to say that the words "continuously in the care and "possession" of the applicant for at least three consecutive months in section 3 are difficult; they are most peremptory, and construed quite literally, do produce absurd consequences, as Mr. Settle pointed out. Supposing the child went to hospital for a night, on the literal construction of these words, the infant would not have been in the care or possession of the applicant during that night. Again, supposing the child went to school and stayed there, even during the daytime, it would not be in the possession of the applicant during the time that it was under the discipline of the school teacher. I am not the first person to appreciate the difficulty here, because in the Scottish case of M., Petitioner,[5] the Lord President said,[6] and I entirely concur in what he said: "I shall not attempt to define the words 'care "'and possession' nor to deal with the difficult border-line cases "which may arise," but where I cannot travel with Mr. Settle is to say that where a proposed adopter voluntarily parted with both the care and possession of the child for even one whole night within the three-month period, the requirement of the Act has not been broken. It seems to me that is the one thing that the policy of the Act intended to prevent and, if one finds, as I do, that the child was in the exclusive care and possession of the mother during the whole of the night and part of a day, that is not consistent with the words "continuously in the care and "possession" of the applicants.

It is upon that third ground that I decide this case, and I have done it in this way for this reason: there are a number of points in this case, and I am sure that if I had not taken this point, I should have had to order a new trial; had I ordered a new trial and then in the end taken this point of law and decided the case upon it, I should have merely put the parties to great expense for no purpose whatever. I realise that the course I have taken might make a difficulty in the Court of Appeal, because the point of construction is not altogether easy; but, on balance, I have thought that that is the right thing to do.

Accordingly, the appeal is allowed and the adoption order is discharged.

The question then arises as to what happens to the child. In In re Adoption Act, 1950,[7] I came to the conclusion that I had

[5] 1953 S.C. 227.
[6] Ibid. 229.
[7] The Times, July 10, 1958.

1960

C. S. C., In re.

Roxburgh J.

no power to grant a stay because there is a mandatory requirement in section 27 (4) of the Act of 1950 that the child is to be handed back; Mr. Wilmers, who argued that case before me, agreed; and that is how the child, in that case,[7] got back to the mother, to her ultimate ruin, because it was in view of what happened after the case was before me and before it came to the Court of Appeal, that the Court of Appeal reversed my order.[8]

Section 35 (3) of the Act of 1958 contains similar words, and so far as I know, I have no power to authorise Mr. Settle's client to retain the child pending an appeal.

I think it is very curious that the court is not given power to stay the operation of this section pending an appeal; but I do not think that I can, because it is a statutory requirement. I do not believe that the Court of Appeal have power to do so either, but there was no appeal on this point in the other case.[8]

I want to make it plain that if I thought I had jurisdiction, I should grant a stay. It seems to me ridiculous that a child should be sent back, then for there to be an appeal, and then that the child should be brought back again.

Appeal allowed.
No order as to costs.

Solicitors: Barnes & Butler for Cecil Bartram & Rogers, Oxford; Preston, Lane-Claypon & O'Kelly for Cole & Cole, Oxford.

[8] The Times, July 29, 1958, C.A.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

1959 Nov. 9, 10, 11.

Sachs J.

* HANIVER v. HANIVER.

Husband and Wife — Judicial separation — Discretion — Prayer for discretion not required in petition for judicial separation—Discretion statement not required—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), s. 14 (1)—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957 (1957 S.I. No. 619 (c. 4), rr. 4 (4), 28 (1).

A wife, in answer to her husband's petition for divorce on the ground of her adultery, prayed for a decree of judicial separation on the ground of her husband's adultery, which he admitted, and alleged that although she had become pregnant by another man her conduct had not amounted to adultery as she had been unconscious through drink. She did not pray for the exercise of the court's discretion in her answer, nor file a discretion statement. Upon the court finding that, although influenced by drink, she had committed adultery which her husband, himself guilty of adultery, had condoned, the question arose whether a decree of judicial separation could be granted without a prayer for discretion or a discretion statement:—

Held, (1) that since under the relevant rules these matters were only required upon a prayer for a decree nisi, it was not necessary to include a prayer for the exercise of the court's discretion, nor file a discretion statement, where a party who had committed adultery prayed for a decree of judicial separation. The court must nonetheless consider, after being fully informed of all relevant circumstances, whether it would be proper to grant a decree of judicial separation notwithstanding that party's adultery.

(2) That it was proper to grant such a decree in the circumstances of the present case.

DEFENDED PETITION FOR DIVORCE.

The husband and wife were married in July, 1945; both of them at that time were under 21, both practising Roman Catholics and both had lived in a country district in Ireland.

The husband by his petition prayed for a divorce on the ground of a single act of adultery on the part of his wife, which resulted in the birth of a child in November, 1951. He alleged that that adultery had never been condoned; and he asked for the discretion of the court to be exercised in his favour notwithstanding several acts of adultery from 1946 onwards.

The wife by her answer admitted that the 1951 child was not the child of the husband; but contended that on the occasion when it was conceived she was, in effect, unconscious as a result of taking alcohol to which she was unaccustomed and that, accordingly, she could not be deemed responsible for the act in question. She prayed for a decree of judicial separation on the ground of the husband's adultery, and neither asked in the prayer of her petition for the discretion of the court to be exercised in her favour, nor filed a discretion statement.

The case is reported solely upon the question, which was considered after judgment on the main issues had been given, whether or not a discretion statement should be filed, and a prayer for discretion included in the petition before a decree of judicial separation could be granted, the wife having been found guilty of adultery when the child was conceived.

R. J. A. Temple Q.C., H. S. Law and J. A. P. Hazel for the husband.

James Stirling Q.C. and D. A. McIntyre Kemp for the wife.

Kemp. Although a petitioner for a judicial separation must make a full disclosure of his adultery to the court, and ask the court to exercise its discretion in his favour, there is no statute or rule which imposes a mandatory duty on the court to require a prayer for the exercise of the court's discretion, and the filing of a discretion statement, before a decree of judicial separation, which is a final decree, can be granted, although the court may in its inherent jurisdiction require these steps to be taken. If the court is satisfied that all relevant matters have been disclosed, and that it is a proper case in which to grant a decree notwithstanding the adultery, it may do so without ordering the petitioner

1959

Haniver
v.
Haniver.

to go through what would only be a procedural formality. On the facts of the present case it is not necessary for the wife to take these steps: see Rayden on Divorce, 7th ed., note (c), p. 244, where it is suggested that, since the rules relating to discretion statements, namely rules 4 (4) and 28 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957,[1] referred only to "decrees nisi," it did not appear that a discretion statement was necessary in a petition for judicial separation, though in Latey on Divorce, 14th ed., p. 669, the contrary is suggested in view of the provision in section 14 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950,[2] relating to the duties of the court, etc., upon the presentation of such a petition.

Temple. There can be no decree of judicial separation in the absence of a prayer for discretion and a discretion statement, for it is proper to infer, from the wording of section 14 (1) of the Act of 1950, that the same rules should be applied to cases of judicial separation as to petitions for divorce.

[Sachs J. referred to Apted v. Apted and Bliss,[3] in which the practice relating to discretion statements had first been laid down.]

Sachs J., who had held on the evidence that, although when the child had been conceived the wife, who had not drunk alcohol before, was undoubtedly affected by the alcohol she had drunk earlier in the evening, he was not satisfied that she had not only lost control of herself, but had lost consciousness, and that he must accordingly find her guilty of adultery, which the husband had condoned, said after hearing the argument upon the question of discretion:

On this question of whether a prayer for discretion in the pleadings and a discretion statement are here needed, there is a

[1] Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957, r. 4 (4): "The petition shall conclude "with a prayer setting out particu- "lars of the relief claimed, including "the amount of any claim for "damages, any claim for costs, and "in appropriate cases, a prayer that "the court will exercise its discretion "to grant a decree nisi notwithstand- "ing the adultery of the petitioner "during the marriage."

R. 28 (1): "Every party to a "matrimonial cause praying that the "court shall exercise its discretion to "grant a decree nisi notwithstanding "his adultery shall lodge in the "divorce registry a statement (in this "rule called 'a discretion statement') "signed by him or his solicitor, "stating that the court will be asked "to exercise its discretion in his "favour notwithstanding his adultery, "and setting forth particulars of the "acts of adultery committed and of "the facts which it is material for the "court to know for the purpose of the "exercise of its discretion."

[2] Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 14 (1): "A petition for judicial "separation may be presented to the "court either by the husband or the "wife on any grounds on which a "petition for divorce might have been "presented, or on the ground of "failure to comply with a decree for "restitution of conjugal rights, or on "any ground on which a decree for "divorce a mensa et thoro might have "been pronounced immediately before "the commencement of the Matri- "monial Causes Act, 1857, and the "foregoing provisions of this Act "relating to the duty of the court on "the presentation of a petition for "divorce, and the circumstances in "which such a petition shall or may "be granted or dismissed, shall apply "in like manner to a petition for "judicial separation."

[3] [1930] P. 246; 46 T.L.R. 456.

conflict between the two standard textbooks, Rayden on Divorce, 7th ed., p. 244, and Latey on Divorce, 14th ed., p. 669. The rules relating to the asking of discretion in a petition and the filing of a discretion statement now alone govern the position and must, it appears to me, be construed as they stand. When one looks at the wording of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957, rr. 4 (4) and 28, and their predecessors, and notes that in each case the wording relates to a prayer "that the court shall exercise its discretion to "grant a decree nisi," it seems to me that the relevant rules cannot apply to prayers for a judicial separation. It accordingly follows that Mr. Kemp is right in his submission that "his tackle "is in order."

In those circumstances it is for me to come to a conclusion whether I will exercise my discretion without asking for the petition to be amended and without asking for a discretion statement to be filed, I have come to the conclusion that this is eminently a case where that discretion should be exercised and I grant a decree of judicial separation accordingly.

Decree of judicial separation.

Solicitors: Young, Jones & Co.; Dollman & Pritchard.

J. B. G

REPORTER'S NOTE: The practice whereby a petitioner must ask for the discretion of the court to be exercised in his favour notwithstanding his adultery, and file a discretion statement, was laid down in a direction of Lord Merrivale P. dated May 29, 1930, following on the practice enunciated by him in his judgment in Apted v. Apted and Bliss [1930] P. 246. Lord Merrivale P. directed that: "when it is intended to ask, "at the hearing of a matrimonial cause, that the discretion of the court "be exercised on behalf of either party, the petition (or answer) shall "contain a prayer to this effect." It was further directed that a statement signed by such party or his solicitor, setting forth the relevant facts, should be lodged with the application for the registrar's certificate. By a further direction, dated May 30, 1930, a plea for discretion was to be confined to the prayer. (See Browne and Latey on Divorce, 11th ed., p. 296.) This direction was incorporated in the rules by an amendment, as from January 1, 1935, to rule 30 (which related to the registrar's certificate, etc.) of the Rules of 1924 (S.R. & O. 1934, No. 1348/L. 32; [1934] W.N. (Pt. 11) 354). In this rule reference is made only to a prayer for a decree nisi. The rule became rule 28 in the Rules of 1937. Rule 30 (c) of the Rules of 1924 (as amended) included, in addition to the directions of 1930, a provision that the words "notwithstanding his "or her adultery" should be included in the prayer of the petition (see now rule 4 (4) and direction in [1957] 1 W.L.R. 558), that notice of allegations in the discretion statement not referable to any specific allegations in the pleadings should be given to the other spouse (now rule 28 (4)); and that the statement should remain privileged until the contents were given in evidence (now rule 28 (5)). These three provisions originated from a direction of November 15, 1932 (see footnote to Kirk v. Kirk and Gundy (1934) 50 T.L.R. 237), from a ruling of Lord Merriman P. on February 1, 1934 (see Kirk v. Kirk and Gundy

1959

Haniver v. Haniver.

[1934] W.N. 31, 32), in which Langton J. held that discretion statements were only required for adultery, and not for other offences which were discretionary bars), followed by a direction dated March 28, 1934 [1934] W.N. 86, and from a ruling in Cullen v. Cullen [1933] P. 218; 49 T.L.R. 469 respectively.

Prior to the ruling in Apted v. Apted and Bliss there was some uncertainty as to the course to be adopted by a petitioner who had committed adultery. In King v. King [1915] P. 88, Bargrave Deane J. laid down a rule that he would in future grant no relief or assistance to any petitioner guilty of adultery "unless in the petition the misconduct "sought to be excused is admitted, and, in the prayer, the discretion of "the court is specifically asked for." In Tickner v. Tickner [1924] P. 118; 40 T.L.R. 367, in which the history relating to petitioners guilty of adultery is considered, the petitioner had admitted her adultery in her oral evidence, and the King's Proctor suggested that a petitioner who asked for the exercise of discretion should be required to say so in petition, and that if the facts were kept back until the case came to court, relief should be refused until a fresh petition had been filed "setting out definitely every single occasion on which he or she had "committed adultery." Sir Henry Duke P. stated that the matter of procedure was under his consideration. Discretion cases were put into the defended list by directions of May 14, 1926, and July 13, 1928.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1960 Jan. 12; Feb. 3.

Cross J.

* CARR and Another v. BOXALL; BRIMMER (Third Party).

[1957 C. No. 1556.]

Legal Aid—Costs—Order for costs against aided person—Damages awarded to aided person—Payment into court—Payment out on satisfaction of costs to be paid by aided person.

Interest — Unliquidated damages — Time from which interest to be awarded—Discretion of court—Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934 (24 & 25 Geo. 5, c. 41), s. 3 (1).

By section 2 (2) (e) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, the liability of an assisted person by virtue of an order for costs made against him is not to exceed the amount (if any) which is reasonable for him to pay having regard to all the circumstances, and by section 3 and regulation 16 of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I. 1950, No. 1359) all moneys payable or costs awarded to an assisted person become, in effect, subject to a charge in favour of the legal aid fund.

By section 3 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934: "In any proceedings . . . for the recovery of any debt or "damages, the court may, if it thinks fit, order that there shall be "included in the sum for which judgment is given interest at such "rate as it thinks fit on the whole or any part of the debt or "damages for the whole or any part of the period between the date "when the cause of action arose and the date of judgment."

[Reported by Miss V. A. Moxon, Barrister-at-Law.]

Two plaintiffs brought an action for a declaration that the defendant was not a tenant of premises of theirs and an injunction, and the first plaintiff claimed damages for assault. The defendant counterclaimed that he was a tenant of the premises and for damages for having been prevented from carrying on business in them; he also claimed damages for assault against the first plaintiff. Before the trial the plaintiffs conceded that the defendant was the tenant of the premises, and the first plaintiff paid £25 into court on the issue of assault. The hearing took place on July 23 and 24, 1958, when, on the issue of assault, judgment was given for both the first plaintiff and the defendant for 40s.; it was declared that the defendant was a tenant of the plaintiffs and an inquiry as to his damages was ordered: all questions of costs were adjourned for further consideration. On August 1, 1958, the defendant reoccupied the premises. On March 3, 1959, the order in the action was drawn up. Subsequently the plaintiffs paid £600 into court against the defendant's damages. The official referee, by his report dated November 6, 1959, assessed those damages at £1,301 14s. 3d. The defendant was a legally assisted person.

On further consideration, when it was agreed that the order would have to provide for taxation and payment (a) of certain costs by both plaintiffs to the defendant; (b) of certain other costs by the defendant to both plaintiffs; (c) of certain costs by the first plaintiff to the defendant, and (d) of certain other costs by the defendant to the first plaintiff:—

Held, (1) that plaintiffs suing a legally aided defendant were entitled to every reasonable protection and that, as there might be a balance of costs payable by the defendant to the first plaintiff or the plaintiffs, the court would direct that one half of the sum paid into court should not be paid out except on the production of an affidavit by the defendant's solicitors to the effect that the costs payable by the defendant to the first plaintiff and the plaintiffs had been satisfied by set-off or payment.

(2) That, although the defendant's claim was for unliquidated damages, the court in the exercise of its discretion under section 3 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, would award interest from August 1, 1958, the date when the defendant reoccupied the premises, and not merely from the date of the official referee's report assessing the amount of the damages to which the defendant was entitled.

ACTION.

In March, 1957, the plaintiffs, Cecil Charles Wilfred Carr and Victor Farrell, bought a property at Hayling Island from the third party, Arthur Thomas Orlando Brimmer. The defendant, Frederick Boxall, carried on business in a kiosk on the property which he occupied under an oral tenancy granted to him by the third party. The plaintiffs refused to recognise that the defendant had any rights as against them to occupy the kiosk, and on April 10, 1957, they removed from it certain chattels belonging to the defendant. In the course of that operation the defendant and the first plaintiff came to blows. On May 20, 1957, the plaintiffs issued a writ claiming a declaration that the defendant was not a tenant of the plaintiffs, an injunction restraining him from continuing to have recourse, or returning to, or entering into possession of the kiosk, and from doing further violence to them, and the first plaintiff claimed damages for assault. By his 1960

Carr
v.
Boxall.

defence the defendant set up his tenancy of the kiosk and denied the assault and, he counterclaimed, inter alia, for a declaration that he was the tenant of the kiosk, an injunction to restrain the plaintiffs from interfering with his occupation of the kiosk and from denying him access thereto, damages for trespass to goods and, against the first plaintiff, damages for assault. The plaintiffs issued a third party notice against the third party, claiming that they were entitled to be indemnified by him. In June, 1958, the first plaintiff paid £25 into court on the issue of assault. Shortly before the trial of the action, the plaintiffs conceded that the defendant was entitled to a tenancy of the kiosk, and on August 1, 1958, the defendant reoccupied it. The action was heard by Danckwerts J. on July 23 and 24, 1958, and the hearing was confined to the issues of assault, and exemplary damages for trespass. The order in the action, dated March 3, 1959, provided, inter alia, that the first plaintiff should recover 40s. by way of damages for assault against the defendant, and that the defendant should recover 40s. by way of damages for assault against the first plaintiff. The order also declared that the defendant was a tenant of the kiosk and that an inquiry should be made before an official referee as to what damages (if any) he had sustained by having been prevented from carrying on his business in the kiosk. All questions of costs between the plaintiffs and the defendant were adjourned for further consideration; but, as the defendant was legally aided, the order provided for the taxation of his costs as required by regulation 18 (3) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950. Subsequently, the plaintiffs paid £600 into court against the defendant's claim for damages. By his report dated November 6, 1959, the official referee assessed the damages which the defendant had sustained by having been prevented from carrying on his business at the kiosk at £1,301 14s. 3d.

Ian McCulloch for the plaintiffs.
A. J. Balcombe for the defendant.
M. J. Anwyl-Davies for the third party.

No cases were referred to in argument.

February 3. Cross J. read the following judgment which, after stating the facts, continued as follows: The parties are agreed that the order on further consideration must provide for the payment by the plaintiffs to the defendant of the sum of £1,301 14s. 3d., and also a further sum of £50, being agreed damages in tort for the conversion of certain property of the defendant with which the official referee did not deal. The parties are further agreed that in the circumstances, and having regard to the payment into court by the first plaintiff and the fact that the plaintiffs conceded before the trial that the defendant was entitled to a tenancy, the order will have to provide for the taxation and payment (a) of certain costs by both plaintiffs to the defendant;

(b) of certain other costs by the defendant to both plaintiffs; (c) of certain costs by the first plaintiff to the defendant; (d) of certain other costs by the defendant to the first plaintiff. All this would give rise to no difficulty whatever if the defendant was not in receipt of legal aid. As it is, however, this matter is slightly complicated by two provisions contained in the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (as amended) made thereunder. First, there are the provisions contained in section 2 (2) (e) of the Act and regulation 17 to the effect that the liability of an assisted person by virtue of an order for costs made against him is not to exceed the amount (if any) which it is reasonable for him to pay having regard to all the circumstances, including the means of all parties and their conduct in connection with the dispute, and, secondly, there is the provision contained in section 3 of the Act and regulation 16, under which any damages payable to and costs awarded to the defendant will have to be paid to the Law Society, and will become subject to a charge in favour of the Law Society to recoup so much of the solicitor and client costs of the defendant as is not covered by his contribution. I can, of course, direct a set-off of the costs payable by the first plaintiff to the defendant against the costs payable by the defendant to the first plaintiff, and of the costs payable by both plaintiffs to the defendant against the costs payable by the defendant to both plaintiffs (see section 3 (b) of the Act), and this I propose to do. But there may, of course, still be a balance of costs payable by the defendant. The sum of £1,301 odd payable to the defendant by way of damages must, I think, be regarded as part of his "means" within the meaning of section 2 (2) (e), and, as this sum must obviously far exceed any balance of costs which may become payable by him to the plaintiffs or the first plaintiff, I have no difficulty in saying that it is reasonable that he should pay such balances (if any). Indeed, the defendant's counsel did not contend to the contrary. But counsel for the plaintiffs has argued that they ought not to have to pay the damages until after the various sets of costs have been taxed, since the solicitor and client costs of the defendant may amount to a substantial sum, and the balance of the damages ultimately received by the defendant if they are paid over now might be insufficient to cover the balances of costs payable by him. I should not think that this would be at all likely to happen. But plaintiffs suing a legally aided defendant are entitled to every reasonable protection, and, in the circumstances, I propose to direct that one-half of the sum of £600 which was paid into court by the plaintiffs against the defendant's claim for damages, the whole of which would normally be paid out to the defendant in part satisfaction of the damages awarded, shall not be paid to the defendant except on production of an affidavit by the defendant's solicitor to the effect that the costs to be taxed under the order and paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs or to the first plaintiff, have been satisfied either by set-off or payment.

1960

Carr
v.
Boxall.

Cross J.

The order will also give liberty to both plaintiffs and defendant to apply, so that, if any difficulty arises hereafter in connection with any balance of costs payable by the defendant, the matter can be mentioned to the court again.

Another point which was argued before me relates to interest on the sum of £1,301 14s. 3d. payable by the plaintiffs to the defendant. Under section 3 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, the court is given power in any proceedings for the recovery of any debt or damages to award interest on the debt or damages for the whole or any part of the period between the date when the cause of action arose and the date of judgment. Counsel for the defendant asked me to exercise my discretion by giving his client interest at the rate of 4 per cent. from August 1, 1958, to judgment. Counsel for the plaintiffs and the third party, on the other hand, while not denying that I have power to award such interest, submit that such interest should not normally be awarded on unliquidated damages, and that, in any event, it should not begin to run until the date of the report of the official referee which assessed the damages. I cannot accept these submissions. If at the trial on July 24, Danckwerts J. had been able to assess the damages suffered by the defendant up to date, and to make an order for their payment, the defendant would have received interest on the judgment so long as the plaintiffs did not satisfy it, while as soon as it was satisfied he would have had the use of the £1,301 odd and the plaintiffs would have ceased to have had the use of it. The fact that the order was not drawn up until March, 1959, and the award of the official referee was not made until November, 1959, will result, if I do not award interest, in the defendant losing the interest which he would, in one form or another, have received if the damages could have been assessed at the trial. I have no reason to think that the plaintiffs were in any way to blame for the delay which took place in drawing up the order or in prosecuting the inquiry as to damages. But I see no reason why they should reap any benefit from this delay. I therefore propose to direct payment of interest at 4 per cent. on the sum of £1,301 14s. 3d. from August 1, 1958, when the defendant, in fact, reoccupied the kiosk, down to judgment.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Taylor, Willcocks & Co.; Arthur S. Joseph & Cates for MacDonald, Jacobs & Oates, Portsmouth; Bernard W. Main for Bliss, Sons & Covell, High Wycombe.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

* WILSON v. WREXHAM CORPORATION.

1959
Oct. 12, 22.

Lord Parker C.J., Ashworth and Hinchcliffe JJ.

Highway—Private street works—Objection to proposals—Jurisdiction of justices—Resolution to make up street and apportion expenditure on one basis—Service of notices—Further resolution on different basis—Whether valid—Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 57), ss. 6, 7, 10, 11.

On November 29, 1956, a local authority resolved, pursuant to the Private Street Works Act, 1892,[1] to carry out certain private street works, and that the expenditure thereof should be apportioned among the premises fronting, adjoining or abutting the street on a frontage basis. No further steps were taken to implement that resolution and there was no publication and no notices were served upon the frontagers. In September, 1957, the authority passed a second resolution in respect of the same street, amending the first resolution so as to change the basis of apportionment of expenditure from frontage to degree of benefit, and approving the necessary plans, documents and provisional apportionment prepared by the surveyor on that basis. That resolution was duly published and notices thereof served upon the frontagers in accordance with section 6 (3) of the Act. No formal objections were made in respect of [1] Private Street Works Act, 1892, s. 6: "(1) . . . the . . . authority "may from time to time resolve with "respect to [a] street . . . to do . . . "works (in this Act called private "street works) . . . and the expenses ". . . shall be apportioned . . . on "the premises fronting, adjoining, or "abutting on such street . . . (2) The "surveyor shall prepare . . . —(a) A "specification of the private street "works . . . (b) An estimate of "the probable expenses . . . (c) A "provisional apportionment of the "estimated expenses . . . Such specification . . . estimate and provisional "apportionment . . . shall be submitted to the . . . authority, who "may by resolution approve the same ". . . (3) The resolution approving the "specifications, . . . estimates, and "provisional apportionments, shall be "published . . . and copies thereof "shall be served on the owners of the "premises shown as liable to be "charged . . ."

S. 7: ". . . any owner of any "premises shown in a provisional "apportionment as liable to be "charged with any part of the "expenses of executing the works "may, by written notice . . . object "to the proposals . . . on any of the "following grounds . . ."

S. 8 (1): "The . . . authority . . . "may apply to a court of summary "jurisdiction to appoint a time for "determining . . . objections . . . "and . . . any such court may proceed "to hear and determine . . . objections in the same manner . . . and "with the same powers . . . as if "the . . . authority were proceeding "summarily against the objectors to "enforce payment of a sum of money "summarily recoverable. The court "may quash in whole or in part or "may amend the resolution, . . . "estimates, and provisional apportionments . . ."

S. 10: "In a provisional apportionment . . . the apportionment of "expenses . . . shall, unless the . . . "authority otherwise resolve, be "apportioned according to the frontage ". . . but the . . . authority may, "if they think just, resolve that in "settling the apportionment regard "shall be had to the following considerations . . . (a) The greater or "less degree of benefit to be derived "by any premises . . ."

S. 11: "The . . . authority "may from time to time amend the "specifications . . . estimates, and "provisional apportionments for any "private street works, but if the total "amount of the estimate . . . is "increased, such estimate and the "provisional apportionment shall be "published . . . and objections may "be made to the increase and apportionment, . . ."

1959

Wilson
v.
Wrexham
Corporation.

the proposals. However, informal representations were made to the authority by certain of the frontagers, and as a result, on November 28, 1957, a third resolution was passed rescinding the second resolution and restoring the first, thereby changing the basis of apportionment back to frontage. The necessary plans and provisional apportionment on that basis prepared by the surveyor were approved by resolution of the authority and duly published and notices thereof served pursuant to section 6 (3).

One of the frontagers, whose liability under the provisional apportionment had risen from £191 18s. 8d. on the degree of benefit basis under the second resolution to £318 2s. 7d. on the basis of frontage under the third resolution, served notice of objection under section 7 to the latter resolution. At the hearing of the objection it was contended, inter alia, that in the circumstances the authority could not rescind the second resolution and substitute a further resolution, and that once a provisional apportionment had been made on one basis and published, and notices served, there was no power under section 11 to change the basis of apportionment. The notice of objection contained no reference to that contention as a ground of objection, and the justices, having decided against the frontager on the grounds stated in his notice, were of the opinion that he ought to have included in his notice the ground that there had been some material informality defect or error in respect of the third resolution and that his notice was invalid; they accordingly confirmed the provisional apportionment. On appeal:—

Held, that the frontager could not challenge the validity of the third resolution by a notice of objection under section 7 because, if the resolution was a nullity, so also were the publication, the notices, the objection and the hearing before the justices: section 8 (1) did not give justices power to determine a matter which was otherwise completely outside their jurisdiction, and if the frontager wished to pursue his contention that the resolution was ultra vires he should have done so by way of application to the Queen's Bench Division for one of the prerogative writs. The justices, accordingly, were right in confirming the provisional apportionment.

Per curiam: The first resolution was and remained purely a "domestic resolution," for no plans had been prepared, or publication made or notices served in respect of it, while the second, "published resolution," was fully rescinded and abandoned when the third resolution was passed, and the authority were in fact entitled to pass the third resolution.

Semble: Section 11 does not empower a local authority to change by amendment the basis of apportionment in a published resolution.

Case stated by Denbigh justices.

The Wrexham Corporation applied to the justices to hear and determine objections made by the appellant frontager, Robert Donald Wilson, to their proposals to carry out private street works under the provisions of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, in a length of a private street, Windermere Road, Wrexham, and in particular to a provisional apportionment of the estimated expenses of such works of £1,631 15s. in all, and £318 2s. 7d. in so far as it related to the appellant's property.

The following were among the facts found by the justices. The appellant frontager had built, and at all material times was the owner of, a bungalow having a frontage of 104 feet 6 inches to the unmade length of Windermere Road. On November 29, 1956, the highways committee of the corporation resolved in pursuance of the powers conferred on them by the Private Street Works Act, 1892, to do certain street works in part of Windermere Road, and that the expenditure thereof should be apportioned upon the premises fronting, adjoining or abutting on the street according to the respective frontages of such premises. That resolution was confirmed by the corporation on December 18, 1956, but no notices under section 6 (3) of the Act were served upon the appellant.

On September 5, 1957, the committee resolved (A) that in the resolution of November, 1956, "the words 'according to the "'respective frontages of such premises' be deleted 'and the "'following addendum made thereto' that in settling the appor- "tionment regard shall be had to the 'greater or lesser degree of "'benefit derived by any premises from such works.' (B) that "the plans, specifications, sections, estimates and provisional "apportionment now submitted by the borough surveyor relating "to the works . . . be approved and the necessary notices be "published and served in the manner prescribed by the Private "Street Works Act, 1892." That resolution was confirmed by the corporation on September 24, 1957, and was duly published in the manner prescribed by Part II of the Schedule to the Act and notices thereof dated October 17, 1957, were served under the provisions of section 6 (3) on the owners, including the appellant, of the premises shown as liable to be charged. By the notice served on him the appellant was informed that the estimate of the probable expenses of the works amounted to £1,631 15s. and a provisional apportionment had been made under which his liability amounted to £191 18s. 8d.

On November 28, 1957, after representations by certain frontagers had been received by the corporation relating to the provisional apportionment, the committee resolved: (i) that the resolutions (A) and (B) of September 5, 1957, be rescinded, and that the resolution of November 29, 1956, be restored and approved; (ii) that accordingly the borough surveyor should submit a specification, plans, sections, estimate and provisional apportionment for approval to the next meeting of the committee; and (iii) that all notices served on the frontagers liable to be charged and published pursuant to resolution (B) of September, 1947, be withdrawn. The corporation confirmed that resolution on December 17, and on January 9, 1958, the highways committee, and on January 28, 1958, the corporation resolved, that the plans, speci- "fications, sections and provisional apportionment now submitted "by the borough surveyor relating to . . . Windermere Road be "approved and the necessary notices be published and served . . ."

That resolution was published, and notices dated February 13, 1958, served pursuant to section 6 (3) of the Act; by the notice served upon him the appellant was informed that the estimate of the probable expenses amounted to £1,631 15s. and that a provisional apportionment had been made under which his liability amounted to £318 2s. 7d.

1959

Wilson
v.
Wrexham
Corporation.

The appellant served notice of objection under section 7 of the Act objecting to the proposals on the grounds: (a) that the proposed works were insufficient and unreasonable, and that the estimated expenses were excessive; (b) that the provisional apportionment was incorrect in respect of the degree of benefit to be derived by him. At the hearing he did not prosecute his objection on the ground that the proposed works were insufficient.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the corporation could not rescind their previous resolution of September 5, 1957, once the procedure under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, had been invoked by the service of notices under the Act, and that the corporation should have left those making representations to lodge formal objections to the provisional apportionment made pursuant to that resolution, and pursue such objections under the provisions of section 7 of the Act; that section 11 did not permit the corporation to rescind a resolution and withdraw notices served under the Act and substitute a further resolution and serve further notices which had the effect of conferring upon the other frontagers an advantage as against him whose liability was thereby increased; that once a provisional apportionment had been made on one basis and notices served thereunder, the corporation could not by virtue of section 11 change the basis of their apportionment; and that the failure to include in the notice of objection an objection that there had been some material informality, defect or error in respect of the resolution under which the final provisional apportionment had been made did not prevent the appellant from making the above points on the ground that section 7 did not preclude a party to any proceedings from making any objection in point of law. It was also argued that the power afforded to an urban authority under section 11 would not enable it to alter a provisional apportionment of expenses so as to favour one frontager against the others.

On behalf of the council it was contended that the provisions of section 11 in so far as they enabled an urban authority from time to time to amend a provisional apportionment, also enabled the authority to amend the resolution laying down the basis of apportionment pursuant to which the provisional apportionment was made; that if the corporation were not empowered to amend the resolution of September 5, 1957, they were also unable to amend the previous resolution of November 29, 1956; that the appellant was not entitled to challenge the right of the corporation to amend the resolution or to contend that the provisional apportionment was consequently incorrect as he had not included in his notice of objection either of the grounds of objection contained in section 7 (c) and (f) of the Act.

The justices were of the opinion that the estimated expenses were not excessive; that the proposed works were reasonable, and that the provisional apportionment on the basis of frontage was correctly made. They were further of the opinion that the appellant ought to have included in his notice of objection the ground that there had been some material informality, defect or error in or in respect of the resolution of November 28, 1957, and that his notice was therefore defective. They accordingly confirmed the provisional apportionment under which his liability amounted to £318 2s. 7d.

Additional facts are stated in the judgment of Lord Parker C.J.

On October 12, 1959, the court adjourned the hearing for the notices given by the local authority to the appellant to be produced, and the case was further argued on October 22, 1959.

R. G. Woolley for the appellant frontager.
H. Parrish for the council.

The following case was cited in argument: R. & T. Glynn Evans v. Liverpool Corporation.[2]

LORD PARKER C.J. This is an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the County of Denbigh to whom an application was made by the Wrexham Corporation to hear and determine certain objections made by the appellant to a proposal to carry out private street works under the provisions of the Private Street Works Act, 1892. The estimated expenses of such works amounted to £1,631 15s. in all, and £318 2s. 7d. was the provisional apportionment in respect of the appellant's property. It was a difficult matter. The justices went into it in considerable detail, and in the end they came to the conclusion that not only were the proposed works reasonable and the provisional apportionment correct, but they were of opinion that the objections which the appellant sought to make before them were ones which were not included in his grounds of objection, and for that reason also the objections failed.

Until February, 1958, the appellant was the owner of a bungalow having a frontage of 104 feet 6 inches to Windermere Road, which was not then a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, but although he ceased to be the owner he remained under the contract of sale liable to pay all road charges which might become payable in the future, hence his interest in the matter.

The matter arises under the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and before continuing to state what in fact the corporation did, I should refer shortly to a few sections of the Act. By section 6—and I am taking it quite shortly—it is provided that the urban authority may from time to time resolve in respect of a street which is not sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged or channelled, etc., that work of that nature shall be done, and that the expenses incurred in executing the works shall be apportioned on the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such street. That is what I may call a "domestic resolution" of the urban

[2] [1959] 2 Q.B. 249; [1959] 2 W.L.R. 749; [1959] 2 All E.R. 419.

1959

Wilson
v.
Wrexham
Corporation.

Lord Parker
C.J.

authority which is not published. Pausing there, it is provided by section 10 that in that resolution the method of apportionment shall be on a frontage basis unless the urban authority otherwise resolve, but that the urban authority may, if they think just, resolve that the apportionment shall be made having regard to the greater or less degree of benefit to be derived by any premises from such works. Having passed such a resolution, the surveyor in the ordinary way is then instructed to prepare a specification, estimate and provisional apportionment in accordance with the basis already resolved. When those have been prepared the urban authority may pass a resolution approving the specification, estimate and apportionment of the surveyor, and if that is done that resolution, which I will call the "published resolution," has to be published together with his specification, plans, sections, estimates and the like, and copies are to be served on the owners. Each owner of property abutting the street in question has one month in which to make certain objections, and by section 7 it is provided that the objections can be made on one of five different grounds. After the month has expired the urban authority, if there are objections, may apply to a court of summary jurisdiction to hear those objections. The court of summary jurisdiction has then authority to "quash in whole or in part or may amend the "resolution, plans, sections, estimates, and provisional appor-"tionments, or any of them, on the application either of any "objector or of the urban authority." Finally, by section 11, there is power in the urban authority to amend the specifications, plans and sections, estimates and provisional apportionments.

The appellant's frontage was more than the frontages of any of the other owners of dwellings along the street, and a frontage basis would clearly require him to pay considerably more when the total cost was apportioned than if the basis was on the degree of benefit. What happened was this: On November 29, 1958, the corporation resolved under section 6 (1) of the Act to do certain work to this road. In that resolution, which is what I have called a "domestic resolution," they resolved that the provisional cost should be borne on the basis of frontage and not of degree of benefit. However, no steps whatever were taken as the result of that domestic resolution. The surveyor was not asked to prepare any plans; there was no approval, therefore, of his plans, and there were no notices. It remained, and was, purely a domestic resolution.

On September 5, 1957, however, the corporation passed a second resolution, again a "domestic resolution," under which they resolved to change the basis of apportionment from frontage to degree of benefit, and they instructed their surveyor to prepare the necessary documents on that basis. He did so, and they confirmed and approved by resolution what he had done. In other words, on this occasion, unlike the first, they went through the statutory procedure and, having confirmed what the surveyor had done, made the necessary publication and served the necessary notices pursuant to section 6 (3). In fact no formal objections under section 7 were ever made as the result of that resolution, either within a month or at all and, so far as the appellant was concerned, there was, of course, no inducement to him to make any objection because under this resolution his apportionment was on a degree of benefit basis which was more favourable to him than a frontage basis.

On November 28, 1957, however, the highways committee passed yet another "domestic resolution," under which they changed back from the degree of benefit basis to the frontage basis. The surveyor was again asked to prepare plans on that basis. His documents were approved by resolution, and that resolution was published and again the necessary notices were given. Having regard to the change of basis the appellant's apportionment rose from a sum of £191 18s. 8d. to some £318. He did object, and his notice of objection stated the following grounds: "(a) that the proposed works were insufficient and "unreasonable and that the estimated expenses were excessive; "(b) that the provisional apportionment was incorrect in respect "of the degree of benefit to be derived by the appellant." Pausing there, it is quite clear that he had in fact no case under his first objection. It is also clear, I think, that the second objection was completely misconceived, because in fact the new apportionment was not on the degree of benefit basis at all but on a frontage basis. It now becomes clear that the corporation had, in sending him notice of the resolution, specifically drawn his attention to the fact that a change had been made from degree of benefit basis to frontage basis; he therefore knew of it, and how he came to make that second objection I do not quite know. It is only fair, however, to say that at that stage nobody fully appreciated the position.

The justices decided this matter on the ground that nowhere among those objections I have read was any objection made to this change from degree of benefit basis to frontage basis. The court has been rather concerned with that because, as I have said, the position then was by no means clear. But for the letter from the corporation to which I have referred there was nothing to indicate to him what the basis was on which the apportionment was made. Also it appears that he was ignorant at that time of something which he learned later, namely, that the reason for the change from degree of benefit basis to frontage basis was representations made by other frontagers informally and not by way of objection to the resolution of September 5, 1957.

In those circumstances, Mr. Woolley, who has argued this case very well, has submitted a number of arguments to the effect that there was no power in the corporation to pass the resolution as to which the objection was made and the objection determined by the justices. He has a number of arguments. As I understand it, his main argument is really this: that there was here no abandonment of the original scheme but that the original scheme

1959

Wilson
v.
Wrexham
Corporation.

Lord Parker
C.J.

was perpetuated but with a minor amendment, namely, this change from degree of benefit basis to frontage basis, and that there is no power under the Act to amend in that respect. He referred us to section 11 and, although it is not strictly necessary for the decision, I am inclined to agree with his argument that under section 11 it is not possible to change the basis of apportionment. Indeed, it would be odd if there were power, because there is no ground on which a frontager could object unless, as I understand it, the total cost of all the work in the street had gone up. In other words, as between himself and his neighbours, he would have no right of objection whatsoever. Accordingly, Mr. Woolley maintains that there was no power to pass this resolution.

His other argument really leads to the same result, namely, that the corporation had no jurisdiction to pass the resolution. If, however, there was no power to pass that resolution, it was a complete nullity. The publication of it was a nullity. The objections made were a complete nullity. The hearing before the justices was a complete nullity. Accordingly, it would be quite impossible for him to raise that point before the justices. Indeed, if one visualised a third objection having been made to the effect that the resolution in question was ultra vires, there being no jurisdiction to make it, it would have been the duty of the justices to say: "We cannot deal with that." If it is a good point, the only way in which the appellant could get it dealt with would be, as soon as he knew the full facts, to come to this court and apply, if the justices would not adjourn the matter, for prohibition. If, as most likely, they would have adjourned the matter, he could have applied to this court for an order of certiorari to quash the resolution in question as being a complete nullity.

It is right to say that section 8 (1) does say: "The court"—that is, the court of summary jurisdiction—"may quash in whole "or in part or may amend the resolution, plans, sections, "estimates, and provisional apportionments," but I do not think myself that any reliance can be put on those words to give a court of summary jurisdiction power to determine a matter which is otherwise completely outside their jurisdiction. Full effect can be given to those words by enabling them to quash on the merits for good ground shown when there is full jurisdiction in the matter. Accordingly, for my part, I am content to decide this case on the basis that even if the appellant had made this objection before the justices, it was not a matter with which they could deal, and the only way in which he could have the matter dealt with would be coming to this court.

It is only right, however, to go on to say that having heard the argument on both sides I am clear in my own mind that any application to this court would have failed. I am now satisfied that there was no attempt to invoke the powers of section 11, the amending powers, at all. If there had been, there would have been no jurisdiction. I am satisfied without going into the facts in detail to say that the first published resolution was fully rescinded and abandoned. I think that when the resolution in question was made there was a total abandonment of the original resolution with fresh instructions to the surveyor to prepare plans and estimates on the new basis and, accordingly, that that was something which was clearly within the power of the corporation. They were not invoking the powers of section 11, which would not have covered them on the facts of this case. However, the first ground is sufficient for the decision, and on that ground I would dismiss this appeal.

ASHWORTH J. I agree, and it is only out of deference to Mr. Woolley's argument that I add one word or two. In my judgment, the appeal can be disposed of, and should be disposed of, on the first of the grounds mentioned by the Lord Chief Justice. It seems to me that directly the argument is analysed, the appellant is contending that the resolution which was the before the justices was a nullity, yet he was seeking before those justices to raise a contention to that effect and thus invite them to determine their own jurisdiction in this matter. They could only have jurisdiction if the resolution was effective and intra vires, and his contention that it was ultra vires was a matter which should have been pursued in this court by means of one of the prerogative remedies.

Mr. Woolley did raise one further point which I should like to mention. Section 8 (2) of the Act provides: "No objection which "could be made under this Act shall be otherwise made or "allowed in any court proceeding or manner whatsoever." As I understood him, he was saying that that, so to speak, limited the appellant's rights here and indirectly enabled him to raise the contention as to jurisdiction which I have already indicated was not maintainable. As it seems to me, that is an unsound argument because it presupposes an objection which could be made under this Act, and the objections which can be made under the Act are catalogued under section 7 and do not include an objection which goes to the vires or otherwise of the second resolution.

On the second branch of this argument, namely, whether this resolution was in fact intra vires owing to the abandonment of the second one, I have nothing to add. I agree that the appeal fails.

HINCHCLIFFE J. I agree, and there is nothing I can usefully add.

Appeal dismissed.

Solicitors: T. D. Jones & Co. for James, James & Hatch, Wrexham; Sharpe, Pritchard & Co. for Town Clerk, Wrexham.

J. F. L.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

1960
Feb. 2, 3.

Finnemore J.

*JUDD v. HAMMERSMITH, WEST LONDON AND ST. MARK'S HOSPITALS BOARD OF GOVERNORS AND ANOTHER.

[1958 J. No. 5662.]

Damages—Personal injuries—Disability pension—Compulsory contributor to statutory superannuation fund—Injuries resulting in inability to work—Superannuation before normal retirement age—Whether pension to be set off against loss of wages.

The plaintiff had been employed as a local government officer by a metropolitan borough council for 32 years, during which period he had made compulsory contributions to a superannuation fund maintained by the council under the Local Government Superannuation Acts, 1937 to 1955. At the age of 58 he was knocked down, owing to the negligence of the defendants' servant, by an electric truck and received injuries which rendered him incapable of ever working again; as a result he was superannuated and became entitled to receive a pension. On the question whether, in assessing damages, the pension received by the plaintiff until his normal retirement age of 65 ought to be taken into account and set off against his loss of wages:—

Held, that the plaintiff had become entitled to receive the pension, not by reason of the accident, but by reason of the contributions he had made during his service with the council, the benefit of which a wrongdoer should not be allowed to appropriate, and it mattered not that those contributions were compulsory; accordingly, the pension should be disregarded in assessing damages.

Payne v. Railway Executive [1952] 1 K.B. 26; [1951] 2 T.L.R. 929; [1951] 2 All E.R. 910, C.A. applied.

ACTION.

On November 18, 1957, the plaintiff, Frederick Judd, was walking along a road in the grounds of the Hammersmith Hospital, the premises of the first defendants, the Board of Governors of the Hammersmith, West London and St. Mark's Hospitals, towards the physiotherapy department where he was to receive treatment, when he was knocked down and injured by a small electric truck driven by the second defendant, Ernest Albert Treby, the servant of the first defendants. Finnemore J. found that that accident was the fault of the second defendant.

The plaintiff, who was then aged 58, had been employed by the Hammersmith Borough Council as a local government officer since July 6, 1926, some 32 years. At the time of the accident he was suffering from rheumatoid arthritis, for which he was receiving treatment but was able to carry on with his work and to walk about, although he normally used a stick, and used public transport to do his work. He was in very little pain and able to enjoy his life reasonably well. His condition was quiescent and, but for the injuries he received in the accident, inter alia, a fracture of the right femur, he would have been able to continue indefinitely with only a partial disability, and would have remained at work up to the normal retiring age of 65. As a result of the accident he became for all practical purposes a permanent cripple; he was largely confined to a wheel chair, was in continual pain and would never get any better. He had been unable to work since the accident and would never be able to work again, and, on January 5, 1959, owing to his condition, he was superannuated.

During his period of employment with the council the plaintiff had been a contributor to a superannuation fund maintained by the council under the Local Government Superannuation Acts, 1937 to 1955. Under the Hammersmith Superannuation Scheme, 1955, made under the Act of 1953, he had elected to retain his previous superannuation rights under the Shoreditch and Other Metropolitan Councils Superannuation Acts, 1922 to 1951, and in consequence, on retirement he received a superannuation allowance comprising a pension based on 1/80th of his average remuneration over three years in respect of each year of service, and a lump sum payment of 3/80ths of his average remuneration in respect of each year of service. The annual pension amounted to £300 11s. 11d. and the lump sum payment to £901 15s. 7d., the service taken into account in the calculation of those retirement benefits being from July 6, 1926, to January 5, 1959. Had he continued in the service of the council until his 65th birthday, March 9, 1964, he would have received an annual pension of £413 13s. 9d. and a lump sum payment of £1,250 1s. 3d.

This report is solely concerned with the question whether the retirement benefits paid to the plaintiff ought to be taken into account in assessing damages.

Michael Lee for the plaintiff.
John May for the defendants.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

FINNEMORE J. stated the facts and continued: The point of law which has arisen concerns the pension which was granted to the plaintiff under the statutory scheme which applied to him as a local government officer. Ought that to be taken into account, and, between now and his retirement age of 65, be set off against his loss of wages? I was referred to British Transport Commission v. Gourley,[1] which was cited because, while concerned with taxation and, therefore, somewhat removed from the present case, it did deal with the general question whether, when a person is injured through somebody else's fault and is entitled to claim damages by way of compensation, tax must be taken into account and the amount of damages reduced by the amount which would have been paid by the successful plaintiff by way of tax

[1] [1956] A.C. 185; [1956] 2 W.L.R. 41; [1955] 3 All E.R. 796, H.L.

1960

Judd
v.
Hammersmith, etc., Hospitals Board.

Finnemore J.

to the Inland Revenue, on the principle that a person must not make a profit out of his accident but must be compensated only for the actual loss which relates to him. Mr. May referred to the speech of Lord Goddard[2] and said that the principle of remoteness had to be applied, and we shall see in a moment how that may affect the present case. It was held there that tax deduction was not too remote to be considered and to be applied in the reduction of damages.

Mr. Lee cited, as supporting his contention, Payne v. Railway Executive.[3] In that case the plaintiff, a petty officer in the Royal Navy, was seriously injured in a railway accident. He was invalided out of the service very much as the plaintiff here was retired from his service. He, as here, was given a pension on his disability and consequent inability to carry on his work; the pension in the present case amounting to some £300 a year.

The scheme under which the plaintiff paid his contributions was a contractual scheme; the council also made its contributions, and I think that one point made by Mr. May as a sort of second limb of defence, that one ought to divide the pension into two, is based on a fallacy. As everybody knows, in a contributory pension scheme, whilst the employee makes a contribution and the employer—in this case the council—makes one, the amount which the employer contributes has to come from somewhere, and, when there is a scheme of this sort in operation, it would seem, as a matter of common sense, that the wages or the salary paid would have to take into account and reflect the contributions made by the employer, at all events in some degree: it is not just a case of the employee paying so much and the employer paying so much, because it is almost bound to be that the actual wages, or salary, paid would be very likely less than the notional sum which the employee might get if there were no such scheme in operation. But, in any event, that is not the point on which the legal decision depends. The submission in law of Mr. Lee is that the pension has to be disregarded: whether because it is res inter alios acta, or because it is too remote, or because it is wrong to allow a tortfeasor or wrongdoer to benefit by what somebody else has done by way of provision for his future, matters not; nor does it matter if it be the result that the plaintiff benefits to this extent by having his pension and having also his compensation for his loss of earnings.

Payne v. Railway Executive,[4] subject to one matter to which I will refer later, seems to me to be very much in line with the present case, because there it was argued that the pension ought to be taken into account. Sellers J., who tried the case, applied the principle which had been adumbrated in Bradburn v. Great Western Railway Co.[5] decided in 1874, long before modern social

[2] [1956] A.C. 185, 207.

[3] [1952] 1 K.B. 26; [1951] 2 T.L.R. 929; [1951] 2 All E.R. 910, C.A.

[4] [1952] 1 K.B. 26, C.A.

[5] (1874) L.R. 10 Ex. 1.

legislation had to be considered. In that case the tortfeasor claimed that insurance money which the plaintiff received as a result of his injury, for which, of course, he had paid his premiums, ought to be taken into account, but it was held that that was money received because of res inter alios acta. Sellers J. considered that principle and applied it, saying [6]: "The plaintiff has become entitled to the pension by reason "of his naval service, it being one of the benefits such "service affords. The pension would have been paid if the "accident had been without any negligence on the part of the "railway's servants. It was argued for the plaintiff that a "pension must be disregarded in making the assessment just as "insurance is to be disregarded, and that as a matter of principle "a wrongdoer should not get the benefit of the fortuitous "circumstance that the plaintiff was serving in the Royal Navy "at the time and had consequently received a pension. I agree "with that contention. Just as the wrongdoer cannot appropriate "to himself the benefit of the premiums paid by the injured "party to cover accident risks so he cannot, I think, appropriate "the benefits accruing from the injured party's service which "similarly entitles him to those benefits."

Cohen L.J., after quoting the passage I have just read, continued [7]: "I respectfully agree with his conclusion and his "reasoning. It seems to me that the accident in this case was "not the causa causans of the receipt by the first plaintiff of the "disability pension, but the causa sine qua non. The causa "causans was his service in the Royal Navy."

In this case the contributions paid by the plaintiff were compulsory, but that does not matter: it is the contributions made by him during his 32 years' service with the council which entitle him to the money he is now enjoying. The causa causans of the pension was the service of the plaintiff with the borough council and, incidentally, his payment of contributions towards the scheme. Cohen L.J. went on to say that he was all the more ready to arrive at that conclusion because of the difficulty of the Minister of Pensions—and the borough council here does not have the right—in assessing pensions, to take into account damages which might be awarded.

It is also true that Singleton L.J. made the same point, but it seems to me that the ratio decidendi is in the conclusion I have just quoted from the judgment of Cohen L.J., and that Singleton L.J. equally accepted that. First of all, he quoted [8] from the judgment of Pigott B.[9] and said [10]: "And, from another point of "view, I draw attention to the words of Pigott B.[11]: '. . . there "'is no reason or justice in setting off what the plaintiff has "'entitled himself to under a contract with third persons, by "'which he has bargained for the payment of a sum of money

[6] [1952] 1 K.B. 26, 35.
[7] [1952] 1 K.B. 26, 36.
[8] Ibid. 39.
[9] L.R. 10 Ex. 1, 3.
[10] [1952] 1 K.B. 26, 39, 40.
[11] L.R. 10 Ex. 1, 3.

1960

Judd
v.
Hammersmith, etc., Hospitals Board.

Finnemore J.

" 'in the event of an accident happening to him.' Equally, it " can be said that the pension awarded to the plaintiff in the " present case is due to his contract or to his terms of service, " with the Admiralty. In certain circumstances a man serving in " the Navy may become entitled to a pension; that is a factor " which enters into the question of his pay; if there were no " pension rights it is reasonable to assume that the pay would be " higher. Why then should the pension enure for the benefit of a " wrongdoer? I myself should be prepared to adopt the reasoning " of Pigott B. and to hold that the plaintiff does not receive the " pension because of the accident 'but because he has made a " 'contract providing for the contingency.' "

That seems to me to be exactly this case. Possibly, though I do not think it affects the principle, it is a little stronger in this case because the man has obviously contributed to the fund for his future pension.

Singleton L.J. went on to say [12]: " None the less, I prefer to " base my judgment in this case on another ground "—and he dealt with the point of the Minister of Pensions taking into account the question of damages awarded in a successful action brought for negligence.

I think, therefore, on the authority of the Court of Appeal in that case, that I am bound to hold that the pension in this case should not be taken into account in favour of the defendants as against the plaintiff.

The question of assessing damages is an extremely difficult matter. I have to consider, first, what the plaintiff has already lost, which, I think, for practical purposes and taking into account deduction of tax and so on, is the sum of £800. I then have to consider what he has lost in having a lower lump sum gratuity at the end of his service than he would have had, which I put at £350. I have to take away five years half the National Insurance benefits and that is agreed at the figure of £511. I have then to add on the reduction of pension for such term of years as I think is right after the age of 65. As I said, the plaintiff will have a pension of £300 instead of one of over £400. Then, forgetting the pension now, I have to consider what I think is a fair sum to allow him for loss of salary between now and the time when he is 65, again making allowance for the fact that he gets it now without waiting for it; and, secondly, that he still has to face all the mishaps and risks of ordinary life which might cause him to be disabled or, indeed, which might bring his life to an end before he reaches the age of 65. I have to take all those matters into account before arriving at what seems to be, not on any arithmetical basis but, as far as one can do it, on a reasonable and sensible and humane basis, a sum which ought to be given to him in compensation for what he has lost, and what he is likely to go on losing because he can no longer do any work of any kind. Then there has to be added to that what Mr. Lee says is really a much larger sum than that as compensation for pain and suffering, which was very considerable, and for his loss of amenities of life in the sense in which those amenities include any kind of activity.

[12] [1952] 1 K.B. 26, 40.

[His Lordship considered that aspect of the matter and continued:] Doing the best I can with all these matters, in regard to the first matter, that is, the loss already incurred and the loss I have to consider for the future, taking away the 50 per cent. in respect of National Insurance benefits over five years, I think the proper sum of compensation is £3,500, and to that I would add, as general damages for the lamentable condition in which the plaintiff is now, the sum of £5,500.

If I am wrong on the pension point, I would say that the damages are to be reduced by £1,200.

Judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

Solicitors: J. G. Haley; Richard Newton.

J. F. L.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

* LENTON v. TREGONING AND ANOTHER.

C. A.
1960
March 1.
Pearce and Harman L.JJ.

[1956 L. No. 428]

Injunction — Form — Joint or several — Injunction not expressed to restrain severally—Breach of injunction by one defendant—Jurisdiction to commit for contempt.

Contempt of Court — Appeal — Civil contempt — Refusal of committal order—Jurisdiction of Court of Appeal—Discretion or substantive law—Committal order—Appeal from—Jurisdiction.

The plaintiff sought an injunction to restrain the two defendants, husband and wife, from obstructing the roadway to her house. Danckwerts J., by an order dated July 21, 1959, ordered that "the "defendants be restrained from doing by themselves or by their "servants workmen or agents or any of them or otherwise howsoever "the following acts that is to say: (1) obstructing the roadway" in question. The injunction was not expressed to restrain the defendants "and each of them." After the making of the order, the second defendant, the wife, repeatedly obstructed the roadway and on one occasion assaulted the plaintiff and her husband when they were removing obstructions she had placed on it. The plaintiff applied by motion to commit the second defendant for her contempt in obstructing the roadway. Vaisey J. dismissed the motion on the ground that, since the order restrained the defendants jointly and not severally, he was precluded from making an order:—

Held, (1) that an appeal lies from a refusal to commit, but that on a question of discretion the Court of Appeal would be loth to interfere.

(2) But that, on the true construction of Danckwerts J.'s order, the defendants were liable if either of them did an act in contravention of the order, and, accordingly, as there had been a breach of

C. A.
1960
Lenton
v.
Tregoning.

that order by the second defendant, an order committing her to prison should be made.

Dictum of Brett L.J. in Jarmain v. Chatterton (1882) 20 Ch.D. 493, 500, C.A. applied.

Per Harman L.J. It would have been much better to have added in the order "and each of them" or "either of them" as is more usually done.

Appeal from Vaisey J.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Phyllis Mary Vinson Lenton brought an action against Richard Nicholas Tregoning and his wife Mildred Maud Tregoning to restrain them from obstructing the roadway in front of the defendants' premises so as to interfere with its use for vehicular traffic or otherwise interfering with the plaintiff's right of way over it. Danckwerts J. by an order in that action dated July 21, 1959, ordered that "the defendants be restrained "from doing whether by themselves or by their servants workmen "or agents or any of them or otherwise howsoever the following "acts or either of them that is to say (1) obstructing the roadway "which passes in front of the premises of the defendants known "as Vale View, Besore, Truro in the County of Cornwall and "which continues westward along the southern boundary of the "premises of the plaintiff known as Clifton Cottage, Besore, "aforesaid in such a way as to interfere with its use for vehicular "traffic and (2) otherwise interfering with the plaintiff's right of "way over the said roadway."

Mrs. Tregoning, the second defendant, subsequently on numerous occasions placed heavy objects in the roadway. Particulars of the obstructions are given in Pearce L.J.'s judgment. The first defendant had no part in obstructing the roadway being at all material times in hospital.

By motion the plaintiff asked for an order that the second defendant be committed to prison for her contempt in obstructing the roadway mentioned in the order of July 21, 1959. Vaisey J. dismissed the motion holding that, since the order was not expressed to restrain the defendants "and each of them," there was no jurisdiction to commit one of them for breaking the injunction.

The plaintiff appealed.

J. A. R. Finlay for the plaintiff.

The second defendant did not appear and was not represented.

The following cases were mentioned in argument which are not referred to in the judgments: Beckett v. Attwood [1]; Hope v. Carnegie [2]; Hackett v. Baiss [3]; Crowther v. Elgood.[4]

Pearce L.J. This is an appeal from an order of Vaisey J.

[1] (1850) 50 L.J.Ch. 687.
[2] (1869) L.R. 7 Eq. 263.
[3] (1875) L.R. 20 Eq. 494.
[4] (1887) 3 T.L.R. 355; 34 Ch.D. 691, C.A.

dismissing a motion to commit the second defendant for breach of an order made by Danckwerts J. on July 21, 1959.

The order related to a lane which passed in front of the plaintiff's and the defendants' houses and read as follows: "And "it is ordered that the defendants be restrained from doing "whether by themselves or by their servants workmen or agents "or any of them or otherwise howsoever the following acts or "either of them that is to say (1) obstructing the roadway which "passes in front of the premises of the defendants known as "Vale View, Besore, Truro in the County of Cornwall and which "continues westward along the southern boundary of the "premises of the plaintiff known as Clifton Cottage, Besore, "aforesaid in such a way as to interfere with its use for vehicular "traffic and (2) otherwise interfering with the plaintiff's right of "way over the said roadway."

The short point arises before us whether, on the construction of that order, the second defendant can be held in contempt in respect of matters which she did alone, although the order does not specify "the defendants and each of them" or "the "defendants or either of them."

Notice of the judge's order was served on the second defendant and at a later stage, when she was clearly in breach of it, the notice of motion to commit was served on her. On August 2 and 9 there was broken glass strewn on the road. That would be a defiance of that injunction if it was put there by the second defendant. The solicitors for the plaintiff, who had already written to the second defendant on July 24 telling her that she must obey the order, wrote a further letter to her on August 13. On September 13 there was an obstruction of the lane by broken glass and old iron. On that day the second defendant assaulted the plaintiff and her husband when the plaintiff and her husband tried to clear away the obstruction. There was a further assault in similar circumstances on September 14, and on that occasion a rude note was left by the second defendant for the plaintiff. On September 22 the order was served but the obstructions of the lane continued almost daily from then. The various obstructions that were put there were an old wooden door, a tin bath, chests, buckets, sheets of galvanised iron and stones. On October 23 the plaintiff saw the second defendant actually putting obstructions in the lane and on that occasion they consisted of sheets of galvanised iron, biscuit tins, a wooden door, buckets, stones and broken glass. There were other occasions on which she was seen to be doing similar acts.

On December 8 the motion to commit the second defendant was heard. The judge came to the conclusion that he could not make an order of committal on the sole ground of the construction of the order. He came to the conclusion that as it restrained both defendants jointly and not the defendants severally and, as there was no evidence of obstruction by both defendants jointly but

C. A.
1960
Lenton v. Tregoning.
Pearce L.J.

only by the second defendant acting alone, he was precluded from making any order. However, he gave leave to appeal.

An appeal does lie from a refusal to commit although, if it is a question of discretion, this court is very loth to interfere with the judge's decision. In Jarmain v. Chatterton,[1] however, an appeal against a refusal to commit was allowed. The Lords Justices observed that in a matter of discretion they would be slow to allow such an appeal. Brett L.J. said[2]: "Here the "meaning of the order is in dispute, and a considerable question "is raised whether the vice-chancellor did not interpret the order "in a different way from that in which this court has construed "it." His brethren took the same view and they allowed the appeal and made the order to commit.

In this case if it were a question of discretion on the part of the judge I for my part would hesitate long before I interfered with it; but I think that the judge was prevented from exercising his discretion by taking a wrong view of the construction of the order which it is alleged has been broken. The words ". . . "the defendants be restrained from doing whether by themselves "or by their servants workmen or agents or any of them or "otherwise howsoever the following acts . . ." are very wide. Even if, which I doubt, the use of the words ". . . the defendants "be restrained from doing whether by themselves or by their "servants workmen or agents . . ." did not make it a contempt for one defendant alone to do an act in contravention of the order, the addition of the words ". . . or any of them . . ." makes it clear that the defendants are liable if either of them does an act in contravention of the order. Moreover, the words ". . . or "otherwise howsoever . . ." further emphasise that it is intended that any act in breach of the order shall be prevented.

Counsel for the plaintiff has pointed out that this order in its exact form, namely specifying the defendants without adding the words "or either of them," is in the form suggested by Lord Uthwatt in Marengo v. Daily Sketch and Sunday Graphic Ltd.[3] I am satisfied that there has been a breach of that order by the acts of the second defendant.

This is an unhappy case, for the affidavit which we gave leave to read shows that these acts have continued since the hearing of the motion before Vaisey J. It appears to be clear that the second defendant is a person of not very high intelligence and of considerable obstinacy, who is deliberately acting in the way complained of in defiance of the order of the court. The letters which she has written make this plain. It is essential that she should understand that she cannot defy the order of the court and we must commit her to prison. It is to be hoped that either she will herself appreciate that she has been acting foolishly and wrongly or that some other person will manage to persuade her of that. I have no doubt that if she makes suitable apology the court will probably take into account the fact that she is not a person of great intelligence and that she has failed to appreciate the seriousness of what she is doing. However, this is serious and the order must be enforced.

[1] (1882) 20 Ch.D. 493, C.A.
[2] Ibid. 500.
[3] 64 T.L.R. 160; [1948] 1 All E.R. 406, C.A.

I would order that she be committed to prison but the order must not be issued until two exhibits are produced to the court. I would therefore allow the appeal.

HARMAN J. I agree and will only add two or three words. For myself I do not applaud the form in which the order was drawn. It would have been much better to have said "and each "of them" or "or either of them" as is more usually done. Nevertheless, I cannot assent to the judge's view that without those words the order cannot be enforced against the defendants severally. That point, however, it is not necessary to decide because of the additional words "or otherwise howsoever" which seem to me to make the matter tolerably clear. We are not interfering with the judge's discretion but only disagreeing with him on a point of construction. As my Lord has pointed out there is no bar to entertaining the appeal which should be allowed with the limitation which my Lord has proposed.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors: E. P. Rugg & Co. for R. L. Frank & Caffin, Truro.

B. A. B.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

* HENRY ANSBACHER & CO. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

1960
Feb. 18.
Danckwerts J.

Revenue — Stamp duty — Security — Contract for sale — Supplemental guarantee by bank—Contract not a primary document—Whether guarantee "primary security"—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), Sch. 1.

By a contract of sale the appellants agreed to buy all the ordinary stock units of a company, under which, by a date called the first completion date, 61s. was to be paid for every 1s. ordinary stock unit. There was to be also a second payment, the amount of which was not immediately ascertainable because the Federation of Malaya and Singapore had acquired the company's assets and the amount of the compensation was not ascertainable at once, and clause 10 of the agreement provided for payment to trustees, the other parties to the agreement, of the amount as soon as ascertained. Clause 11 provided that the appellants should procure that the payment to the trustees of any sum payable to them under clause 10 be guaranteed by a named bank executing in a specified form a deed of guarantee duly stamped. The bank duly executed a deed expressed to be supplemental to the sale agreement, whereby it guaranteed to the trustees to the extent of £750,000 the due and punctual payment of whatever sum should in the event be payable to them under clause 10 of the agreement on the second completion date. The Inland Revenue Commissioners considered that the sale agreement was a secondary instrument within paragraph (2) to the heading "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant" in Schedule 1 to the Stamp Act, 1891,[1] and that the guarantee was "the only or "principal or primary security for the payment of" the £750,000 within paragraph (1) of that heading, and they accordingly assessed the guarantee to stamp duty at the rate of 5s. for every £100, namely, £1,875. On appeal:—

1960

Ansbacher (Henry) & Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs.

Held, that the sale agreement, not being under seal, was not a document within the heading "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Cove-"nant," but that that did not make the guarantee, which was a secondary security, a primary security within the meaning of the schedule; the guarantee, therefore, remained a secondary document, and was a collateral, auxiliary, additional, or substituted security to a security of another kind to that mentioned in the heading, and, accordingly, the claim for duty was misplaced.

Case stated by the Inland Revenue Commissioners.

The appellants, Ansbacher (Henry) & Co., a private company, presented an instrument, dated December 9, 1957, of guarantee, made between the National Bank Ltd. and Evelyn James Bunbury, Sir Edward Wilshaw and Arnold Wilfred Sarsen, trustees, and expressed to be supplemental to a sale agreement dated October 29, 1957, to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under section 12 of the Stamp Act, 1891, for their opinion as to the stamp duty chargeable upon it.

The commissioners stated, inter alia, that by the instrument the bank guaranteed to the trustees to the extent of £750,000 the due and punctual payment to the trustees of whatever sum should in the event be payable to the trustees on the second completion date under the terms of clause 10 of the sale agreement.

At the date of the sale agreement the Governments of the Federation of Malaya and of Singapore had acquired certain assets of the Oriental Telephone and Electric Co. Ltd., and there were vested in that company certain claims against the Governments for compensation. The sale agreement was made between Evelyn James Bunbury, Charles Penrhyn Ackers, the Right Honourable Malcolm Baron Hailey of Shahpur and Newport Pagnell, Sir Charles Alexander Innes and Sir Edward Wilshaw ("the direc-"tors"), who were expressed to be acting for and on behalf of themselves and all others the holders of ordinary stock of the

[1] Stamp Act, 1891, Sch. 1: "Mort-"gage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant "(except a marketable security other-"wise specially charged with duty) . . . "(1) Being the only or principal or "primary security (other than an "equitable mortgage) for the payment "or repayment of money . . . (2) Be-"ing a collateral, or auxiliary, or "additional, or substituted security "(other than an equitable mortgage) "or by way of further assurance for "the above-mentioned purpose where "the principal or primary security is "duly stamped."

Oriental Telephone and Electric Co. Ltd. who should assent to the terms thereof, and the appellants (called "the purchaser") of the other part.

Clauses 1 and 2 of the sale agreement provided that the directors and the holders of ordinary stock of the Oriental Telephone and Electric Co. Ltd., who should assent to the terms of the sale agreement, should sell and the appellants should purchase all the ordinary stock of the company held by the assenting stockholders, and that the price was to be (A) the sum of 61s. per 1s. ordinary stock unit, to be paid or satisfied as thereinafter provided on the date thereinafter referred to as "the first completion "date," and (B) such a further sum (thereinafter called "the "second instalment") as should be payable under the provisions thereinafter contained, which further sum was to be paid on the date referred to as the "second completion date." Clause 7 (c) provided that the company would execute a deed of appointment (in a form set out in the third schedule) appointing the trustees to be its attorneys, inter alia, to determine or cause to be determined the amount of its claim against the Governments, and clause 8, that after their appointment the trustees should, on the company's behalf, prosecute the claims against the Governments for compensation, and should out of a sum of £200,000 of the company's moneys to be transferred to a separate account of the company at a bank, and out of any compensation received by the trustees pay and discharge certain liabilities therein mentioned.

Clause 9 of the agreement contained provision whereunder on the claims having been finally settled, and on all compensation payable by either of the Governments in respect thereof having been paid to the company (or on its being decided by the trustees that it was not reasonably practicable to recover any further compensation) then, and in either such case, subject to all matters required to enable the second instalment to be calculated having been completed, the amount (if any) payable on the second completion date in respect of each ordinary stock unit of the company (which was to be ascertained in accordance with the provisions of the fourth schedule thereto, and the amount of which was under that schedule dependent, inter alia, on the amount of the compensation) was to be certified as therein provided.

By clause 10 it was provided that on the second completion date as therein defined the appellants should pay or cause to be paid to the trustees as trustees for the asssenting stockholders a sum (being the second instalment) equal to the sum certified under clause 9 thereof multiplied by the number of ordinary stock units sold thereunder by the assenting stockholders.

Clause 11 provided that the appellants should procure that the payment to the trustees of the sum (if any) payable to them under clause 10 should be guaranteed to the extent of £750,000 by the National Bank Ltd., executing and delivering to the trustees on the first completion date a deed of guarantee duly stamped in the form of the draft deed set out in the fifth schedule thereto (being the draft of the guarantee).

1960

Ansbacher (Henry) & Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs.

The sale agreement was expressed to be conditional on the passing by the company in general meeting on or before November 29, 1957, of the special resolution set out in the first schedule thereto, and on the holders of not less than the percentage specified of the ordinary stock of the company accepting its terms in manner therein mentioned on or before November 29, 1957, or such later date as therein provided for. Both conditions had been satisfied and the sale agreement had become unconditional before the date of the guarantee. The sale agreement was signed by each of the directors and by Louis Albert Hart on behalf of the appellants, in each case over a sixpenny adhesive stamp.[2]

On December 10, 1957, the company, in accordance with the provisions in clause 7 (c) of the sale agreement duly executed a deed of appointment in the form of the draft set out in the third schedule thereto appointing the trustees to be its attorneys. On December 9, 1957, the guarantee was executed under the seal of the bank.

The commissioners were of opinion that the sale agreement was not a security within the heading "Bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever," etc., or within the heading "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant," etc., in the First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, or at all, being an agreement for two payments, one of which was wholly unascertainable at the date of the agreement: no instrument (other than the guarantee) securing payment of the purchase-money for the stock or any part thereof and stamped with ad valorem duty, or exempt from such ad valorem duty by statute, had been produced to the commissioners. They were of the opinion that the guarantee fell within the heading "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant (1)" in the First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, and was "the only or principal or primary security for the payment of" the sum of £750,000, and they accordingly assessed it to duty at the rate of 5s. for every £100, namely, £1,875.

The appellants objected to the assessment and contended that the sale agreement was a "security" and the "principal or primary security" for the moneys mentioned therein and in the guarantee and, accordingly, that the guarantee was not the only or principal or primary security within the heading "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant (1)" in the First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, for the moneys mentioned in the guarantee. They further contended that the guarantee was a "collateral, or auxiliary, or additional, or substituted security (other than an equitable mortgage) or by way of further assurance for the above-mentioned purpose where the principal or primary

[2] Finance Act, 1949, s. 35 (1) (a) and Sch. 8, provide that no instrument shall be chargeable with duty under the heading agreement or any memorandum of an agreement as being an agreement or memorandum of agreement for the sale of stock.

"security is duly stamped" within the heading "Mortgage, "Bond, Debenture, Covenant (2)" in the First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, and as such should be liable to duty at the rate of 1s. for every £100 limited to a maximum of 10s. under the provisions of section 7 of the Revenue Act, 1903.

The appellants, having paid the duty in accordance with the assessment in pursuance of section 13 of the Finance Act, 1891, required the commissioners to state a case. The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) Whether the guarantee was liable to the amount of duty assessed by the commissioners: (2) If not, with what amount of duty the guarantee was chargeable.

John Foster Q.C. and G. B. H. Dillon for the appellants.
J. Pennycuick Q.C. and E. Blanshard Stamp for the Crown.

The following cases referred to in argument were not cited in the judgment: Jones v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[3]; National Telephone Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[4]; Durham (County) Electrical Power Distribution Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[5]; British Italian Corporation Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[6]; Independent Television Authority and Associated-Rediffusion Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.[7]

DANCKWERTS J. This is a case of stamp duty and, like most stamp duty cases, it is a troublesome matter. The question arises in this way. There was a contract of sale by which the appellants, a company but not a limited company, agreed to purchase for practical purposes all the ordinary stock units of a company called the Oriental Telephone and Electric Co. Ltd. It was subject to a condition that the shareholders should agree to this transaction; that condition was fulfilled, and therefore I may treat it for practical purposes as a definite contract between the contractors and the appellants for the sale and purchase of all the stock units in that company. The price was to be ascertained in this way. There was to be a payment by a certain date of the sum of 61s. for every 1s. ordinary stock unit, and the date on which that sum was to be paid was the first completion date. The particular date does not matter. The date of the agreement was October 29, 1957, and in the result the first completion date was December 13, 1957. The second payment could not be ascertained at once, because the assets of the company had been acquired by the Federation of Malaya and Singapore, and the amount of the compensation could not be ascertained, but the agreement provided, in effect, that when it had been ascertained the amount should

[3] [1895] 1 Q.B. 484; 11 T.L.R. 78, D.C.
[4] [1899] 1 Q.B. 250; 15 T.L.R. 98, C.A.
[5] [1909] 2 K.B. 604; 25 T.L.R. 672, C.A.
[6] (1957) reported in Sargeant on Stamp Duties, 3rd ed., p. 334; [1921] W.N. 220, C.A.
[7] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 259; [1959] 1 All E.R. 464.

1960

Ansbacher (Henry) & Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs.

Danckwerts J.

be paid off accordingly; there was to be payment of the second sum, the one which was still to be ascertained and which would plainly be ascertained in due course, and then a final payment on the second completion date would take place.

Clause 11 of the agreement provided that the appellants should procure that the payment to the trustees of the sum, if any, payable to them under clause 10 should be guaranteed to the extent of £750,000 by the National Bank Ltd. executing and delivering to the trustees on the first completion date a deed of guarantee duly stamped in the form of the draft deed set out in the fifth schedule thereto, being the draft of the guarantee. Such a guarantee was duly executed by the bank. It was expressed to be supplemental to the sale agreement, and by it the bank guaranteed to the trustees to the extent of £750,000 "the due and "punctual payment to the trustees of whatever sum shall in the "event be payable to the trustees on the second completion date "under the terms of clause 10 of the said agreement." The Commissioners of Inland Revenue having been applied to on the question of what was the proper amount of the stamp duty on the guarantee, duty was paid at the rate of 5s. per cent., which amounts to the sum of £1,875. It is claimed, on the other hand, that the amount of stamp duty on the guarantee should be only 10s. I should add that by virtue of section 35 (1) (a) of the Finance Act, 1949, the agreement for sale has not borne any stamp duty, as being exempted by that section as an agreement or memorandum of agreement for the sale of stock.

I now turn to the provisions under which the claim is made. The claim is made under a heading in the First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891: "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant "(except a marketable security otherwise specially charged with "duty) and Warrant of Attorney to confess and enter up judg-"ment. (1) Being the only or principal or primary security "(other than an equitable mortgage) for the payment or repay-"ment of money," and then there are certain rates—not exceeding £10 and going up to over £100, and for any fractional part of £100 over £300 of the amount secured, 5s. per cent. There is a second paragraph which is material: "Being a collateral, or "auxiliary, or additional, or substituted security (other than an "equitable mortgage) or by way of further assurance for the "above-mentioned purpose where the principal or primary "security is duly stamped." That is the heading under which the payment of stamp duty in the present case is claimed by the commissioners, and it is the only one under which the claim is made, and the other provisions I am about to refer to are only material because of certain decisions which have been given on the provisions of a slightly different character.

Turning back to the First Schedule, there is a heading which starts off with bonds: "Bond, Covenant, or Instrument of any "kind whatsoever. (1) Being the only or principal or primary "security for any annuity (except upon the original creation "thereof by way of sale or security, and except a superannuation "annuity), or for any sum or sums of money at stated periods, "not being interest for any principal sum secured by a duly "stamped instrument, nor rent reserved by a lease or tack." There is also a second paragraph similar to the one relating to the other group: "Being a collateral, or auxiliary, or additional, or "substituted security for any of the above-mentioned purposes "where the principal or primary security is duly stamped." I am not concerned with the question whether a claim might be made under either of the instruments in this case under that head or any other head. I am simply concerned with the claim made by the Inland Revenue in this case under the particular heading I read first of all. The materiality of that other paragraph is, that a number of cases which have been referred to in argument, and it is not necessary for me to go through them, have established, to the surprise of most people who come fresh to this Act, that "security" is not, as one would have supposed, an instrument securing payment of money by land or personal property being charged, so as to make sure that the sum payable shall be discharged, but includes a mere promise to pay, although it is not an instrument which creates security for a debt at all, and although there is no security in the conveyancing sense of the word, and though the debt may be a purely unsecured debt. There is complete authority for that proposition in the cases to which I have been referred. Those cases also establish that if a primary security which is a mere instrument under hand for the purpose of the other heading (not the one which is the material one), has either been stamped with the proper duty or is exempt from duty, any other document which is secondary to it cannot be stamped as a primary document and, at most, may bear the lower rate of duty for which these headings provide.

The claim in this case is really based on this proposition: it is said, it would appear, correctly, that the instrument under hand, the sale agreement, cannot be a mortgage, bond, debenture or covenant within the material heading because it is not under seal; but it is also claimed on the part of the Inland Revenue that it cannot be "the only or principal or primary security" for the purpose of the provisions under these various headings, including in particular any mortgage, bond, debenture or covenant because, for the same reason, it is not under seal; and therefore it is said that it does not come within paragraph 1 of the heading "Mort-"gage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant." That may be perfectly correct, but it does not seem to me that that makes what is, in effect, a secondary security become the primary security within the meaning of the Act. It remains a secondary document even though it is secondary to some document which is not a security under seal within the term "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, "Covenant," and the argument which was put up on behalf of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue supports this result, because, as was pointed out to me, the words in paragraph 2 of the heading "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant" must mean some document which is secondary to the document mentioned in paragraph 1. The guarantee may well be a document which is not a secondary document to any document within paragraph 1 under the heading "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, "Covenant." The result is that it does not come within that heading at all, and it does not become a primary document when it is not a primary document.

1960

Ansbacher (Henry) & Co. v. Inland Revenue Comrs.

Danckwerts J.

That, shortly, is the argument, and if it is analysed in that manner the answer is plain: neither the sale agreement under hand nor the guarantee by the bank under seal is a document within "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, Covenant," and that the guarantee remains a secondary document. It is a collateral, auxiliary, additional or substituted security to a security of another kind than that mentioned in "Mortgage, Bond, Debenture, "Covenant," but it is not by virtue of that, for purposes of that heading, a primary document or the only document, or the only or principal or primary security. The claim for duty is misplaced in the way it was made, and, therefore, the appeal should be allowed with costs and there will be an order for repayment. I have not considered the fixing of the duty because all I have held so far is that it does not come within this heading. I will say 10s., but not under this heading.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors: Herbert Smith & Co.; Solicitor, Inland Revenue.

K. R. A. H.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1960
Feb. 4;
March 17.

Cross J.

* In re JEWISH ORPHANAGE CHARITY ENDOWMENTS TRUSTS.
SEBAG-MONTEFIORE and Others v. ROTHSCHILD EXECUTOR AND TRUSTEE CO. and Another.

[1959 J. No. 5898.]

Charity—Rules—Alteration—Charity established by scheme—Power to alter scheme provided that no "deviation from the main prin-"ciples"—Purported alteration of investment clause—Whether power to alter investment clause—Whether permitted range of investments one of "main principles" of scheme.

Charity—Investments—Variation of powers—Whether power to alter scheme includes power to enlarge investment clause.

A scheme made by the Charity Commissioners in 1876 governing the affairs of an orphanage contained provisions for the alteration or modification of the scheme by resolution confirmed by the Board of Governors. It provided that "no alterations, modifications, or "variations shall be made involving a deviation from the main "principles of this scheme." The scheme contained an investment clause in which the permitted range was wider than that permitted by the Trustee Act, 1859, and at some time before 1910 that power was extended to give a wider power of investment. On September 16, 1959, the Board of Governors duly confirmed a resolution, altering the investment clause so that the power of investment as to one-third of the funds was limited to investments authorised by law and as to two-thirds was extended to include investment in first-class equities. On a summons to determine the validity of the resolution: —

Held, (1) that the provision for modification of the scheme was effective to cover an alteration of the investment clause, for the Charity Commissioners were entitled in a scheme establishing a charity to confer power on someone else to enlarge the original investment clause.

Dictum of Harman J. in In re Tobacco Trade Benevolent Association Charitable Trusts [1958] 1 W.L.R. 1113, 1116; [1958] 3 All E.R. 353 considered.

(2) That a clause prescribing the manner in which funds could be invested could not be regarded as one of the "main principles" of a charitable trust; and that, therefore, the resolution was effective to extend the range of permissible investments.

In re Holloway's Trusts (1909) 26 T.L.R. 62 distinguished.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment: On July 7, 1876, the Charity Commissioners made a scheme amalgamating the Jews' Hospital, Lower Norwood, Surrey, and the Jews' Orphan Asylum, Tenter Ground, Middlesex, into one institution to be called "The Jews' Hospital and Orphan "Asylum." By clause 3 of the scheme the objects of the new institution were stated to be the provision of a home in the institution for, and the maintaining, educating, clothing and apprenticing to industrial employments of, poor children of the Jewish religion, including those deprived of both parents and of one parent only. and the relief of poor aged persons of the Jewish religion. Clauses 4 to 45 of the scheme contained provisions for the government of the institution: there was to be a board of governors consisting of subscribers to the institution, which was to meet at least once a year, and a committee of management. Clauses 46 to 54 provided for the taking over by the new institution of the property and debts of the two existing institutions and for the acceptance of gifts and bequests. Clauses 55 and 57 dealt with the appointment of trustees to hold the property of the new institution. Clause 56 was an investment clause which permitted the investment of the funds of the institution in a specified range of investments somewhat wider than that then authorised by the Trustee Act, 1859. Clauses 58 to 71 dealt with the conditions of admission of beneficiaries and the appointment of salaried officers. Clauses 72 and 73 conferred power to make by-laws and clause 74 gave power to make other provision for the poor aged beneficiaries. Clause 75 was in the following terms: "If, in the opinion of the "committee, any alteration or modification of this scheme shall "be required for any purpose, the committee shall submit the "same to a meeting of the governors. If the said meeting, by a

1960

Jewish Orphanage Charity Endowments Trusts, In re.

"majority not being less than two-thirds of the persons present "thereat, adopt such alteration or modification, the committee "shall submit the same to another meeting of the governors, and "if the said second meeting shall by a majority of the persons "present thereat confirm the same, such alteration or modifica-"tion shall thereupon be made and take effect. If the said first "meeting shall, by a majority, not being less than two-thirds of "the persons present thereat, make any variation in the said "alteration or modification, the said variation shall be considered "by the committee, and if the same shall be adopted by them, "the committee shall submit the said alteration or modification, "with such variation, to a second special meeting, and if the said "second meeting shall, by a majority of the persons present "thereat, adopt the said alteration or modification, with the said "variation, the same shall be made and take effect. Provided "that no alterations, modifications, or variations shall be made "involving a deviation from the main principles of this scheme."

The scheme established in 1876 was altered from time to time under clause 75. At some date before 1910 a resolution was passed purporting to extend the powers of investment contained in clause 56 of the original scheme to cover a considerably wider range, although not so as to include a general power to invest in equities.

On June 22, 1928, the Charity Commissioners made a further scheme by which a separate charity to be known as the "Jews' "Hospital Pension Charity" was set up to carry on the part of the work of the original charity which was concerned with the relief of poor aged persons and the name of the original charity was changed to the Jewish Orphanage. Certain investments forming part of the endowment of the original charity were transferred to the new pensions charity. Some of these were investments which were not authorised under the original investment clause but only under the purported alteration made some time before 1910.

On July 15, 1959, the committee of the Jewish Orphanage, being desirous of further widening the investment powers of the charity, submitted a resolution to the board of governors for the alteration of the investment clause in the scheme so as to limit the power of investment with regard to one-third of the funds to investments authorised by law for the investment of trust funds, but to permit the remaining two-thirds to be invested in first-class equities. The resolution was duly passed and confirmed by the board of governors as required by clause 75 at a further meeting held on September 16, 1959. The Charity Commissioners questioned the validity of that resolution, and the plaintiffs, the managing trustees of the orphanage, took out this summons against the custodian trustee of the charity's funds, the Rothschild Executor and Trustee Co., and the Attorney-General asking whether the resolution was valid and effective to extend the range of permissible investments, or whether it was invalid because the proposed alteration involved a deviation from the main principles of the scheme, and if it were invalid, that the proposed extended range be authorised by the court.

L. H. L. Cohen for the managing trustees.

Martin Roth for the custodian trustee.

Bryan Clauson for the Attorney-General.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Howe v. Dartmouth (Earl) *; Holland v. Hughes †; Baud v. Fardell.‡

Cur. adv. vult.

March 17. CROSS J., reading his judgment, stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the Attorney-General puts the case against the validity of the resolution in two ways. First, he says that so far as paragraph 75 of the scheme does on its true construction purport to cover an alteration of the range of investments permitted by the scheme as originally framed, it can have no legal effect. Alternatively, he says that paragraph 75 of the scheme on its true construction does not cover such an alteration since it would constitute a deviation from the main principles of the scheme.

In support of his argument on the first point, counsel referred to a dictum of Harman J. in In re Tobacco Trade Benevolent Association Charitable Trusts,[1] where the Tobacco Trade Benevolent Association, which was an unincorporated body, by a resolution passed at a general meeting in 1956 introduced a new rule purporting to widen the range of its permitted investments. The association's original rules made in 1860 contained no power of alteration, but in 1871 a rule had been passed at an annual general meeting purporting to confer a power of altering the rules. That rule had been acted upon and the association had made various alterations in its rules in particular in those relating to investments. The decision in the case was that as the original rules conferred on the association no power to alter them, the alteration made in 1871 and any subsequent alterations made in pursuance of it were invalid, but in the course of his judgment Harman J. said[2] that he doubted "Whether, if in the "beginning the rules had provided a power to alter them, the "body could then make use of that power to widen its investment "capacity."

Counsel argued that the doubt expressed by Harman J. was justified. He pointed out that before the Trustee Act, 1859, was passed the 3 per cent.'s investments were the only form of investment which the court recognised as proper for the investment of

* (1802) 7 Ves. 137.
† (1809) 16 Ves. 111.
‡ (1855) 7 De G.M. & G. 628.

[1] [1958] 1 W.L.R. 1113; [1958] 3 All E.R. 353.
[2] [1958] 1 W.L.R. 1113, 1116.

1960

Jewish Orphanage Charity Endowments Trusts, In re.

Cross J.

trust funds. By the various Trustee Acts the range of authorised investments has been greatly widened, but at any given time there are always some investments upon which trustees cannot lawfully invest unless the terms of their trust expressly permit them to do so. Although a settlor or testator has always been able to empower his trustees to invest in non-trustee securities, he cannot, so the argument ran, confer on other people, whether they be the trustees themselves or some of the beneficiaries or some outside person or body, a power to extend the investment clause contained in the settlement; nor can the Charity Commissioners insert such a power in a scheme establishing a charity.

In view of the dictum of Harman J. I thought it right to take time to consider the matter, but on consideration I do not think that his doubt was justified. If a testator or settlor can himself empower his trustees to invest in forms of investment not authorised by law for the investment of trust funds, I do not see on principle why he should not be entitled to confer on someone else a power to enlarge the original investment clause. I do not remember ever having seen such a power in a will or settlement, but that is not surprising, for anyone who was prepared to allow the range of permissible investments to be extended in this way during the life of the trust would normally give his trustees the wider power in the first instance. One can, of course, easily conceive of some exercise of such power which would be invalid; trustees, for example, could not exercise it so as to authorise the investment of trust moneys on loans to themselves. (Compare In re The French Protestant Hospital.[3]) But no question of that sort arises here. I think, therefore, that the first submission of counsel for the Attorney-General fails.

It remains to consider whether the range of investments originally prescribed by clause 56 of the scheme was one of its "main principles." On this point I was referred to the case of In re Holloway's Trusts,[4] where Swinfen Eady J. had to consider a somewhat similar restriction on a power of alteration contained in a trust deed establishing Holloway College; but there the trust deed was divided into a number of parts with separate headings, one of which was "Nature and principles of the "college." It was therefore easy to say that anything outside that part could be altered under the power. Here, however, I have nothing of that sort to guide me. It is clear that it would be a deviation from the main principles of this scheme to alter the objects of the charity to something quite different from the objects laid down in clause 3. But what sort of alteration, short of an alteration of the objects, would constitute a deviation from the main principles of the scheme? Was it, for example, a main principle of the scheme that all the committee should be appointed by the board of governors? If so, the alteration of clause 6 in 1933, under which some members of the committee are to be appointed by orphan aid societies, was invalid. Again, was it a main principle of the scheme that the age of admission of orphans should be from two to eleven? If so, the deletion of clause 63 in 1950 was invalid. Where is one to draw the line? Counsel for the Attorney-General says that however difficult it may be to say on which side of the line some cases fall, a restricted range of investment was in 1876 common form in trusts both private and charitable, and should therefore be regarded as one of the main principles of this scheme. The fact that nowadays it has become common, in private trusts at any rate, to insert a very wide, if not unlimited, investment clause is, he submits, irrelevant. But I cannot think that a clause prescribing the manner in which funds can be invested could, even in 1876, have been regarded or described as a main principle of a charitable trust. I propose, therefore, to declare that the resolution in question effectively extended the range of permissible investments.

[3] [1951] Ch. 567; [1951] 1 T.L.R. 785; [1951] 1 All E.R. 938.

[4] (1909) 26 T.L.R. 62.

Declaration accordingly.
Applicants' and first defendants' costs to be taxed on a trustee basis, and second defendant's costs on a common fund basis, such costs to be paid out of trust fund.

Solicitors: Hyman Isaacs, Lewis & Mills; Treasury Solicitor.

M. G. T.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

* WESTCOTT v. STRUCTURAL AND MARINE ENGINEERS LTD.

1960
March 10.
Lord Parker C.J.

[1958 W. No. 2164.]

Building—Safety regulations—"Temporary platform"—Fixed structure temporarily used as working place—Whether breach of statutory duty—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1145), reg. 24 (1) (5) (d).

By regulation 24 of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948: "(1) . . . every side of a working platform or "working place, being a side thereof from which a person is liable "to fall a distance of more than 6 ft. 6 ins., shall be provided with "a suitable guard-rail or guard-rails. . . . (5) (d) The require-"ments of paragraph (1) . . . shall not apply to a temporary plat-"form which is used only by erectors of structural steelwork or iron-"work for the purposes of bolting-up, riveting or welding work of "such short duration as to make the provision of a platform with "guard-rails and toe-boards unreasonable if (i) the platform is at "least 34 inches wide and (ii) there is adequate handhold and "(iii) the platform is not used for the deposit of tools or materials

[Reported by Miss E. CARYL-THOMAS, Barrister-at-Law.]

1960

Westcott
v.
Structural and Marine Engineers
Ltd.

"otherwise than in boxes or receptacles suitable to prevent the fall "of the tools or materials from the platform."

The plaintiff, a chargehand steel erector employed by the defendants, was engaged in the erection of a new steel tower on a conical base in place of one which had been demolished, and during the process of bolting the new conical base onto a fixed concrete structure he was standing on the concrete structure some 11 ft. from the ground. While he was putting a nut on a bolt he fell and suffered injuries. He sued his employers for damages, alleging, inter alia, a breach by them of regulation 24:—

Held, that "temporary platform" in regulation 24 (5) (d) applied to a platform erected temporarily for a particular purpose, but did not apply to a fixed structure which was being used only temporarily as a working place; paragraph (5) (d), therefore, had no application to the fixed structure on which the plaintiff was working, and the employers' prima facie obligation under regulation 24 (1) to provide a guard-rail or guard-rails was an absolute obligation; accordingly, the defendants were in breach of the statutory duty imposed on them by regulation 24 (1).

Action.

The following facts are taken substantially from the judgment: The plaintiff, Ernest Leonard Westcott, was employed by the defendants, Structural and Marine Engineers Ltd., as a chargehand steel erector. On September 17, 1957, he was sent to the Royal Air Force Station, West Ruislip, to be in charge of the demolition of two steel towers and the erection of similar towers in their places. The towers were standing on conical bases which in turn were bolted onto square brick structures. By October 1 one tower had been demolished and a new one erected in its place; the demolition of the second tower had been completed and the plaintiff was engaged in erecting the new tower. The first part of the construction was to bolt the new conical base onto the brick structure, and for that purpose the old bolts (which were still embedded in the concrete) and the old nuts were used. The plaintiff was tightening the nut on a bolt while standing on the structure some 11 ft. from the ground when he overbalanced, fell and suffered injuries. He sued the defendants for damages, alleging that they were guilty of breach of duty owed by master to servant at common law in that they failed to provide proper plant and equipment and exposed him to unnecessary risk, and also that they were in breach of their statutory duty under (inter alia) regulation 24 of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, in that they failed to provide guard-rails at the plaintiff's working place.

Dudley Collard for the plaintiff.
Peter Ripman for the defendants.

Lord Parker C.J. stated the facts, considered the evidence, found that the plaintiff had been supplied with proper tools for the job, and continued: When one comes to the regulations, the position is more difficult. In the first place, I think that the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, clearly apply. These chimneys, as it seems to me, were part of a building, and the work concerned the demolition and re-erection of part of a building.

The first regulation relied upon is regulation 5, which is dealing with the provision of scaffolds, and provides, so far as it is material: "Suitable and sufficient scaffolds shall be provided for "all work that cannot safely be done on or from the ground." For my part, I think that this was work which would come within the words of work which can be safely done without the provision of a scaffold.

But when one comes to regulation 24, there is no similar qualification. Regulation 24 (1) provides that subject to paragraphs (3), (4) and (5) of that regulation "every side of a working "platform or working place, being a side thereof from which a "person is liable to fall a distance of more than 6 feet 6 inches, "shall be provided with a suitable guard-rail or guard-rails." This concrete on which the two men were working was over 6 ft. 6 ins. from the ground, and it must be, and is conceded, that where they were standing was a working place. Accordingly, prima facie, the obligation arose to provide a guard-rail or guard-rails.

That, as I have said, is subject to certain other paragraphs. The only paragraph which could apply is paragraph (5) (d). [His Lordship read regulation 24 (5) (d) and continued:] Observe that whereas paragraph (1) is referring to "a working platform or "working place," paragraph (5) (d) is referring to "a temporary "platform." In my judgment, "a temporary platform" cannot apply to a working place such as this fixed tower with its concrete platform at the top on which the men were working. That, as I have said, is undoubtedly "a working place," but I am quite unable to see how it could be said to be a "temporary platform." It seems to me that the expression there "a temporary platform" points to and covers the case of a platform erected temporarily for a particular purpose, and does not apply to a fixed structure, part of the building, which is being used as a working place for the time being. "Temporary" there is not, I think, referring to the fact that it is used only temporarily, but that the platform is there only temporarily. Accordingly, if that be right, then sub-paragraph (d), which is really a proviso to paragraph (1), has no application, and the prima facie obligation under paragraph (1) is an absolute obligation to provide a guard-rail or guard-rails. I should add that, even if I am wrong, I think it would be difficult to say that there was here "adequate handhold" within the meaning of sub-paragraph (d).

I confess that I come to that conclusion with some reluctance, because it seems to put a very severe burden on employers in a case such as this, but those who sit in these courts are constantly coming across cases under the regulations where such a harsh burden is put upon employers. Often the obligation is qualified by words such as whether it is "reasonable or reasonably

1960

Westcott v. Structural and Marine Engineers Ltd.

Lord Parker C.J.

"practicable." There is no qualification here; it is an absolute obligation.

Accordingly, in my judgment, these employers were in breach of the statutory duty imposed by regulation 24 (1) of these regulations.

[His Lordship then considered the question of contributory negligence and found that the defendants had not discharged the burden of proof upon them. After considering the evidence in relation to damages, his Lordship awarded the plaintiff £1,643 13s. 7d., which included £893 13s. 7d. agreed special damages.]

Judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

Solicitors: W. H. Thompson; Barlow, Lyde & Gilbert.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1960 March 22.

Roxburgh J.

* MORRIS MOTORS LTD. v. PHELAN.

[1960 M. No. 661.]

PRACTICE NOTE.

Passing off—Goodwill, damage to—Sale of article as new—Motor-car—Injunction to restrain—Terms of injunction.
Injunction—Form—Trap—Injunction to restrain sales of cars as new—Disputed meaning of "new"—Need for definition in injunction.

MOTION.

The plaintiffs, Morris Motors Ltd., moved for an injunction restraining the defendant, John Phelan, "from advertising, offering for sale, or selling any motor-vehicle not being a new motor-vehicle of the plaintiffs' manufacture as and for a new motor-vehicle of the plaintiffs' manufacture and from falsely representing that any motor-car of the plaintiffs' is new when it is to the defendant's knowledge not new." The defendant was willing to treat the motion as the trial of the action, and to give a perpetual undertaking in the terms of the notice of motion set out above.

C. Mayson for the plaintiffs.
F. E. Skone James for the defendant.

It was understood at one time in the trade that "new" meant unused and not second-hand, and it was thought that a car could be advertised as new if it had not been on the road, but it was now realised as a result of the judgment of Wynn-Parry J. in Morris Motors Ltd. v. Lilley [1] that that was not so.

---

[Reported by Miss PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

1960

MORRIS MOTORS LTD. v. PHELAN.

ROXBURGH J. If a special meaning is given to the word "new," as indeed was done in Morris Motors Ltd. v. Lilley,[1] I am not willing to put a defendant under an injunction which is in fact a trap, and on that ground I do not consent to the terms of the notice of motion. The notice of motion must be amended. The decision of Wynn-Parry J. was that a new motor-car did not merely mean unused but that it meant something else. If that is so counsel must redraft the notice of motion so as to embody that decision, even though the notice of motion as it stands is in the same form as the order granted by Wynn-Parry J. The notice of motion should be amended to read: "from advertising, offering "for sale or selling any motor-vehicle of the plaintiffs' manufac- "ture and for a new motor-vehicle of the plaintiffs' manufacture "and from falsely representing that any motor-vehicle of the "plaintiffs' manufacture is new after it has been the subject of a "retail sale by a distributor or dealer, has been registered with "the local county council, has had number plates affixed thereto, "and has been driven away by the purchaser." That form is exactly following the language of Wynn-Parry J.[2]

Solicitors: Osmond Bard & Westbrook; Peacock & Goddard for Rothera, Sons & Langham, Nottingham.

[1] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1184; [1959] 3 All E.R. 737.

[2] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1185, 1186.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

* In the Estate of COOK, DECD.

1960 Feb. 19.

Collingwood J.

Will—Signature—Sufficiency—Description of deceased in own hand in place of signature—"Your loving Mother"—Wills Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26), s. 9.

The words "Your loving Mother" subscribed by the deceased at the foot of her will, and intended by her to represent her name, constitute a sufficient signature according to the requirements of section 9 of the Wills Act, 1837.[1]

PROBATE ACTION.

The deceased made a holograph will which commenced with the words "I, Emma Cook of 38, Maida Vale declare this to be "my last will . . . " and then set out her testamentary dispositions. In the presence of two witnesses the deceased wrote the words "Your loving Mother" at the foot of the document and the witnesses duly attested the same. The deceased then put the

[1] Wills Act, 1837, s. 9: "No will "shall be valid unless it shall be in "writing, and . . . it shall be signed "at the foot or end thereof by the "testator, or by some other person in "his presence and by his direc- "tion. . . ."

1960

Cook, decd., In the Estate of.

document into an envelope on which she wrote "Last will." The plaintiff and the defendants to the action, which prayed that the will be admitted to probate, were the children of the deceased, who were the sole beneficiaries under the will and the persons entitled on an intestacy. Terms of settlement had been signed.

John B. Latey Q.C. and Bryan Anns for the plaintiff.
A. Richard Ellis for the first defendant.
R. Gavin Freeman for the second defendant.

The following case was cited in argument in addition to those referred to in the judgment: Morton v. Copeland.[2]

Collingwood J. In this case there is no doubt that the requirements of the Wills Act, 1837, have been complied with so far as attestation is concerned; the only question is whether the will has been signed within the meaning of section 9 of that Act. [His Lordship referred to the facts and continued:]

Mr. Latey has referred me to several authorities, the most important of which, I think, is In the Goods of Sperling.[1] That was a case where, the deceased having signed his will in the presence of a servant, the servant described himself as "Servant "to Mr. Sperling," not writing his name or giving any further identification. That was held to be a sufficient attestation and subscription, and Sir J. P. Wilde, giving the short judgment, said[2]: "I think that there is a sufficient attestation and subscrip-"tion. I am satisfied that Saunders," that is the servant, "wrote the words which appear on the will, intending thereby an "identification of himself as the person attesting," and I think the same test would be applicable to the case of a testator.

In Baker v. Dening,[3] it was held that under the Statute of Frauds the making of a mark by the devisor, to a will of real estate, was a sufficient signing; and it was not necessary to prove that he could not write his name at the time. In the course of his judgment Coleridge J. said[4]: "I should be sorry if our decision "were to lead to the practice of substituting a mark for a name, "for this might give much opportunity for fraud. But here we "are on the question of law, whether, if a party make his mark, "that be a signature, although he could have written his name. "How can we say that it is not, when we look at the statute and "find what is admitted in argument? The statute has only the "word 'signed'; and it is admitted that, in some cases, this is "satisfied by a mark. When I consider the inconvenience which "would result from inquiring, in all cases, whether the party who "has made a mark could write at all, or could write at the par-"ticular time, I think it would be wrong to raise a doubt by "granting a rule. Rule refused."

[2] (1855) 16 C.B. 517.
[1] (1863) 3 Sw. & Tr. 272.
[2] Ibid. 273.
[3] (1838) 8 Ad. & El. 94.
[4] Ibid. 98.

In In the Goods of Redding[5] a testatrix, having duly executed her will under an assumed name, subsequently altered the will by erasing that name, and signing her true name; but the witnesses did not subscribe the will as altered. Probate was granted of the will as it originally stood, as the court considered the assumed name might be regarded as the mark of the testatrix. Finally, there is the decision in Hindmarsh v. Charlton,[6] in which Lord Campbell L.C., in the course of his speech, said[7]: "I will lay "down this as my notion of the law: that to make a valid sub-"scription of a witness, there must either be the name or some "mark which is intended to represent the name."

Applying those principles to the present case, I am quite satisfied here that the words "Your loving Mother" were meant to represent the name of Emma Edith Cook, the testatrix, and, accordingly, I pronounce for the will in solemn form and the terms of compromise will be made a rule of court.

Solicitors: James B. Holt; Tamplin, Joseph & Flux; Millard & Potts.

E. J.

[5] (1850) 2 Rob.Ecc. 339.
[6] (1861) 8 H.L.Cas. 160.
[7] Ibid. 167.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

* PRACTICE DIRECTION (TRUSTEE'S ABSENCE).

1960
Mar. 2.

Trusts—Abroad, trustee going—Power of attorney—Statutory declaration—To be filed with each power of attorney—Trustee Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 19), s. 25 (4).

The masters of the Queen's Bench Division have agreed that the practice under section 25 of the Trustee Act, 1925,[1] is to require a statutory declaration by the donor to be filed with each power of attorney that is filed, and that no exception to this practice can be made.

William H. Redman,
Secretary to the Masters of the
Queen's Bench Division.

March 2, 1960.

[1] Trustee Act, 1925, s. 25: "(1) A "trustee intending to remain out of "the United Kingdom for a period "exceeding one month may, . . . by "power of attorney, delegate to any "person (including a trust corpora-"tion) the execution or exercise during "his absence from the United King-"dom of all or any trusts . . . vested "in him as such trustee. . . . (4) The "power of attorney shall be attested "by at least one witness, and shall "be filed at the Central Office within "ten days after the execution thereof "with a statutory declaration by the "donor that he intends to remain out "of the United Kingdom for a period "exceeding one month from the date "of such declaration, or from a date "therein mentioned."

[RESTRICTIVE PRACTICES COURT.]

R. P. Ct.† (E. & W.)

1959 Nov. 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 30; Dec. 1, 2, 3, 4, 17, 21.

* In re FEDERATION OF BRITISH CARPET MANUFACTURERS' AGREEMENT.

[1957 No. 12 (E. & W.).]

[1957 No. 13 (E. & W.).]

Restrictive Practices—Restriction—Whether contrary to public interest—Price restriction—Carpet industry—Minimum prices for standard quality carpets—No formula or costings system—Restrictions on discounts and direct sales to consumers—Whether removal of restrictions would result in reduction in export business—Whether benefit or advantages conferred on public—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 68), s. 21 (1) (b) (f).

By two agreements, one made between all the members of the Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers and the other between the federation and all the wholesalers on the federation's wholesale list, the federation controlled the prices of certain qualities of Axminster and Wilton carpets, fixed a wholesale discount of 11–12½ per cent. payable only to all wholesalers on the list, and prevented generally quantity discounts and direct sales by manufacturers to consumer buyers.

The carpets subject to price control were known by the symbols A1 and W1, which denoted carpets containing a prescribed weight of surface yarn. Manufacturers, by putting good quality materials into A1 and W1 carpets, had given them a very good reputation in the trade but the symbols did not signify anything to the general public in the United Kingdom. In Australia and New Zealand the symbols were known to the public, in whose minds a "British "A1" quality stood high. However, there had been a sharp decline in the export trade of the whole carpet industry from 1954 onwards, and an even greater decline in exports of A1 carpets. In 1958, exports accounted for £8,000,000 out of total sales of £71,000,000. The decline in exports was steadily continuing.

The prices for A1 and W1 carpets were fixed by reference to broad market trends and general costs, but no costings system or price formulae were employed. Theoretically, every application for admission to the federation's wholesale list were considered on the basis of certain criteria designed to exclude persons who could not provide a proper wholesale service, but in fact the list was operated arbitrarily.

On a reference by the registrar of both agreements, the restrictions were justified on the ground that their removal would deny the public specific and substantial benefits within paragraph (b) and substantially reduce exports of carpets within paragraph (f) of section 21 (1) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956.[1] The † Upjohn J., Sir Stanford Cooper and Mr. W. L. Heywood.

[1] Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, s. 21: "(1) For the purposes of "any proceedings before the court . . . "a restriction accepted in pursuance "of any agreement shall be deemed "to be contrary to the public interest "unless the court is satisfied of any "one or more of the following cir-"cumstances, that is to say . . . "(b) that the removal of the restric-"tion would deny to the public as "purchasers, consumers or users of "any goods other specific and sub-"stantial benefits or advantages main benefits alleged were the maintenance of standards of quality in Axminster and Wilton carpets at fair and reasonable prices, stability of carpet prices and a cheap and efficient distributive system:—

Held, (1) that since the standards denoted by the symbols A1 and W1 meant nothing to the public, they were of no benefit to it, and that, although they gave to retailers a convenient standard of comparison with other qualities, that was not a matter of substantial benefit (post, pp. 372, 384).

(2) That prices fixed, as these were, arbitrarily and without a recognised costings system could not be guaranteed to be reasonable for the public (post, p. 379).

(3) That price stability in itself was not a benefit but, in any event, on the evidence, abrogation of the restrictions would not lead to undue instability in price (post, p. 385).

(4) That arbitrary selection to the wholesalers' list and the exclusion of genuine wholesalers therefrom had harmed the public and could not be justified, nor could the restriction on direct sales to consumers (post, pp. 382, 387).

(5) That, in view of their rapid decline, no further reduction in exports caused by removal of the restrictions would be likely to be substantial; but that, in any event, the court was not satisfied that the removal of the restrictions would cause any reduction (post, pp. 388, 388–389). Accordingly, the federation had failed to establish their case under either paragraphs (b) or (f) of section 21 (1) and the restrictions must be declared contrary to the public interest.

TWO REFERENCES.

On July 18, 1957, the Registrar of Restrictive Trading Agreements, pursuant to section 20 (2) (a) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, by two notices of reference referred to the court an agreement made between the members of the Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers, and an agreement made between the federation and numerous carpet wholesalers whose names appeared on the list of houses to whom the current rate of wholesale discount might be allowed, numbered 1320 and 1316 respectively on the register of agreements. By representation orders made under rule 11 of the Restrictive Practices Court Rules, 1957, the federation was made sole respondent to the proceedings on the first reference on behalf of all its members, and the Wholesale Floor Covering Distributors' Association respondent to the proceedings on the second reference on behalf of all the wholesalers on the list.

By an order made on November 13, 1958, by consent of all the parties to the proceedings, it was ordered that the two references be consolidated and heard together.

"enjoyed or likely to be enjoyed by "them as such, whether by virtue "of the restriction itself or of any "arrangements or operations resulting "therefrom: (f) that, having regard "to the conditions actually obtaining "or reasonably foreseen at the time "of the application, the removal of "the restriction would be likely to "cause a reduction in the volume or "earnings of the export business "which is substantial either in rela- "tion to the whole export business of "the United Kingdom or in relation "to the whole business (including ex- "port business) of the said trade or "industry. . . . (2) In this section "'purchasers,' 'consumers' and "'users' include persons purchasing, "consuming or using for the purpose "or in course of trade or business "or for public purposes. . . ."

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of the court.

This consolidated reference is concerned with certain trading restrictions which members of the Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers (which we shall call "the federation"), have by a series of agreements bound themselves to observe and also with certain common form agreements which members require wholesalers with whom they deal to enter into. The restrictions fall broadly into two classes: first, a price-cum-quality control of certain qualities of carpet, and secondly, restrictions on trading by placing some limitation on wholesalers with whom manufacturers may deal, by fixing rates of discount and defining the terms on which sales may be made to retailers.

Woven carpets are made of yarns of many differing materials, they may be made of all wool or worsted, man-made fibres, cotton or mixtures of these yarns. The backing may be of cotton, jute, linen, hemp, paper or terylene. Furthermore, carpets may be woven in a variety of different weaves and on a number of different types of loom.

The price-cum-quality restrictions of the federation affect only all-wool or worsted carpets and then only certain qualities known as W1, a Wilton weave, and A1, an Axminster weave.

Carpets, we have been informed, were first woven in Axminster in 1755 and in Wilton from Huguenot times. Carpet manufacture is still carried on in those towns but the main centres of the carpet making industry are, and for many years have been, in Kidderminster, in Scotland and in the North of England. The particular weaves Wilton and Axminster, with which we are concerned, however, originated in the United States of America where the weaving of carpets by power loom was first invented many years ago, but carpets made on these looms were described as Wilton or Axminster no doubt for good commercial reasons. Power looms were introduced in this country under patent licences and one well-known firm—it is best that we should preserve a complete anonymity of names from start to finish of this judgment—introduced a particular quality named "Imperial Axminster" which achieved great success. Other firms began to copy this until Imperial Axminster became the description of a particular quality rather than the production of a particular firm. It acquired world-wide renown as a medium to good quality carpet suitable for domestic use anywhere in a house.

Before the war there were a number of associations of carpet manufacturers who were concerned to protect their mutual interests but none of them attained the position of power and influence now held by the federation. The most important seems to have been the Carpet Manufacturers Association (C.M.A.), formed many years ago, although it was small in numbers compared to the whole industry, but it had a powerful rival in the Allied British Carpetmakers, formed in 1937. The C.M.A.

was a staunch supporter of the Imperial Axminster standard and its members agreed to a specification for the standard comprising total yarn weight and surface yarn weight. During the pre-war years, this specification was upgraded for the reason that individual members of the C.M.A. had been seeking to obtain some advantage over one another by giving a better quality than their competitors within the C.M.A. The members of the C.M.A. agreed among themselves the price at which they would sell Imperial Axminster and this price tended to set the general price for Imperial Axminster throughout the trade.

During this time, too, the C.M.A. devised similar standards and prices for "Super Wilton." This is a more expensive quality than Imperial Axminster and, though used to some extent domestically, is more normally found where harder wear is to be expected, e.g., in hotels. Apart from this price leadership by C.M.A. in these two qualities, there was no price control in the trade so far as is known.

During the 1930s, the carpet industry experienced trouble from the type of trader known as a "brassplater." As the possibility of re-entry of this type of trader into the carpet trade plays an important part in the federation's case, we shall at once explain this phrase.

In the carpet industry the wholesaler plays an important part in the distribution and sale of its products. Some manufacturers will deal only direct with retailers; they have to maintain an elaborate sales organisation of their own. Other manufacturers refuse to deal with retailers at all but deal exclusively with wholesalers; they need only maintain a minimum sales organisation. Most manufacturers, however, deal both with wholesalers and retailers and they regard the wholesaler as part of their selling organisation. Speaking in very general terms the pattern of sales of this last class of manufacturers seems to be that they deal direct with the big retailers in the populous areas, leaving the less populous or more remote areas to be covered by the wholesalers' systems of travellers. The wholesaler may be a specialist in floor coverings or he may be a general wholesaler with a carpet department.

The wholesaler is expected to provide a service for the retailer, i.e., he is expected to have adequate show-rooms where the retailer can see and compare wide varieties of carpets; he is expected to carry reasonable holdings of stock so that the retailer can obtain quick delivery. Finally, the larger wholesaler is expected to provide what is called a "customers' customer" service. This means that a small retailer holding only a small stock can send a member of the general public requiring a carpet to the wholesaler to inspect his range of carpets. The customer chooses a carpet, notes its number and then orders it through the retailer. For these services the wholesaler of course obtains a wholesale discount on the manufacturer's list price to the retailer.

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)
1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

The "brassplater" is a trader who held himself out as a wholesaler but he had no more than a small office from which he conducted business—hence the name. He held no stock, had no showroom and was no more than a commission agent. If he obtained an order from a retailer he merely passed it on to the manufacturer but, representing himself to be a wholesaler, claimed the wholesale discount though performing no service to the retailer or general public.

Frequently, the brassplater would deal direct with the general public and, having low overheads, would be prepared to split the wholesale discount either with the retailer or the public. This enabled him to quote lower prices to the retailer than the manufacturer was prepared to do. Very often he was only in the trade for a comparatively short time. No doubt, he was a thorn in the flesh of the manufacturer, though we are satisfied that some of the evidence as to the gravity of this problem before the war was greatly exaggerated. There was in fact a marked expansion in the industry in the 1930s.

To return to our brief historical survey, on the outbreak of war the overall export trade of the United Kingdom became of vital importance and a carpet export group was set up to encourage the export of carpets, but by 1941 this of course had become impossible. The carpet trade was regarded as a non-essential industry, looms were dismantled and the industry turned itself to the manufacture of a large range of war products.

In 1943, a Carpet Manufacturers Executive Committee was formed to represent the interests of all United Kingdom manufacturers of woollen and worsted carpets.

In June, 1944, a sub-committee of this executive committee was formed under the title "The Post-War Trade Terms Sub-"committee" and it formulated a number of recommendations (subsequently adopted by the executive committee) as to post-war trading. An important part of the recommendations dealt with transactions with wholesalers; broadly speaking they foreshadowed the terms of trading later adopted by the federation.

Towards the end of 1944, raw materials, including wool, became sufficiently available to enable allocations to be made for civilian industrial purposes and The Carpet Trade Rationing Committee, originally constituted on the outbreak of war, resumed its activities. The carpet trade began to resume its activities under a system of licensing from the Board of Trade and a strict system of control on maximum prices at all stages, manufacturing, wholesaling and retailing, was imposed.

The Board of Trade established certain quality standards by reference to the weight of surface yarn and designated each quality by reference to a symbol; maximum prices were established in each weave for each quality. Thus in the Axminster weave four qualities were defined numbered from A0 to A3. The A1 quality was the old Imperial Axminster. In the Chenille weave there were six qualities from C0 to C4. In the Wilton weave there were thirteen qualities from W0A to W7. The W1 quality was the old Super Wilton. In each case the top quality was 0 and the qualities descended progressively.

The establishment of rigid price control which depended on the cost from time to time of raw materials and labour together with the great shortage of raw materials, particularly jute, necessitated continual discussion between the Board of Trade and the Carpet Manufacturers Executive Committee and a body representing the wholesalers known as The Wholesale Floor Covering Distributors Association (W.F.D.A.).

Terms of trading were also reviewed, among other matters. A wholesale list containing the names of wholesalers with whom members might deal was drawn up in 1945 and names were subsequently added to or deleted therefrom. A wholesale rate of discount was established at 10 per cent. with the approval of the Board of Trade. In 1946 a working party was set up by the Board of Trade to examine the carpet industry and it reported in 1947. Among many other recommendations it recommended [2] "That the Carpet Manufacturers' Executive "Committee should be reconstituted with wider functions to "assist in promoting the efficiency of the industry to act as a "channel of communication between the Government and the "industry and to satisfy the Government that proper progress is "maintained and the interests of the community served."

Arising out of that recommendation, the federation was founded in September, 1948. Control of qualities and prices by the Board of Trade came to an end in April, 1952.

The reference of the agreement between the members of the federation comprised the constitution and rules of the federation, a document entitled "Standards of Trading," a list of houses to whom the current rate of wholesale discount might be allowed and a supplementary list of such houses, the undertakings signed by the members of the federation and all resolutions and minutes of committees of the federation which were as such binding upon the members as if the same were contained in or formed part of the agreement or were otherwise expressly or impliedly deemed for the purposes of the Act to be binding upon them.

The agreement between the federation and the wholesalers whose names appeared on the list of houses to whom the current rate of wholesale discount might be allowed comprised a letter from the secretary of the federation to each of the carpet wholesalers on the list, a document signed by each carpet wholesaler on the list, a document containing particulars of the standards of trading together with and including all resolutions and minutes of committees of the federation which were as such binding upon the parties to the agreement as if the same were contained in and formed part of the agreement or were otherwise expressly

[2] (1947) Working Party Reports. Carpets (H.M. Stationery Office), p. 41.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

or impliedly deemed for the purpose of the Act to be binding upon them or any of them.

The objects of the federation, admittedly a trade association as defined in section 6 (8) of the Act as set out in clause 2 of its constitution and rules, were "(a) to promote and advance the "interests of the carpet industry as a whole. (b) to carry into "effect, where practicable, the recommendations of the Working "Party Report for the Carpet Industry, 1947. (c) to assist, "advise, negotiate, and deal with Government Departments "and others on behalf of its members, and to promote, support "or oppose legislative or other measures affecting the carpet "industry. (d) to assist in the procurement of raw and processed "materials when necessary and in their equitable distribution to "the carpet industry. (e) to promote research, development, and "the study of design and colour, and, to assist in these objects, "to contribute to outside bodies dealing with these matters; "to collect and distribute information and statistics which may "be of interest to the carpet industry. (f) to arrange for "representation on the National Joint Committee and District "Joint Councils for the carpet industry and other bodies and to "contribute to the costs. (g) to collaborate with the appropriate "trades unions by supporting the Joint Advisory Council for the "Carpet Industry as a channel through which matters of interest "to the well-being of the carpet industry are discussed, wages "and working conditions being specifically excepted."

A manufacturer, upon applying for membership of the federation, was required to give an undertaking to abide by the federation's standards of trading so long as the manufacturer remained a member of the federation, unless specific notice to contract out had been given to the federation through the secretary in accordance with clause 22 of the constitution and rules concerning any particular clause, or unless the federation decided that the standards should be varied for all members. Clause 22 of the constitution and the rules was as follows: "Any "member shall have the right to contract out of any decision "of the executive committee that relates to a matter not included "in the objects clause 2 (b) to (g) without terminating his "membership of the federation, provided that thirty days' notice "in writing is given to the secretary. Confidential information "on that matter may, however, at the discretion of the executive "committee, be withheld from the member so contracting out."

As from September 1, 1959, the federation's Standards of Trading [3] (which did not apply to carpets with a jute nor cotton

[3] The federation's standards of trading as at the date of the hearing of the reference differed in certain respects from the standards of trading in force as at the date of notice of reference. The principal changes were effected as a result of the decision of the executive committee of the federation on August 26, 1959, that provisions relating to overseas markets should be omitted from the current standards of trading and incorporated with certain modifications into new standards of trading for overseas markets. It was also decided to authorise the sale of pile or to tufted carpets known as such manufactured by members, or to any carpets exported from the United Kingdom) were as follows:

" 1. PRICES.

" (a) Federation Standard Qualities.

" (i) The following qualities known as Federation Standard " Qualities shall not be sold at prices other than the standard " prices fixed for the time being by the federation:

" W1 Figured Woollen	Five frame
" W1 Figured Worsted	Five frame
" A1 Woollen.

" (ii) The finished surface yarn weights of the above- " mentioned standard qualities shall not be less than the " minima per square yard specified below:

		minima per sq. yd.
" W1 Figured Worsted	Five frame	2·35 lb.
" W1 Figured Woollen	Five frame	2·70 lb.
" A1 Woollen		1·35 lb.

" (iii) No five-frame figured worsted or woollen Wilton and " no woollen Axminster carpet containing less than the finished " surface yarn weights above mentioned shall be sold at a price " within 12½ per cent. of the price fixed in respect of the standard " quality in each type.

" (iv) The above does not prevent any carpet containing " more than the finished surface yarn weights above mentioned " from being sold at more than the price fixed in respect of the " standard quality.

" (v) The standard qualities shall be marked as ' Federation " ' Standard Quality ' by label.

" (vi) The above shall not apply to carpets the face yarn of " which is not composed wholly of wool or worsted.

" (b) Change in prices.

" On a change in prices, all goods shall be charged at prices " ruling at the date of invoice or despatch whichever is the " earlier except in the case of specials and contract orders " definitely known to be such and where a firm price regardless " of subsequent rise or fall has been quoted to the member's " customer at the time the order is placed and to be the ultimate " consumer, such goods being distinct from goods ordered for " ordinary stock.

" (c) Price lists.

" Members shall forward to the secretary of the federation a any all-wool pile carpet at more than standard price, provided it contained more than the minimum finished surface yarn weight and was neither described as " A1 " or " W1," as the case might be, nor marked as a federation standard quality. This last alteration had been recommended by the federation's legal advisers as a natural corollary to the executive committee's earlier decision to remove the upper weight limits from the specifications for the standard qualities.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

" copy of their current price list and shall inform him immediately " of any alteration therein.

" (d) Ministry of Works and Admiralty contracts.

" Ministry of Works and Admiralty orders for which tenders " are required shall be entirely free as regards price for com- " petitive quotations, but goods shall be charged up and paid for " on completion of normal manufacture. Normal manufacture " is defined as weaving and finishing and does not include " seaming and/or making up.

" (e) Charges for chlidema squares and for making up squares " other than chlidema.

" (i) Charge for supplying a made-up chlidema square.

" In the case of a made up bordered breadth square there " shall be made an additional charge of 5 per cent. on the price " of the piece goods involved in such square.

" (ii) Charge for supplying an unsewn chlidema square.

" In the case of a bordered breadth square supplied unsewn " the additional charge under clause 1 (e) (i) above shall be " reduced by 1s. per linear yard of piece goods included therein.

" (iii) Charge for making up a square other than a chlidema " square.

" In the case of all other carpets made up from piece goods " and offered for sale as squares, there shall be an increased " charge of not less than 2s. per linear yard of piece goods.

" (iv) Permissible reduction in making up charges.

" In the case of charges to be made under sub-clauses 1 (e) (i) " and 1 (e) (iii) above for squares, if these increase the price " above that of the corresponding standard seamless square the " charges may be reduced so that the prices are equivalent.

" (v) Additional charge—special squares.

" In the case of a chlidema or other square specially made to " a customer's requirements there shall, where applicable, be " made an additional charge in accordance with clause 1 (b) " below.

" (f) Charges for cut lengths or short lengths—narrow loom " goods only.

" (i) Narrow loom goods are defined as those of a width of " less than 6″.

" (ii) In the case of an order for one quality, width, design " and colour which does not include a full piece of not less than " 40 yards in length, involving cutting from a stock piece the " price shall be increased by 10 per cent.

" (iii) In the case of a number of short pieces required for " matching, a weaving charge may be made at the option of the " member in addition to the 10 per cent. short piece charge where " this is applicable.

" (g) Prices for squares, cut lengths or short lengths— " Broadloom goods.

" (i) Broadloom goods are defined as those of a width of 6″ " or over.

"(ii) A piece is defined as one of not less than 25 yards in "length.

"(iii) In relation to the prices for squares, cut lengths or "short lengths, there shall be maintained a differential amounting "to an increase of 5 per cent. as compared with the prices for "piece goods.

"(iv) In the case of a number of short lengths required for "matching a weaving charge may also be made at the option of "the member.

"(h) Charges for fringing.

"Where a square, broadloom, sofa rug, corridor rug, rug or "mat is supplied with ends fringed there shall be made an "additional charge.

"2. TERMS OF TRADING.

"(a) Wholesale List and rate of wholesale discount.

"(i) Wholesale discount shall be granted only to those firms "appearing on the federation's List of Wholesale Houses.

"(ii) Every member of the federation who contracts out of "clause 2 (a) (i) of the Standards of Trading shall send to the "secretary a full list of those firms, other than those whose "names appear in the federation's wholesale list, to whom he "proposes to grant wholesale discount. He shall also obtain "from each such firm and send to the secretary an undertaking "identical with that given by firms whose names do appear on "the federation's wholesale list. He shall keep the secretary "informed of any additional firm to whom he decides to grant "wholesale discount.

"(iii) The rate of wholesale discount allowed shall be that "authorised for the time being by the executive committee of "the federation.

"(b) Cash discount.

"Cash discount of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. only shall be allowed for "payment by the 20th of the month following the date of "despatch or of the invoice whichever is the earlier, subject to "a tolerance, at the discretion of members, of not more than "five days, in special circumstances.

"(c) Quantity discounts.

"Quantity discounts, as under, shall be allowed on contract "orders, required by a retail customer or a buying agency for "one ultimate consumer, such goods being distinct from goods "ordered for ordinary stock:

"(i) 1,000 linen yards $\frac{3}{4}$ width (or equivalent in square yards "for other widths) of any one quality, width, design and colour, "ordered at one time for delivery as ready—5 per cent.

"(ii) Additional widths to complete the contract ordered at "the same time—5 per cent. The above quantity discounts shall "not apply to rugs, mats or squares.

"(d) Patterns, Pattern Books and Cuttings.

"(i) Patterns.

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

"Patterns if sent for special inquiries shall be returnable but "if retained by the customer to hold on show they shall be "charged at list price less 25 per cent. and shall not then be "returnable.

"(ii) Pattern Books and Cuttings.

"Pattern books and cuttings may be supplied on approval.

"(e) Competing for customers own showrooms.

"A discount of 5 per cent. shall be allowed to retail customers "on competing for their own showrooms except in cases where "the 5 per cent. quantity discount is applicable, in accordance "with clause 2 (c) above.

"(f) Jobbing.

"When goods are jobbed, for whatever reason, there shall be "allowed minimum discounts as under:

"To the wholesale 10 per cent.

"To the retail 15 per cent.

"(g) Invoices shall not be forward dated.

"(h) No additional discount shall be allowed for prompt "cash.

"(j) Goods shall not be supplied on 'sale or return' or on "any analogous terms, unless specifically authorised by the "executive committee of the federation.

"(k) Sales shall not be made direct to consumer buyers, i.e., "public bodies, householders, hotels, restaurants, or cinemas. "This does not apply to recognised buying agencies with whom "members and wholesalers shall be free to deal if, in their "opinion, they conform to the definition set out in Appendix "'A.'

"(l) All goods supplied to buying agencies shall be charged "at manufacturers' list prices without deduction of trade discount "or any price concession, other than quantity discount if "appropriate.

"Appendix 'A.' Recognised buying agencies.

"1. A buying agency must be one that acts for a more than "normally large consumer of carpets, e.g., railway and steam-"ship companies, motor-car and aircraft manufacturers, cinema "and hotel furnishers.

"2. The agency shall be established on a permanent basis "and not merely set up to deal with a particular transaction or "requirement.

"3. The agency shall have a staff of carpet planners, fitters "and layers and shall have its own premises for undertaking the "work, or shall subcontract the work to bona fide planners to "the trade, other than retail stockists.

"4. Orders for H.M. Government shall only be supplied "through the Ministry of Works or the Admiralty.

"5. Local authorities. Hospital regional boards and manage-"ment committees and other national bodies shall not be in-"cluded in the definition of a buying agency, except:

"(a) H.M. Office of Works.
"(b) The Admiralty.
"(c) British Railways Executive.
"(d) British Airways Corporations.
"(e) Ministry of Transport."

A wholesaler, upon being added to the federation's list of wholesale houses to whom the current rate of wholesale discount might be allowed, was required to confirm that he would abide by the federation's Standards of Trading and to sign the following undertaking: "In consideration of receiving the current "wholesale trade discount from carpet manufacturers we agree:

"(1) To carry a stock of carpets, carpeting and/or rugs.

"(2) To buy in reasonably large quantities.

"(3) To accept the manufacturers' price as minimum price "to the retailer.

"(4) To retain the whole of the manufacturers' current "wholesale trade discount.

"(5) Not to give any cash discount on payment, or extension "of time for payment, in excess of the corresponding terms "received from carpet manufacturers.

"(6) To offer the goods openly and freely on the market to "any and all retail buyers who purchase for resale.

"(7) Not to sell direct to consumer buyers, i.e., public bodies "(other than H.M. Government), householders, hotels, restau-"rants or cinemas. This does not apply to buying agencies who "are the recognised channel through which purchases for certain "large consumers or groups of consumers are made, and who "conduct their operations in recognised business premises."

The federation formerly had another standard quality carpet —the Chenille Axminster known as C3—but that carpet ceased to be a standard quality carpet on December 7, 1955.

Since the date of decontrol, there had been six price changes in the standard qualities as follows:

	Axminster A1 per sq. yd.		Wilton W1 per sq. yd.
	s.	d.	s.	d.
Maximum prices fixed by last statutory instrument	35	11	58	3
Minimum price at date of decontrol, April 25, 1952	32	4	51	1
June 2, 1952	29	1	48	6
December 1, 1952	32	0	54	7
August 28, 1953	33	7	57	5
September 5, 1955	35	0	60	2
March 28, 1957	36	9	63	3

Although the federation had not yet established its own research unit, it had a technical advisory sub-committee, which maintained contact with and exchanged information with research departments of other interested industries, including the Wool Industries Research Association, the British Jute Trade Research

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

Association, the British Rayon Research Association, and the Linen Industries Research Association. The technical advisory sub-committee also issued regular bulletins on all developments regarding machinery, patents, and other technical matter, and it undertook investigation of all technical questions related to the production of carpets or their usage.

The federation maintained close contact with two outside bodies closely connected with the trade. It had a liaison sub-committee with the Wholesale Floor Covering Distributors' Association, and the National Association of Retail Furnishers. The federation also collaborated with and helped finance the British Carpets Promotion Council, a body formed in conjunction with the International Wool Secretariat to promote the sales of British carpets; the federation had its own Overseas Markets Research Sub-committee which prepared periodical reports on overseas markets.

On October 20, 1959, the executive committee resolved that members be recommended to send out letters to each of their wholesaler customers in the form of a draft letter, prepared by the federation's secretariat, inviting the wholesaler to enter into an individual agreement whereby the terms of trading between the member and wholesaler would be regulated by the conditions set out in a document accompanying the letter: which conditions were the same as those contained in the standards of trading.

The statement of case and answer in each reference were in identical terms. By their statement of case, the federation sought to justify the restrictions imposed under their agreement under section 21 (1) (b), (f) and (g) of the Act. The federation alleged that the public were provided with four specific and substantial benefits by virtue of the restrictions; first, the existence of a standard quality of Axminster all-wool carpet, a standard quality of Wilton figured worsted carpet and a standard quality of Wilton figured woollen carpet which was regarded by the public and by the trade as being constant and undebased in quality at a price which was regarded by the public and the trade as being proper and reasonable; secondly, a substantial degree of stability in the price of carpets resulting in a stable distributive trade, and the creation of sufficient confidence among wholesalers and retailers to maintain adequate stocks of carpets with the consequential advantage to the public of a large freedom of choice; thirdly, a system of distribution of carpets which ensured that the needs of the public were well served through wholesalers and retailers in all areas at a low cost; fourthly, the maintenance of promotional costs in connection with the sale of carpets at a low level.

It contended that removal of the restrictions would result in the following detriments to the public; first, the standard qualities would cease to exist or become so debased that the public and trade would have no confidence in the quality or price of the standard carpets or similar carpets and would be deprived of a standard of comparison of qualities; secondly, the price of carpets would become so unstable that wholesalers and retailers would not maintain sufficiently adequate stocks with resultant lack of choice for the public; thirdly, persons would be enabled to set up as wholesalers or distributors of carpets without carrying sufficient stocks of carpets or providing any or any sufficient service to the public, and discounts paid to wholesalers would increase together with the introduction of discount rebates to retailers, resulting in a narrower choice of carpets being available to the public, the more remote areas of the United Kingdom being inadequately served, and the distributive costs of carpets being increased with consequential price increases to the public; fourthly, the joint advertising and promotion of carpets undertaken by the federation through the British Carpets' Promotion Council would cease and be replaced by individual advertising which would be more costly and be paid for in increased prices to the public or in a deterioration in the quality of carpets.

The federation also contended that the removal of the restrictions would be likely to cause a substantial reduction in the volume or earnings of the export business, in that sales of carpets to countries overseas depended on the maintenance of the standard qualities as constant and undebased qualities and upon their continued recognition as standard qualities, the standard qualities having been recognised and accepted throughout all countries to which carpets were exported from the United Kingdom.

The federation, further, alleged that, if one or more of the restrictions contained in the agreement were not contrary to the public interest, the other restrictions were reasonably necessary for purposes connected with the maintenance of the restrictions found by the court not to be contrary to the public interest.

By his answer, the registrar denied that the public enjoyed or were likely to enjoy any specific or substantial benefits or advantages by virtue of the restrictions, and, if (which was denied) any of the four matters relied on by the federation as being such benefits could be specific or substantial benefits to the public, it was denied that they were enjoyed by reason of the restrictions or any of them or from any arrangement or operation resulting therefrom. The registrar did not admit the existence of a standard constant or undebased quality of any carpet, and alleged, further, that the standardisation of surface weight of yarn did not ensure a good or constant standard of quality which depended upon many factors, and the registrar denied that the standard qualities were regarded as constant and undebased by the public or the trade. He denied that the prices fixed were proper or reasonable, or that they were so regarded by the public or by the trade. He did not admit that there had been a substantial degree of price stability and denied that stability of price was a benefit in itself without regard to the level at which prices were stabilised or to variations in production costs. If (which was denied) stability of price resulted in a stable distributive trade, that was a benefit only to distributors and deprived the more far-sighted purchasers, whether traders or consumers, of the opportunity to meet their needs at lower prices. The registrar did not admit that the degree of price stability (if any) created confidence in stocks or that large stocks were held as a result of the restrictions; nor did he admit that the system of distribution of carpets ensured that the needs of the public were well served or served at all, nor did he admit that by virtue of the restrictions promotional costs were kept at a low level, nor that low promotional costs were a benefit to the public.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

The registrar denied that the removal of the restrictions would deprive the public of any specific or substantial benefits enjoyed or likely to be enjoyed by them, or would cause the standard qualities to cease or become debased, or the public to lose confidence in the quality of carpets, or the price of the standard quality or similar carpets to become unstable or an unstable distributive system to result. He did not admit that the removal of the restrictions would lead to inadequacy of stocks held by retailers or wholesalers or to the entry into the trade of wholesalers carrying insufficient stocks or providing insufficient service or to increased discounts to wholesalers or to the introduction of retail rebates or to a narrower choice of carpets being available to the public or to more remote areas of the United Kingdom being inadequately served. The registrar, in any event, denied that increased discounts or the introduction of retail rebates would increase the cost of distribution or the selling price of carpets to consumers. He denied that the removal of the restrictions would result in increased costs of distribution or in increased prices to the public, and did not admit that the arrangements made in respect of joint advertising were dependent upon the existence of the restrictions or that if they were removed manufacturers would be forced to abandon the arrangements or that they would do so. The registrar denied that the removal of the restrictions would be likely to cause a reduction in the volume or earnings of the export business of the carpet industry. He further denied that, if one or more of the restrictions were found not to be contrary to the public interest, the other restrictions or any of them were reasonably necessary for purposes connected with the maintenance of the restrictions found by the court not to be contrary to the public interest.

Finally, the registrar submitted that all the restrictions contained in the agreement were unreasonable having regard to the balance between the circumstances relied upon by the federation and the detriment to the public resulting or likely to result from the operation of the restrictions. The registrar invited the court's attention to the following matters of detriment: (i) low cost manufacturers were deprived of the opportunity to quote lower prices and so obtain a larger share of the total demand for their products; (ii) the exclusion of competition in price between members, and the consequent removal of a powerful incentive to efficient and economic production and distribution; (iii) the activities of efficient distributors was stultified by the fixing of common discounts and the limitation upon wholesalers entitled to receive discount; (iv) the elimination of scope for special arrangements between manufacturers and particular retailers, having particular requirements to satisfy; (v) the prevention of manufacturers from reducing their prices below the fixed minimum prices; (vi) the discouragement of specialisation aimed at reducing costs, since such manufacturers could not quote lower prices for goods manufactured more efficiently and cheaply; (vii) the veto of the manufacturers over persons wishing to remain in business or establish themselves as wholesalers; (viii) the deprivation to the public as consumers of the benefits likely to be derived from increased competition between wholesalers as the result of the removal of the restrictions concerning wholesalers.

Further facts are stated in the judgment.

J. G. Foster Q.C., R. O. Wilberforce Q.C. and A. R. Barrowclough for the federation and the Wholesale Floor Covering Distributors' Association.

A. A. Mocatta Q.C. and W. A. Bagnall for the registrar.

The following case was cited in argument, in addition to those mentioned in the judgment: In re Wholesale and Retail Bakers of Scotland Association's Agreement and In re Scottish Association of Master Bakers' Agreements.[4]

Cur. adv. vult.

December 17. UPJOHN J. read the following judgment of the court which, after stating the facts set out above, continued: We think that during the period of statutory price control, the symbols A1, W1, C1 and so on were greatly used and became well known in all sections of the trade; manufacturing, wholesaling and retailing. There is no doubt that rightly or wrongly these symbols were regarded in the trade as denoting standards of quality and this was particularly true of the A1 and W1 qualities. If a wholesaler or retailer was offered an A1 or W1 quality he accepted it as such without question.

We are not satisfied that these symbols A1 and W1 became well known as standards of quality in the minds of the general public.

Some no doubt did regard them as denoting a general standard of quality but we believe that many did not and relied entirely on the sales talk of their retailer. Many purchasers were governed entirely either by price considerations or by general appearance, design or colour.

[4] (1959) L.R. 1 R.P. 347; [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1094; [1959] 3 All E.R. 98.

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

Whatever may have been the position when Board of Trade controls applied, we are satisfied that since then so far as the general public is concerned the use of the symbols A1 and W1 in the United Kingdom has virtually come to an end. Manufacturers increasingly sell under their own trade names and not under A1 and W1. No doubt as one of the more important witnesses for the federation stated in his proof, those in the trade would know that the X (trade name) carpet is the Y firm's A1 product but to the general public the symbol A1 or W1 if (as we doubt) it ever carried the assurance of a particular quality, has long since ceased to have any precise meaning in the minds of the general public.

The federation consists at present of some 58 members. Membership has fluctuated and since the end of 1949 there have been eight additions and eighteen resignations. There are about fourteen manufacturers outside the federation. Members of the federation make about 75 per cent. of the total United Kingdom production of "traditional" carpets, i.e., all wool or worsted, mixtures, hair and rayon. Of the outside manufacturers, one who is very large makes about 10 per cent. of total production and two others who resigned from the federation in 1957 together account for another 10 per cent. leaving the remaining 5 per cent. to be split among the remaining twelve outside manufacturers.

There is a remarkable diversity in the range of manufacture by the members of the federation. Some members concentrate largely on A1 and W1 qualities and their major production (up to, in one case, in one year, 100 per cent.) is in these qualities.

At the other end of the scale some members make no A1 or W1 qualities at all.

Then again the proportion of production by any one firm of the various qualities may differ considerably year by year.

Statistics of production within the industry are not important in this case and have not been easy to obtain, but we think such statistics as have been put before us together with the oral evidence, justify the following brief conclusions:

1. The industry as a whole is and has been since the war a prosperous expanding industry. Its condition was described by a federation witness as buoyant.
2. Over the past three years the production of A1 and W1 by federation members taken as a whole has been fairly constant and it is not yet possible to say with any certainty whether there is a trend away from these qualities and other woollen carpets in favour of newer types such as tufted or mixtures containing man-made fibres.
3. Foreign imports have greatly increased since 1953 mainly in carpets containing less than 50 per cent. wool.

It is fair to say that conditions within the industry are competitive.

The federation has in conjunction with the British Carpets Promotion Council undertaken to advertise British carpets. Over 400,000 copies of a booklet "How to Choose and Care for "British Carpets" and 500,000 copies of a booklet entitled "How to Look After Your British Carpet" have been issued to the public. Copies have been in evidence before us. They do nothing to extol any particular qualities. Indeed the first-mentioned publication is at pains to explain Axminster and Wilton are NOT brand names but two major weaving processes. The second publication merely gives hints on the care of carpets generally. The object of this advertising campaign as appears plainly from the Promotion Council's Report for 1957, is to advertise generally the advantages of traditionally woven wool carpets including Wilton and Axminster to try to stem the greatly increased sales of new types of tufted carpets.

The International Wool Secretariat has published brochures for the use of salesmen entitled "Selling Carpets" and "The "Care of Carpets." They are written to promote the sales of British wool carpets in quite general terms.

"Selling Carpets" contains some imaginary conversations with an intending customer and are skilfully devised to induce a sale; it is noteworthy from start to finish that there is no mention of particular qualities.

The International Wool Secretariat has also organised certain training courses for salesmen to educate them to sell more effectively to the public. In addition, carpet fortnights are organised, when retailers make a special display of their goods and there is an advertising campaign in the national press. A slogan may be chosen such as "Carpets Make a Home."

The joint advertising campaign by the Promotion Council is contributed to by members of the federation but in addition there is a grant, which over the past three or four years has been £30,000 annually, made by the International Wool Secretariat and British Wool Marketing Board.

We propose now to summarise the main restrictions which the federation and its members have adopted, leaving over for later consideration a number of ancillary or subsidiary restrictions.

We start with the relevant restrictions as they stand upon the Register of Restrictive Trade Practices today mentioning any previous amendments which may seem material.

The restrictions are contained in a document headed "Stan-"dards of Trading," and at the outset the reader's attention is drawn to the fact that members are entitled to contract out of any particular clause in accordance with clause 22 of the federation's constitution. Then there is a note that the Standards of Trading do not apply to jute or cotton pile carpets nor tufted nor to carpets exported.

Main clause 1 deals with Prices. It provides as follows:

"(a) Federation Standard Qualities

"(i) The following qualities known as 'Federation Standard

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)
1959
Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

" ' Qualities ' shall not be sold at prices other than the standard " prices fixed for the time being by the federation:

" W1 Figured Worsted	Five frame
" W1 Figured Woollen	Five frame
" A1 Woollen

" (ii) The finished surface yarn weights of the above-" mentioned standard qualities shall not be less than the " minimum per square yard specified below:

		" Minimum " per sq. yd.
" W1 Figured Worsted	Five frame	2·35 lb.
" W1 Figured Woollen	Five frame	2·70 lb.
" A1 Woollen		1·35 lb.

" (iii) No five-frame figured worsted or woollen Wilton and " no woollen Axminster carpet containing less than the finished " surface yarn weights above mentioned shall be sold at a price " within 12½ per cent. of the price fixed in respect of the standard " quality in each type.

" (iv) The above does not prevent any carpet containing more " than the finished surface yarn weights above mentioned from " being sold at more than the price fixed in respect of the standard " quality.

" (v) The standard qualities shall be marked as ' FEDERA-" ' TION STANDARD QUALITY ' by label."

There follow a number of ancillary and subsidiary provisions such as making charges for cut lengths and so on.

Sub-clause (iii) has been referred to as the quarantine clause.

Originally a maximum as well as a minimum weight was laid down but a resolution of the Executive Committee of the federation on December 3, 1958, abolished the maximum weight and introduced sub-clause (iv).

Originally too, the prices fixed were minimum prices and the 12½ per cent. quarantine operated above as well as below the minimum price but by a similar resolution on August 26, 1959, a fixed price was substituted and the quarantine only operated on lower qualities. At the same time exported carpets were for the reasons appearing later excluded from the Standards of Trading.

Originally the Chenille Axminster quality C3 was treated as a Federation Standard Quality but that was abandoned on December 7, 1955.

A number of the labels referred to in sub-clause (v) have been put in evidence. An examination of them coupled with the oral evidence we have heard establishes conclusively that in recent years the whole weight of advertising in and by these labels is for the individual manufacturer's brand or trade name. Sometimes the "Federation Standard Quality" is omitted altogether as an act of deliberate policy. In nearly every case where the phrase is still used it is in small unimportant lettering scarcely calculated to bring to the mind of the purchaser that there is such a thing as an A1 or W1 standard or even a British Federation Standard. It strongly supports the view we have already expressed that the ordinary purchaser is quite ignorant nowadays of any such standard or more particularly what is assured by it.

Two things are clear. First, subject only to the 12½ per cent. quarantine, there is no limitation on the prices that may be charged by the manufacturer for carpets outside the standard qualities; this applies whether the carpets in question are above or below the standard. Secondly, the prices fixed for the standard qualities are prices to the retailer. No attempt is made to control the price at which the retailer may sell to the public; he can add whatever "mark-up" he thinks commercially wise to the price he pays the manufacturer or wholesaler.

It was also established that though there is no fixing of prices for other than standard qualities yet the prices of other qualities of woollen and worsted carpets do in fact tend to move in accord—as it was put in evidence—with the price fixed for the standard quality.

Finally, when selling their non-standard ordinary range of carpets appearing in their retailers' price lists from time to time, it does seem customary for manufacturers to refuse to quote prices below the listed prices although we can see nothing in the Standards of Trading to preclude them from doing so. The reason for this will appear later. However, the manufacturer does quote special prices to wholesaler or retailer for special exclusive designs or special non-listed qualities.

We may conveniently deal here with one submission of the registrar. He submits that a standard defined solely by reference to the weight of surface yarn is no true standard at all. The standard provides no test as to the quality of the wool to be woven or the dye to be used and there is no definition of the structure of the carpet or the backing. Hence the standard laid down provides but little guide as to durability, as to fastness of colour and so on. We agree, as indeed did many of the federation's witnesses, that the standard laid down is neither comprehensive nor perfect but the difficulty is to know what more comprehensive yet workable standard can be laid down. The British Standards Institute have been considering this problem for some time and have not yet solved it. The Board of Trade adopted it for the purposes of their controls and, imperfect though it may be, we think it is probably the most useful single standard that can be devised and is entitled to recognition as such. The real truth of the matter is that the manufacturers, always jealous of their reputation, have made the standards A1 and W1 become known within the trade as good and reliable standards because they have in fact put good quality materials, wool, dye, backing, into the standard carpets. One reason for this is the existence of the 12½ per cent. quarantine.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

For example, the standard price of A1 to retailers is now 26s. 3d. so that no member of the federation can sell a lower quality all wool Axminster for more than approximately 23s. This prevents what has been called "debasement," i.e., that if all price controls on the quality standards are removed there will follow (so it is said) a secret and commercially dishonest process of lowering the quality of carpets ostensibly offered as of the standard qualities.

We turn to the second main clause of the Standards of Trading.

"(a) Wholesale List and Rate of Wholesale Discount.

"(i) Wholesale discount shall be granted only to those firms "appearing on the federation's List of Wholesale Houses.

"(ii) Every member of the federation who contracts out of "clause 2 (a) (i) of the Standards of Trading shall send to the "secretary a full list of those firms, other than those whose "names appear in the federation's wholesale list, to whom he "proposes to grant wholesale discount. He shall also obtain from "each such firm and send to the secretary an undertaking "identical with that given by firms whose names do appear "on the federation's wholesale list. He shall keep the secretary "informed of any additional firms to whom he decides to grant "wholesale discount.

"(iii) The rate of wholesale discount allowed shall be that "authorised for the time being by the Executive Committee of "the federation."

These provisions apply to all types of carpets not excluded from the Standards of Trading and not merely to A1 and W1.

There follows in paragraphs (b) to (j) inclusive a number of ancillary or subsidiary provisions dealing with cash discounts, quantity discounts and so on.

Closely bound up with and an integral part of these provisions are the arrangements which members agree to make with the wholesalers on the wholesale list. This forms the subject-matter of the second consolidated reference before us. The respondents are the wholesalers on the wholesale list and are represented before us by the Wholesale Floor Covering Distributors' Association.

Each wholesaler on the wholesale list is required to sign a letter to the secretary of the federation, whereby in consideration of receiving the current wholesale trade discount from carpet manufacturers he agrees (so far as material to this case):

(a) to accept the manufacturer's price as the minimum price to the retailers;

(b) to retain the whole of the manufacturer's current wholesale trade discount;

(c) not to give any cash discount on payment or extension of time for payment in excess of the corresponding terms received from carpet manufacturers;

(d) not to sell to consumer buyers.

The distribution scheme of the federation is thus a clear and coherent whole.

The retailer obtains his carpets whether it be from manufacturer or wholesaler at, but not below, the list price and that no doubt is why the manufacturer will not quote special prices for his ordinary listed range of qualities to the retailer; he must not undercut his wholesaler. The wholesaler (if he is on the wholesale list) for the services he performs in carrying stock and having adequate showrooms receives the wholesale rate of discount. This rate was originally fixed by the federation at 11 per cent. and it is clear this is a low rate of discount compared to similar trades. Between 1952 and 1958, there was much pressure to increase this rate of discount and a number of small members of the federation contracted out of paragraph 2 (a) (i) of the Standards of Trading as they were entitled to do under clause 22 of the constitution. Finally, in 1957, two substantial members (one involving two companies) contracted out and in fact resigned from the federation. Apparently they now allow 12½ per cent. on all sales. It became evident that the line could no longer be held and as from September 1, 1958, the federation fixed a wholesale rate of discount on all carpets below the quality of A1 and W1 at 12½ per cent. It remains at 11 per cent. for A1 and W1 and higher qualities.

The last restriction in the home market with which we propose to deal is that in clause 2 (k) of the Standards of Trading.

Shortly stated, sales must not be made direct to consumer buyers, i.e., public bodies, householders, hotels, restaurants or cinemas.

There are excepted from this provision recognised "buying "agencies" which are defined in an appendix. Briefly, buying agencies are those who supply more than normally large consumers of carpets, e.g., railway and steamship companies, certain government departments but not local authorities, Hospital Boards or nationalised industries except British Railways or British Airways Corporations.

This restriction stands very much on its own and is designed to prevent large consumers from obtaining wholesale terms direct from manufacturers. The argument is that such consumers require a retail service and should therefore be compelled to buy through retailers. Thus, for example, the London County Council whose total requirements for carpets for their own offices, hospitals and schools come to about £20,000 per annum, are compelled to purchase through retailers. Of course, retailers will be prepared to give big local authorities and other large purchasers very favourable terms and one case was proved before us where a retailer was content on one occasion to pass on carpets to the London County Council at the price which he (the retailer) paid; his only profit was the 2½ per cent. discount he received for cash.

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

These large purchasers naturally argue that they should have the opportunity of striving to get the wholesalers' rate of discount or at any rate some part of it.

We shall deal with restrictions on trading in overseas markets at a later stage of this judgment.

We now propose to consider how these restrictions are operated by the federation in practice. We shall consider first the fixing of prices of the standard qualities by the federation and then the method of selection of wholesalers for inclusion on the wholesale list.

The federation do not claim that the price fixed is a low price or a minimum price in the sense of being a stop loss price. They claim it is a proper and reasonable price, a phrase we shall examine later. In marked contrast to the elaborate costings and calculations which we had to consider in the Yarn Spinners' case [1] and the Blankets' case,[2] there is no costings procedure in any accountancy sense whatever. The registrar's accountant made an investigation into the accounts of fourteen firms who were treated as representative. In only two cases were any standard forms of costing adopted and it was difficult to extract any completely accurate or truly comparable figures of cost. However, the accountant's evidence established all that it really set out to do; to prove, namely, that there was a substantial range of cost between the high cost producer and the low cost producer and the price fixed by the federation had no relationship to the costs of individual firms.

As we have stated earlier, the prices were fixed down to the time of decontrol in 1952 by the Board of Trade after negotiations with the old executive committee. When the Board of Trade's accountants were investigating these matters, a figure of 7½ per cent. was taken as a basic margin of profit to be allowed on top of costs.

On decontrol the federation was then in a position to start from those figures and the practice has been to consider not basic costs of materials and costs of conversion but differences in costs of materials or of conversion since the price was last fixed.

Prices are first considered by bodies known as Area Costings Committees. These are not truly sub-committees of the federation but are meetings of manufacturers in each of the three areas. Discussion is very informal and in the more remote areas sometimes merely by telephone. Apparently some information is exchanged but the evidence was very vague. These meetings are no more than preparatory discussions for the quarterly meeting of the Costing and Prices Sub-committee of the federation.

This meeting is attended by the members of the sub-committee and their cost accountants and they have before them reports from the area committee sometimes verbal, sometimes in the form of an aide memoire. As the cost of raw material accounts for about 60 per cent. of the total cost of a carpet the sub-committee first consider any changes in raw material prices and, after discussion, decide what should be accepted as the current price of the raw material. They then go through the same procedure with the costs of conversion.

[1] (1959) L.R. 1 R.P. 118; [1959] 1 W.L.R. 154; [1959] 1 All E.R. 299.

[2] (1959) L.R. 1 R.P. 208; [1959] 1 W.L.R. 442; [1959] 2 All E.R. 1.

They, then, consider whether any change in the prices for the standard qualities is justified, but in doing this the committee does not rely on figures only. As the principal witness on this part of the case said in his proof of evidence, "We rely at "least as much on our collective knowledge and experience of "the carpet business as on the figures themselves. Perhaps "the best way of explaining the matter is to say that the "costings figures produced are relied on as showing trends in "costs and are used as a basis for discussion." The sub-committee then makes a report to the executive committee indicating whether any change of price is justified. The matter is then discussed by the executive committee who make the decision as to any change. This committee meets regularly shortly after the sub-committee and it also takes a very broad view. To quote from the federation's answer to the registrar's questionnaire:

"The Executive Committee reviews the current minimum "prices in the light of the report from the sub-committee but "it also takes account of many other factors, such as current "and future conditions and trends, the season of the year in "relation to sales programmes and other matters not directly "related to costs, before it takes a decision as to whether the "current minimum prices should be changed."

It may fairly be stated that the executive committee has never decided to make any greater increase of prices than that recommended as justifiable by the sub-committee, and, on a number of occasions, has either made no increase or a lesser increase than that suggested by the sub-committee. Since this scheme started in April, 1952, there have only been five changes in prices, one in June, 1952 (downwards), and subsequently in September, 1952, December, 1953, September, 1955, and March, 1957, all upwards. We observe that though the price was last changed in March, 1957, when the price of wool was 108d. per pound and it rose to 110d. for the months of August–October, 1957, it then fell to 106d. in November, 1957, and to 100d. in April, 1958, yet no downward revision has been made. There was no evidence before us that conversion costs have risen during this period to balance the fall in raw material prices.

However, looking at the matter generally, it seems to us clear that prices admittedly fixed by the methods we have stated, give no assurance that they will be reasonable in the interests of the public, whose interests indeed do not seem to be considered at all. Changes in carpet prices for the standard qualities seem to be no more than informed guesses taking into account a large

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

number of factors, many of them not related to costs at all. Prices so fixed cannot fairly be described as other than arbitrary.

We return to the wholesale list. Its avowed object is to keep brassplaters out of the trade and ten criteria have been laid down by the federation as the principal factors to be taken into account when judging suitability for admission to the list. We propose to summarise the more important of them. The applicant must have adequate storage space and showrooms; adequate finance and coverage by travellers. His standing in the carpet trade is considered. The size of his carpet turnover is considered and if it drops to less than £10,000 per annum, he is warned that he may be taken off the list. His general reputation, connection with the retail trade and the general nature of his business are also among the criteria.

Before considering the operation of admissions to and removals from this list, we must give a few statistics. There are at present 193 wholesalers on the list. In their replies to the registrar's questionnaire, the federation stated that between June 1, 1955, and January, 1959, fourteen applicants to the wholesale list had been admitted, 134 rejected and nine deferred. The reason given for rejection of this large number was that the applicant was not a proper firm to be admitted to the list. There seems to be an annual review of those on the list in March of each year. Four were removed and ten warned in March, 1957. As a big manufacturing group resigned in March, 1957, no firm was removed in 1958 but fifteen were warned. Six were removed and seven warned in 1959. Some of those warned had for two or three years turnovers substantially below the critical figure of £10,000 and it is difficult to see why such firms were not removed if the general scheme of the wholesale list was really being operated as it was represented to be. However, it is fair to say that (allowing for readmissions) between 1952 and 1959, 26 have been removed for low turnover and ten for other reasons.

The question of admission to and removal from the wholesale list is dealt with by the federation's Terms Sectional Committee.

We have already pointed out that a manufacturer may contract out of this provision (and we have been told fourteen have done so) but he may not want to do so; however, he may want to see a wholesaler on the list but the committee as a whole think otherwise. In that event, the manufacturer is entitled to put that particular wholesaler on a supplemental list and provided the wholesaler is willing to sign the common form agreement (as to discounts and terms of resale to retailers) that particular member, but no other, is entitled to treat that particular wholesaler as being on the list. A number of manufacturers have exercised this privilege.

When a wholesaler applies to be put on the wholesale list he is sent a questionnaire so framed as to enable the committee to consider which of the criteria he satisfies. The matter is then put before the committee. Any member of the federation may attend these meetings if he is interested but usually there are fifteen or sixteen members who attend regularly.

Two leading members of the federation have given evidence before us as to the operations of the committee and the registrar has called a number of carpet wholesalers and intending carpet wholesalers who have applied for admission to the wholesale list and have been refused.

We are prepared to accept that admission to the wholesale list when it was first administered by the committee was intended to be regulated to keep out the brassplater. However, we are completely satisfied upon the evidence that for some years now the committee has ruled upon applications for admission in an arbitrary manner entirely for the benefit of the manufacturers and the ten criteria are seldom if ever applied in a bona fide way. Their decisions in practice go far beyond the ostensible object of keeping out the brassplater. They keep out, quite arbitrarily, a number of genuine wholesalers who would satisfy, and well satisfy, the principal criteria, and we saw in the witness-box some wholesalers who, if the ten criteria had been seriously applied, must have been admitted to the list. We were told that these matters were discussed at great length in the Terms Sectional Committee, yet the secretary never recorded anything more than the decision. He made no attempt to record the sense of the meeting or state the reasons for any decision and the normal practice is never to give to the applicant any reason for refusal of his application. That, in itself, indicates a failure to operate the ten criteria for the purposes of which the applicant has laboriously but so often, uselessly filled in the questionnaire.

The truth of the matter is that there is no plan for an efficient wholesale coverage of the United Kingdom based on density of populations in geographical areas at all. Each member present at the committee consults only his own interest, that is to say, if he is not concerned to have an extra wholesaler in the particular area where the applicant happens to have his place of business, the manufacturer will not support his application. If it so happens that no one is concerned to support the applicant for this reason, the applicant, however deserving and qualified, has no chance of election, and that is why such a large number of applicants have been rejected.

The witnesses for the federation (who, to be fair to them, gave their evidence with great candour) seem to confuse election to the list with the obligation to supply to those on the list. No manufacturer is bound to supply a wholesaler merely because he is on the list. The federation's principal witness on this part of the case gave perfectly understandable reasons why he, personally, would not supply some of the wholesalers called before us by the registrar. He seemed unable to appreciate the distinction between that and election to the list.

Harm has been done to the public in this arbitrary manner of selection to the list. For example, there is no carpet wholesaler in the Channel Islands. Retailers there can of course see patterns brought by travellers from the manufacturers or wholesalers but if a retailer wants to see a display of carpets he must go to the mainland; yet a perfectly genuine wholesaler in Jersey who would have been capable of providing just that service was refused admission to the list. Notwithstanding the post-war introduction of the large pattern trade (i.e., where travellers take round a large selection of lithographs and big pattern books), this seems to us a serious drawback to local retailers.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

The effect of the joint operation of the wholesale list and the wholesale discount is quite obvious. The wholesalers on the list reluctantly accept these low rates of discount, primarily, because they are on this very select list which diminishes though it does not destroy competition and, secondly, because they hope to make another breach in the rate of discount. The manufacturers have to pay only a low wholesale discount and if they are dissatisfied with the present structure of their selling and distribution organisation, can either actively sponsor an applicant for admission to the list or can put him on the supplemental list.

The federation supports its case on the restrictions agreed between members of the federation under section 21 (1) (b) (f) and (g) of the Act of 1956. It supports its case on the common form agreement with wholesalers under paragraphs (b) and (g) only. We shall consider paragraph (b) first.

We have to decide whether the removal of the restriction would "deny to the public as purchasers, consumers or users "of any goods other specific and substantial benefits or advantages "enjoyed or likely to be enjoyed by them as such whether by "virtue of the restriction itself or of any arrangements or "operations resulting therefrom."

The benefits alleged to be enjoyed by virtue of the restrictions as pleaded and argued before us are as follows:

(1) The existence of the A1 and W1 standards are in themselves of great benefit to the public and to the trade for they are confidently regarded by the public and by the trade as being constant and undebased in quality at prices which are regarded by the public and by the trade as being proper and reasonable and as indicating a constant and undebased quality.

If the scheme is abolished the substantial benefits and advantages which would be denied to the public are alleged to be that these standards would cease to exist or would become debased and the public would have no confidence in the quality or price of such carpets and would be deprived of a standard of comparison of qualities.

(2) The fixing of prices for A1 and W1 qualities ensures a substantial degree of stability in the price of these and of other qualities which results in a stable distributive trade, creates confidence in stocks on the part of wholesalers and retailers so that they maintain adequate stocks.

If the scheme is abolished the substantial benefits and advantages which would be denied to the public are alleged to be that prices would become unstable, there would be in the distributive trade, a lack of confidence and a consequent holding of inadequate stocks for the public and with a resultant lack of choice for them.

(3) The scheme of distribution of carpets ensures that the needs of the public are well served through wholesalers and retailers throughout the country at a low cost.

If the scheme is abolished the substantial benefits and advantages which would be denied to the public are alleged to be that brassplaters will enter the trade, discounts to wholesalers would be increased, allowances by way of annual rebates would be introduced, a narrow choice of carpets would be available to the public, the more remote districts would be inadequately served and the cost of distribution would rise.

(4) The scheme ensures the maintenance of "promotional "costs" that is, advertising costs in connection with sale of carpets at a low level.

If the scheme is abolished, the substantial benefits and advantages, which it is alleged would be denied to the public, are alleged to be that the joint advertising scheme would be abandoned and greatly increased sums expended by individual firms on advertising leading to more expensive carpets or a deterioration in quality.

Counsel have quite properly taken each set of restrictions and examined them in turn and we propose to follow the same course but in the end we shall review the restrictions as a whole, that is, as a planned system of trading activity.

Paragraphs (1) and (2) are directed to the maintenance of a quality price standard and paragraph (3) to the arrangements with wholesalers and we (like counsel) shall so deal with them. Paragraph (4) stands on its own.

As to (1), standard cum price quality. We agree that the maintenance of a standard quality well known to the public is an advantage to it, though whether it would be a specific or substantial advantage is a matter on which we express no opinion, but for the reasons we have given, we are not satisfied that so far as the general public is concerned, the A1 and W1 standards signify any standard of quality. Nevertheless we agree that within the trade A1 and W1 do indicate a quality standard. They are widely accepted as standards for comparison with other qualities and to that extent make it easier for the retailer to form a judgment. If therefore the result of an adverse decision of this court would be to destroy not only the price element but the quality element (an argument we shall examine in a moment) would the loss of a standard quality by itself deny substantial and specific advantages to the public? In the circumstances mentioned above, the denial of advantages (if any) to the general public is de minimis.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

Then as to the position of the retailer section of the public. If the quality standard disappears, it is true he will be deprived of standards of comparison at present available to him. But this is no more than an inconvenience to him. The retailer is in the trade to serve the public, and there was ample evidence that, before the war, experienced retailers were capable of comparing carpets for quality and detecting debasement. If these drills have been forgotten during the post-war control, they must be relearnt and, until they are relearnt, retailers who want good quality carpets will have to go to manufacturers or wholesalers of a high reputation. We feel sure they will not be disappointed.

But what if our conclusions are wrong as to the importance of the quality standard to the general public?

It was the essence of the federation's case that the loss of the quality/price standard would be a serious loss.

It is said that if owing to an adverse decision of this court the price cum quality standard is abolished, that the quality standard must necessarily disappear at the same time because, so it was said, quality not coupled to a price and buttressed by a quarantine was a meaningless phrase. It was urged upon us that the abolition of the price standard would lead to debasement almost overnight and the public would suffer accordingly. Evidence was given as to the position before the war when it was said that lack of price cum quality control led to hopeless debasement of the Axminster qualities in the United States of America; in England it was said that the Brussels weave was debased to virtual extinction

This evidence, we think, was greatly exaggerated. We draw attention to the fact that before the war the industry was an expanding industry and in fact the Axminster Imperial quality was upgraded.

However, pre-war history is not a reliable guide to post-war events. The position today is that this is an expanding, prosperous and buoyant industry. We were told that large sums out of the earnings of the industry have been retained in the industry since the war, and were used to improve premises, plant and machinery. The manufacturers are jealous of their reputations and trade names at home and, as we shall show later, overseas. Little has been heard of federation standards lately. Furthermore, there was no evidence of debasement by firms outside the federation to compete with the latter's A1 and W1 qualities.

If the quality cum price control is abolished, some firms may possibly debase, but we believe that many manufacturers will seize this opportunity to take advantage of the increased standards of living of the public and put on the market, probably under their own trade names, carpets of as high quality as today so that there will be readily available to the public a large range of high quality carpets.

Then as to price. We have already criticised the price fixed by the federation to retailers as being arbitrary. To suggest, as the pleadings do, that the price is regarded by the public as proper and reasonable, is a meaningless phrase. First, because the public are wholly ignorant of the standard price; secondly, because they have to pay a price arbitrarily imposed upon the retailer by manufacturers and in addition whatever mark up the retailer thinks it is commercially prudent to add. If the pleadings intend to suggest that the retail price charged to the public is regarded by them as reasonable, that was not established by evidence and we do not accept it. We believe that if the quality price restriction goes, the force of competition will tend to lower prices and that the public will be offered a large range of excellent carpets at competitive prices.

We shall deal with discounts when dealing with paragraph (3).

We have come to the conclusion that the abolition of the price cum quality standard will deny to the public no benefits whatever.

As to (2), stability of prices. Some degree of stability of prices may be sacrificed if the standard quality price is abolished. But as has been pointed out, in earlier cases in this court,[3] that is not necessarily a bad thing. In any event, after an initial shake-out there seems no reason to expect any undue instability of prices and certainly no instability comparable with the incidence of charging purchase tax.

Increasing competition in both wholesale and retail trade will compel traders who are determined to stay in business to continue to hold adequate stocks giving the public a large variety to choose from. Stability of prices confers no benefit on the public in this case.

Then as to (3), which, in effect, supports the wholesale list and the wholesale rate of discount.

The wholesale list is in our view the most objectionable feature of the whole scheme. It prevents new and enterprising wholesalers from having an opportunity to purchase a proper range of carpets, for we are satisfied that though some manufacturers may refuse to supply some newcomers whom they regard as undesirable wholesalers or as competitors, other manufacturers would do so.

The list also prevents many existing and well-established wholesalers who have not been admitted to it from increasing their range of carpets.

Those now on the list are not subject to so great a spur of competition as they otherwise would be; in short their turnover may to some extent be determined not by their efficiency but by their comparative exclusiveness.

The only possible excuse for such a list is to keep out the brassplater. If the list was operated bona fide in accordance with [3] In In re Yarn Spinners' Agreement (1959) L.R. 1 R.P. 118, 189; In re Scottish Association of Master Bakers' Agreement. Ibid. 347, 376.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

the ten criteria (which we have found as a fact it is not), those criteria go much further than can be justified for that limited purpose. Furthermore, though we understand the anxiety of the industry in connection with the brassplater, the problem is one which is not peculiar to this industry but is a common one particularly in the textile trade. The industry faced it before the war and survived. We have already pointed out that no less than fourteen manufacturers have contracted out of the wholesale list and that is a powerful pointer to the fact that it acts as a drag on freedom of trading. The problem of the brassplater must again be faced and dealt with by the industry and the remedy lies in the hands of the members. This provision certainly does not fall within section 21 (1) (b).

Then as to the wholesale rate of discount. It is possible that the wholesalers will force an increase in the wholesale rates of discount if the list is abolished. Competition may force members to offer bigger discounts for bulk orders or give to retailers quantity discounts of some kind based on orders over the year. These are problems common to every industry and again this is no case for 21 (1) (b); nor is there any ground for believing that these matters will either increase the price of carpets to the general public or decrease the range of carpets available. A number of members have contracted out of this provision and they together with outside manufacturers no doubt give higher rates of discount, yet their prices remain fully competitive. As for inadequate service to remote areas the evidence points to, as we have shown, exactly the opposite result to that claimed.

As to (4), maintenance of promotional costs. Two points arise. One of the witnesses said that without the maintenance of the restrictions, it would be impossible to maintain co-operative advertising. We do not understand why this should be so. We have already pointed out that the whole object of this effort is generally to promote the sale of wool or worsted British carpets regardless of manufacturer or qualities and if it be worth while to continue the scheme supported as it is by a substantial annual grant, the federation will, we believe, do so.

Secondly, it was said that much greater expenditure on advertising by individuals would be required if the promotional costs effort goes.

Even if the abolition of the scheme does lead to greater expenditure on advertising, it by no means follows that the price of carpets will rise and we do not think they will. Some outside manufacturers spend very large sums on advertising compared with members, yet their prices at home are no higher. Advertising is undertaken in the expectation that it will be remunerative by increasing turnover in an expanding market or obtaining a larger share of the existing market. This again is a feature common to all industries and does not satisfy section 21 (1) (b).

Then, we must look at the scheme as a whole for the purposes of section 21 (1) (b). We are prepared to accept the view that the scheme was introduced with the honest intention of giving the public a good service though plainly the federation was in nowise neglecting its own interests.

As the scheme has been operated, however, the result seems to be as follows. The manufacturers benefit greatly by getting from their point of view good prices for their carpets which they fix and by paying a low rate for distribution. The wholesaler fortunate enough to be on the wholesale list has some benefit by reduction in competition. It is a convenience (no more) to the retailer not to have to take some trouble in appraising the quality of carpets, but, on the other hand, he has a less good wholesale coverage. To the general public, we can see no benefit at all. They are paying prices which are probably too high and the retailer to whom they go may not have the range of carpets which he otherwise would have. We think the public will continue to obtain an adequate range of carpets of all qualities if the restrictions are abolished.

The claim under section 21 (1) (b) fails.

Next, we must deal with the restriction prohibiting sales to consumers except through retailers. We do not find any justification for this restriction in the pleadings which appear to be directed only to matters which we have earlier discussed in this judgment. Nor have we been persuaded in argument that there is any justification for it to be found in section 21 (1) (b). It was said that without it the retailer would refuse to deal in the goods of the manufacturer. We do not accept that for a moment. This restriction is plainly bad.

We next consider the federation's case under section 21 (1) (f) in relation to the home trade. The federation have to satisfy us that the removal of the restriction would be likely to cause a substantial reduction in the volume of earnings of the carpet trade export business in relation to the whole business including export business of the carpet trade. The other alternative in the sub-paragraph is plainly inapplicable.

We must start by quoting some statistics though both the registrar and the federation have found it difficult to put reliable statistics before us. Values of export sales ex factory of the whole carpet industry of wool, worsted and mixtures excluding mohair and tufted carpets declined steadily from rather over £12,000,000 in 1954 to just under £8,000,000 in 1958. This must be compared to total home and export sales of such carpets which increased from £65,000,000 in 1954 to £71,000,000 in 1958. It follows that the export trade expressed as a percentage of total sales declined from 18·5 per cent. in 1954 to 11 per cent. in 1958. The export trade is steadily and rather rapidly declining despite the maintenance of the price quality standards of W1 and A1.

During this time, the exports of 48 of the federation's members (who, however, exported 98 per cent. of all federation

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

exports of woollen and worsted carpets) of A1 quality fell from nearly £5,000,000 in 1954 to just over £3,000,000 in 1958. Exports of W1 during this time were, apparently, much smaller. During this time the percentage of exports of A1 to total exports of the 48 federation members fell from 56 per cent. to 45 per cent.

It is clear that in a rapidly declining export market the proportion of exports of A1 is also declining. There seems little ground, therefore, for anticipating that the abolition of the standard quality cum price would be likely per se to cause a substantial reduction in the export trade. The figures suggest that a reduction is likely to occur in any event. This case fails on these figures.

However, we heard some evidence upon this matter. Exports to Australasia account for rather more than half of the total exports of United Kingdom carpet manufacturers. It was proved by evidence called by the federation that the exports of British manufacturers to these Dominions depend on their ability to offer goods of high quality.

Since the war, a substantial local carpet manufacturing industry has been built up in Australasia. They still use the same symbols as were in earlier days in use in the trade here such as A1, 2, 3. Moreover it is clear from the Australian and New Zealand newspaper advertisements that we have seen that these qualities are brought to the notice of the purchasing public in a way that was never, so far as the evidence goes, done in this country. The evidence was that many of the products of Australian manufacturers although advertised in various standard qualities, are in fact of lower quality, in other words debased. British manufacturers have only been successful in exporting to these Dominions in the face of difficult quota regulations and import duties, by offering a uniformly high undebased quality and there is no doubt that, e.g., a British A1 quality stands much higher in the estimation of the Australian buying public than an Australian A1. Furthermore, these newspaper advertisements bring to the notice of the buying public again in a way which so far as the evidence goes has never been done in this country, the names of the leading British manufacturers as an indication of excellent quality. Exports to Australia and New Zealand have declined from rather under £9,000,000 in 1954 to under £5,000,000 in 1958 and, if this decline is to be arrested, it can only be done by maintaining high and undebased qualities.

It is said that this will be impossible, for debasement in the home market will inevitably follow if home restrictions are abolished and it will then be administratively impracticable to maintain undebased qualities for export. This is contrary to the evidence and to common sense. Contrary to the evidence, for it was established, first, that a non-federation manufacturer who makes little A1 for the home market, makes a substantial line of A1 for export and, secondly, that the general Australasian taste is for a rather different type of design to the popular lines in the United Kingdom; the lines which sell best there being chintz and floral designs. It is contrary to common sense, for British manufacturers who wish to remain in the Australasian market will so organise their factories as to compete on the only possible basis with the local product, by producing better quality and by enhancing their reputations as leading British manufacturers. If any manufacturer decides to go out of the Australasian market, it will not be because of the abolition of the restrictions at home, but because the export market is proving unprofitable to him on any footing.

Finally, although counsel have dealt with this particular matter when arguing another part of the case, we think it is relevant to refer to the progressive removal of federation restrictions in relation to the export market. At the date of the reference in July, 1957, there was a general restriction binding on members that in sales overseas, except to the United States of America, carpets were not to be sold at prices below those for the home market. Then, in December, 1957, Europe was excluded from that restriction. A year later Central and South America, Canada and parts of Africa were excluded.

It seems that the federation has come to believe that freedom of action is the best policy in the export trade. It is a little difficult to see then why freedom of action in the home market should be said to lead to a substantial reduction in exports.

This point fails.

It follows that, as the federation has failed to establish any case under section 21 (1) (b) or (f), that sub-paragraph (g) has no application. It also follows that it is unnecessary for us to consider the balancing provisions at the end of subsection (1), for there is no benefit to be weighed in the balance against the detriment to the public. It is implicit in what we have already said that we regard the detriment to the public flowing from the operation of the federation scheme as very considerable.

There remain two matters with which we must deal. The first is in regard to the restrictions entered into by members of the federation in relation to their overseas trade. These restrictions are based upon and follow substantially the restrictions relating to the home market. Until August 26, 1959, these restrictions all formed part of the "Standards of Trading" and were contained in main clause 3 of those standards. The cardinal provision was that carpets were not to be sold in overseas markets at prices below those for the home market.

The home wholesalers are not so far as we are aware concerned with exports, so there was no wholesalers' list but there was a provision that no wholesale or retail discounts should be allowed other than those authorised by the federation.

By resolution of the executive committee of August 26, 1959, however, the restrictions were removed bodily from the Standards of Trading and reinstated in what was alleged to be a new agreement.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

This was admittedly done in case the federation should lose their case before this court. Their case is that by removing bodily the provisions relating to overseas trading from the Standards of Trading and reinstating them in another document, they have entered into a new agreement to which the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, does not apply by virtue of section 8 (8) of that Act. The registrar contends that the alleged new agreement is only a variation of the old agreement (a variation without a difference) and should be entered upon the register maintained by him. That is a question which can only be determined by the High Court.

It has been admitted by the federation that, having regard to section 20 of the Act of 1956, restrictions on the register in relation to overseas trading down to August 26 last are justiciable by us and that we have a discretion to adjudge upon them if we think proper to do so. But the federation, nevertheless, submit that in the exercise of our discretion we ought not to do so.

The question really is whether we ought to decide upon the validity of the whole scheme as registered down to August 26, 1959, or only on the provisions relating to the home trade.

We think we should decide upon the whole scheme for two reasons. First, the old overseas scheme was an integral part of and depended upon the existence of a scheme for the home market. If the price quality standard is abolished at home all reason for a scheme abroad based on home prices seems to go. If any manufacturer at home can charge any price he likes for an A1 carpet, there seems no reason to compel him to charge the same or a higher price for an A1 carpet overseas.

There was no evidence to show that the old scheme could have any useful operation abroad in the absence of controlled prices at home, or that it could be justified under section 21 (1) (b) of the Act.

But there is another reason why we think we should deal with the whole scheme today.

The federation having, as they put it, severed their overseas trading restrictions from the home trading restrictions by a pair of scissors on August 26, applied to this court for an order that all restrictions relating to the supply of goods by export contained in the registered agreements be excluded from consideration by the court in these proceedings. That application was heard by us on October 14 last and we refused it. The federation and their advisers, therefore, knew that we might consider the export restrictions and they knew that the registrar would invite us to do so. They have not in the least been taken by surprise and yet although the onus is clearly upon them, they have elected to call no evidence to justify the continuance of the overseas restrictions; they must be taken to have decided upon that course deliberately.

We must declare that the restrictions contained in main clause 3 down to August 26 last are contrary to public policy.

If the High Court decides that the registrar's contention is correct, and the so-called new severed agreement is in law only a variation which ought to be registered with the registrar, we see no reason why he should be put to the expense of a fresh reference. In that event, we propose to give him liberty to apply for a declaration of invalidity as to the variation made on August 26 last to which in the absence of any change of circumstances he will plainly be entitled.

The second matter with which we must deal is an even later last-minute decision to try to avoid the consequences of an adverse finding by this court.

On October 20, the executive committee of the federation resolved as follows:

"The committee considered the draft of an agreement "between individual manufacturers and their wholesale "customers, which had been prepared by the secretariat, at "the request of the Chairman's Sub-Committee, in the form of "two draft letters, together with an appendix and an annexure, "as a means by which whatever the outcome of the case "members of the federation, if they wished to do so as "individual firms, might be able to continue to trade with their "wholesale customers under the rules at present embodied in "the Standards of Trading for the home market.

"After considerable discussion on the details of the drafts, "in which the secretary was instructed to include a section to "cover the position of wholesalers with retail connections, the "committee agreed that the draft agreements, as amended, "should be sent to the Council of the Wholesale Floor Covering "Distributors' Association for comment; and that subsequently "the drafts should be sent to each member of the federation "with a recommendation that each member should, without "delay, send letters on the lines of the drafts, to each of his "wholesale customers, with a view to establishing individual "agreements on terms of trading. A copy of the drafts, as finally "amended, is at appendix 'B.'"

Members of the federation have been circularised accordingly. The resolution has been registered with the registrar.

We do not pause to read the drafts at appendix B for they do in substance carry out the plain intention of the federation as expressed in the resolution, i.e., on the footing that all the present restrictions are found contrary to public interest by this court, the drafts enable individual manufacturers to continue trading with their wholesale customers under the rules embodied in the Standards of Trading.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers' Agreement, In re.

During the hearing, we were told that some 28 out of 58 members have acted on this resolution.

The resolution is a recommendation to which section 6 (7) of the Act is plainly applicable, so that the constitution of the federation must be construed as though it contained a term whereby members agree to comply with those recommendations. The members, therefore, are deemed to be bound to send out draft letters on the lines of the drafts circulated. Those drafts as we have said contain terms similar in substance, though not in form, to the letters which wholesalers are bound to sign as a condition of being entered on the wholesale list. We have not yet considered those undertakings in detail and we think the convenient course will be to consider all those matters together.[4]

Accordingly, today, we decide that the following restrictions contained in the Standards of Trading are contrary to public policy:

(1) The main price quality standards contained in main clause 1 (a).

(2) The restrictions relating to the wholesale list and rate of wholesale discount contained in main clause 2 (a).

(3) The consumer-buyer provisions contained in main clause 2 (k); and finally,

(4) The main provisions of the overseas market restrictions contained in main clause 3 down to August 26 last.

Declaration accordingly.

Solicitors: Simmons & Simmons; Treasury Solicitor.

N. P.

[4] On December 21, 1959, the court formally declared that the restrictions scheduled to its order [the restrictions contained in the standards of trading, ante, pp. 363–367, other than those relating to the definition of standard qualities] agreed to be the registrable restrictions in the agreements, were contrary to the public interest. Upon receiving undertakings from the Federation of British Carpet Manufacturers and from the Wholesale Floor Covering Distributors' Association on behalf of themselves and their members that they would not give effect to, nor enforce the restrictions, nor enter into or make any agreement to the like effect in respect of the restrictions, without giving the Registrar of Restrictive Trading Agreements twenty-eight days' notice of their intention to do so, the court by consent made no order on the registrar's application for injunctions.

[RESTRICTIVE PRACTICES COURT.]

* In re FEDERATION OF WHOLESALE AND MULTIPLE BAKERS' (GREAT BRITAIN AND NORTHERN IRELAND) AGREEMENT.

R. P. Ct.† (E. & W.)

1959 Nov. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 9, 10, 11, 12; Dec. 16.

[1957 No. 11 (E. & W.).]

Restrictive Practice—Restriction—Whether contrary to public interest—Price restriction—Baking industry—Fixed retailers' margin—Ascertainment of retail price from average costs—System based on method evolved by Government Department during period of price control—Recommended prices low for high cost section of industry—Whether a true maximum—Whether retail prices in general lower by reason of recommendation—Whether benefits or advantages conferred on public—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 68), s. 21 (1) (b).

Restrictive Practice — Recommendation — No powers for enforcing observance—Restriction deemed in law to arise by virtue of recommendation — Whether "restriction accepted in pursuance of any "agreement" — Whether presumption that contrary to public interest — Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 68), ss. 6 (1) (7) (8), 21 (1).

From 1941 to September, 1956, the price of bread was subject to Governmental control and a subsidy system was in operation, subsidy rates being determined by the Ministry. After decontrol, the Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers (Great Britain and Northern Ireland), a trade association within the meaning of section 6 (8) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, issued recommedations to its members as to the retail selling price of standard bread. In July, 1957, the registrar referred the federation's agreement to the court. In April, 1958, the federation adopted a memorandum under which any specific recommendations as to the retail prices of standard bread were to be in the form of a maximum price, members being free to charge less "but should "not charge more," and incorporating an elaborate formula regulating the price to be recommended and setting out a system of costing. The costings system adopted, based on "volunteered" samples of production and distribution costs, was in substance based on that adopted by the Ministry during the period of control, but the calculations for ascertaining the margin upon which the recommended price was based included a 7½ per cent. deduction as an "efficiency factor," and provision was made for a ceiling, above which no price could be recommended, by adding to a certain sum one quarter of any shortfalls and deducting one quarter of any excesses in the preceding four quarters. The federation also issued recommendations as to a fixed retailers' margin for standard bread.

The federation was formed in 1942. Its members were all large plant bakers, multiple bakers using a travelling oven, a highly mechanised method of bread production, and it formed one of the three main sections of the bread industry in England and Wales; in 1956 members had about 37 per cent. of the total bread production, and in 1958 to 1959 51 per cent. Membership comprised three groups and some individual members, but the groups were growing.

---

† PEARSON J., MR. W. WALLACE and MR. W. G. CAMPBELL.

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

Trade in standard bread was either direct from baker to consumer or from baker to retailer; there was no intervening wholesaler. Demand was declining and the decline was likely to continue, or, at best, would become stationary. The sample returns showed a wide range of profits, but while the recommended maximum prices were low as regards high costs sections of the industry they were not low for low cost producers and most of the members were making good profits. The evidence was that sales below the recommended maximum had hardly ever taken place.

The federation had no power in its rules to enforce the observance by members or retailers of the recommended prices, and it contended, inter alia, that its members had not by reason of the issue of the recommendations accepted any restriction under any agreement as defined in section 6 of the Act, and that the restriction deemed in law to arise thereby under section 6 (7)[1] was

[1] Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, s. 6: "(1) . . . this Part of this "Act applies to any agreement "between two or more persons carrying on business within the United "Kingdom in the production or supply "of goods, . . . being an agreement "under which restrictions are accepted ". . . in respect of the following "matters, that is to say: (a) the "prices to be charged, quoted or paid "for goods supplied, . . . (3) In this "Part of this Act 'agreement' "includes any agreement or arrangement, whether or not it is or is "intended to be enforceable . . . by "legal proceedings, and references . . . "to restrictions accepted under an "agreement shall be construed accordingly; and 'restriction' includes any "negative obligation, whether express "or implied and whether absolute or "not. . . . (7) Where specific recommendations (whether express or implied) "are made by or on behalf of a trade "association to its members or to any "class of its members, as to the action "to be taken or not taken by them in "relation to any particular class of "goods or process of manufacture in "respect of any matter described in "the said subsection (1), this Part of "this Act shall apply in relation to "the agreement for the constitution of "the association notwithstanding any "provision to the contrary therein, as "if it contained a term by which each "such member, and any person represented on the association by any "such member, agreed to comply with "those recommendations and any "subsequent recommendations made "to them by or on behalf of the "association as to the action to be "taken by them in relation to the "same class of goods or process of "manufacture and in respect of the "same matter. (8) In this section "'trade association' means a body of "persons (whether incorporated or not) "which is formed for the purpose of "furthering the trade interests of its "members, or of persons represented "by its members; and for the purposes of this section, two or more "persons being inter-connected bodies "corporate or individuals carrying on "business in partnership with each "other shall be treated as a single "person."

S. 20: "(1) The Court shall have "jurisdiction, . . . in respect of any "agreement of which particulars are "for the time being registered . . . "to declare whether or not any "restrictions by virtue of which this "Part of this Act applies to the agreement . . . are contrary to the public "interest. . . . (5) The powers of the "Court under this section shall not be "affected by the determination of an "agreement effected after the commencement of the proceedings, and "where an agreement is varied after "the commencement of the proceedings, the Court may make a declaration and, if it thinks fit an order "under subsection (3) or subsection (4) "of this section, either in respect of "the agreement as at the commencement of the proceedings or in respect "of the agreement as varied, or both."

S. 21: "(1) For the purposes of any "proceedings before the Court . . . "a restriction accepted in pursuance "of any agreement shall be deemed "to be contrary to the public interest "unless the Court is satisfied of any "one or more of the following circumstances, that is to say— . . . (b) "that the removal of the restriction "would deny to the public as purchasers, consumers or users of any "goods other specific and substantial "benefits or advantages enjoyed or "likely to be enjoyed by them as such, "whether by virtue of the restriction "itself or of any arrangements or not "a restriction accepted in pursuance of any agreement" within section 21 (1),[1] so that the statutory presumption created by that subsection that such a restriction was contrary to the public interest did not apply to the reference. Alternatively, the federation sought to justify its retail price recommendations under paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) on the ground that their removal would deny to the public the specific and substantial benefits or advantages of the limitation of upward movement of prices inherent in a maximum price, it being part of the federation's case in this respect that by reason of its strength, the maximum price influenced non-members as well as members and that if the recommendations were withdrawn, there was a real risk that prices would rise. Both sides asked the court, in exercise of its powers under section 20 (5),[1] to pronounce upon the price recommendations made prior to the adoption of the memorandum in April, 1958:—

Held, (1) that since the federation was a trade association as defined in section 6 (8) and had made specific recommendations to its members in respect of matters therein set out, the conditions for bringing section 6 (7) into operation were satisfied, and the position, for the purposes of section 21 (1), was that the agreement for the constitution of the federation, notwithstanding appearances to the contrary, contained a term whereby each member agreed to comply with the recommendations so that the members had "accepted" a restriction in pursuance of an agreement within the opening words of the section, and the prima facie presumption, which it was for the respondents to disprove, applied (post, pp. 412–414).

(2) That on the true construction of section 21 (1) (b) the court could and should adopt a realistic approach and consider on the merits whether in fact removal of the restrictions would have the effect alleged: the court, therefore, was not bound to confine its attention to the quasi-legal or formal effect of the recommended maximum prices, but should consider how they had been, were, and would be likely to be, effectively operating in practice, and whether as maximum, or fixed, or minimum prices, those being questions of fact to be decided on the evidence (post, p. 412).

(3) (a) That where a collective price control stated in terms of maximum prices actually operated as such, the maximum price might in certain circumstances safeguard the buyer against paying more while giving him a chance of paying less, which chance might be a benefit; but whether that benefit was real or notional, substantial or insubstantial, depended upon what in fact happened or was reasonably estimated as likely to happen in the future, and if it appeared that sales at prices below the maximum had been made very infrequently, that would tend to show that the benefit of having the price stated as a maximum was insubstantial or even negligible (post, pp. 418–419).

(b) That, in fact, the federation's recommendations did not operate as maximum price recommendations and, therefore, were "operations resulting therefrom; . . .

"(g) that the restriction is reasonably "required for purposes connected with
"the maintenance of any other restric"tion accepted by the parties, whether "under the same agreement or under "any other agreement between them,
"being a restriction which is found
"by the Court not to be contrary to "the public interest upon grounds
"other than those specified in this "paragraph, or has been so found
"in previous proceedings before the "Court, and is further satisfied (in "any such case) that the restriction is "not unreasonable having regard to "the balance between those circum"stances and any detriment to the "public or to persons not parties to "the agreement (being purchasers,
"consumers or users of goods produced
"or sold by such parties, . . .) result"ing or likely to result from the "operation of the restriction."

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

not substantially beneficial by virtue of their description of the price as a maximum. Sales below the maximum had hardly ever taken place; there were indications, such as the absence of any public announcement at the time when the change from a fixed to a maximum price was made, that the new description of the prices was not expected or intended to have far-reaching effects; the intervention of the fixed retailer's margin, which introduced an element of rigidity into the price structure, hindered sales to retailers at reduced prices; and, as a matter of common sense, the natural consequence of the publication of a recommended price by a body such as the federation was that members and other traders would regard the price recommended as fair and reasonable and would be unlikely to sell at any lower price (post, pp. 419, 422).

(4) That the recommendations of retail prices arrived at under the formula did not and would not tend to keep prices of standard bread below what they would be if there were no such recommendations, and the court was not satisfied that there was any serious risk that their abolition would cause bread prices to rise.

(a) From the financial aspect, the profits shown by the formula were too favourable to justify a claim that it adequately protected the consumer. The basis of the formula itself was open to criticism: it was neither realistic nor necessary to take as a foundation the methods adopted by the Minister in the control period, evolved during the stress of war and directed to the condition then existing, for the present composition of the federation, the importance of standard bread and general conditions were not comparable (post, p. 422).

If there was to be a collective regulation of prices on the basis of cost, it would be a sounder principle (though perhaps not without its difficulties) that it should be based on the lowest cost with an addition calculated to keep in business enough higher cost producers to provide the supplies required by the public (post, p. 423).

(b) From the economic aspect, important factors were the declining market for standard bread and the need of plant bakers to maintain a steady turnover so that in conditions of price freedom a plant baker would be more likely to reduce than to increase his prices in order to retain his existing market, and the fact that members on average made good profits from standard bread and probably higher profits on other breads and flour confectionery; in the face of a declining demand and ample and increasingly efficient productive capacity, the long-term natural forces of competition, which it was important to preserve as the ultimate safeguard (it being the local competition of members rather than the existence of the recommendations which had tended to keep down the prices of other bakers), would seem to favour some reduction in the level of prices (post, pp. 423–426).

The federation, accordingly, had not satisfied the court that removal of the recommendations would deny to the public any specific or substantial benefit within section 21 (1) (b) and there must be a declaration that the restrictions involved in the present system were contrary to the public interest.

Dicta in In re Wholesale and Retail Bakers of Scotland Association's Agreement and In re Scottish Association of Master Bakers' Agreement (1959) L.R. 1 R.P. 347, 379, 382 applied.

Held, further, that the powers of the court under section 20 (5) were discretionary, and that since the recommendations made under the agreement prior to its variation by the resolutions of April, 1958, were now a matter of past history, it would not be appropriate to make any declaration in respect of them (post, pp. 426–427).

REFERENCE.

By a notice of reference, dated July 12, 1957, the Registrar of Restrictive Trading Agreements, pursuant to section 20 (2) (a) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, referred to the court an agreement, numbered 962 on the register of agreements, subsisting between all the members of the Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) and contained in the federation's constitution and rules, list of members, recommendations bearing various dates and memorandum of the term implied by section 6 (7) of the Act, expressly or impliedly deemed to be binding upon them for the purposes of the Act. By an order made on January 14, 1958, the federation was made sole respondent to the proceedings on behalf of all its members, it being agreed that the registrar would not in the reference seek any relief against the Scottish or Northern Irish members.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of the court.

There are several types of bread. First and foremost there is the standard loaf, which may be white or brown and is made from normal bread dough with some fat enrichment and is baked in a tin. It is sometimes sold whole and unwrapped, but in the great majority of cases nowadays it is sliced and wrapped in wax paper. There is the enriched loaf, often known as the American or top-grade loaf, which is similar in appearance to the standard loaf, but contains added fat, milk powder and sugar and is usually sold at a price 3d. more than the price of the equivalent standard loaf. There are loaves called "Farmhouse" or "Long Tin" or "Tin Coburg," which are baked in tins of various sizes and usually sold at the same price as the standard loaves, though they are produced in very much smaller quantities. There are the so-called "oven bottom" types of loaf which are baked in the oven without being placed in a tin, and are usually sold at about 1d. above the price of the standard loaf owing to additional costs of production and the preference of some customers. In addition there are certain proprietary and specialised types of bread. Of the methods of production the least modern is that of the family baker using what is called a "peel oven." The loaves are baked on the oven bottom and are withdrawn by means of a "peel," which is a wooden shovel. Intermediate is the semi-automatic bakery, which is partly mechanised and can supply several retail shops. The modern highly mechanised method of production is that of the plant bakery, using a travelling oven, which is in effect a baking chamber with a conveyor. One type of travelling oven is the swing-tray type, suitable for the baking of standard loaves and other tinned loaves. Methods of distribution have advanced from the handcart to motor transport, but there is an economic limit to the radius of profitable distribution owing to congestion of traffic, the need for bread to be delivered fresh to the customers and the large bulk of bread and its low value per cubic foot.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

These limit the expansion of the business of any particular bakery and may account for the growth of groups of bakeries in this industry.

There has been a decline in the consumption of bread in general and standard bread in particular. The statistical and oral evidence on this point will be referred to at a later stage.

The baking industry in England and Wales can conveniently be divided into three main sections: 1st Section. The National Association of Master Bakers, Confectioners and Caterers, formed in 1887, has in its membership a large number of family bakers and a few plant bakers including J. Lyons & Co. Ltd. They had about 45 per cent. of the total bread production in 1956, but only a reduced percentage, estimated at 34 per cent., in 1958–59. The number of family bakers had declined from 24,000 in 1935 to 12,700 in 1955. Probably the decline both in share of output and in number is continuing. 2nd Section. There is the respondent federation, formed in 1942. The members are all plant bakers. They had about 37 per cent. of the total bread production in 1956, and a larger percentage, estimated at 51 per cent., in 1958–59. There are three groups and some independent members of the federation. One group is controlled by Allied Bakeries Ltd., formed in 1935 by Garfield Weston, who has bakery interests in Canada and other countries but has no flour-milling interests in the United Kingdom. A second group is controlled by British Bakeries Ltd., which was formed in 1955 and is controlled by Rank Ltd., who have large flour-milling interests. The third group is controlled by United Bakeries Ltd. which was formed in 1955 and is controlled by Spillers Ltd., who also have large flour-milling interests. The groups have been growing, and the independent members of the federation have become fewer. In 1953 there were 43 group members and 120 independent members. In 1959 there are 142 group members and only 51 independent members. Comparative figures for present output are not available, but in 1955–56 the aggregate output of the independent members was less than half of the aggregate output of the three groups. 3rd Section. There are the Co-operative Societies which in the year 1956 had about 18 per cent. of the total bread production and in 1958–59 about 15 per cent. Most of their production is in plant bakeries. There is also a small residue of family bakers who are not members of any association.

The declared objects of the federation are (inter alia): (a) to promote commerce and in particular in relation to the baking industry; (b) to promote and to protect the industrial interests and the trade of its members; (c) to encourage co-operation between any two or more members for the furtherance of any one or more of the above-mentioned objects by any means which are not contrary to the public interest or registrable under the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956; (d) to do all or any acts or things as may be incidental or necessary to the carrying out of any of the said declared objects.

Under article 3 of the constitution and rules of the federation membership shall be open to: (a) such bread and flour confectionery bakers who use in the manufacture of bread an average sackage of not less than 200 sacks of flour a week or whose output of bread and flour confectionery together or of flour confectionery alone exceeds £100,000 per annum measured in terms of retail prices; (b) such other bread and flour confectionery bakers as may be elected by the main committee of the federation.

The costing system used by the federation is, in essence, a continuation of that utilised, during the period of Government control, for the determination of the subsidies payable to bread producers. A short review of the subsidy period is necessary, therefore, as a preliminary to the consideration of the present system.

In 1941 the price of bread (under the description of "national" bread) became subject to control and a subsidy system was instituted, for the benefit of bakers producing and distributing this bread, in order to compensate them for selling it at uneconomic prices. From 1941 to 1949 nearly all the output of the baking industry consisted of these "national" loaves, baked from "national" flour and neither sliced nor wrapped; the output of other breads and of flour confectionery was negligible. During the war and afterwards, until September, 1956, the retail selling price of "national" bread was fixed under Statutory Order. The subsidy rates were usually determined at half-yearly intervals by the Ministry and were based on sample returns of information as to the proceeds and costs of production and distribution of "national" bread covering the whole industry, which then included the federation, the National Association of Master Bakers, the Co-operative Societies, and a minority of family bakers not covered by any association. Each of these submitted returns to the Ministry, who then calculated the amounts payable as subsidies, after making, when appropriate, adjustments to allow for known changes in material items, such as wages, when they became effective. The decisions as to rates of subsidy were sent to the industry, with details of the computations in support. These computations averaged the returns from these sources of proceeds and costs of "national" bread produced, after weighting the returns to the extent that each participant was regarded or estimated as representing the whole industry. For this purpose the weighting of the federation returns was 37½ per cent., that being the estimate of their production proportionately to the total production in England and Wales. There was, inevitably, a considerable lapse of time between the end of each costed period and the date of the eventual subsidy decision based on that period. At first the successive rates of subsidy operated from the date of the decision but, latterly, the subsidy changes were made retroactive to the date to which the costings had been made. The unit of costing was by reference not to the loaf but to the sack of flour used in bread production, on the assumption that the loaves of a given weight, produced from each sack of 280 lb. of flour, would be a reasonably constant number. After the war, in May, 1946, the weight of the larger "national" loaf was reduced from 2 lb. to 28 oz. and of the smaller loaf from 1 lb. to 14 oz. The number of larger loaves which it was possible to produce from a sack of flour increased from 192 to as many as 218. In practice it is usual to assume the latter number to be 216.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

The permitted profit margin on each sack for subsidy purposes, was 5s. with (in later years) an additional 4s. per sack for the first 25 sacks of flour converted to "national" bread, each week, by each bakery undertaking. This 5s. remained, in spite of the increased number of loaves allowed in 1946, until October, 1954, when it was increased to 7s. This increase was given, inter alia, to remunerate the additional capital employed between 1941 and 1954, to allow for greater usage of plant owing to the greater number of units produced, and to allow for the reduced value of the £ sterling. Until the weight of loaf was reduced in 1946 the bakers had been allowed to retain the extra profit arising on production and distribution of the smaller loaf, of 1 lb. weight, of which the retail price was usually more than half the price of the larger, 2 lb. loaf. When the downward change in weight was permitted it was assumed that this additional profit would increase and the Ministry assessed it at 3s. 6d. per sack, for subsidy purposes. In the costings covering the period to March, 1956, the percentage of national bread produced and sold as small loaves, by members of the federation, was 11 per cent. of their total output of "national" bread; this percentage of 3s. 6d. gives 5d. per sack, approximately, so that, at the end of the subsidy period, the overall permitted profit margin was 7s. 5d. per sack. This margin did not take account of other sources of profit, arising from the production of "national" bread, which successively arose in the later years and which the bakers had been allowed to retain. These were: (a) profits from wrapping and slicing; (b) deferred rebates on flour under the scheme operated by the Incorporated National Association of British & Irish Millers Ltd., from March 1, 1954; and (c) cash discounts allowed by the millers for prompt payment.

F. W. Charles, the federation's accountant, gave evidence that the information available to the federation from the subsidy computations of the Ministry, showed that the production and distribution costs of members of the federation were lower in amount than those attributable to the other sections of the industry. The computations based on the costings to March, 1956, which determined the rate of subsidy ruling for the final six months, to September, 1956, of the subsidy period showed the average costs of federation members to be 2s. 10d. lower than the average costs of the industry as a whole. The average margin effectively available to federation members at the end of the subsidy period may, therefore, be regarded as 10s. 3d., representing the 7s. 5d. margin increased by 2s. 10d. The average profit arising from production and distribution of standard bread by members of the federation, inclusive of the profits of wrapping and slicing and of the millers' rebate but exclusive of cash discounts, on the above bases as on April 1, 1956, has been estimated by the respondents as follows:

Ministry margin, and increase above	10s. 3d.
Profits of wrapping and slicing	5s. 0d.
Millers' rebate	1s. 7d.
Total profit, exclusive of cash discounts	16s. 10d.

The controlled price of the 28 oz. loaf at the end of the subsidy period was 8½d., and the final subsidy was just over 1½d. The baker normally received just over 10d. per loaf. If "long-"hauled" flour was used an additional subsidy adjustment brought the proceeds to 10¼d.

For some time prior to September, 1956, with the removal of price control imminent, members of the federation were in some doubts as to the situation which might develop. The fifteen years of control, during which the sections of the trade had provided costings the average of which had been made known to the other sections, had produced a similarity of pattern in the costs of members. It was decided, in June, 1956, that the main committee should recommend prices to federation members before the end of September. Two main reasons were given for this decision: members had no knowledge what the then current rate of subsidy would be (it was not agreed till February, 1957); and a considerable number of members were convinced that the recommended price should be as low as was consistent with a reasonable profit. Behind this conviction was the desire to retain a steady turnover, since a fall in production would have resulted in uneconomic labour costs and idle capital equipment, added to the fact that bread which is not sold within a short time of baking becomes unsaleable; unlike many other products it cannot be stored for sale if and when demand revives.

Before control was removed, the Minister asked representatives of bakers' organisations to attend a meeting at which he is stated to have expressed the hope that the trade, following the withdrawal of the bread subsidy, would use its freedom to fix bread prices in a statesmanlike manner, having regard to the economic position of the country.

Following this, in September, 1956, the main committee recommended, from October 1, a retail price for the standard 28 oz. loaf of 10d. for port areas and 10½d. for inland areas where the price of flour was 2s. per sack, or more, over the basic price; the recommended price for the 14 oz. loaf being 6d. In each

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

case one penny was allowed extra for wrapping and slicing. The port areas' bakeries thus received a small fraction of a penny less than they had done in the subsidy period; and the remainder almost exactly the same as before. Dissatisfaction with these recommendations was expressed by some members and, after consideration of the rising cost of flour, it was decided, on December 6, 1956, to remove the port-area differential and to recommend a uniform national price of 10½d. for the unwrapped 28 oz. loaf, no change being made in the price of the 14 oz. loaf nor in the wrapping and slicing allowances. The cost of flour continued to rise, with increased distribution and other costs, and, on February 14, 1957, the unwrapped large loaf was raised to a recommended price of 11d., the smaller loaf in most areas being raised to 6½d. The price of flour was then 10s. per sack higher than at the end of the subsidy period, and this increase, together with the trend of costs shown by the abridged form of costings then available, was considered to justify an increased price for the loaves. Subsequently the price of flour fell and, on May 29, 1957, it was recommended in spite of considerable opposition that the price of the unwrapped standard 28 oz. loaf should be reduced to 10½d. for all areas.

This recommendation was the last of those made in the immediate post-subsidy period, a difficult time during which, it is claimed, the federation was concerned to keep price changes reasonably in line with cost variations so far as these could be ascertained. From the evidence it appears that the federation made every effort to satisfy the Minister's request for moderation in the period following decontrol.

On July 12, 1957, the registrar referred the agreement of the federation with its related recommendations to this court. By that time, as we were told, it was apparent to the main committee that, working largely in the dark, relying on abridged costings and loose estimates of changes in material elements and factors and with no precise information, it was increasingly difficult to justify their recommendations convincingly. The federation's accountant advisers were strongly in favour of a return to a more elaborate costing system and it was decided to adopt a form substantially the same as that which had operated up to the end of control. During the succeeding months the prices remained unchanged at the June, 1957, levels, in spite of increased flour and wages costs, and a formula was sought which could be used, and justified, as a reasonable basis for determining standard bread price recommendations. It was not till April 9, 1958, that a definitive memorandum entitled "Cost and Sale of Standard Bread in "England and Wales," with supporting resolutions, was adopted. This memorandum incorporated a formula to regulate price recommendations.

The essential resolutions were as follows: "It is hereby "resolved and declared on behalf of the members of the federa-"tion in England and Wales that if the said members or the "main committee acting on their behalf, at any time or from "time to time recommend a retail selling price for standard "bread, or wrapped, or sliced and wrapped standard bread in "England and Wales or allow such recommended price to "continue, they shall not recommend or continue any such price "in a manner which conflicts with the provisions of a memo-"randum dated April 9, 1958, and entitled 'Cost and Sale of "'Standard Bread in England.'

"It is further hereby resolved and declared that the members "of the federation in England and Wales or the main committee "acting on their behalf may at any time or from time to time "discontinue the making of such recommendation but if a "specific recommendation is made each member, while free to "charge less than the maximum retail price stated in the "recommendation, should not charge more than that price.

"It is hereby resolved and declared that four copies of these "resolutions and of the memorandum entitled 'Cost and Sale "'of Standard Bread in England and Wales' shall forthwith be "delivered to the Registrar of Restrictive Trading Agreements "and two copies of the same shall forthwith be delivered to Peat, "Marwick, Mitchell & Co.,[1] and one copy to each of the said "members and that any amendment or cancellation or revival of "these resolutions or of any of them and of the said memorandum "shall forthwith on the occasion of the amendment or cancella-"tion or revival be likewise delivered."

Amendments were made to the memorandum on May 13, 1958, November 12, 1958, and May 11, 1959, and these have been incorporated in the present form of the memorandum, which will be discussed in detail later. From December 8, 1958, the recommended price for the unwrapped 14 oz. loaf was 6½d. for all areas. The current recommended prices of unwrapped standard loaves are: 28 oz. loaf—10½d.; 14 oz. loaf—6½d. Wrapped and sliced loaves are 11½d. and 7½d., respectively.

Before considering fully the memorandum and formula an explanation of some trade terms which occur in this case will be helpful. The trade in standard bread is either (a) from baker direct to public or (b) from baker to retailer, then from retailer to public. There is no intervention of a wholesaler between the baker and the retailer and "wholesale price" means the price charged by the baker to the retailer. "Retailer's margin" is the difference between the wholesale price and the retail price; this margin is that allowed to retailers who do not qualify for specially advantageous terms. The term "discount" is used in two ways. Normally it means the retailer's margin plus an additional sum allowed to quantity purchasers, to groups of multiple stores, or to "ex-bakers" (a somewhat odd term used to describe family bakers who buy part of their requirements from the plant bakers). Sometimes "discount" is used to mean the additional sum only,

[1] The federation's accountants.

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

without the retailer's margin. The term is appropriate only in contexts which denote that retailers are purchasing on specially advantageous terms entitling them to a preferential wholesale discount.

During the control period the retailer's margin rose from 6d. to 9d. per dozen 2 lb. loaves. When the subsidy was withdrawn it was increased to 1s. per dozen 28 oz. loaves. Up to that time this margin was dealt with by the area groups but it was then decided that the federation should make a national recommendation, which was done on February 14, 1957, when the retailer's margin was increased to 1s. 3d. per dozen 28 oz. loaves; for the 14 oz. loaf it was fixed at 8d. in some areas and 7½d. in others.

It is necessary to examine in some detail the memorandum of April 9, 1958, with subsequent amendments. In opening the respondents' case, Sir Milner Holland said: "That memorandum "was at the heart of this case. . . . It is a memorandum "determining how costing information should be obtained, what "costing information should be obtained, and what use should "be made of it."

The first introductory paragraph states: "This memorandum "sets out the method of costing to be used on behalf of the "members of the federation in England and Wales for the "purpose of determining the cost of producing and distributing "standard bread in England and Wales and the method of "determining recommended maximum retail selling prices of "such bread in the event that the members (through the main "committee) decide to make or continue making such recom-"mendation, it being understood that the members are not under "any obligation to initiate recommendations or to continue any "recommendations already in force."

Part I defines the term "standard bread" and goes on to state the requirements as to number and types of costed members. The paragraph reads: "1. Definition of standard bread. The "term 'standard bread' in this memorandum and in any returns "of cost means all loaves of 14 ounce weight or multiples thereof "baked in tins from brown or white flour, or blends thereof, by "members of the federation in England and Wales, whether or "not subsequently wrapped or sliced, other than Vienna bread "or rolls, or fancy or proprietary or specially enriched bread. "2. Number and types of costed members. The costs of "producing and distributing standard bread and wrapped and "sliced and wrapped standard bread in England and Wales will "be determined from the like representative numbers and types "of members to those used in the preparation of costs for the "Ministry of Food during the period of price control of national "bread by that Ministry. A sufficient number of returns not "being less than forty should be submitted by members to the "appointed accountants and should continue to be representative "of the whole of the members of the federation in England and "Wales."

After stressing that confidential treatment would be given to all information submitted, it is added that members who are not subsidiaries of the same parent company should not exchange information relating to their individual returns.

Returns are made on seven schedules:

Production Costs:

Schedule I	Flour, other ingredients, and bakehouse wages and expenses.
VIa	Administration expenses, apportioned to production.

Distribution Costs:

Schedule II	Wholesale selling and depot expenses.
III	,, delivery expenses.
IV	Retail shop expenses.
V	,, delivery expenses.
VIb	Administration expenses, apportioned to distribution.

A statement, containing details of sales and production for the quarter, and a statement summarising costs and margins, with a separate summary of additional proceeds and costs of slicing and wrapping standard bread, complete the returns.

Instructions for dealing with specific items in the costings, and for methods of apportionment, are given. Amongst these it is necessary to mention two, about which comment is made later. Depreciation of plant and the like is to be taken as one-quarter of the annual allowance and initial allowance granted by the Inland Revenue for the fiscal year within which the costed quarter falls. Rent is to be taken as one-quarter of the net Schedule A annual value, or of the actual annual rent paid, whichever is higher, with an addition of one-quarter of the industrial buildings allowance and initial allowance on the buildings granted for the fiscal year in which the costed quarter falls.

Members producing or distributing other goods in addition to standard bread are to apportion costs between the standard bread and other goods. Where possible the apportionment is to be made on the basis of actual costs, failing which certain bases are given amongst which three may be noted:

Wholesale delivery expenses (schedule III), in the proportion of gross retail value of standard bread delivered wholesale to 25 per cent. of the gross retail value of other goods delivered wholesale.

Retail shop expenses (schedule IV), in the proportion of gross retail value of standard bread sold over the counter to 50 per cent. of the gross retail value of other goods sold over the counter.

Retail delivery expenses (schedule V) in the same proportion as for retail shop expenses substituting "delivered to retail "customers" for "sold over the counter."

The returns are to be completed within 21 days of the end of the quarter and sent to the appointed accountants, Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co. who have the right to inspect the records of any member submitting returns and to test the accuracy of the returns submitted.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

Part II of the memorandum deals with the analysis of the returns which is to be prepared by the accountants after they are satisfied (a) that the sample is of "like representative numbers "and types of members to those used in the preparation of costs "for the Ministry of Food" during the control period, and (b) "that the sum of the outputs . . . from those returns of plants "whose average weekly sackage exceeds the average weekly "sackage per member of all members of the federation in "England and Wales is not less than the sum of the outputs "from those returns of plants whose average weekly sackage is "below the said average weekly sackage per member." The accountants may exclude returns in order to satisfy (b) so long as the total number included in the sample is not less than 36. No analyses are to be prepared if insufficient returns are made. The accountants, having made the analysis, prepare statements to show basic averages as follows:

(a) Averaged production cost, that is the average, on a weighted basis, of the cost of production of standard bread per sack for the costed period (schedules I and VIa supply the data).

(b) Averaged distribution cost, that is the average, on the same basis, of the distribution costs of standard bread including the costs of slicing and wrapping.

(c) Averaged total datum cost, which is the sum of (a) and (b) less an amount equal to 7½ per cent. of that part of the cost in (a) which is attributable to costs other than flour cost.

(d) Averaged datum sales revenue, that is the average, on a weighted basis, of the revenue from the sales of all standard bread, including proceeds from any retail delivery charge, assuming that the bread had been sold during the period of the return at the recommended maximum retail selling price prevailing during the period.

(e) The returned margin, which is the difference between the datum revenue (d) and the datum cost (c) averages. This, the final product of the sample for the quarter, is then taken as the basis for determination of "the current margin."

(f) The current margin is determined, as at the date of the analysis, by "correcting the returned margin to account for "changes during the period of the costing not fully reflected in "such costings and for changes, since the period of the returns, "in charges for flour and wages and in the price of standard "bread." Authoritative sources for such changes are given and "forecast" changes of charges and "contemplated" changes in price may be taken into account also.

(g) The ceiling. This is ascertained by adding to 15s. per sack one-quarter of the sum of any shortfalls in the preceding four quarters and deducting one-quarter of the sum of any excesses in the preceding four quarters. Shortfalls occur in any quarter when the returned margin for that quarter is less than 15s. per sack, excesses when the returned margin is greater than 15s. per sack.

Part III of the memorandum deals with the duty of the main committee as regards the specific recommendations and the notice to be given to the purchasing public. It reads as follows: "The main committee, if it decides on behalf of the members "of the federation in England and Wales to make specific "recommendation as to the maximum retail selling price of "standard bread in England and Wales or to allow any such "recommendation to continue in force, shall not make any "such recommendation the effect of which would be to cause the "current margin, after allowing for any contemplated change of "price and for any forecast change of charges, to exceed the "ceiling by more than an amount represented by one-half of the "minimum practicable price change of ½d. in the retail price "of standard bread of 28 ounces weight and shall not allow any "recommendation to remain in force after discontinuance of cost "returns or the effect of which would be to cause the current "margin to exceed the ceiling after allowing for any prospective "change of charges by more than half the said minimum "practicable price change.

"The main committee shall make any such specific recom-"mendations or withdraw the same by public announcement and "for this purpose may use the national press and radio, the "object being to ensure that the purchasing public is informed of "any such recommendation or withdrawal."

The phrase "amount represented by one-half of the minimum "practicable price change" may be simplified as "4s. 6d.," that amount being one-half of 9s., the effect, on the proceeds of sale of 216 loaves of 28 ounces, of a price change of ½d. per loaf.

Schedules were submitted in evidence, prepared in considerable detail by the appointed accountants, and summarised according to the formula, for the five consecutive quarters to March 31, 1959. They cover the first fifteen months of the existence of the formula.

Generally it may be said that the federation has adopted the Ministry's practice of using samples of costs of production and distribution. The federation's accountant said that so far no returns have been excluded from the analysis and that he considered that the sample had been fairly consistent, quarter by quarter. The numbers of members making returns were:

	1st	2nd	3rd	4th	5th quarters
Bakers of first group	15	15	15	15	15
Bakers of second group	16	16	14	15	16
Bakers of third group	14	19	19	18	18
Non-group bakeries	3	4	3	2	3
Total individual returns	48	54	51	50	52

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

Basic average results computed were as follows:
Returned margins: 11s. 8d., 15s. 7d., 15s. 10d., 12s. 6d., 12s. 10d.
Current margins: 13s., 15s. 7d., 15s. 10d., 13s. 2d., 13s. 5d.

A material item in the final average computation is the 7½ per cent. deduction (a considered but arbitrary percentage) made from the ascertained average production costs, other than flour cost. In the five quarters analysed this deduction varied from 3s. 2d. to 3s. per sack. No such deduction was made in the Ministry control period. The court was informed that it was deliberately introduced into the formula in order to bias the ascertained costs down from the average towards the lower-costed bread production. It sets the weighted average costs of the sample about 3s. per sack below what the sample shows them to be and, to that extent, reduces the difference between the average sample costs and the production costs of the lower cost producers. The respondents' trade witness, T. W. H. Curtis, called this "the efficiency "factor."

As an illustration of the final calculation which determines the decision whether or not to recommend a change in price the last quarter, to March 31, 1959, may be taken. The "current "margin" was 13s. 5d. and it was estimated that an increase of ½d. in the recommended price of the 28-ounce loaf would have produced additional proceeds of 8s. 2½d. (after allowing for the estimated effect of the smaller loaf remaining at an unchanged price). Such a change would have increased the profit margin to 21s. 7½d. The ceiling, however, was then 15s. 10d. (the 10d. being one-quarter of the net deficiencies of the earlier quarters), to which was added the 4s. 6d. limitation, making 20s. 4d., above which the profit margin was not to rise. No increase could therefore be recommended.

In present conditions the operation of the formula, it was agreed by the federation's accountant, with a basic ceiling of 15s. and an "efficiency factor" of 3s., produces, in the long run, an average profit of 12s. per sack, exclusive of cash discounts. These, it was also agreed, add approximately 1s. 5d. per sack, and so we are dealing with a total average profit margin of 13s. 5d. per sack.

At this stage two considerations must be stressed. Firstly, the baking of standard bread is not the sole activity of the trade, granting the justice of the comment that it is, indeed, the standard "bread-and-butter line" of the plant baker. Other sources of profit are the baking of special breads and the production of flour confectionery. According to the costing returns of March, 1956, and March, 1958, respectively, the federation's accountant stated that the relative percentages, on a flour converted basis, were:

	1956	1958
National or standard bread	86·9	84·2
Other breads, etc.	13·1	15·8

If the proportion is based on proceeds, that is retail turnover, for both these years the national or standard bread percentage is 56·9.

Secondly, the sample shows a very wide range of profits both as a whole and within the groups. Taking the year 1958 (which incorporates the first four quarters of the formula's operation), the range over the whole sample was from a profit of 31s. 3d. to a loss of 22s. 11d. per sack. Ranges within the groups were:

First group	—	Profit 20s. 2d. to loss 1d.
Second ,,	—	Profit 21s. 3d. to loss 2s. 10d.
Third ,,	—	Profit 31s. 3d. to loss 22s. 11d.
(Non-group members	—	Profit 11s. 2d. to loss 6d.)

The weighted average profit margin for all returns for the year was 10s. 11d.

The participation in the sample by the third group appeared to the court scarcely to merit the description "fairly consistent" applied to the sample as a whole by the federation's accountant. Both from variations in the number of members participating quarter by quarter, and from variations in the identity of those members, it seemed that there was no settled group policy in these respects.

However that might be, it was certain that a considerable number of federation producers of standard bread within the sample were making profits in 1958 well above the average of the sample, and it is a reasonable assumption that this applied outside the sample members and, indeed, outside the federation.

The federation sought to justify all the retail price recommendations under paragraph (b), and the recommendation as to the fixed retailer's margin under paragraph (g), of section 21 (1) of the Act.

Sir Milner Holland Q.C. and Robert Lochner for the federation.
John Megaw Q.C. and R. A. Barr for the registrar.

The following case was referred to in argument: In re Wholesale and Retail Bakers of Scotland Association's Agreement.[2]

Cur. adv. vult.

December 16. PEARSON J. read the following judgment of the court. The present case is confined to matters arising in England and Wales. There was recently before this court in Scotland a case [1] dealing with bakers carrying on business in Scotland. Naturally there is much in the technical, industrial and historical background that is common to the two cases, both being concerned with trade associations of bakers and with the prices

[2] (1959) L.R. 1 R.P. 347; [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1094; [1959] 3 All E.R. 98.

[1] In re Wholesale and Retail Bakers of Scotland Association Agreement (1959) L.R. 1 R.P. 347; [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1094; [1959] 3 All E.R. 98.

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)
1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

to be charged for standard bread. There are, however, differences in the facts generally, and in particular there are differences in the arrangements for price recommendations as a result of changes introduced for England and Wales in the year 1958. Shortly it can be said that the present system in England and Wales involves recommended retail prices, which are in form at any rate maximum and not fixed or minimum retail prices, and a rigid formula for determining on a costings basis what prices are to be recommended from time to time, and an ancillary recommendation of a fixed retailer's margin. There are in that system certain features which distinguish it from the system which was considered in the Scottish case. The issues to be decided in the present case, although from one point of view they cannot be basically different from those which arose in the Scottish case under the same provisions of the same Act, have arisen on different facts in relation to a different system and have been differently presented and argued. There was rightly no suggestion made on behalf of the registrar that the decision in this case should be governed by the decision in the Scottish case, and the respondents are fully entitled to have this case considered quite separately and independently on its own evidence and its own merits.

We will first state what are the main issues to be decided, and deal with a question which was raised as to the burden of proof, before proceeding to examine the facts of the case. The issues are related to section 21 of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, and the provisions of that section which are material to the present case are as follows: "(1) For the purposes of any "proceedings before the court under the last foregoing section, a "restriction accepted in pursuance of any agreement shall be "deemed to be contrary to the public interest unless the court is "satisfied of any one or more of the following circumstances, "that is to say . . . (b) that the removal of the restriction would "deny to the public as purchasers, consumers or users of any "goods other specific and substantial benefits or advantages "enjoyed or likely to be enjoyed by them as such, whether by "virtue of the restriction itself or of any arrangements or "operations resulting therefrom; . . . (g) that the restriction is "reasonably required for purposes connected with the mainten-"ance of any other restriction accepted by the parties, whether "under the same agreement or under any other agreement "between them, being a restriction which is found by the court "not to be contrary to the public interest upon grounds other "than those specified in this paragraph, or has been so found in "previous proceedings before the court, and is further satisfied "(in any such case) that the restriction is not unreasonable "having regard to the balance between those circumstances and "any detriment to the public or to persons not parties to the "agreement (being purchasers, consumers or users of goods "produced or sold by such parties, or persons engaged or seeking "to become engaged in the trade or business of selling such "goods or of producing or selling similar goods) resulting or likely "to result from the operation of the restriction."

Subject to the point of law which will be mentioned hereafter, the incidence of the burden of proof is quite clear. The registrar can rely on the prima facie presumption that the restrictions are contrary to the public interest, and the respondents, in order to displace the presumption, have to satisfy the court on two points, namely: (i) the existence of the "circumstances" referred to in paragraphs (b) and (g); and (ii) that the restrictions are not unreasonable having regard to the balance between those circumstances and any such detriment as is mentioned at the end of subsection (1). If the respondents fail to prove the circumstances, the "balancing provision," as it is conveniently called, does not need to be considered. If the respondents prove the circumstances, they have the further task of satisfying the court that the restriction is not unreasonable having regard to the balance when the circumstances are put in one scale and any detriments are put in the other scale. As the case developed at the hearing, battle was joined, so to speak, on the paragraph (b) line, and attention was mainly concentrated and most of the evidence and argument were directed to establishing or defeating the respondent federation's contention that removal of the restrictions would deny to the public as purchasers, consumers or users of any goods specific and substantial benefits or advantages such as are referred to in paragraph (b). The respondents' contention was summarised very briefly and clearly in two paragraphs of Sir Milner Holland's opening speech on their behalf.

On the first day, referring to "specific and substantial benefits "or advantages," he said "the simplest way of putting it is to "give them as two; one is the limitation of upward movement of "retail prices, which is inherent in the maximum price, and the "other is the limitation imposed by the moral pressure, at any "rate, of the recommended discount, which tends to keep down "one cause of upward price movement. . . . We also say that "the benefits are substantial . . . because as a fact in this "industry there is a real risk that prices would rise if this very "influential body of large plant bakers withdrew or was ordered "to withdraw its maximum price recommendation." On the second day he said: "The specific benefit which would be denied "to the public if we stopped what we are doing is the limitation "to upward movement of retail price, and the limitation on one "particular cause of upward movement, namely, the retailer's "margin." In his closing speech Sir Milner Holland gave a slightly different version of the respondents' contention, quite consistent but bringing out another aspect of it, when he said that "the broad question . . . is . . . whether the adoption of a "maximum price by a very influential part of the bread industry ". . . does not necessarily confer a substantial benefit on the

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

"public, not only because it will prevent members of the "federation from charging more, but because on the facts it must "tend to keep the price of bread down by its influence on others."

Mr. Megaw on behalf of the registrar disputed the respondents' contention and said that it raised two questions, namely: "First, "are these recommendations recommendations of maximum "prices, or are they in effect recommendations of fixed prices, or "are they what may be thought to be somewhere between the "two, recommendations which tend to bring prices up to or "towards the maximum recommended price? Secondly, which-"ever they are or whatever they are in these respects, is their "true effect to keep the prices in general now and hereafter, "while the formula continues, below what they would be if there "were no such recommendations?"

Undoubtedly those questions do arise. In so far as the consideration of them involves construction of paragraph (b) of section 21 (1), the court, having regard to the general effect and language of that paragraph and the subsection as a whole and also the provisions of sections 2, 3 and 4 of and the Schedule to the Act as to the composition and procedure of the court, takes the view and decides that it is at liberty and ought to adopt a realistic approach and to consider on the merits of the particular case whether in fact the removal of the restrictions would have the effect alleged. In particular, the court is not bound to confine its attention to the quasi-legal or formal effect of the recommended maximum prices, but can and should consider how they have been, and are, and are likely to be, effectively operating in practice, and whether as maximum or fixed or minimum prices. That question, and the question whether the recommendations are having and are likely to have the practical effect of keeping prices down, are simply questions of fact to be decided on the evidence. In addition, there are questions as to the adequacy of the federation's formula for determining the prices to be recommended. Is it apt and correct for keeping prices down and stimulating efficiency and affording an objective standard and regulator independent of the wishes of the members?

A point of law was taken on behalf of the respondents as to the burden of proof in a case such as this, where the restrictions are contained in recommendations of a trade association and not in clauses of an agreement. It was pointed out that the words in section 21 which place the burden of proof on the respondents are the words "a restriction accepted in pursuance of any "agreement shall be deemed to be contrary to the public interest "unless the court is satisfied. . . ." In the present case restrictions were not in fact accepted in pursuance of an agreement. Accordingly it is argued that section 21 does not apply to this case or can only be applied partially or by analogy or with modifications or otherwise imperfectly.

In the view of the court this point is covered and disposed of by subsection (7) of section 6 of the Act providing as follows: "(7) Where specific recommendations (whether express or "implied) are made by or on behalf of a trade association to its "members or to any class of its members, as to the action to "be taken or not taken by them in relation to any particular "class of goods or process of manufacture in respect of any "matter described in the said subsection (1), this Part of this "Act shall apply in relation to the agreement for the constitution "of the association notwithstanding any provision to the "contrary therein, as if it contained a term by which each such "member, and any person represented on the association by any "such member, agreed to comply with those recommendations "and any subsequent recommendations made to them by or on "behalf of the association as to the action to be taken by them "in relation to the same class of goods or process of manufacture "and in respect of the same matter."

That subsection introduces a convenient statutory fiction. The obvious reason for this fiction is that compliance by the members of a trade association with its recommendations may have substantially the same effect in establishing and maintaining restrictive practices as would compliance with an agreement by the parties to it. The manifest object of the subsection is to bring the recommendations within the Act and put them on the same basis as contractual provisions for the purpose of being fully amenable to the jurisdiction of the court. The conditions which are required for bringing subsection (7) into operation are satisfied in the present case, in that (a) the respondents in these proceedings are the Federation of Wholesale & Multiple Bakers (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) representing their members; (b) they are a trade association as defined in subsection (8), being a body of persons formed for the purpose of furthering the trade interests of the members; (c) there is an agreement for the constitution of the federation; and (d) specific recommendations have been made by the federation to the members as to action to be taken by them in relation to standard bread in respect of wholesale, retail and other prices to be charged therefor in England and Wales. Accordingly by the operation of subsection (7), Part I of the Act applies in relation to the agreement for the constitution of the federation as if the agreement contained a term by which each member of the federation agreed to comply with those recommendations and to comply with any subsequent recommendations so made as to the action to be taken as to the same class of goods and in respect of the same matter. If then we turn back to section 21, we have to apply the statutory fiction in order to give effect to the obvious intention of the Act and in order to implement the express provisions of subsection (7) of section 6. We have this position. The agreement constituting the federation contains a term that the members shall comply with the federation's recommendations: the agreement does contain that term, notwithstanding appearances to the contrary, because Parliament has said so: that is the effect of the statutory fiction. The federation makes a recommendation setting up a restriction. The members have to accept, and do accept, the restriction in pursuance of the agreement, which contains a term obliging them to accept it. Therefore the provisions of section 21 as to the burden of proof do apply fully and without modification to the present case.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

Now we come to the facts [His Lordship stated the facts set out above and continued:] Much time and thought have been applied to the question of comparison of the trading results of the federation, judged from the sample, with those obtained in other reasonably similar trades. The value of such comparisons of averages, especially in cases based on a sample of returns, must always be limited because of the difficulty of ascertaining with sufficient accuracy the bases of preparation of the accounts, samples and statistical tables which may be selected for comparison purposes.

Comparison of averages resulting from the sample returns with outside statistical sources might have been usefully supplemented by the production of actual samples of representative balance sheets and trading accounts. Such examples would certainly supply a useful check, especially if the trading results were, to use a phrase which has statutory authority, "computed "on ordinary principles of accountancy recognised in the United "Kingdom."

The federation's accountant produced a comparison, based on one of the Annual Reports issued by the Commissioners of H.M. Inland Revenue, which, inter alia, give information of the net trading profit percentages, on turnover, earned by various categories of industrial companies. The report for 1957 to 1958 gives for the food category the figures:

1953–54	6·2 per cent.
1954–55	6·6 per cent.
1955–56	5·7 per cent.

He agreed, basing his calculation on the sample returns for the March, 1959, quarter, that a profit margin of 13s. 5d. represented, approximately, a percentage on turnover of 7 per cent.; that is to say, a materially higher percentage.

In the case of one particular company, a group member put forward by the respondents as a typical plant-bakery the output of which, in standard bread, would show a proportion similar to the average, it was stated that, for the post-subsidy period 1956 to 1959, the ratio of profit to turnover, for standard bread only, was 10·2 per cent.

Unresolved differences of accountancy opinion appeared in the evidence of the accountant for the respondents, as compared with that of the accountant for the registrar, W. E. Parker, not only with reference to the most appropriate standard of comparison, but also as to the methods of arriving at an estimate of the capital employed in the industry. The accountant for the registrar suggested that comparison should be made of the average profits earned on capital employed shown by the sample with similar statistics published in "The Economist," quarterly, relating to industrial profits and capital. These, for the period from April, 1958, to March, 1959 (corresponding to the last four quarters of the formula period), gave, for Food and Confectionery Companies, capital employed, including intangible assets, £1,069 million and relevant trading profits, before taxation, £181 million. The average profit margin of such Food and Confectionery Companies expressed as a percentage on capital employed including goodwill was, therefore, 16·9 per cent.

An inquiry was made by the federation in 1958, when each member submitting costs was asked to furnish particulars of assets and liabilities according to their balance sheets ended between April, 1957, and March, 1958, 38 members sent returns, 37 from the groups and 1 independent, and a schedule was completed from which the position can be summarised as follows: (a) Capital employed with fixed assets taken, as far as possible, at estimated taxation written down values and including goodwill, 64s. 4d. per sack. Average profit margin of 13s. 5d. per sack = 20·8%. (b) Capital employed with fixed assets taken at depreciated replacement cost and including goodwill, 87s. 10d. per sack. Average profit margin of 12s. 1d. per sack = 13·8%.

(Fixed assets at replacement cost would require a higher rate of annual depreciation, and this was estimated by the federation's accountant to be about 1s. 4d., reducing the 13s. 5d. profit margin to 12s. 1d. as above.)

The accountant for the registrar challenged the inclusion of the whole of the groups' "goodwill" in the calculation, since there would certainly be included elements other than normal trade goodwill. He also argued that it was unlikely that "The "Economist" table fixed assets were all at depreciated replacement cost, as probably some would be at historical cost. He had prepared an estimate of capital employed on a basis of historical cost, 49s. 6d. per sack, without goodwill, and at depreciated replacement cost, 73s. per sack, without goodwill. Profit margins of 13s. 5d. and 12s. 1d., respectively, equalled 27 per cent. and 16½ per cent. on capital employed. He thought the reality lay between the two, and added that from "The Economist" comparison "it looks as if the industry is not doing too badly "but I cannot be more specific than that." In fact both comparisons (in respect of turnover and in respect of capital employed) show, with whatever reservations, average profits favourable to the standard bread industry.

On the memorandum and sample generally, while it should be recognised that the federation, faced with difficult problems at the end of 1956 and onwards, made a serious attempt to

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)
1959
Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

evolve a mandatory formula, nevertheless the basis of this formula is open to criticism.

This criticism is in part detailed and in part general. As to the former, it appears to us that it was not necessary, nor realistic, to take as a foundation the methods adopted by the Ministry in the control period, evolved under the stress of war and directed in their origin to the conditions then existing. The present composition of the federation, the relative importance of standard bread production in the industry and the general conditions are not comparable with the earlier period. We have already referred to the change in the composition of the federation in England and Wales as follows:

	1953	1959
" Group " members	43	142
Independents	120	51
	163	193

During the early period of control bakeries were producing practically nothing but " national " bread. Today, as we have stated, 56·9 per cent. in value of total output is standard bread, and 43·1 per cent. in value is made up of other breads and flour confectionery. The demand for standard bread has been steadily declining, and its relative importance to the trade is much reduced since the war period. As to general conditions, it was agreed in evidence that costing techniques had greatly improved and that much more accurate costing could and should be expected from the industry today than could have been hoped for in the control period. No evidence was given as to how far the requirement in the memorandum that apportionment of certain expenses should be on the basis of actual costs, where possible, was implemented in the sample. This would have been an almost unrealisable requirement in the difficult war years, but should be much more capable of realisation in any returns today.

In examining the sample analyses it was noticeable that the cost of flour in the case of the two miller-controlled groups was greater than for the group which had no such association. The explanation given was that the millers charged the same price to their associated members as to outsiders and that the " non-miller " group used overseas flour, with probably cheaper blends, and obtained higher rebates. Without investigating or questioning these reasons we feel that there is here a potential weakness in the formula, since the millers' policy vis-à-vis their respective groups might easily change, with distorting effects on the costs of the sample. These groups are both powerful, and could exercise a very material power in this respect, if they so decided, within the frame of the memorandum as it now stands.

Mention has already been made of the inclusion of initial allowances in the charges for depreciation and rent. It was agreed that this method could cause considerable distortion of results when rebuilding or re-equipment was prevalent. No evidence was forthcoming of the difference which the replacement of the memorandum method by a more realistic depreciation method would make in the sample results.

Reference has been made to methods of apportionment of certain expenses where the Ministry adopted arbitrary reductions, to 25 per cent. and 50 per cent. of their retail selling values, for products other than National Bread. It is fair to comment that the accountant for the registrar said that he did not think that actual costing where available would produce a material effect within the sample, but we think that, given the great difference, to which we have already referred, between the period of control and today, in the relative production of the other sources of revenue to that of standard bread, an attempt should have been made to confirm, at least, the substantial accuracy of the fixed percentages adopted.

These are important criticisms of detail. But assuming for the moment an arrangement to fix maximum prices on these general lines to be capable of justification, the basis actually adopted is open to major criticism. The obvious need was to produce figures of costs and profits which would justify the prices recommended. The most obvious and defensible way would be to assemble the costs and profits of all the members of the federation. "Sample" figures can only be justified in certain circumstances and subject to recognised principles. In this case no attempt was made by the respondents to obtain the actual figures. The sampling method was, as has been said, merely a continuation of sampling methods adopted under abnormal conditions and (an important distinction) under the supervision of a government department. Given this approach by the respondents, careful rules were made to secure that the samples used compared not unfavourably with those in the control period in numbers and in types of members, and to see that the figures resulting from these samples were weighted to secure due representation of the figures drawn from the larger and, it was assumed, lower-cost producers. Moreover, an arbitrary reduction of 7½ per cent. in the costs of production, excluding flour, was made in order to bring the assumed average costs nearer to those of the lower-cost producers. Full credit must be given for these arrangements and for the way in which they were carried out by the federation's accountants, as well as for the arrangements for the automatic change in prices. But it was freely admitted in evidence that no one knew anything about the essential test of the samples; namely, as to whether they were, in fact, representative of costs and profits. Only the costs and profits of the units submitting samples were known; there were no means of actually testing how far, in fact, they were representative.

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement
In re.

Again, the quarterly returns were consistently referred to as "samples," as if that fact gave them validity. But the first question of the statistician must be as to how these samples are arrived at. The answer given was that all members of the federation were asked to "volunteer" to make returns; if these were the returns volunteered, obviously the varying circumstances and attitudes, and, indeed, interests, of the different members could have an unpredictable effect upon the returns actually received. They were not the "planned samples" carefully specified to a given end, nor the "chance samples" known to statisticians as acceptable for certain purposes, and within certain limits and conditions. Moreover, it appeared that in fact (as has been shown) only 3 returns were volunteered from among 51 independent members and the remaining 49 (to take the quarter ending March 1959) were supplied from the three large bakery groups. This ratio was justified by the respondents on the ground that the independents' costs would be higher. But a further factor emerged at the hearing, very important from the point of view of assessing the validity of the sampling as a method. This was that as regards all those units within the three groups (representing nearly three-quarters of the whole) the selection of which units, within each group, should be regarded as representative and should make returns was decided by the management of each group. Without wishing in any way to suggest that, in fact, those concerned were biased, or were in fact influenced by any improper motive in their selection, it is obvious that returns "volunteered" in this way would not satisfy the tests of sampling as generally understood.

It should be mentioned here that after the conclusion of the evidence at the hearing Sir Milner Holland on behalf of the federation informed the court that if only the limitations of the "sample" and the inclusion of the initial allowances in the depreciation figures stood in the way of a decision in favour of the federation's recommendations, the federation would be willing to undertake to amend the formula by providing for every member of each group to supply costings and for "straight line "depreciation" to be used in the costings.

We have now stated the facts which appear to us to be most material, with special emphasis on the memorandum or formula, which is a central feature of this case. We can now come to the issues which have to be decided, as set out at an earlier stage.

The first issue, stated very shortly, is whether the maximum prices have in practice effectively operated so far, and can reasonably be expected to operate in the future, if they are continued, as maximum or fixed or minimum prices. It should be said at the outset that a collective price control stated in terms of maximum prices, and actually so operating, seems less open to criticism in relation to the public interest than one stated in terms of fixed or minimum prices. A maximum price might in certain circumstances safeguard the buyer against having to pay more, while giving him a chance of paying less if he could find a seller willing to take less. That chance might be a benefit, and not unreal, because a situation might arise in which a seller would be willing to take less and the description of the recommended price as "maximum" would enable him to take less without infringing the recommendation. But whether the benefit is real or notional, substantial or unsubstantial, depends upon what happens in practice, or, for the present purposes under section 21 (1) (b) of the Act, what is reasonably estimated as likely to happen in the future, taking into account what has been happening up to the present time. If it appears that in fact sales at prices below the recommended maximum price have been made very infrequently, that must tend to show that the benefit of having the recommended price stated as a maximum is unsubstantial or even negligible. It is clear from the evidence in this case that such sales have taken place hardly ever. There has been no specific evidence of any actual instance, and it has been admitted on behalf of the federation that such sales have been very rare. Indeed, in the market survey, which will be dealt with more fully later, there were 109 purchases of standard bread and not one of them was at a price below the recommended maximum price. That was the only specific evidence before the court on this point. It was contended that the reason for the absence of sales at prices below the recommended maximum price is that it was fixed at a low level, so that nobody could afford to sell below it. In our view, however, as will appear later, while the prices recommended may be low for certain higher-cost sections of the industry (which includes the family bakers producing the loaves by manual operation and on a small scale), they are not low prices for the members of the federation, having enabled them to make, on the average of the "sample," good profits. Some of the federation members are making high profits and could afford to make sales at reduced prices, if that were their policy.

Next, as we have to make under section 21 (1) (b) a forecast as to what is likely to happen in the future, it is right to bring into account indications of the federation's own attitude and expectations. When the change was made from fixed to maximum prices in April, 1958, there was no alteration of the figures and there was no announcement to the public. As appears from the resolutions, which have been set out above, copies of the resolutions and the memorandum were delivered to the Registrar of Restrictive Trading Agreements and to the federation's accountants and to each of the members of the federation. There is, however, nothing to show that the independent retailers or the purchasing public had any knowledge of the newly acquired "maximum" character of the recommended prices in April or May, 1958, or at any time before November, 1958, when, on the occasion of a change in some of the prices, public announcements were made in the Press clearly stating that the prices were maximum and sales could be made at lower prices. The absence of any public announcement at the time when the change from fixed to maximum prices was made tends to show that at that time the federation were not expecting or intending that the new description of the prices as maximum would have far-reaching practical effects. Next, there was no softening of the federation's uncompromising attitude towards price reductions, at any rate if they could be described as "price-cutting." They had in March, 1958, before the change was made, taken a very adverse view of a retailer giving away some loaves and selling others at 1d. below the proper price. In a letter of May 2, 1958, after the change had been made, the secretary of the federation, explaining the disadvantages of high rates of wholesale discounts, said: "There is, too, the "danger that a sufficiently high discount will introduce price "cutting at retail level, a result which might have the heaviest "effect in the West Midland area. It is obvious that wholesale "discounts must be kept to a minimum, not only for the protec-"tion of retail business, but also in the public interest. . . . "I feel particularly disturbed since I have endeavoured, and "to date with a measure of success, to have all federation "members, be they independent or in groups, comply with the "arrangements and agreements made freely in open discussion. "This policy, I had hoped, would be in everybody's interests "and prevent the outbreak of price-cutting wars, which "were so ruinous 20 years ago." Also, there are striking passages in the federation's statement of case, delivered on May 19, 1958. It is right to bear in mind that the statement of case must have been drafted initially at a time when fixed prices were recommended, and that even after the change the court's approval was (as it still is) sought for the earlier fixed price recommendations as well as for the later maximum price system. Nevertheless, the passages are striking, and the following are examples:

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

Paragraph (21) (h) (i). "There is information as to price "available which would put any member of the public on "inquiry as to profiteering in the event of prices substantially "in excess of the recommended price being demanded without "adequate justification and on inquiry as to a lowering of "quality and service in the event of prices substantially lower "than the recommended price being demanded without adequate "justification." Paragraph 21 (h) (vi). "The existence of the "recommended price, though not preventing sales of bread at "lower prices when adequate justification for such lower prices "exists, will tend to mitigate such periods of price cutting."

The intervention of the fixed retailer's margin of 1s. 3d. per dozen loaves of standard bread introduces an element of rigidity into the price structure, and would hinder sales to independent retailers at reduced prices, if any member of the federation were minded to make such sales. While the federation's trade witness was giving evidence, a problem was put to him on these lines: Take the common case of a sale by a federation member to an independent retailer in circumstances where only the fixed retailer's margin of 1s. 3d. per dozen loaves, without any additional discount, is appropriate. If the sale is made at the maximum price, the invoice will show for one dozen loaves the maximum retail price of 10s. 6d. and the retailer's margin of 1s. 3d., and the net wholesale price of 9s. 3d. The retailer will sell at 10½d. per loaf and receive 10s. 6d. But suppose that the federation member wished to sell at a reduced price, what would he do? Would he simply charge a reduced wholesale price of, say, 8s. 9d., and leave the retailer free to sell at the recommended maximum price of 10½d. per loaf, which is also the current price, and so receive a total of 10s. 6d., thereby taking a margin of 1s. 9d. instead of 1s. 3d.? Or should the federation member, before reducing his wholesale price, take some action to ensure that the retailer will make a corresponding reduction in his retail price to the public, so that the retailer will receive no more than his proper margin of 1s. 3d.? The federation's trade witness asked for time to consider the question, and on a later day he was recalled. He gave a full and careful answer. He could not say that precisely the circumstances or precisely the type of example stated in the question had been considered, but he did think that, in approaching the question of retail price and fixed margin, so far as possible the whole context of such a position had been given some thought, and he could give a generalised answer on these lines: "First, "if a producer reduced his recommended retail price and then "gave the same fixed margin, so that he was in effect putting "into the hands of the retailer bread at a lower price, it might "well be considered by the federation that he was not obeying "the fixed margin; that in effect he was giving a larger margin "than the fixed retail margin, which would be regarded as being "against the interests of the federation. The only other "alternative circumstances I can think of is that if a producer "desired his bread should be sold to the public at a lower price, "he would then have to enforce a fixed price ruling on the "retailer." He was then asked if that meant there would be an understanding between the particular plant baker and the particular retailer, that if the retailer got his 12 loaves at 8s. 9d. he must not sell them at more than 10s. He said: "Precisely. I cannot conceive that that would be likely to "arise, because I do feel so much myself that the position "we are in is that action by one producer could produce "action by other producers in the same area, so that advantage

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

"would be short-lived with an arrangement of this sort." In all probability his answer does show how the problem would be solved, if it arose and had to be decided. It is interesting, however, to note that there was no ready-made solution for this problem, which seems elementary if any sales below the recommended maximum price in the common type of transaction (with the plant baker selling to the independent retailer, who resells to the public) were expected or envisaged. So long as the recommended maximum price is operating as a fixed price, it can operate in conjunction with the fixed retailer's margin without raising any such problem, and, as the problem had not been raised, it is a reasonable inference that the recommended maximum price had been operating as a fixed price.

Finally, it can be said as a matter of common sense that if a large and influential federation, which has at least half the market for the commodity concerned, publishes a recommended price, even if it is described as a maximum price, the members of the federation and other traders will naturally regard it as a fair and reasonable price approved by the federation, and they will be disinclined and unlikely to sell at any lower price.

For the reasons which have been given, our conclusion is that the federation's recommended maximum price has in practice effectively operated as a fixed price, and, whether or not the recommendations have been otherwise beneficial to the public, they have not been substantially beneficial by virtue of their description of the price as "maximum."

We now come to the second main issue, which is whether the true effect of the price recommendations is to keep standard bread prices now and hereafter, while the formula continues, below what they would be if there were no such recommendations. We have to make a forecast as to the likelihood or degree of risk of price increase ensuing if the price recommendations were abolished.

The issue has two aspects. The first is financial—what level or kind of price is likely to be produced by the formula? The second is economic—what results would be likely to flow from the economic facts of the situation if the formula had not existed or were abolished?

As to the financial aspect, the formula itself, although for reasons given above it cannot be fully relied upon to present a dependable average cost, appears to show profits which are too favourable to justify a claim that the formula adequately protects the consumer. The average profits have been shown to be favourable in comparison with profits in other industries. Moreover the average profit, which results from the formula, is to continue while the formula lasts, in bad times as well as good. Deficiencies below the average are to be automatically recovered in subsequent periods whatever the state of trade or whatever the variation in consumer purchasing power.

As to the economic aspect, we will first mention a suggestion as to method that was made by the registrar's expert witnesses. They suggested that, if there is to be collective regulation of prices on the basis of costs, it should not be on the basis of average costs reduced by an "efficiency factor" (such as the 7½ per cent. of production costs other than flour in this case) but rather on the basis of lowest costs with an addition calculated to keep in business enough higher-cost producers to provide the supplies required by the public. There was no evidence in this case as to practical applications of the suggested method, and it might not be free from difficulties, but it does seem to us to be sound in principle, and a citation from the judgment of this court in the Scottish case [2] will show what is involved: ". . . the "ascertainment of a price based on averaged costs has been shown "in the evidence in this case to be consistent with high profits "being available to the low cost producers, with no means "existing whereby they can pass any part of the benefit of these "profits, or their own probable higher efficiency, to the con-"sumer in the shape of lower prices for standard loaves. Not "unnaturally it is among the low cost producers that the "businesses controlled by the five dominating groups are to be "found. Thus the system is not designed to reflect the lowest "economically practicable cost, or to result in the lowest "economically practicable price being paid by the consumer, and "if it does not do so in the short run, we do not see why it should "do so in the long."

We now come to consider directly the question, What results would be likely to flow from the economic facts of the situation if the formula had not existed or were abolished? A very important factor to be taken into account is one which has already been mentioned briefly, namely the declining demand for bread in general and standard bread in particular. In the agreed statement of facts there is a table of bread consumption stated in ounces per head per week as follows:

Year	Oz.
1937–38	58·19
1954	56·28
1955	55·13
1956	51·08
1957	48·00
1958	47·21

Of course, the increase of population is a partial countervailing factor. There is in the agreed statement of facts another table showing both the declining trend of bread sales for 1948 to 1954 and also the larger establishments gaining more of the market at the expense of the small firms. The figures are in thousands of hundredweights, and are for Great Britain except that for 1954 the sales by larger establishments include also sales in

[2] L.R. 1 R.P. 347, 379.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

Northern Ireland. Subject to that qualification the figures are as follows:

	1948	1951	1954
Sales by larger establishments	55,032	52,994	52,947
Sales by small firms	26,253	17,699	12,690
Total sales	81,285	70,693	65,637

It was agreed by the witnesses that there has been a considerable decline in the consumption of standard bread since 1956. The declining trends in the consumption of bread in general, and standard bread in particular, will not necessarily continue indefinitely, and the federation's trade witness had an impression, from certain figures of flour consumption which he had seen, that the declining tendency is now levelling off. It seems, however, likely that the decline will continue to some extent owing to consumer preference for more expensive foods than bread and for breads other than standard bread. Another important factor which has already been mentioned is the need for a plant baker to maintain a steady turnover, because a fall in production would cause uneconomic labour costs and idle capital equipment. Production for stock is not practicable, as bread which is not sold within a short time of baking becomes unsaleable: unlike some other articles, it cannot be stored for sale if and when demand revives. So long as there is a declining demand for standard bread, the plant baker will have to increase his share of the diminishing market merely in order to retain his existing turnover, and he would be more likely to reduce than to increase his prices. If there is or will be a levelling out of the demand, so that it ceases to decline and becomes stationary, it will still be necessary for the plant baker not to lose turnover, and there would obviously be a risk of that if he increased his prices. Thirdly, the recommended prices, while they may be low for the industry as a whole, are not low for the federation members, who are on the average making good profits from standard bread, which is their "bread and butter line," and they are probably making higher profits from other breads and flour confectionery. There are thus sound economic reasons for expecting that prices would tend to be favourable to the consumer in the absence of collective price recommendations. Moreover, the evidence of the federation's trade witness shows that there are other considerations likely to influence the federation in the direction of a low price policy, in that (i) they wish to act with a due sense of responsibility to the public and give no ground for any accusation of profiteering, (ii) they wish to avoid any situation which might lead to the reimposition of price control by the Government, (iii) high prices might give rise to wide retailers' margins, and (iv) the federation members are supplying quite a number of substantial multiple grocers or dairies or similar large customers, and if the profit margin of bread were at a high level such customers might prefer to bake their own bread rather than buy it from federation members. The effect of competition is illustrated by the results of a market survey carried out for a rather different purpose. The federation had instructed Retail Statistics Ltd. to carry out a market survey by making purchases of standard loaves in selected areas, and Retail Statistics Ltd. accordingly purchased 109 of the 28-ounce wrapped and sliced standard tin loaves for this purpose. A summary of the results of the survey shows that in areas where the federation's influence is strong, whether the population be large (as in Liverpool, Bristol and Croydon) or sparse (as in Hucknall, Garforth and Hereford), the sales were made, with only one exception, at the federation's recommended maximum price of 11½d. per loaf; but that in areas where the federation's influence is weak, whether the population be large (as in Ipswich, Swindon and Weymouth) or sparse (as in Downham Market, Devizes and Whitchurch), a majority of the sales (15 to 12 and 12 to 8) were made at prices higher than the recommended price. Of the sales at prices higher than the recommended price none was made to the customer by a federation member through his own shop or roundsman, but some were of bread produced by federation members. These results do afford evidence of the federation influence in securing sales at the prices which they fix, but it is the local competition of the federation members rather than the existence of the recommendations which tends to keep the other prices down.

Under free competition there might well be cases of some prices in some areas being above the general level, but, as the market survey has shown, that happens also with the recommendations in operation. Moreover, a marked rise in production costs would force a rise in prices whether the recommendations were in operation or not. But, on the whole, having regard to the factors which we have mentioned and our impressions derived from all the evidence, we are not satisfied that there is a likelihood or serious risk that abolition of the recommendations would cause a rise in bread prices. On the contrary, in face of a declining, or at best stationary, demand on the one hand, and ample and increasingly efficient production capacity on the other hand, the long-term natural forces of competition would seem to favour some reduction in the level of prices.

The importance of preserving competition as the ultimate safeguard can be deduced from a consideration of the evidence of the respondent's economist, E. E. Watkins. He gave evidence to the effect that, at present, prices are largely controlled by dominant groups which have grown or developed under present arrangements; that in this situation it is in the economic interests of members of the federation not to compete in price, and they are strong enough to fix prices if they act together; and that in these circumstances the consumer would do well to accept the existing system of recommended maximum prices. If we had reached a different view as to the net benefits derived by the consumers from the present formula, it would then have become important to bear in mind the strain to which any formula would be exposed, if at some future time the groups' strong and increasingly dominant position in the industry were carried forward to a point only just short of "monopoly" as statutorily defined, and they were fixing the prices without any external check or independent regulator, with the purchasing public, deprived of the ultimate safeguard of price competition, left to rely solely on the formula for their protection. That is not the present position, but it is a future possibility which cannot be disregarded.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1959

Federation of Wholesale and Multiple Bakers' (Great Britain and Northern Ireland) Agreement, In re.

Our conclusion is that the respondents have not proved their case under paragraph (b), not having satisfied the court that the removal of the restrictions would deny to the public any specific or substantial benefit or advantage such as is referred to in that paragraph. Therefore, no question now arises under paragraph (g) or under the "balancing provision." As the restrictions concerned have failed to pass the statutory tests, there must be in the terms of the Act a finding that the restrictions are contrary to the public interest. As was said in the Scottish case,[3] "It "must always be kept firmly in view that it is to be presumed "that freedom from the restrictions struck at by the statute is "in the public interest, and freedom from such restrictions "necessarily implies freedom to compete in price as well as in "other matters." There is no implied criticism of the conduct or intentions of the federation, who have not been lacking in moderation or in civic responsibility. Their formula has deserved, and we hope has received, full and careful consideration. The federation have through their counsel and witnesses put the full facts candidly and lucidly and fairly before the court.

One further point remains to be dealt with. Counsel on both sides have asked us, in exercise of the powers conferred by section 20 (5) of the Act, to make declarations not only in respect of the agreement as it now is with the set of restrictions now in force, but also in respect of the agreement as it was in, say, March, 1958, before it was varied by the resolutions of April 9, 1958, introducing the costings formula and the description of the recommended prices as maximum. The powers under that subsection are discretionary, and we are asked to make a declaration in respect of a system which has been obsolete for twenty months and was materially different from the system now in force. We have to ask ourselves, how could paragraph (b) be applied? Suppose that the expression "would deny" can be read, as counsel on both sides asked us to read it, as including "would have denied": it would still be necessary for us to project our minds back to March, 1958, and make a forecast in respect of a period then future but now past, and it would be difficult to decide how much foreknowledge we could allow ourselves to have in respect of that period. In our view it is not appropriate to make any declaration as to past history in this case. There will be a declaration as to the restrictions involved in the present system.

[3] L.R. 1 R.P. 347, 382.

Declaration accordingly.

Solicitors: McKenna & Co.; Treasury Solicitor.

J. F. L.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.
1960
Mar. 7.
Sellers, Ormerod and Upjohn L.JJ.

* PEASE v. GEORGE.

[1959 P. No. 1739.]

PRACTICE NOTE.

Practice — Jury, civil action — Right to jury — Judge's discretion— Whether Court of Appeal will interfere—Personal injuries—Very grave injuries—R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 1 (1) (3).
Court of Appeal—Discretion of judge, matter within—Application for jury—Whether court will interfere with judge's decision.

Hope v. Great Western Railway Co. [1937] 2 K.B. 130; 53 T.L.R. 399; [1937] 1 All E.R. 625, C.A. applied.

APPLICATION.

By his writ and statement of claim, the plaintiff, Edward Pease, an infant suing by his father and next friend, Edward Frederick Pease, claimed damages for personal injuries against the defendant, Richard Thomas George. The plaintiff's claim was in respect of injuries alleged to have resulted from a collision between his solo motor-cycle and the defendant's motor-van along Thanet Way, Herne Bay, Kent, on May 10, 1959, which was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. The defendant denied that he was negligent or in any way responsible for the accident. There was no agreed report on the plaintiff's condition. The plaintiff alleged that he had sustained very severe injuries. It was pleaded in his statement of claim, inter alia, that "the plaintiff is now a total invalid and is likely "to remain so both mentally and physically for the remainder "of his life, requiring constant nursing and medical attention."

On the summons for directions, Master Clayton ordered that the trial should be before a judge without a jury. On appeal to Hinchcliffe J. in chambers, the judge affirmed the master's order and refused the plaintiff leave to appeal. The plaintiff applied to the Court of Appeal for leave to appeal.

C. A.
1960
Pease v. George (Practice Note).

J. Drinkwater for the plaintiff.
E. W. Eveleigh for the defendant.

The following cases were cited in argument, in addition to those referred to in the judgment: Scott v. Musial *; Bocock v. Enfield Rolling Mills Ltd. †; Dolbey v. Goodwin. ‡

Sellers L.J. This is a case where the plaintiff sought to have an action for damages for personal injuries incurred through a road accident tried by a jury. The application was refused by the master, and, on appeal to Hinchcliffe J., he likewise, in his discretion, refused to order a jury. There may be much to be said for having a jury in this particular case where the injuries are very grave indeed, and there is some judicial authority to indicate that a jury is not an improper or unreasonable mode of trial in such circumstances. But, while there was ample power in the judge to have ordered trial by jury in this particular case, he took the view that it was not one in which he would do so. It seems that under R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 1 (3),[1] it is in the discretion of the court or the judge to decide one way or the other, and that is an absolute discretion. In Hope v. Great Western Railway Co.[2]—a decision of a court of five judges of the Court of Appeal—it was held that this court would not interfere with the judge's discretion in such circumstances. No doubt if it was, in the view of this court, going to create any real injustice, the principle of Evans v. Bartlam [3] might be invoked. But I can see no injustice in this particular action being tried by a judge alone, as the judge below ordered. This application, therefore, must be refused.

Ormerod L.J. I agree.

Upjohn L.J. I agree.

Application dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: White & Co.; L. Bingham & Co.

N. P.

* [1959] 2 Q.B. 429; [1959] 3 W.L.R. 437; [1959] 3 All E.R. 193, C.A.

† [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1303; [1954] 3 All E.R. 94, C.A.

‡ [1955] 1 W.L.R. 553; [1955] 2 All E.R. 166, C.A.

[1] R.S.C., Ord. 36, r. 1: "(1) In "every action commenced by writ of "summons, an order made on the "summons for directions shall determine the place and mode of the trial, "and, where the trial is to be before "a Judge, shall determine whether "the trial is to be with or without a "jury; but any such order may be "varied by a subsequent order of the "Court or a Judge made at or before "the trial. . . . (3) Save as provided "by Rules 2 and 3 of this Order, the "discretion of the Court or Judge in "making or varying any order under "this Rule is an absolute one."

[2] [1937] 2 K.B. 130; 53 T.L.R. 399; [1937] 1 All E.R. 625, C.A.

[3] [1937] A.C. 473; 53 T.L.R. 689; [1937] 2 All E.R. 646, H.L.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

* FINCH v. FINCH.

1960
March 14, 15, 16, 17, 18.

Mr. Commissioner Latey Q.C.

PRACTICE NOTE.

Husband and Wife—Practice—Pleading—Answer—Bare denial—Provocation and other matters of the nature of confession and avoidance alleged at hearing.

The doctrine of confession and avoidance does not obtain in matrimonial causes. The Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957, r. 17, although leaving a party free to set up more than a bare denial if so advised, places no obligation upon him to do so.

Thompson v. Thompson [1957] P. 19; [1957] 2 W.L.R. 138; [1957] 1 All E.R. 161 applied.

PETITION for divorce.

A wife filed a petition seeking dissolution of the marriage on the ground of the husband's cruelty and adultery. The husband filed an answer which consisted of a bare denial of the wife's charges.

At the hearing of the suit the cross-examination of the wife proceeded on the basis of certain acts of violence and ill-temper on her part which had provoked some degree of retaliation on the part of the husband. Counsel for the wife sought to exclude those matters on the ground that they should have been pleaded in the husband's answer so that he should not be taken by surprise.

In the course of the hearing leave was granted to the husband to amend his answer to make, by way of cross-petition, a charge of desertion against the wife.

S. C. Silkin and R. D. L. Kelly for the wife.

K. Bruce Campbell and Elaine Jones for the husband and the intervener.

MR. COMMISSIONER LATEY Q.C., in the course of his judgment, referred to the submission of counsel for the wife on the state of the pleadings and continued: He submitted that as the answer was a bare denial of cruelty it was not open to counsel for the husband to set up in cross-examination a case of provocation and the like. He based himself on the Rules of the Supreme Court, Ord. 19, r. 15, which states: "The defendant or plaintiff (as the case "may be) must raise by his pleading all matters which show the "action or counterclaim not to be maintainable, or that the trans-"action is either void or voidable in point of law, and all such "grounds of defence or reply, as the case may be, as if not raised "would be likely to take the opposite party by surprise, or would "raise issues of fact not arising out of the preceding pleadings, as, "for instance, fraud, Statute of Limitations, release, payment,

1960

Finch
v.
Finch.

Mr. Commissioner Latey Q.C.

"performance, facts showing illegality either by statute or common law, or Statute of Frauds" and suggested that he had been taken by surprise in this matter.

The doctrine as to pleading confession and avoidance or accord and satisfaction in common law and Chancery actions is well established, but it has never obtained in matrimonial causes as something which has to be pleaded. There are some circumstances in which, although the answer may be confined to a bare denial, some extra fact should be pleaded, as, for instance, when the wife's respondent's case, in a petition based on desertion, was that there had been a mutual agreement to separate with subsequent happenings which might negative desertion. That was really the issue in Slater v. Slater.[1] In such a case it is desirable that the fact be pleaded in the answer.

Counsel for the wife further invoked the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957, rule 82, as to the Rules of the Supreme Court being followed where there was no matrimonial causes rule dealing with the subject-matter; but rule 17 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957, does deal with this point. Though it imposes no obligation upon the defending party to set up more than a bare denial, it leaves him free to do so if he is so advised. An apt explanation on the point raised by counsel for the wife was actually given by Denning L.J. in the case of Thompson v. Thompson,[2] a case based on cruelty charges in which the pleadings of both parties were prolix. Denning L.J. said [3] that all that was needed from the wife, respondent, was a denial of the charge of cruelty. Speaking generally, he said [4]: "The respondent should "also remember that in his answer he need only deny that he is "guilty of cruelty. He need not go on to say what happened on "the occasion in question." Thus, both by law and practice, the objections of counsel for the wife cannot be sustained. The underlying principle in matrimonial causes is that all the relevant facts to enable the court to come to a decision should be adduced in order that the court may, if satisfied of a matrimonial offence, possibly change the status of the parties.

[His Lordship at the conclusion of his judgment, rejecting the charges of cruelty and adultery made against the husband, the intervener having already been dismissed from the suit, found that the wife had deserted the husband and dismissed the prayer of the petition and granted a decree nisi to the husband on the prayer of his cross-petition.]

Solicitors: Barradale, Blacket Gill, Silkin & Young; Prothero & Prothero.

E. J.

[1] [1952] W.N. 260; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 1314; [1952] 1 All E.R. 1343.

[2] [1957] P. 19; [1957] 2 W.L.R. 138; [1957] 1 All E.R. 161, C.A.

[3] [1957] P. 34.

[4] Ibid. 35.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

* STROUD BUILDING SOCIETY v. DELAMONT AND OTHERS.

1960
Jan. 22, 26, 27, 28.

Cross J.

[1959 S. No. 1407.]

Mortgage—Receiver—Receipt of rent, by—Trespasser, from—Whether tenancy created—Surrounding circumstances—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 20), s. 109 (2).

On July 31, 1947, freehold premises were charged by way of legal mortgage in favour of a building society by a legal charge which provided that no lease should be made by the mortgagor without the consent of the society. In March, 1948, the mortgagor, without the consent of the society, granted an oral tenancy of the premises. On June 27, 1956, the mortgagor was adjudicated bankrupt. On January 23, 1957, the society served notice on the tenant to deliver up possession and stated that they did not regard themselves as bound by the tenancy, but the tenant did not comply with the notice to quit and the society did not enforce it, and until the end of 1957 the rent was paid to the mortgagor's trustee in bankruptcy. On January 13, 1958, the society, pursuant to section 109 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, appointed P., its secretary, to be receiver of the income of the mortgaged property; he gave the tenant notice of his appointment and requested her to pay the rent to him. In March, 1958, the society informed the tenant that the terms of the tenancy, which she held as tenant of the building society, were the same as those of the tenancy granted by the mortgagor. The tenant paid rent by cheques drawn in favour of the society, and on July 1, 1958, P., acting as secretary of the society and not as receiver, served on the tenant notice to quit and deliver up possession on January 3, 1959, but it was agreed that, if the tenant held a tenancy binding on the society, that notice was invalid. The tenant failed to comply with that notice. On a summons by the society claiming possession of the premises:—

Held that, although the receipt of rent by a receiver appointed by a mortgagee did not of itself create a tenancy between a mortgagee and the tenant, there was nothing to prevent a mortgagee who had appointed a receiver from creating the relationship of landlord and tenant between himself and the mortgagor's tenant without previously terminating the receivership, and that, on that footing and looking at the facts as a whole, the right inference was that the society had consented to accept the tenancy notwithstanding the receivership. The society, accordingly, was not entitled to possession.

Dictum of Harman J. in Lever Finance Ltd. v. Trustee of the Property of L. N. and H. M. Needleman (Bankrupts) [1956] Ch. 375, 382; [1956] 3 W.L.R. 72; [1956] 2 All E.R. 378 applied.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By a mortgage deed, dated July 31, 1947, the first defendant, Stanley Ernest Delamont, charged by way of legal mortgage a freehold property, No. 22, East St. Helen Street, Abingdon, Berkshire, in favour of the plaintiffs, the Stroud Building Society, in consideration of an advance of £2,800 with interest. Clause 7 (iii) of the deed provided that no lease should be made by the mortgagor without the consent in writing of the society. In March, 1948, the mortgagor, without the consent of the society, orally agreed with Mrs. Mary Alice Waller, the third defendant, that she should have a tenancy of the mortgaged property at a weekly rent of five guineas. On June 27, 1956, the mortgagor was adjudicated bankrupt and the tenant then paid the rent to the second defendant, the trustee in bankruptcy. On January 23, 1957, the society served on the tenant notice to deliver up possession of the mortgaged property on February 9, 1957. Correspondence ensued between her solicitors and the solicitors acting for the society in which it was stated that the society did not recognise the tenancy as binding upon it, since it had not consented to its creation. Nevertheless, the tenant did not comply with the notice to quit, and the society took no steps to enforce it. The tenant continued to pay rent to the trustee in bankruptcy throughout 1957.

1960

Stroud Building Society v. Delamont.

On January 13, 1958, the society, in exercise of the powers conferred on it by section 109 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, appointed its secretary, Alan Frederick Richards Payne, to be the receiver of the income of the mortgaged property, and on the next day he gave the tenant notice of his appointment and requested her to pay to him all rent then due, or thereafter becoming due, in respect of the tenancy.

On March 3, 1958, one E. W. Mann, who helped the tenant in business matters, wrote a letter to the society's solicitors which contained the following sentence: "With reference to your letter "of January 14th signed by Mr. Payne applying for the rent, will "you please send Mrs. Waller the terms and conditions of the "tenancy." On March 10, 1958, the society's solicitors replied that they understood from the society that the terms of the tenancy were the same as those between the tenant and the mortgagor, and that unless all rent due since the service of the notice was paid within seven days proceedings would be taken for its recovery and for possession. After a dispute with regard to deductions for repairs, the tenant paid the arrears of rent from January 14, 1958, to the society by a cheque drawn in favour of the society, and she continued to pay the weekly rent of five guineas by cheques drawn at intervals in favour of the society. It appeared from the account kept by the manager of the society that the total amount received from the tenant was less than the sum expended on repairs to the property.

On July 1, 1958, the society's solicitors wrote to the tenant in the following terms: "We have been instructed by the Stroud "Building Society to send you the enclosed notice to quit and "deliver up the above mentioned premises on January 3, 1959, "at which date the key should be forwarded to the secretary of "the Stroud Building Society. . . ." The enclosed notice read as follows: "I, Alan Frederick Richards Payne, secretary of the "Stroud Building Society . . . hereby give you notice to quit and "deliver up to the . . . society or to whom they may appoint on "January 3, 1959, possession of the premises . . . which you "hold as tenant of the said Stroud Building Society."

It was agreed between the parties that in giving that notice he was acting as secretary of the society and not as receiver. In answer to a letter from E. W. Mann expressing surprise at the service of the notice to quit, the society's solicitors wrote again to the tenant on August 25, 1958, saying: "We have to inform "you that the possession of this property will be required on "January 3, 1959, as provided by the notice to quit and in the "meantime rent should be paid to the society." The tenant continued to pay the rent to the society after receipt of that letter in precisely the same manner as she had been paying it up to that date. On December 19, 1958, the tenant's solicitors wrote to the society's solicitors suggesting, among other things, that the notice to quit of July 1, 1958, was invalid as the premises were business premises and the notice did not comply with the statutory requirements. It was common ground between the parties that if the tenant held a tenancy binding on the society the notice must have been bad. The tenant did not give up possession on January 3, 1959, and, accordingly, on January 30, 1959, the society's solicitors wrote to her solicitors saying that they had been instructed by the society to institute proceedings for possession of the property, and that in view of the nature of the tenancy a fresh notice to quit was being given. No fresh notice was in fact given and by a summons dated May 6, 1959, the society claimed possession of the mortgaged premises on the footing that the tenant was a trespasser and that no particular form of notice was required.

E. G. Nugee for the plaintiffs.

A. L. Price for the tenant.

The first and second defendants did not appear and were not represented.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Keech v. Hall[1]; Lows v. Telford[2]; In re O'Rourke's Estate[3]; Doe d. Hughes and Rising v. Bucknell[4]; Corbett v. Plowden[5]; Rust v. Goodale[6]; Clarke v. Grant[7]; Leicester Permanent Building Society v. Shearley[8]; Parker v. Braithwaite[9]; Towerson v. Jackson[10]; Keith v. R. Gancia & Co. Ltd.[11]

[1] (1778) 1 Doug.K.B. 21.
[2] (1876) 1 App.Cas. 414, H.L.
[3] (1889) 23 L.R.Ir. 497.
[4] (1838) 8 C. & P. 566.
[5] (1884) 25 Ch.D. 678, C.A.
[6] [1957] Ch. 33; [1956] 3 W.L.R. 749; [1956] 3 All E.R. 373.
[7] [1950] 1 K.B. 104; 65 T.L.R. 241; [1949] 1 All E.R. 768, C.A.
[8] [1951] Ch. 90; 66 T.L.R. (Pt. 2) 316; [1950] 2 All E.R. 738.
[9] [1952] W.N. 504; [1952] 2 T.L.R. 731; [1952] 2 All E.R. 837.
[10] [1891] 2 Q.B. 484, C.A.
[11] [1904] 1 Ch. 774; 20 T.L.R. 330, C.A.

1960

Stroud Building Society v. Delamont.

Cross J. stated the facts substantially as set out above and continued: When a mortgagor has granted a tenancy which is not binding on the mortgagee, since he has not given his consent, the mortgagee can, instead of treating the tenant as a trespasser, consent to treat him as his tenant or, at all events, act in such a way as precludes him from saying that he has not consented to take him as his tenant. Such an acceptance by the mortgagee of the mortgagor's tenant, whether express or implied, or operating by way of estoppel, must, I think, amount to a creation of a new tenancy between the parties. The tenancy between a mortgagor and a tenant is not one which is merely voidable by the mortgagee if he chooses not to accept it, but which he can confirm by waiving his right to avoid it. It is a nullity as against the mortgagee; and so, if the mortgagee is to lose his right to treat the mortgagor's tenant as a trespasser, it must be because the tenant has become the mortgagee's tenant under a new tenancy. The law on the subject is, I think, correctly stated in Smith's Leading Cases, 13th ed. (1929), p. 575, in the notes to Moss v. Gallimore.[1]

In this case it is clear that until January 13, 1958, when the receiver was appointed, the society had done nothing which deprived it of its right to treat the tenant as a trespasser. It is equally clear that if the society had then called on her to pay her rent to it, and she had done so, a new weekly tenancy would have been created between her and the society. But, instead of calling on the tenant to pay them rent, the society appointed its secretary receiver of the mortgaged property. A receiver appointed by a mortgagee does not, of course, pay any rent received to the mortgagor. He either applies it in payment of outgoings or pays it to the mortgagee. But, though the mortgagee has the benefit of the rent, the receiver, by reason of section 109 (2) of the Law of Property Act, is the agent of the mortgagor. In Lever Finance Ltd. v. Trustee of the Property of L. N. and H. M. Needleman (Bankrupts),[2] where, as here, the mortgagor was a bankrupt and the mortgagee had appointed a receiver, Harman J. considered the question whether the receipt of rent by such a receiver created a tenancy between the tenant and the mortgagee, and he expressed the view that it did not.[3] This was obiter dictum and not part of the ratio decidendi of the case, but I shall accept it as correct. Indeed, counsel for the tenant has not invited me to do otherwise, but bases his case entirely on what happened after the appointment of the receiver. It is, I think, a reasonable, indeed the only reasonable, inference from the correspondence, that the society did not appreciate until shortly before the issue of the summons that the fact that they had appointed a receiver might enable them to continue to treat the tenant as a trespasser if they so desired, even though they were receiving the benefit of the rent paid by her. When E. W.

[1] (1779) 1 Doug. 279.

[2] [1956] 1 Ch. 375; [1956] 3 W.L.R. 72; [1956] 2 All E.R. 378.

[3] [1956] Ch. 375, 382.

Mann wrote to the society on March 3, 1958, in answer to the receiver's demand for rent, asking what would be the terms and conditions of the tenancy, the society through its solicitors answered that the terms of the tenancy were the same as those between the tenant and the mortgagor. The question and answer indicate that both parties thought that a new tenancy between the society and the tenant would result from her payment of rent. The matter is made still plainer by the words "which you "hold as tenant of the said Stroud Building Society" in the notice served on July 1, 1958, and in the reference to the nature of the tenancy in the society's solicitors' letter of January 30, 1959. There is, after all, nothing very surprising in the society making this mistake. The idea that a mortgagee can through the medium of receivership get the benefit of a tenant's rent while remaining at liberty to treat him as a trespasser is a highly artificial one which would not readily occur to a layman or even to a good many lawyers.

Mr. Nugee, however, argued for the society that the fact that the parties may have thought they were entering into the relationship of landlord and tenant is quite irrelevant. He points out that the receivership was never terminated, and that in a new rent book which was issued in April, 1959 (by which time no doubt the society had been advised as to the effect in law of receipt of rent by a receiver), the rent is described as payable to the receiver under a tenancy between the tenant and the mortgagor. He also points out that such cases as Doe d. Wilcockson v. Lynch[4] and Lowenthal v. Vanhoute[5] show that, when an owner of land is entitled to treat someone in occupation of it as a trespasser, the inclusion in a notice served on him of an erroneous statement that the occupier is the tenant of the owner will not itself without more create a tenancy between the owner and occupier. On the basis of those cases he argued that the inclusion in the notice of July 1, 1958, of what he submits was an erroneous statement that the tenant was tenant of the society would not crate a tenancy. He also argues that no importance should be attached to the fact that by the letter of August 25 the society demanded payment of rent and that the tenant paid the rent demanded, since she was only continuing to do what she had in fact been doing since March. He argues that the fact that rent was paid by cheque in favour of the society is not (having regard to section 109 (3) of the Law of Property Act, 1925) inconsistent with its being paid to the receiver. Consequently, he says, the reference to the payment of rent to the society made in the letter of August 25, 1958, is capable of being construed as an intimation that the tenant must, until the notice to quit expires, go on paying rent to the receiver as agent for the mortgagor by way of cheques drawn in favour of the society.

[4] (1771) 2 Chit. 683.

[5] [1947] K.B. 342; 63 T.L.R. 54; [1947] 1 All E.R. 116.

1960

Stroud Building Society v. Delamont.

Cross J.

It may well be that if one takes each point which may be said to tell in favour of the creation of a tenancy in isolation from the rest, each can be explained away on those lines, but I must look at the picture as a whole. So far as I know, there is nothing in point of law to prevent a mortgagee who has appointed a receiver of mortgaged premises from creating, by virtue of his legal estate in the land, the relationship of landlord and tenant between himself and a tenant of the mortgagor without previously terminating his receivership. Mr. Nugee, though he did not admit that that was so, was not able to refer me to any case which suggested the contrary. On that footing I have to say whether (looking at the facts as a whole and putting myself in the position of a juryman) the society had consented to accept the tenant as tenant notwithstanding the receivership or whether they had not. In my judgment, the right inference to draw from all the facts is that the society had consented to accept her as a tenant. No doubt the society never deliberately abandoned any right which it had to treat her as a trespasser, but that was because it never appreciated that it had any such right. No doubt, if it had appreciated that, it would have acted differently. But, as I see it, that is irrelevant to the question I have to decide. In the result, therefore, I must refuse this application.

Application refused with costs.

Solicitors: Crossman, Block & Keith for Winterbotham, Ball & Gadsden, Stroud; Gamlen, Bowerman & Forward for Morland & Son, Abingdon.

M. G. T.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.

1960
March 1, 2, 3, 4, 7.

Sellers, Ormerod and Upjohn L.JJ.

* PEMBERTON v. BRIGHT and Another.

[1957 P. No. 295.]

Nuisance—Watercourse—Interference by highway authority—Extension of ancient culvert with new entrance on adjoining occupiers' land—Entrance left unprotected by grid—Neighbouring land flooded by blocking of unprotected entrance 30 years after completion of work—Liability of highway authority—Liability of occupier—Highways Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will 4, c. 50), s. 67.

Nuisance—Potential nuisance—Damage reasonably foreseeable—Entrance to culvert left unprotected.

Injunction—Form—Nuisance—Mandatory order on occupiers of land "at all times" to keep culvert clear and unobstructed—Whether too wide.

In 1926 a county council as the highway authority widened a road under which ran a stream through an ancient brick culvert. Their operations involved their extending the culvert by means of a new pipe, the entrance to which was placed on the land of adjoining occupiers to the west of the road. The new entrance so made was left unprotected by any form of grid or grating for the succeeding 30 years. From time to time after the work was done, and at least until 1954, the county council's servants cleared the entrance to the culvert of dirt or débris which might cause a blockage.

In 1934 the first defendants B. became the occupiers of the land on which the entrance to the culvert was situated.

In December, 1956, following heavy rainfall, the land and dwelling-house of the plaintiffs P., which was situated in a dip on the east side of the highway, became flooded by reason of the entrance to the culvert becoming blocked by débris. They brought an action in nuisance, claiming damages and a mandatory injunction against the occupiers B., who in turn instituted third party proceedings against the county council; and on the trial the county council were joined as second defendants, the allegation against them being that they had in 1926 created a nuisance by the manner in which they had interfered with the stream and by their failure to protect the new entrance with a grid.

The trial judge gave judgment against both defendants, apportioning the liability as to one-fourth against the occupiers and three-fourths against the county council; and he granted a mandatory injunction ordering the occupiers "at all times" to keep the culvert clear and unobstructed. On appeal by both defendants:—

Held, (1) that the county council by what they had done in 1926 and failed to do subsequently had created a potential nuisance and were, accordingly, liable for the failure to provide a grid or grating when the potential became an actual nuisance in 1956 (post, pp. 442, 446).

(2) That the occupiers were also liable for continuing the nuisance created on their land; nor, in the absence of evidence of a contractual obligation on the county council to keep the entrance clear, were they liable to indemnify the occupiers against that liability. Although the council had previously kept the culvert clear, they had power to do so under section 67 of the Highways Act, 1835 [1] (post, p. 443).

(3) That the apportionment of liability by the trial judge should not be disturbed.

(4) That the mandatory injunction granted against the occupiers was too onerous and should be modified to restrain them from allowing the entrance to the culvert to become blocked in such a way as to cause a nuisance to the plaintiffs (post, p. 446).

Greenock Corporation v. Caledonian Railway Co. Ltd. [1917] A.C. 556; 33 T.L.R. 531, H.L. followed.

Dicta in Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan [1940] A.C. 880, 895–896, 902, 912–913; 56 T.L.R. 887; [1940] 3 All E.R. 349 considered and applied.

APPEAL from Cassels J.

In 1926 the Devon County Council, as the highway authority, acquired a strip of land on the west side of the existing road from Axminster to Chard and widened the road. That involved extending a culvert which carried a stream under it from land on the same side occupied by small farmers. There had been a causeway over the stream adjacent to the pre-existing road with a [1] Highways Act, 1835, s. 67: "The said surveyor . . . shall have "power to make, scour, cleanse, and "keep open all ditches, gutters, "drains, or watercourses, . . . as he "shall deem necessary, in and "through any lands or grounds "adjoining or lying near to any high-"way. . . ."

C. A.
1960
Pemberton
v.
Bright.

culvert underneath, and as the widened road encroached on that, the county council extended the culvert 30 ft. and made a new causeway for the occupiers' use so much further to the west. The 30 ft. extension of the culvert consisted of a concrete pipe of 2 ft. diameter or slightly less. It was of a different character from the ancient drain, with a smaller orifice and of a different shape. The old brick culvert had had a flat base of 2 ft. 8 ins. and was arched to a height of 2 ft. with the sides not quite even. The gradient over the new 30 ft. pipe was 1 in 32, and of the adjacent 32 ft. of the old culvert 1 in 24, and the next 8 ft. 1 in 11, showing a more rapid fall on to the land on the east side of the road. Although the addition in 1926 had a reduced superficial area, the circular and smooth piping facilitated the flow of water and the capacity in cubic feet per minute was somewhat greater with the pipe. When the culvert was altered in that way and extended, the entrance was left uncovered and unprotected.

In 1934 a father and son, Henry and Martin Bright, became occupiers of the land—Coaxdon Farm—on the west side of the widened road on which the new entrance to the culvert was situated.

In 1953 the plaintiffs in the present proceedings, Colonel John Boileau Pemberton and his wife, Alice Barbara Pemberton, became the owners and occupiers of a house and lands, Coaxdon Hall, Chardstock, Devon, situated on the east side of the widened road opposite the land occupied by the Brights. Their property was at a dip in the road and the house was below the road level, being about the lowest point of a catchment area of some 90 acres.

The stream, the subject of the county council's alterations in 1926, ran eastward from the Brights' fields in a steep gulley or goyle, passed under the road through the ancient brick culvert as altered, and then travelled along the northern side of Coaxdon Hall along a stretch described as "the easement" and then on through fields to join the River Axe.

Over Christmas, 1956, the rainfall had been heavy and persistent, and was followed on the night of December 27/28 by even heavier rains, which, though unusual, were not such that they could not have been reasonably anticipated. On the early morning of December 28, the plaintiffs' house was found to be flooded in the hall at the front of the house facing west, in the drawing-room on the south side, and in the garage, where the water reached a height of some 2 ft. 2 ins. The drive from the main entrance on the Chard Road had been scoured out and even cobblestones in it had been removed. The damage had been done, as the trial judge found, by water diverted from the stream from the Brights' land, owing to the fact that the stream had been unable to make its way through the culvert because the entrance was blocked with tree branches, leaves, mud and débris, which had collected at the mouth to such an extent that very little water passed through it, but the water collected and built up until it passed round the sides, over the top of the retaining wall, and over the road and down the plaintiffs' drive, with the full force of the stream pushing it on.

The plaintiffs brought proceedings against the Brights as occupiers of the land on which the entrance to the culvert was situated. They alleged, inter alia, that by reason of the absence of a grid or grating to protect the entrance to the culvert the entrance was liable to become blocked during or after heavy rain by débris washed down by the stream and to cause flooding of surrounding land; that the Brights knew or ought to have known that that was liable to happen; and that the culvert with its unprotected entrance constituted a nuisance. They claimed (a) a mandatory injunction ordering them to prevent the pipe from becoming blocked and to keep it clear and unobstructed, and (b) damages for nuisance.

The Brights denied liability and that the unprotected entrance constituted a nuisance or that they were responsible for it. They claimed further that if a nuisance existed, it had been created by the Devon County Council which was responsible therefor; and they joined the county council in third party proceedings. The county council were later joined in the plaintiffs' action as second defendants. It was alleged that they had constructed the culvert in 1926 and had repaired and maintained it from time to time thereafter; and that the nuisance created by them had been continued by the Brights or by the county council thereafter. Both the plaintiffs and the Brights alleged against the county council that the work done in 1926 had been improperly done in that no grid had been placed to prevent blocking of the entrance.

The county council by their defence admitted that as the highway authority they had in connection with the widening of the road entered on the land later occupied by the Brights and had extended the culvert, but denied that they had any responsibility for the pipe or its entrance or for the repair, maintenance or alteration thereof. They alleged that before its extension the culvert had never been protected by a grid, and denied that the pipe and the uncovered entrance to it constituted a nuisance to the plaintiffs or that they had created or continued the alleged nuisance, or that the pipe had become blocked in December, 1956, or that by reason thereof the water had collected and burst out from the Brights' land to invade the plaintiffs' premises.

On the trial of the action before Cassels J. at the Devon Winter Assizes on February 12, 1959, the pleaded defence of both defendants that the heavy rainfall of December, 1956, was an act of God, was not pursued. Evidence was given that protecting grids were not normal in that part of the country; and one Alner, formerly a servant of the county council as a roadman or lengthman for the material area, gave evidence that until his retirement in 1954 he had often cleared the mouth of the culvert, since water would otherwise have come round over the culvert on to the main road; and he stated that he had looked at that culvert more often than at other culverts along the road because the water used to

C. A.
1960
Pemberton
v.
Bright.

come down very rapidly at that point; and that he had looked to see if any rubbish came down the gully which would stop the mouth of the culvert. There was no clear evidence as to what was done after his retirement.

The special damages suffered by the plaintiffs were agreed at £681 15s. 2d. Cassels J., having found that the reason for the flooding of the plaintiffs' premises was the build-up of water by reason of the blockage of the entrance to the culvert, held that that was a nuisance. He said: "It was a nuisance for the county "council to have created such a state of affairs; they were inter-"fering with the course of the water; they were pushing it into a "pipe. And they made no provision for keeping it clear other than "getting one roadman occasionally to go and see it was not "blocked. They never adopted the plan of having a grid. And "they made a situation—not under the highway but under the "causeway which is not part of the highway—which, when there "came this abnormal downfall of rain, it was quite incapable of "receiving." He gave judgment for the plaintiffs against both defendants; against the first defendants as the occupiers of the land on which the nuisance existed, and against the second defendants as the persons who created the nuisance. He awarded a total of £1,000 to the plaintiffs, and apportioned that as to £250 against the Brights and as to £750 against the county council. His Lordship also granted the mandatory injunction asked for against the Brights in the following terms: "That the defendants "Henry Bright and Martin John Henry Bright by themselves "their agents or servants or otherwise be restrained from allowing "or permitting the pipe which carries a stream under land "occupied by these defendants . . . from becoming blocked by "dirt and/or débris or from becoming otherwise obstructed and "that they be ordered to keep the same at all times clear and "unobstructed."

The defendants appealed against the judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, and also against the apportionment of liability as between themselves.

G. D. Squibb Q.C. and Thomas Dewar for the county council.

N. R. Fox-Andrews Q.C. and J. F. E. Stephenson for the occupiers.

J. T. Molony Q.C. and H. E. L. McCreery for the plaintiffs.

Thompson v. Gibson[2] was referred to in addition to the cases cited in the judgments.

Sellers L.J. stated the facts set out above, and continued:

When the culvert was altered and extended in 1926, the entrance was left uncovered and unprotected, and it was alleged by both the plaintiffs and the first defendants that the work was consequently incomplete and improperly done as no grid had been placed at a reasonable distance, perhaps eight yards, to prevent anything which might be washed down, particularly at times of heavy rain or storm, from blocking the entrance to the culvert and so holding up and diverting the stream. There was evidence that a grid was not usual in that part of the country, or with the culvert as large as 2 ft. in diameter and was not necessary, but the judge preferred the evidence that a grid should have been provided, and I see no reason to take a different view.

[2] (1841) 7 M. & W. 456.

When interference with the stream took place in 1926, reasonable foresight should have foreseen that blocking of the culvert might divert the stream on to the plaintiffs' premises. They were so situated that heavy rain was always a potential danger unless properly controlled, and this at least was a place where a grid would have stopped, or would probably have stopped, débris getting past it. If it had become blocked and had created a dam there, the water would probably have found its way into the culvert some eight yards further on, and would not have been diverted across the road on to the plaintiffs' property.

Lord Finlay stated the broad principle of law in the well-known case of Greenock Corporation v. Caledonian Railway Co. Ltd.,[1] where he said: "It is the duty of anyone who interferes with the "course of a stream to see that the works which he substitutes "for the channel provided by nature are adequate to carry off the "water brought down even by extraordinary rainfall, and if "damage results from the deficiency of the substitute which he "has provided for the natural channel he will be liable." The deficiency here was, it was alleged, the unprotected entrance.

In Sedleigh-Denfield v. O'Callaghan,[2] it appears that the appropriate county council—there the Middlesex County Council—had placed a pipe or a culvert in a natural ditch which ultimately gave rise to trouble. In that case the Middlesex County Council were not before the court, and the action was against the occupiers. In the recital of the circumstances which gave rise to the case, it appears that the county council made the culvert and covered the top of it with earth.[3] "To prevent the possibility of "wood or leaves blocking the opening of the fifteen-inch pipe, it "would have been proper practice to fix a grid or grating in the "ditch a little way from the opening of the pipe, inasmuch as "there were trees in the hedge, and sticks and leaves would be "apt to fall into the ditch. The county council recognised the "necessity for a grating, and provided one, but their workmen, "instead of fixing it in the ditch a foot or two from the opening "of the pipe or culvert, where it would intercept leaves and other "refuse, placed it on the top of the culvert, where it was useless. "The mouth of the culvert was on the respondents' land." Lord Atkin said[4]: "I agree with the finding of the learned judge,

[1] [1917] A.C. 556, 572; 33 T.L.R. 531.
[2] [1940] A.C. 880; 56 T.L.R. 887; [1940] 3 All E.R. 349 (H.L.).
[3] [1940] A.C. 880, 881.
[4] Ibid. 895–896.

C. A.
1960
Pemberton v. Bright.
Sellers L.J.

"accepted by the Court of Appeal, that the laying of a 15-inch "pipe with an unprotected orifice was in the circumstances the "creation of a nuisance or of that which would be likely to result "in a nuisance. It created a state of things from which when "the ditch was flowing in full stream an obstruction might "reasonably be expected in the pipe, from which obstruction "flooding of the plaintiff's ground might reasonably by expected "to result. . . . It is probably strictly correct to say that as "long as the offending condition is confined to the defendant's "own land without causing damage it is not a nuisance, though "it may threaten to become a nuisance. But where damage has "accrued the nuisance has been caused." Lord Wright put the matter this way[5]: "The interposition of the pipe as the means "of carrying the water from the ditch in place of the former open "watercourse was not in itself objectionable. The trouble was "that no protecting grid was put in place, and there was nothing "to prevent the pipe getting choked. There was thus the risk "of a flood, which might spread, as in fact happened, to the "appellant's premises, causing damage which in the actual result "was considerable. The structure of the orifice of the pipe was "on the respondents' land. If the work had been done by or on "behalf of the respondents, the conditions requisite to constitute "a cause of action for damages for a private nuisance, would be "beyond question complete." I make one other citation from the speech of Lord Romer[6]: "When the Middlesex County "Council constructed the culvert without a proper grid to prevent "its getting blocked they created a potential nuisance; that is to "say they did something that in the future might and did in fact "seriously damage the appellant as the occupier of No. 1, Victoria "Road. The respondents"—the respondents being the occupiers "did not themselves create this potential nuisance, and cannot "therefore be held liable for its creation. But an occupier of land "upon which a nuisance has been created by another person is "liable if he 'continues' the nuisance."

I would hold, as did the judge, that in 1926 the Devon County Council created a potential nuisance which became an actual and actionable nuisance when, by reason of the entrance to the culvert being negligently left unprotected, it became blocked so that it dammed the water flowing in the stream and diverted it on to the plaintiffs' land.

Up to his retirement in 1954, a Mr. Alner, a roadman or lengthman for this area, employed by the county council, had cleared the mouth of the culvert very often, otherwise, as he said, the water would have come round over the culvert on to the main road. One question he was asked was: "Did you treat this "culvert in any different way to other culverts along the road?", to which he answered: "I used to look at it more often because "the water used to come down very fast because it is more steep

[5] [1940] A.C. 880, 902. [6] Ibid. 912-913.

"there; I looked to see if any rubbish came down the gully "which would stop on the mouth of the culvert." There is no reason to think that after Mr. Alner's retirement similar clearing was not done by his successor, although the county council seem to have been somewhat inexplicably reticent about what was in fact done.

The advantage of a grid, as I see it, is that in a sudden heavy rainstorm with consequential onset of débris towards the culvert it would prevent the culvert becoming blocked and probably would have successfully met the situation which occurred on the night of December 27/28. This blockage was not shown to have been due to a failure to inspect and clean out the culvert regularly and as a matter of routine—that may well have been done—but it came about because there was nothing to stop the débris blocking the culvert's entrance if it collected suddenly and during the night as it seems to have done here.

On the facts found by the judge, which, in my view, the evidence fully justified, the first defendants were clearly liable for the damage caused as the occupiers of the land on which the nuisance existed, and, as the Devon County Council created the trouble by their failure to complete the culvert properly with a protection, they also are liable.

The work in 1926 was necessitated by the road widening and, no doubt, was done with the agreement of the then owners who would have relied on the county council to do it properly. Mr. Squibb contended that the work was done by the county council merely as contractors for the occupiers and no more. It was probably done in lieu of compensation, but I cannot think it makes any difference to their liability.

We were asked by Mr. Fox-Andrews for the first defendants to find that there was an agreement continuing from the date of the new culvert that the county council would not only construct the culvert but would thereafter maintain it, and therefore the county council were liable to indemnify the first defendants against their liability in this case. Certainly from 1926 up to 1954 the county council did in fact do the necessary work to keep the entrance clear and, if the facts were known, it may be there was an arrangement of some kind. But the county council had powers under section 67 of the Highway Act, 1835, to do what they did, and I do not find sufficient evidence to support any contractual obligation with the first defendants or their predecessors. In any case I doubt if any ordinary or reasonable attention to the culvert entrance would have prevented this flooding in the absence of a grid. A grid would form an emergency barrier.

This is a case where the same damage has been caused by two sets of wrongdoers and it is, perhaps, not an easy case in which to decide what is a just and equitable apportionment between them having regard to the extent of their respective responsibility. The first defendants could, if they had wished, have provided a grid, but from the time they came into occupation

C. A.
1960
Pemberton
v.
Bright.
Sellers L.J.

in 1934 they had seen the county council in charge, as it were. They were small farmers accepting things as they found them. The county council, on the other hand, had failed to put the grid in at the outset or to make amends by putting one in later, which they could in fact have done by the authority of section 67, if not by negotiation with the occupiers.

The county council submitted that all the burden lay on the occupiers who should have kept the culvert clear, and that there was no room for any contribution. We were urged on behalf of the first defendants, on the other hand, to vary the order to 100 per cent. contribution against the Devon County Council. I find the relevant factors hard to assess in a case such as this, and I am not prepared to alter the judge's decision on apportionment, especially as this court does not readily interfere in such a matter.

In considering this case I have regarded the plaintiffs' complaints that the pipe laid in 1926 was not the right size, and that the defendants, or one of them, had increased the quantity of water brought on to the plaintiffs' land as no longer in issue or as unsustainable. Also I have disregarded the evidence of some flooding of the plaintiffs' premises in 1957, and of the capacity of the plaintiffs' easement, which was itself at least in part artificial, containing, as it did, some small culverts. As the damages were agreed in the event of liability, and no attempt was made at the trial to limit them, the conditions of flooding which might have arisen if the culvert had not been blocked on the night of December 27/28 do not call for consideration.

I would dismiss the appeals of both the defendants, subject to the modification of the injunction against the first defendants in the way to be indicated by Upjohn L.J.

Ormerod L.J. I agree. There is no doubt that the plaintiffs' premises were flooded on the night in question and damage was done to them. A substantial part of that damage was done to the drive, which was badly scored by reason of the volume of water which flooded down it. It was not seriously disputed that the water in the main came from the goyle in the first defendants' land. On the morning following the flood the culvert was blocked so that little or no water passed through it, and the water in the goyle was still high enough to trickle on to the road. It was common ground that when the road was widened in 1926 the culvert was extended by the county council not only to the new width of the road but for some feet on to the land now occupied by the first defendants, and a causeway was constructed over the culvert on the first defendants' land so that they and their cattle could pass from one field to the other. Mr. Squibb, on behalf of the county council, argued that in these circumstances there was no liability on the second defendants to keep the mouth of the culvert clear. His submission was that the work of extending the culvert on to the first defendants' land was "accom-"modation" work done by the county council, presumably in pursuance of an agreement with the then owners or occupiers of the land, and they were in no different position from the position in which a firm of private builders would be who agreed to build the culvert in those circumstances. That may well be so, but it leaves the question as to whether the county council discharged their obligations sufficiently at the time when they constructed the culvert. The submission was that the culvert was properly constructed at the time in 1926 and thereby the responsibility of the county council was at an end. It was suggested in the course of the argument that as the culvert put in by the county council was circular it was of a less dimension than the original culvert, and that although the evidence was that it would take an equal or greater flow of water than the original culvert because of the reduced friction in the pipe, there was a greater danger of the orifice being blocked because of its smaller area. This argument, however, does not seem to carry the case much further, and the consensus of evidence appeared to be that, so far as the culvert itself was concerned, it was, both in its dimensions and construction, in accordance with sound engineering practice. But it was submitted as against the county council that the county council at the time of constructing the culvert should also have constructed a grid and placed it about eight yards upstream of the mouth of the orifice. There was a conflict of evidence amongst the experts as to the necessity for this provision, but the judge, who had an opportunity of seeing the witnesses and considering the value of their evidence, appears to have come to the conclusion that such a provision should have been made. I say "appears" because it has been argued that there was not a precise finding in the judge's judgment to that effect. I think, however, that it is clear that that was the conclusion to which he came. He said: "Now it was said on behalf of the plaintiffs that "one of the things that ought to have been done was to have a "grid. Mr. Patrick, who was the expert called on behalf of the "plaintiffs, said that a grid was essential; he thought it ought to "have been about five feet high. He said that was necessary "because of the danger in such country as this of large trunks of "trees getting wedged and causing something in the nature of a "dam. His view was that a grid was important and he would "put it, as I say, five feet high, and about eight yards back from "the pipe. The surveyors called on behalf of the first defendants "and the second defendants have disagreed with Mr. Patrick. "One of the reasons given was that they do not use grids in the "county of Devon; another reason was that they do not think that "a grid would have made any difference." The judge then went on: "This court cannot help coming to the conclusion that a grid "at that spot might well have served at least one useful purpose, "and that is, it would have made it easier to clean upstream, and "if any trunks of trees had been lodged against the grid they "could have been pulled out more easily, instead of letting them

C. A.
1960
Pemberton v. Bright.
Ormerod L.J.

"flow on until they come down to the mouth of the pipe." Later he said: "I hold that this was a nuisance. It was a "nuisance for the second defendants to have created such a state "of affairs; they were interfering with the course of the water— "they were pushing it into a pipe. And they made no provision "for keeping it clear other than getting one roadman occasionally "to go and see it was not blocked. They never adopted the plan "of having a grid." I see no reason for disturbing this finding of the judge.

It was argued that even if a grid had been constructed by the county council it would have to be kept clear, presumably by the occupier, and that, if it were not, there would still be as great a danger of blockage as if it were not there. I think the real value of the grid, provided, of course, that the occupier performs his task and keeps it clear, is to catch material coming downstream during the actual flood which might otherwise block the culvert. An occupier cannot, of course, be certain that the culvert will be kept clear. But if there is a grid properly sited it seems to be common sense that the likelihood of the culvert being blocked during a flood will be substantially reduced. In my judgment, on the findings of the judge the county council were at fault in not providing a grid, and the absence of the grid was to some extent at least responsible for the blockage of the culvert and the consequent flooding of that night.

It has been argued on behalf of the first defendants that they should not be held responsible for their failure as occupiers to keep the goyle clear as this work was from time to time done by the workmen of the county council, although there appeared to be no evidence that it was done by them after Mr. Alner left some two or three years before the flood. It was, however, the responsibility of the occupiers, and, although the apportioning of blame in a matter of this kind, as my Lord has said, is difficult because of the various factors that have to be taken into consideration, I would not for my part disturb the apportionment which has been made by the judge.

I agree that the appeal should be dismissed subject to the variation in the form of the injunction with which Upjohn L.J. will deal.

Upjohn L.J. I agree, and I do not think I can usefully add anything. Subject to any comments that counsel may care to make, the injunction will be in this form: "An injunction "restraining the defendants Henry Bright and Martin John Henry "Bright from allowing the entrance to the culvert mentioned in "the pleadings from becoming blocked by stones, mud, branches, "leaves or other débris so as to cause water in the goyle to flow "over the road immediately to the east thereof and thence over "the plaintiffs' land and premises in such manner as to cause a "nuisance to the plaintiffs."

C. A.
1960
PEMBERTON v. BRIGHT.

Appeal of first defendants dismissed with costs.
Appeal of second defendants dismissed with costs.
Injunction modified as above.

Solicitors: Sharpe, Pritchard & Co. for H. G. Godsall, Clerk to Devon County Council; Keene, Marsland & Co. for McLusky & Braddell, Exeter; Arnold Carter & Co. for Dunn & Baker, Exeter.

M. M. H.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

* MASCHERPA v. DIRECT LTD.

[1959 M. 603.]

C. A.
1960
March 18, 21.
Hodson, Willmer and Devlin L.JJ.

Practice—Discovery—Privilege—Forfeiture of lease, action for—Counterclaim for relief against forfeiture—Whether exclusion of discovery on forfeiture claim extended to counterclaim—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 & 16 Geo. 5, c. 20), s. 146 (2).

The rule that an order for the discovery of documents will not be made in an action for the forfeiture of a lease does not extend to a counterclaim thereto under section 146 (2) [1] of the Law of Property Act, 1925, for relief against forfeiture, since a separate issue is raised by the counterclaim on which questions other than those relating to forfeiture may arise.

A defendant to an action for possession of certain premises for breach of covenant contained in the lease counterclaimed for relief under section 146 (2) of the Act of 1925. An order was made on him for discovery of documents "excluding . . . those documents relating "to the issue of forfeiture":—

Held, that the order was good in law, as the form of the order enabled the two issues—that of forfeiture and of relief against forfeiture—to be kept separate.

Earl of Mexborough v. Whitwood Urban District Council [1897] 2 Q.B. 111; 13 T.L.R. 443, C.A. considered.

APPEALS from an official referee.

The plaintiff, Livio Onorino Mascherpa, by this action against the defendants, Direct Ltd., sought possession of certain property

[1] Law of Property Act, 1925, s. 146 (2): "Where a lessor is proceeding, by action or otherwise, to enforce such a right of re-entry or forfeiture, the lessee may, in the lessor's action, if any, or in any action brought by himself, apply to the court for relief; and the court may grant or refuse relief, as the court, having regard to the proceedings and conduct of the parties under the foregoing provisions of this section, and to all the other circumstances, thinks fit; and in case of relief may grant it on such terms . . . as the court . . . thinks fit."

C. A.
1960
Mascherpa
v.
Direct Ltd.

on the ground of breach of covenant in the lease thereof. By an order made by consent the action was transferred to an official referee.

By an order of the Official Referee (Sir Brett Cloutman Q.C.), dated January 12, 1960, it was ordered that: "The plaintiff re-"deliver to the defendant within seven days the schedule of "dilapidations referred to in the statement of claim" and "with-"in ten days file an affidavit of documents and that the "defendant within ten days file an affidavit of documents exclud-"ing in the case of the defendant those documents relating to the "issue of forfeiture." That order was not appealed against at the time. On February 23, 1960, a second order consequential on the first was made, by which it was ordered that unless "the defen-"dant pays into court the sum of £250, and files an affidavit of "documents, both within seven days, the defendant's defence and "counterclaim herein be struck out and the defendant placed in "the same position as if he had not defended and the plaintiff to "be at liberty to sign judgment for damages to be assessed and "his costs of this action including the costs of this application "to be taxed the defendant having failed to comply with an order "of His Honour Sir Brett Cloutman . . . dated January 12, 1960, "for discovery of documents."

The defendants appealed from those orders.

David Weitzman Q.C. and Peter Weitzman for the defendants.
Norman Tapp for the plaintiff.

All the cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

Hodson L.J. stated the facts and continued: The action being an action for the possession of land, based upon a forfeiture, and the plaintiff's case being that the defendants had failed to comply with their covenant to repair, the defendants take the point that no order for discovery can be made. So far as the first order is concerned they were out of time on appealing. They obtained the consent of the plaintiff according to a direction (Practice Direction [1]) given by this court and their time was thereby extended. This has a curious effect in this case, because the order of January 12, 1960, had not been appealed from, and the order of February 23, 1960, was consequential upon non-compliance with the first order: on the face of it the official referee was not wrong in law, and no appeal therefore lies to the court from the second order. But the question whether appeal can be made from that order is merely of academic importance because it depends in any event on the first order, and, in my judgment, the first order was right, as to discovery, and the defendants are wrong in seeking to say that they are not open to any order for discovery at all.

It should be stated that what has happened here (as happens in many cases where an application for possession is made, based upon forfeiture) is that the defendants have, in the same action, by way of counterclaim, asked for relief against forfeiture, relying upon the provisions which are now contained in section 146 (2) of the Law of Property Act, 1925. [His Lordship read section 146 (2) of the Law of Property Act, 1925.]

[1] [1958] 1 W.L.R. 761; [1958] 2 All E.R. 493.

It is clear from the language of that section that many other issues may be raised on the defendants' claim for relief against forfeiture apart altogether from the issue or issues upon which the forfeiture itself depends. To complete the matter, I should say that that right to claim relief against forfeiture was first introduced by the Conveyancing Act, 1881. Before that the position appears to have been that, except in the case of non-payment of rent and certain other rare cases, no relief against forfeiture could be given until that Act came into force.

The contention of the defendants here is that this is a case where the only matter in issue is forfeiture, and they argue that if that is not precisely correct, the position is that since they are claiming relief against forfeiture, their claim for relief is so closely allied to the plaintiff's claim for possession based on forfeiture that the protection which the law gives them on the forfeiture matter should cover them as to the counterclaim. They rely on what was said by this court in Earl of Mexborough v. Whitwood Urban District Council.[2] I draw attention to the date of that case because, of course, it was after 1881, when the Conveyancing Act, 1881, came into force; and, indeed, Mr. Weitzman, on behalf of the defendants, has relied upon that matter as showing the attitude of the court towards discovery notwithstanding the enlarged right to relief which the statute has given.

In that case, the headnote reads[3]: "In an action to enforce "a forfeiture of a lease for breach of covenant the court will not "grant discovery of documents or leave to administer interroga-"tories for the purpose of establishing the forfeiture." No other issue was raised in the action but the question whether or not there had been a forfeiture for breach of covenant; and there was no claim for relief against forfeiture. The rule was stated by Lord Esher M.R. in this way[4]: " . . . there are two rules of law "which have always existed as part of the common law of "England, and have been recognised as such by all courts "whether of law or equity, and the rights conferred by them have "never been taken away by any statute. The first is that, where "a common informer sues for a penalty, the courts will not assist "him by their procedure in any way; and I think a similar rule "has been laid down, and acted upon from the earliest times, "in respect of actions brought to enforce a forfeiture of an "estate in land. These are no doubt rules of procedure, but they "are much more than that: they are rules made for the protec-"tion of people in respect of their property, and against common "informers."

[2] [1897] 2 Q.B. 111; 13 T.L.R. 443, C.A.

[3] [1897] 2 Q.B. 111.

[4] Ibid. 114, 115.

C. A.
1960
Mascherpa v. Direct Ltd.
Hodson L.J.

Lord Esher, quoting from a judgment of Alexander C.B. in Orme v. Crockford,[5] said[6]: "'We must not lose sight of the fact "'that it is a most important right of which this bill seeks to "'deprive the defendant, no less than that of protecting himself "'by refusing to answer from the consequences of answering "'questions which might tend to charge him with a crime or "'subject him to penalties, or forfeiture of estate contrary to the "'humane policy of the law.'" Later he said[7]: "I do not "think the House of Lords [Ind, Coope & Co. v. Emmerson[8]] "meant to decide that the Judicature Act had done away with "these two fundamental rules of law for the protection of people "in respect of their title to property and against common "informers. There appears to me to be ample authority for "saying that an action for forfeiture stands for the present pur-"pose on the same footing as an action for penalties. I think the "proper enunciation of the law on the subject is that, where in "any action an issue is raised solely for the purpose of obtaining "judgment for a forfeiture of land, the court will not with regard "to that issue make any order either for the discovery of docu-"ments or for the administration of interrogatories. There may "be an action where that is one of the issues and there are other "independent issues, and the court may with regard to those "other issues make an order for discovery of documents and inter-"rogatories, but on the issue relating to forfeiture I think the "court will not make such an order. When, as in the present "case, the sole issue raised is whether there has been a for-"feiture, I think no order can be made in favour of the plaintiff "either for discovery of documents or for the administration of "interrogatories."

I have read enough to show that the way in which Lord Esher, and, indeed, the other members of the court, approached the matter was that they were desirous of laying down the continued existence of the rule which protected people in respect of their title to property; and it was emphasised in the last sentence which I read that the only issue raised was whether there had been a forfeiture.

That case has been followed recently in two cases, the first of them being Seddon v. Commercial Salt Co. Ltd.,[9] and I need only read one sentence from the judgment of Warrington L.J.[10]: "There is a very well-known rule that where in any action an "issue is raised solely for the purpose of obtaining judgment for "the forfeiture of land, the court will not with regard to that "issue make any order either for the discovery of documents or "for the administration of interrogatories."

The only other case I need mention to which we have been referred is Colne Valley Water Co. v. Watford and St. Albans Gas

[5] (1824) 13 Price 376.
[6] [1897] 2 Q.B. 116.
[7] Ibid. 117.
[8] (1887) 12 App.Cas. 300, H.L.
[9] [1925] Ch. 187, C.A.
[10] Ibid. 194.

Co.,[11] which was also a decision of the Court of Appeal. That was an action for penalties; there was also a claim for damages and an injunction; and the question which is connected with this question was whether in such an action discovery could be obtained without infringing the rule which I have stated. On the facts of that case Tucker L.J. put the matter in this way[12]: "That part of the claim being one for penalties, it becomes "necessary to consider whether in this particular case, in the "exercise of his discretion, the judge should, or could, have made "an order for discovery limited to those issues in the action which "are not concerned with the claim for penalties. I agree that in "this particular action it would be impossible to frame an order "so limited, and, therefore, that this was not a case where the "judge could be called upon to exercise the discretion which he "would otherwise have had in circumstances similar to the "present." Lord Goddard C.J. had said[13]: "It is clear that, "although three different remedies are sought, there is really only "one issue, namely, whether or not the gas company have fouled "the water supply of the water company."

In this case, in my opinion, there is more than one issue, and for that reason the order of the official referee was right. The pleadings upon the question whether relief should be granted contained a number of matters, quite apart from the question raised as to the want of repair of the premises, the contention of the landlord being, broadly speaking, that the defendants are not financially sound and able to shoulder the obligations of the lease; and it is in respect of that aspect of the matter that discovery is by them primarily sought. I think that the official referee has by the form of his order enabled the two matters to be kept separate. It is conceded by the landlord, the plaintiff in the action, so far as his claim to mesne profits is concerned, that that may be subject to the same objection as the claim for damage was in the Colne Valley case,[14] and he does not seek discovery upon that. But so far as the other matters are concerned, the question of the breach of covenant to repair can be kept quite separate from the matters arising from the counterclaim of the defendants.

In my judgment, the order of the official referee (and I am dealing with the first order, that of January 12, 1960) was good in law; the defendants' objection to that order fails; and the appeal should be dismissed.

WILLMER L.J. I agree so fully with what my Lord has said that I should be merely wasting time if I were to repeat the reasons for dismissing the appeal.

[11] [1948] 1 K.B. 500; 64 T.L.R. 44; [1948] 1 All E.R. 104, C.A.
[12] [1948] 1 K.B. 507.
[13] Ibid. 505.
[14] [1948] 1 K.B. 500.

C. A.
1960
Mascherpa v. Direct Ltd.

Devlin L.J. I also agree.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Gale & Phelps; Gordon Dadds & Co.

I. G. R. M.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1959
Oct. 15.
Danckwerts J.

*LEWIS v. PACKER.

Practice and Procedure—Originating summons—Moneylender—Application by originating summons for payment of moneys secured—Whether summons should contain facts to be contained in statement of claim—R.S.C., Ords. 3, r. 10; 20, r. 10; 55, r. 5A.

Moneylender—Action for recovery of money—Originating summons—Form—R.S.C., Ords. 3, r. 10; 20, r. 10; 55, r. 5A.

By two legal charges dated respectively March 25, 1955, and April 19, 1955, the defendant charged property by way of legal mortgage with payment to the plaintiff, a licensed moneylender, of moneys due under two promissory notes. In January, 1958, the property was sold by prior mortgagees but the proceeds of sale were insufficient to pay the amount due to them. The plaintiff applied by originating summons dated February 6, 1957, under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A,[1] for payment of the moneys secured. On an objection by the defendant that the summons did not contain the statements of fact which a statement of claim should contain in order to comply with Order 20, r. 10, and Order 3, r. 10[2]:—

Held, that although proceedings commenced by originating summons were an action, neither the summons nor the affidavit in

[1] R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A: "Any mortgagee or mortgagor, whether legal or equitable or any person entitled to or having property subject to a legal or equitable charge . . . may take out as of course an originating summons . . . for such relief of the nature or kind following as may by the summons be specified, and as the circumstances of the case may require; that is to say,—Payment of moneys secured by the mortgage or charge . . ."

[2] Ord. 20, r. 10: "In actions by a moneylender or an assignee for the recovery of money lent by the moneylender or the enforcement of any agreement or security relating to any such money, the statement of claim shall state, in addition to any other particulars, the particulars referred to in paragraphs (a) to (j) inclusive in rule 10 of Order 3."

Ord. 3, r. 10: "Where an action for the recovery of money lent by a moneylender or for the enforcement of any agreement or security relating to any such money is brought by the lender or an assignee, the indorsement on the writ shall state, in addition to any other particulars, the fact that at the time of making the loan or contract the plaintiff or (in an action by an assignee) the original assignor was a licensed moneylender, and if the writ be specially indorsed under rule 6 of this Order, shall also state—(a) the date on which the loan was made; (b) the amount actually lent to the borrower; (c) the rate per cent. per annum of interest charged; (d) the date when the contract for repayment was made; (e) the fact that a note or memorandum of the contract was made, and signed by the borrower; (f) the date when a copy of the note or memorandum was delivered or sent to the borrower; (g) the amount repaid; (h) the amount due but unpaid; (i) the date upon which such unpaid sum or sums became due; (j) the amount of interest accrued due and unpaid on every such sum."

support of it was a statement of claim, so that Order 20, r. 10, did not apply, and compliance with the practice under Order 55, r. 5A, was sufficient; accordingly, the defendant's objection failed.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS.

By two legal charges dated respectively March 25, 1955, and April 19, 1955, made between the plaintiff, Harry Lewis, a licensed moneylender, and the defendant, Reginald Howard Packer, each charge reciting that the plaintiff had advanced £100 to the defendant on a promissory note of even date bearing interest at 48 per cent. per annum, the defendant charged No. 18, Sandilands Road, Baguley, Manchester, by way of legal mortgage with payment to the plaintiff of all sums payable on the promissory notes. In or about January, 1958, the property was sold by prior mortgagees. The proceeds of sale were insufficient to pay the amount due to the prior mortgagees.

The plaintiff applied by originating summons dated February 6, 1957, to recover from the defendant £409 18s. 6d. (£200 principal and £209 18s. 6d. interest), and further interest at the same rate from that date until judgment.

The defendant took the preliminary objection that, since the legal charges were part of moneylending transactions, the summons should have contained the statements of fact which a statement of claim in an action by a moneylender commenced by writ should contain in order to comply with R.S.C., Ord. 20, r. 10, and Ord. 3, r. 10. The affidavit evidence in support of the summons complied with R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, and the plaintiff's affidavit in reply contained those particulars required by R.S.C., Ord. 20, r. 10, and Ord. 3, r. 10. The plaintiff abandoned the excess of his claim over £400 and did not ask for costs prior to the filing of his affidavit in reply. The application was adjourned into court from the District Registrar at Manchester.

E. W. H. Christie for the plaintiff.
The defendant appeared in person.

DANCKWERTS J. The objection taken by the defendant has common sense to recommend it, and it may be that the rules should be changed, but the objection fails because, although proceedings commenced by originating summons are an action, the originating summons is not a statement of claim, and R.S.C., Ord. 20, r. 10, does not apply to it. It has sometimes been said that the affidavit in support of an originating summons is equivalent to a statement of claim, but it is not in fact a statement of claim, and compliance with the requirements of proof under R.S.C., Ord. 55, r. 5A, is sufficient for an originating summons brought under that rule.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

Solicitors: L. A. Lewis & Co., Manchester.

M. G. T.

[MANCHESTER ASSIZES.]

1959
Dec. 11, 18.

Jones J.

* AKERIB v. BOOTH & OTHERS LTD.

[1958 A. No. 4752.]

Contract—Exceptions clause—Negligence—Tenancy agreement—Landlord not "in any circumstances" responsible for damage caused by water—Damage to tenant's goods by water escaping from cistern in water closet retained in landlord's possession—Landlord's liability for negligence.

By a written agreement dated December 1, 1954, the defendants let to the plaintiff certain offices and warerooms in their premises, retaining possession of a water closet on a higher floor. Water escaped from a cistern in this water closet by the admitted negligence of the defendants or their servants, and did damage to the plaintiff's goods. The defendants relied upon a clause in the tenancy agreement: "The landlord shall not in any circumstances "be liable for damage caused by . . . water . . . to any goods "whether in the possession of the landlord or not." Goods were defined elsewhere in the agreement as including "the tenant's "goods," which in turn were defined as including all goods bought by or belonging to the tenant, or in which the tenant may be interested, or which may come under his control in connection with the business of the tenant as carried on upon the premises:—

Held, that the words "in any circumstances" were wide enough to protect the defendants from liability for their admitted negligence.

Joseph Travers & Sons Ltd. v. Cooper [1915] 1 K.B. 73; Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry Ltd. [1945] K.B. 189; [1945] 1 All E.R. 244; and A. E. Farr Ltd. v. Admiralty [1953] 1 W.L.R. 965; [1953] 2 All E.R. 512 applied.

Action.

By a written agreement dated December 1, 1954, the defendants, Booth and Others Ltd., agreed to let to the plaintiff, Jack Akerib, part of their premises at 21, Chorlton Street, Manchester. The premises consisted of four offices and a wareroom on the third floor, and a further wareroom on the second floor. The defendants retained in their possession a water closet on the fourth floor. In addition to the tenancy obligations the agreement contained terms whereby the packing of all the plaintiff's goods was to be carried out exclusively by the defendants, and also certain exemption clauses. The clause relied on by the defendants was contained in the schedule to the agreement, and was in the following terms: "2. The landlord shall not in any circumstances "be responsible for damage caused by fire water (including "sprinkler leakage and damp) . . . to any goods whether in the "possession of the landlord or not." The word "goods," where used in the schedule, was expressed to include "the tenant's "goods" as defined in the agreement. By the terms of the agreement this expression was to include "all goods bought by

[Reported by Donald Hart, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

"or belonging to the tenant or in which the tenant may be "interested or which may come under his control in connection "with the business of the tenant." Between April 3 and 5, 1958, there was an escape of water from the cistern in the water closet, alleged by the plaintiff to be due to the defendants' negligence, which caused damage to certain of the plaintiff's goods in the part of the premises let to him. The defendants by their defence denied negligence, and relied in the alternative upon the exemption clause in the tenancy agreement. At the trial, negligence was admitted, in that the overflow pipe of the cistern was blocked, and the defendants' servants failed to turn off the water supply at the control tap in the basement on the night or nights preceding the escape, although it was their duty to do so. Damages were agreed subject to liability.

J. R. D. Crichton Q.C. and C. N. Glidewell for the plaintiff.
Fenton Atkinson Q.C. and A. K. Hollings for the defendants.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18. Jones J. stated the facts and continued: The point that the defendants take is that they are protected by an exemption clause in the agreement between the parties.

Clause 1 of the agreement provides that the landlord agrees to let and the tenant agrees to take four offices and one wareroom on the third floor and one wareroom on the second floor. By sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) of clause 2 the landlord agrees to provide for the payment of rates and taxes and for the supply of water and electric current. Sub-paragraph (c) provides that the landlord agrees to make-up and/or to pack the tenant's goods at the rates from time to time agreed upon between the parties in a workmanlike and efficient manner and with all reasonable dispatch, having regard to the landlord's obligations of a similar nature to other customers, and otherwise upon and subject to the terms and conditions set out in the schedule to the agreement. That is an important provision, and it makes it clear that this agreement is not only a tenancy agreement but an agreement which provides for other matters.

Clause 4 is important and reads: "The terms of this tenancy "are based upon the undertaking of the tenant (hereby expressly "given) to employ the landlord exclusively in the making-up "and/or packing (including the supply of all materials therefor) "of all goods bought by or belonging to the tenant or in which "the tenant may be interested or which may come under his "control in connection with the business of the tenant as carried "on upon the premises all which goods are included in the expres-"sion 'the tenant's goods' as used in this agreement."

There are then two paragraphs in the schedule which are 1959

Akerib
v.
Booth &
Others Ltd.

Jones J.

important. The first one is as follows: "No liability is accepted "by the landlord for any loss or damage to any goods (which word "where used in the schedule includes 'the tenant's goods' as "hereinbefore defined) where such loss or damage occurs whilst "the goods are in transit to any premises of the landlord or at any "time after the same have left such premises."

Paragraph 2, which is the exemption clause, is the most material clause for the purposes of this case. That provides: "The landlord shall not in any circumstances be responsible for "damage caused by fire water . . . to any goods whether in the "possession of the landlord or not."

Mr. Atkinson, for the defendants, has taken the point that paragraph 2 protects the defendants against liability for negligence, because the defendants could not possibly be liable to the plaintiff for any damage caused by water unless it was caused by the negligence of the defendants or their servants, and that, consequently, no other liability could arise. Apart from that, this exemption clause is a particularly powerful one, because of the presence in it of the words "shall not in any circumstances."

As for the exemption clause, the rule as to these clauses has been laid down comparatively recently in Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry Ltd.[1] The headnote in that case is as follows: "Articles "were sent by the plaintiff to the defendants' laundry to be "washed and were lost. In an action by the plaintiff against "the defendants for damages the defendants relied on the follow-"ing condition to limit their liability: 'The maximum amount "'allowed for lost or damaged articles is twenty times the charge "'made for laundering':—Held, that as no liability could arise "for loss of articles except through the defendants' negligence, "the condition applied to limit their liability in cases of negli-"gence and applied, therefore, to limit the plaintiff's damages. "In a case where loss might arise from causes other than negli-"gence, such a condition would not apply to limit liability for "loss through negligence, unless it was expressly made applicable "in clear terms."

Lord Greene M.R. said[2]: "It was argued before us for the "defendants that the clause did apply and was effective to limit "liability for lost articles; and reliance was placed on a well-"known line of authority dealing with clauses of this description. "The effect of those authorities can I think be stated as follows: "where the head of damage in respect of which limitation of "liability is sought to be imposed by such a clause is one which "rests on negligence and nothing else, the clause must be con-"strued as extending to that head of damage, because it would "otherwise lack subject-matter. Where, on the other hand, the "head of damage may be based on some other ground than that "of negligence, the general principle is that the clause must be "confined in its application to loss occurring through that other

[1] [1945] K.B. 189; [1945] 1 All E.R. 244, C.A.

[2] [1945] K.B. 189, 191.

"cause, to the exclusion of loss arising through negligence. The "reason is that if a contracting party wishes in such a case to "limit his liability in respect of negligence, he must do so in "clear terms in the absence of which the clause is construed as "relating to a liability not based on negligence." He then gives some illustrations, which it is unnecessary that I should read. There is a short judgment by MacKinnon L.J., in which he refers [3] to a passage from the judgment of Scrutton L.J. in Rutter v. Palmer.[4] MacKinnon L.J. said: "The rule or principle is "very admirably stated by Scrutton L.J. in a short passage in "Rutter v. Palmer: 'In construing an exemption clause certain "'general rules may be applied: first, the defendant is not "'exempted from liability for the negligence of his servants "'unless adequate words are used; secondly, the liability of "'the defendant apart from the exempting words must be "'ascertained; then the particular clause in question must be "'considered; and if the only liability of the party pleading "'exemption is a liability for negligence, the clause will more "'readily operate to exempt him.'"

Some difficulty has been occasioned by a decision in the Privy Council made since the decision in Alderslade v. Hendon Laundry Ltd.[5] In Canada Steamship Lines Ltd. v. The King[6] these words appear in reference to the passage I have read from the judgment of Lord Greene M.R. in the Alderslade case[7]: "It "appears to their Lordships that none of the judges of the "Supreme Court regarded this passage as being in any way in "conflict with the law of lower Canada. . . ." The judgment goes on to deal with the approach to the consideration of such clauses: "(2) If there is no express reference to negligence, the "court must consider whether the words used are wide enough, "in their ordinary meaning, to cover negligence on the part of "the servants of the proferens. If a doubt arises at this point, "it must be resolved against the proferens in accordance with "article 1019 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada: 'In cases of "'doubt, the contract is interpreted against him who has stipu-"'lated and in favour of him who has contracted the obligation.' "(3) If the words used are wide enough for the above purpose, "the court must then consider whether 'the head of damage "'may be based on some ground other than that of negligence,' "to quote again Lord Greene in the Alderslade case.[8] The "'other ground' must not be so fanciful or remote that the "proferens cannot be supposed to have desired protection against "it; but subject to this qualification, which is no doubt to be "implied from Lord Greene's words, the existence of a possible "head of damage other than that of negligence is fatal to the

[3] [1945] K.B. 189, 195.
[4] [1922] 2 K.B. 87.
[5] [1945] K.B. 189.
[6] [1952] A.C. 192, 208; [1952] 1 All E.R. 305.
[7] [1945] K.B. 189, 191.
[8] Ibid.

1959

Akerib
v.
Booth &
Others Ltd.

Jones J.

"proferens even if the words used are prima facie wide enough "to cover negligence on the part of his servants."

Mr. Atkinson submitted that there was no possible ground of liability in the present case except negligence; that if water had percolated through from the cistern, that would not be liability that came within the principle of Rylands v. Fletcher,[9] because it has been so held in a number of cases which are summarised in Salmond on Torts, 12th ed., at p. 566, in these words: "The rule "in Rylands v. Fletcher is not applicable to the escape of things "brought or kept upon his premises by the defendant with the con- "sent of the plaintiff. In such cases the defendant is not liable "except for negligence. Although not so limited, this principle "finds its chief application in those cases in which the different "storeys of a building are in the occupation of different persons, "and the occupant of a lower storey complains of the damage done "by the escape of water from an upper storey. Whether this water "is rainwater collected from the roof, or water supplied ab extra "in pipes, it is settled law that there is no liability for any such "escape in the absence of proved negligence on the part of the "upper occupant. For in such cases the water has been collected "or brought there for the mutual benefit and with the express or "implied consent of both parties; there is therefore no sufficient "reason why the risk of accident should lie upon the upper rather "than upon the lower occupant, and the only duty is one of "reasonable care."

Mr. Crichton, on behalf of the plaintiff, suggested as other grounds of possible liability first of all the case of a claim by the plaintiff against the defendants if the defendants packed the plaintiff's goods badly, in breach of clause 2 (c) of the agreement, and if, in consequence of their being packed badly, they were damaged by water. I am not very clear whether that would be a claim for damage caused by water, or whether it would not really be a claim for damage caused by bad packing. But he suggested as another ground of possible liability if the defendants collected water in their upper premises, not of the character that I have just referred to, not as being for the use of all the tenants for domestic purposes, but possibly for some other purpose, and then allowed it to escape. In the case of that happening he suggested that there would be a possible liability for nuisance, or the question of liability in regard to the rule in Rylands v. Fletcher.[9] It seems to me that it is possible that some such liability might arise. I am more impressed with the second point that he took than I am with the first, but, even so, I have to consider what is the effect of these very wide words: "The land- "lord shall not in any circumstances be responsible for damage." In relation to that I was referred to Joseph Travers & Sons Ltd. v. Cooper,[10] in which the summary of the judgment appears in the headnote: "Held, (1) by the whole court, that the onus lay

[9] (1868) L.R. 3 H.L. 330.

[10] [1915] 1 K.B. 73.

"on the defendant, who was in possession of the goods as bailee, "of showing that the negligence of his servant in leaving the "barge unattended did not cause the loss, and that he had failed "to discharge that onus; (2) by Kennedy and Phillimore L.JJ., "Buckley L.J. dissenting, that the term in the contract exempt-"ing the defendant from liability for damage 'however caused' "relieved him from liability for damage caused by the negli-"gence of his servant, and that therefore he was entitled to "judgment."

Kennedy L.J. said [11]: "The general principle was laid down "by Lord Blackburn in Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire "Railway Co. v. Brown [12]: 'When an exception is made, the "'question is, what is excepted? Custom and ordinary usage "'says, in bills of lading when the goods are going by sea, "'"perils of the seas excepted." Well, the carrier is free as "'regards them. No one could for a moment argue that if the "'shipowner's servants negligently ran upon a rock, or negli-"'gently had a collision with another vessel, the owner of the "'goods carried in his ship would not be entitled to say, "I will "'"bring an action against you for this negligent collision which "'"has done me harm, even though you are not to be made "'"responsible, as an insurer, for a peril of the sea, which is an "'"excepted means of damage." And so of leakage, and many "'other things of that sort. But that does not in the slightest "'degree show that when a man says he will not be responsible "'for damage however caused, that is to be cut down and made, "'contrary to the intention of the parties, not to include the "'negligence of his servants.'"

Kennedy L.J., referring to the case before the court, went on to say [13]: "In the present case, the condition which we have to "consider uses the very words of exemption referred to by Lord "Blackburn in Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire Railway "Co. v. Brown,[14] 'damage however caused'; and I see no "sufficient reason not to treat them as sufficient to protect the "defendant from liability for the negligence of his servant in "regard to the carriage of the plaintiff's goods. On this ground, "therefore, whilst, for the reasons which I have stated, I respect-"fully differ from my brother Pickford in regard to the view "which he has taken as to the burden of proof upon the question "of negligence, I think that in the result the defendant is entitled "to retain the judgment in his favour, and that this appeal should "be dismissed."

There is then a passage from the judgment of Phillimore L.J., which has been quoted on many occasions. He puts the matter in this way [15]: "This then is the distinction. It is a fine one, "and I am sorry to think that it is so fine; but it seems to be "this. If you say 'any loss' you are directing attention to the [11] [1915] 1 K.B. 73, 93.

[12] (1883) 8 App.Cas. 703, 709.
[13] [1915] 1 K.B. 73, 94.
[14] 8 App.Cas. 710.
[15] [1915] 1 K.B. 73, 101.

1959

Akerib
v.
Booth &
Others Ltd.

Jones J.

"kinds of losses and not to their cause or origin, and you have "not sufficiently made it plain that you mean 'any and every "'loss' irrespective of the cause, and therefore you have not "brought home to the person who is entrusting the goods to you "that you are not going to be responsible for your servants on "your behalf exercising due care for them, or possibly even for "your own personal want of care. But if you direct attention to "the causes of any loss, if you say 'any loss,' 'however caused' "or 'under any circumstances,' you give sufficient warning, and "it is unnecessary to say in express terms 'whether caused "'by my servants' negligence,' or in the bill of lading phrase, "'neglect or default or otherwise.'"

That passage has been considered comparatively lately in A. E. Farr Ltd. v. Admiralty.[16] That was a case where the plaintiffs entered into a contract for the construction of a destroyer jetty, and the contract incorporated certain conditions. The work was proceeding under a contract when an Admiralty vessel, due to admittedly negligent navigation by an Admiralty servant, collided with certain parts of the jetty. The plaintiffs were instructed, under the contract of the Admiralty officer, to repair the damage, which amounted to a certain sum. They claimed that sum from the Admiralty under the contract which provided that the contractors would recover any expenses properly incurred in complying with the superintending officer's instructions, or, alternatively, as damages for breach of contract. But the Admiralty relied on the general conditions which provided that "The contractor shall be "responsible for any loss or damage to the works arising from "any cause whatsoever." It was held by Parker J. that the words "any cause whatsoever" were as wide as they should be and should be read as including negligent navigation of a ship by an Admiralty servant, and that, once that construction was applied to the condition, there was no room for any implied term which would limit the effect of those words, and that the plaintiffs were, accordingly, not entitled to recover the sum claimed. Parker J. said[17]: "A number of cases were cited to me. "I do not propose to refer to any of them, because they all "depend on their own particular wording, except Joseph Travers "& Sons Ltd. v. Cooper, a decision of the Court of Appeal which "has been often quoted and approved." He then referred to the facts of that case, and to the passage from the judgment of Phillimore L.J. which I have just read, and said[18]: "It seems "to me, therefore, that the words in the present case are about "as wide as they can be, and that I must read 'any cause what-"'soever' as if it included and expressly said 'including damage "'caused by the negligent navigation of a ship by an Admiralty "'servant.'"

It seems to me that the words of this exemption clause are as wide as they could possibly be, and that they are wide enough, having regard to the decisions to which I have referred, to entitle the defendants to be protected by that exemption clause, and consequently to resist the liability for the damage that was done to the plaintiff's goods.

[16] [1953] 1 W.L.R. 965; [1953] 2 All E.R. 512.

[17] [1953] 1 W.L.R. 965, 967.

[18] Ibid. 968.

Judgment for the defendants.

Solicitors: Linder, Myers & Pariser, Manchester; A. W. Mawer & Co., Manchester.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

* REGINA v. WOODBURY LICENSING JUSTICES. Ex parte ROUSE.

SAME v. SAME. Ex parte OLDHAM.

1960
April 1.

Streatfeild, Ashworth and Hinchcliffe JJ.

Licensing — Justices — Jurisdiction — Meeting subsequent to general annual licensing meeting fixed beyond statutory period—Mandamus —Licensing Act, 1953 (1 & 2 Eliz. 2, c. 46), Sch. 2, Part I, para. 5. Justices — Costs — Award against justices — Mandamus — Principles applicable—Mistake—Date for hearing outside statutory period—Licensing.

By paragraph 5 of Part I of Schedule 2 to the Licensing Act, 1953: "The times and places appointed for the second or any sub-"sequent session of the general annual licensing meeting shall be "such as appear to the justices convenient for persons intending to "apply for justices' licences; and the times so appointed shall not "be earlier than the sixth day after the session of the general "annual licensing meeting at which they are appointed or later "than one month after the first day of the general annual licensing "meeting."

At a general annual licensing meeting held on February 1, 1960, the justices ordered the second meeting to take place on the first Monday in March. Owing to leap year, instead of the first Monday falling on March 1, it fell on March 7. Two applications were made on February 11 and 12 respectively, one for a justices' licence and the other for a removal. When the applicants attended the meeting on March 7 they were told that the justices could not hear their applications because it was more than five weeks since the last meeting. The applicants moved the court for an order of mandamus to the justices to hear and determine the applications:—

Held, that the court had power to make an order absolute calling on the justices to hold a meeting for the purpose of hearing and determining the two applications.

Reg. v. Farquhar (1874) L. R. 9 Q.B. 258 applied.

APPLICATION for order of mandamus.

Applications were made by Ernest George Rouse and Bertram Oldham on February 11 and 12, 1960, respectively, for a justices' licence and for a removal. At the general annual licensing meeting for the area, which had been held on February 1, 1960, the

---

[Reported by Miss E. CARYL-THOMAS, Barrister-at-Law.]

1960

Regina v. Woodbury Licensing Justices. Ex parte Rouse.

licensing justices for the Petty Sessional Division of Woodbury had ordered the second meeting to take place on the first Monday in March which, owing to leap year, was March 7. When the applicants attended in order to make their applications they were told that the justices could not hear them because it was more than five weeks since the last meeting, which was contrary to paragraph 5 of Part I of Schedule 2 to the Licensing Act, 1953.

The applicants moved the court for an order of mandamus to the justices to hear and determine the applications.

Francis Irwin for the applicants.

The justices were not represented.

The cases cited in argument are referred to in the judgment.

Streatfeild J. In these two cases application was made on February 11 and 12 respectively by two applicants, one for a justices' licence and the other for a removal. The general annual licensing meeting in this particular area had been held on February 1. Under Schedule 2 of the Licensing Act, 1953, Part I, para. 5, the second meeting of the justices should have been held not less than six days and not more than one month after the first. The justices, forgetting that it is leap year this year, ordered the second meeting to take place on the first Monday in March, believing that that was within one month of their first meeting. Unfortunately, March 1, which no doubt was the date they really believed they were fixing, although they did not say so, was a Tuesday. They sit on Mondays, and the first Monday in March was March 7. That was more than five weeks after the first meeting, and therefore, prima facie, a date which they could not fix under paragraph 5 of the Second Schedule. In the meanwhile, after the first meeting these two applications were made and the applicants attended in order to make their applications. They were then told by the justices' clerk, apparently with apologies, that the justices could not hear them because it was more than five weeks since the last meeting, with the result that the applicant in each case, through no fault of his own, will miss the granting of the licence or the removal, as the case may be, for another year. Accordingly, they move this court for an order of mandamus to the justices to hear and determine their applications.

There is mentioned in Paterson's Licensing Acts, 68th ed., p. 1025, a case in 1932 which is on all fours with the present one, Rex v. Kingston Justices,[1] which is only reported in the Brewing Trade Review. It seems to us that the principle upon which we can act in order to set this matter right is contained in Reg. v. Farquhar,[2] in which Blackburn J. said[3]: "All we can do is to "grant a mandamus to the justices to hold a licensing meeting

[1] (1932) Br.Tr.Rev. 154.

[2] (1870) L.R. 9 Q.B. 258; 39 J.P. 166.

[3] Ibid. 262.

"to hear and consider the objection to the renewal on notice to "the applicant, and to decide, after hearing him, according to "law and fact. We have power to order the justices to do this "now, though the proper time has gone by, on the authority of "the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Rochester Corporation v. The Queen.[4] The rule, therefore, will be absolute for a "mandamus commanding the licensing justices, or some of them, "to hold a meeting, with notice to the applicant, and then to "hear and determine the question of the renewal of his licence." Quain J. said[5]: "The intention of section 42 is that there should "be a due hearing, and it is only on the objection failing in "point of law or on the facts that he is entitled to the renewal. "But to say that merely because he has not been required to "attend at the adjourned meeting, he is now to have a licence "granted as of course, is a proposition quite unmaintainable. The "mandamus must be to the justices to assemble a meeting for "the purpose of hearing Gardner's application, they having given "him notice to attend, and hearing the case just as they would "had they proceeded regularly in the first instance under section "42 (2)," and Archibald J. concurred, saying: "I am of the "same opinion, it being understood that the mandamus is to be "in the limited form to hear and determine only." It seems to me that those words cover the present situation, and that this court has power to make an order absolute calling upon the justices to hold a meeting for the purpose of hearing and determining these two applications.

ASHWORTH J. I agree.

HINCHCLIFFE J. I also agree.

[The court heard argument on whether notices which had been given in respect of these applications before the justices, and which would have been in time if the applications had been heard on March 7, were effective notices for the hearing which was now to be fixed. The court held that the notices already given were effective.]

Irwin. Would your Lordships say that this was a proper case for the applicants to have costs? It is unusual, I appreciate, for the justices to be ordered to pay costs. Griffits Guide to Crown Office Practice, p. 164, reads: "Justices may be allowed their costs "of opposing by affidavit. Costs are not usually given against "justices unless they have acted oppressively or improperly or not "bona fide." A distinction is drawn between acting in bad faith and acting improperly. In Reg. v. Bell[6] the justices had made an adjudication under the Licensing Acts and an aggrieved person wanted them to state a case. They refused to state a case, and [4] (1858) E.B. & E. 1024; 27 L.J. Q.B. 434.

[5] (1874) L.R. 9 Q.B. 258, 262.

[6] (1899) 15 T.L.R. 487, D.C.

1960

Regina v. Woodbury Licensing Justices. Ex parte Rouse.

at the same time they refused to certify that the application to them to state a case was frivolous. Ridley and Darling JJ. both held that that was a proper case where costs should be awarded.

[Streatfeild J. That is a little different. In this case they have acted by inadvertence. The difficulty I feel is that this was not oppressive. It certainly was not improper, nor was it mala fide; it was just a pure mistake.]

It was. The only description I would attempt to give it is that it might come under the description of being an improper act in that there is a duty on the justices or their clerk to see that they obey the statute and do not deprive any applicant of his rights. They have deprived him of his rights. He incurs expense in coming to this court, and this court sets the matter right.

Streatfeild J. I know, but I think we can acquit the clerk; he was ordered by the justices to fix the sessions on the first Monday in March. They themselves thought that was all right, but unfortunately they made a slip. I do not think that under those circumstances we can make an order for costs against a body like justices.

Order of mandamus.
No order as to costs.

Solicitors: Field, Roscoe & Co. for Ford, Simey & Ford, Exmouth.

[RESTRICTIVE PRACTICES COURT.]

R. P. Ct.† (E. & W.)

1960 Feb. 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 29; Mar. 1; Apr. 7.

* In re PHENOL PRODUCERS' AGREEMENT.

[1957 No. 27 (E. & W.).]

Restrictive Practice—Restriction—Price restriction—Whether contrary to public interest—Phenol industry—Fixed prices for phenol—No formula or costings system—Natural phenol produced from distillation of tar—Current fixed price higher than free market price—Whether tar producers would divert tar to burning if phenol price fell—Whether benefits or advantages conferred on public by restrictions—Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956 (4 & 5 Eliz. 2, c. 68), s. 21 (1) (b).

Phenol, commonly known as carbolic acid, was an important raw material in the chemical industry, used principally in the manufacture of plastics, pharmaceutical preparations, paints and synthetic dyestuffs. It could be produced by synthesis from benzene, when it was known as synthetic phenol, or by refining crude tar acids, when it was known as natural phenol. Phenol, together with other hydroxyls, occurred naturally in coal tar, and these were generally known as "tar acids." The tar acids could be extracted from the coal tar by chemical action followed by fractional distillation. Synthetic phenol accounted for about three-quarters of current production, and natural phenol for about a quarter.

---

† Pearson J., Diplock J., Russell J., Sir Stanford Cooper, Mr. W. L. Heywood, Mr. W. Wallace and Mr. W. G. Campbell.

The main trends in the industry were rapid and consistently rising production (production in 1960 being expected to be four times what it was in 1949), the cessation of imports, which in 1952 and 1957 were an important supplement to home production when supplies were scarce, a remarkable rise in home trade deliveries from United Kingdom producers, though not as large a rise as that of production, and the growth of exports as a large and increasing outlet for the industry's output.

By an agreement made between all its members, the Phenol Producers' Association fixed the price at which they could sell phenol, the current basic price being 1s. 4d. per lb.

The association sought to justify the restrictions under paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956,[1] on the ground that there was a present surplus of supply over demand which would persist for five years; that without the scheme the surplus would cause a fall in the price of phenol and related products by 25 per cent.; that thereby there would be such a loss of revenue to tar producers that tar would be diverted from distillation to use as a fuel, for which profitable sales could be obtained; and that, in consequence, many valuable chemicals derived from tar distillation would be lost to the nation, and phenol kept in short supply.

The association, also, contended that the scheme kept the price of phenol stable and held it down when demand exceeded supply, and that it increased the supply of phenol to meet an erratically increasing demand.

The court found that the fixed price scheme had the following four main detriments: (1) the price was being maintained at the present time at a higher level than that obtaining in the free market; (2) it was unrelated to cost of production or any costings formula so that there was no fetter on the amount of the price fixed by the association; (3) the policy of the association had been to charge what the trade could stand; and (4) the scheme permitted no concessions for those engaged in exports or buying phenol under long term or large scale contracts: the fixed price was a uniform delivered price, so that there were no reductions for those who collected their phenol in their own transport or whose premises were near the seller's:—

Held, (1) that even if the price of phenol and related products fell by 25 per cent. in a free market (which contentions were not accepted), it did not follow that the loss of revenue would cause diversion of tar from distillation to use as fuel because (post, pp. 483, 484):

[1] Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, s. 21: "(1) For the purposes of "any proceedings before the court . . . "a restriction accepted in pursuance "of any agreement shall be deemed "to be contrary to the public interest "unless the court is satisfied of any "one or more of the following cir-"cumstances, that is to say . . . "(b) that the removal of the restric-"tion would deny to the public as "purchasers, consumers or users of "any goods other specific and sub-"stantial benefits or advantages "enjoyed or likely to be enjoyed by "them as such, whether by virtue "of the restriction itself or of any "arrangements or operations result-"ing therefrom: . . . (2) In this "section 'purchasers,' 'consumers' "and 'users' include persons pur-"chasing, consuming, or using for "the purpose or in course of trade or "business or for public purposes. . . ."

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1960

Phenol Producers' Agreement, In re.

(a) there were conflicting expert opinions as to its suitability for use as fuel;

(b) the market for tar as fuel was uncertain, whereas there was an assured market for the products of tar distillation;

(c) it was uncertain what price tar would fetch as fuel, and whether it could compete with oil or coal;

(d) the evidence of the only tar producer called as a witness did not support the association's contention.

(2) That there was unlikely to be a shortage of supplies in future because synthetic production could be expanded, but, in any event, stability of price at an excessive level could not be a benefit to the public (post, pp. 484, 485).

In re Wholesale and Retail Bakers of Scotland Association's Agreement (1959) L.R. 1 R.P. 347, 376; [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1094; [1959] 3 All E.R. 98 applied.

(3) That the scheme did not increase supplies of phenol, which were due mainly to increasing demand from the plastics industry (post, p. 485).

The association, therefore, had failed to establish its case under paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) and the restrictions must be declared contrary to the public interest.

Reference.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of the court: On November 22, 1957, the Registrar of Restrictive Trading Agreements, pursuant to section 20 (2) (a) of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act, 1956, referred to the court an agreement subsisting between the members of the Phenol Producers' Association and numbered 219 on the register of agreements. There were then 15 members, but one had since resigned, so that there were at the date of the hearing 14 members. The agreement was not intended to be legally enforceable and did not provide any penalty for non-compliance, but each member signed an undertaking to adopt the schedule of prices, terms and conditions for sales of phenol fixed by the association at the date of the member's entry into the association, and any alteration thereto subsequently agreed upon by them. The price schedule, at present in force, provided a fixed basic price of 1s. 4d. a lb. for contracts for 10 tons and over for delivery at the buyer's premises in the seller's road tanks or rail tanks. There was a scale of additions to be made to the basic price for deliveries in smaller quantities or in drums or other packages, and certain terms and conditions were prescribed, but there was not, at the hearing, any separate question to be considered as to the suitability of the scale of additions and the terms and conditions, because it was agreed between counsel, and it was clear to the court that the scale of additions and the terms and conditions were merely ancillary to the fixed basic price and must in the proceedings stand or fall with it.

Phenol or benzene hydroxyl is an important raw material in the chemical industry. It is used in the manufacture, among other products, of plastics, plasticisers, pharmaceutical preparations, paints and synthetic dyestuffs. It can be produced industrially by synthesis from benzene. It occurs naturally in coal-tar together with other hydroxyls of similar chemical characteristics of which the most important are cresols and xylenols. These are sometimes called generically "tar acids." Phenol and the other tar acids can be extracted from coal-tar by chemical action followed by fractional distillation. The phenol produced in this way is known as "natural phenol."

Synthetic phenol is manufactured as pure phenol without admixture with other tar acids. Three different processes are used in this country. In each of these, benzene, itself obtained as a by-product from the distillation of coal, is the principal raw material. The oldest process is the sulphonation process. It is used by a company, which is a member of the association, and produces as a by-product sodium sulphite, which is used in the paper industry. It is the only synthetic process for which any costings are available. The annual output of phenol manufactured by this process is 14,000 tons. The second process, the chlorbenzene process, has been used in this country for nearly 10 years by a company which was, until 1956, but is no longer, a member of the association. There was no evidence as to its costings and little information as to its by-products. The annual output of phenol manufactured by this process is 15,000 tons. The most modern process is the "Cumene" process for which a plant has recently been constructed by a company, which is not a member of the association. Acetone is the main by-product. This process has been operated in the United States of America for some years. Its profitability is dependent to a greater extent than the other two processes upon the market for the by-product. There were no costings and no information upon which the court could safely rely as to its profitability relative to the other two synthetic processes. The annual output from this process is expected to be 10,000 tons in 1960 and to rise to 13,000 tons thereafter.

The total productive capacity of the synthetic phenol industry in the United Kingdom is thus expected to be 39,000 tons in 1960, rising to 42,000 tons in 1961 and after, of which two-thirds, viz., 28,000 tons per annum, will be produced by non-members of the association.

To operate economically, a synthetic plant must be large, i.e., its capacity should be not less than 10,000 tons per annum, and it should be operated at maximum throughput. The association, however, called no evidence in relation to any of these processes as to the practicability or effect upon costs of production of reducing annual output by closing down the plant as a whole or some units of the plant for temporary periods, although the assumption that this cannot be done economically would appear to be an important part of their case.

The current output of natural phenol is between 14,000 and 15,000 tons per annum, or about one-quarter of the total output of natural and synthetic phenol. In view of the important part which natural phenol plays in the association's submissions,

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1960

Phenol Producers' Agreement, In re.

however, it is necessary to consider its production in some detail. It occurs in the natural state in coal-tar together with other tar acids. Coal-tar itself is a by-product of the distillation of coal. When coal is subjected to dry distillation, i.e., heated in retorts in the absence of air, five primary products are produced, viz., gas, coke, ammonia liquor, benzene and coal-tar. The dry distillation of coal it undertaken by two main industries, the gas industry, in which the object is to obtain the largest quantity of gas, and coke ranks as a by-product, though the most important by-product, and the steel industry, in which the object is to obtain the largest quantity of coke suitable for use in blast furnaces, and the gas is a by-product. The technical processes differ in the two industries and as a result, not only the quantity of coal-tar produced but also its chemical composition varies according to whether it is a by-product of the gas industry or the steel industry. One member of the association uses a third process, namely, low-temperature carbonisation, of which the main product is a smokeless fuel. The chemical composition of the coal-tar produced in this process resembles that produced by the gas industry.

Coal-tar in its crude form is thus an inevitable by-product of the manufacture of gas for domestic and industrial consumption, and of the manufacture of blast furnace coke for use in the steel industry. It will continue to be produced in the future so long as those two industries continue. The quantity produced is strictly related to and dictated by the amount of coal used in those industries, although it is anticipated by the association that, as a result of changing techniques in the gas industry, the production of coal-tar by that industry will diminish.

The current annual production of crude coal-tar in the United Kingdom is of the order of 3,000,000 tons per annum. It is combustible and capable of use in its crude form as a fuel. About 250,000 tons per annum are so used, almost exclusively by steel companies burning in their own works the crude tar produced in the coking plants at those works. The presence of carbon particles which provide radiant heat makes it suitable for use in open hearth furnaces. Conflicting views were expressed by experts as to the suitability of crude tar as a liquid fuel for steam raising and other industrial purposes. It is, however, clear that, whatever its theoretical utility may be, there has hitherto been no market for crude tar as an industrial fuel and, save for trivial quantities, its use as a fuel is restricted to the use of tar produced at their own works by some eight steel companies.

More than 90 per cent. of crude tar produced is distilled. Crude tar is a mixture of a large number of organic chemicals which vaporise at different temperatures—a physical characteristic which make it possible to separate its constituents into various groups or fractions by distillation. The normal fractions produced upon distillation in descending order of volatility are: crude naphtha, carbolic oil, naphthalene oil, creosote oil, and anthracene oil, leaving a residue of pitch which in bulk and weight is the largest product. Each of the five fractions is itself a mixture of many different organic chemicals. Tar acids occur in the first four of them from which they can be abstracted by a chemical process. Phenol, which has the lowest boiling-point of the tar acids, is present in greater quantities in the lower boiling-point fractions, viz., crude naphtha and carbolic oil, but is to be found to some extent in naphthalene oil, while cresols and xylenols are more abundant in naphthalene oil but are present with phenol in carbolic oil and even crude naphtha, and with the higher boiling-point tar acids in anthracene oil. The product of the chemical extraction of phenol, cresols, xylenols and high boiling-point tar acids from these various fractions is known as crude tar acids, and constitutes the raw material for the final stage in the preparation of natural phenol, namely, the refining of the crude tar acids.

In addition to tar acids, the five fractions contain other valuable chemicals such as pyridine bases and naphtha in the crude naphtha fraction, Coumarone resins in the crude naphtha and carbolic oil fractions, and naphthalene in the naphthalene oil, and anthracene in the anthracene oil fractions. Creosote oil is used by itself as a wood preservative, but in the main is mixed with the residual pitch to make either road tar or creosote-pitch mixture, which is widely used as an industrial fuel in competition with heavy petroleum oil. All these products play an important part in the economics of tar distillation. The pitch-creosote mixtures, both road tar and fuel, account for about two-thirds of the total value of the products, the balance being split between the tar acids and the other products of distillation in the ratio of about three to two. Phenol itself accounts for about 5 per cent.–6 per cent. of the total value of the products of distillation, and the other tar acids for about 13½ per cent. to 15½ per cent.

The crude tar acids chemically extracted from the coal-tar fraction have little or no commercial use in their crude form and have to be subjected to a fresh process of refining by further fractional distillation. Phenol, the lowest boiling-point tar acid, can, in this way, be obtained either commercially pure, viz., 99 per cent. pure, or mixed with other tar acids, mainly cresols, to a purity of 90 per cent. phenol (a mixture which has large commercial uses), or even less, the less pure mixtures being cheaper to produce. Ortho-cresol, which has the next lowest boiling-point, is generally prepared for commercial use in a purity of about 90 per cent. Meta- and para-cresols boil at the same temperature and thus cannot be separated by fractional distillation. Their value is dependent on the proportion of meta- and para-cresols in the mixture which, in turn, depends upon the natural chemical composition of the tar. The various xylenols, of which there are several isomers, are not normally separated one from another but are sold in various mixtures classified by their boiling-point range. It is, however, not possible to generalise as to the various mixtures of refined tar acids which can be and are in

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1960

Phenol Producers' Agreement, In re.

practice produced, since the nature of the process of fractional distillation enables a great variety of mixtures of varying degrees of purity to be made to meet varying commercial demands.

As already indicated, the refined tar acids represent at current prices about 20 per cent. of the total value of the products of distillation of crude coal-tar. Even if they were valueless, however, it would be necessary to extract them in whole or in part in order to obtain some of the other commercially valuable products from coal-tar. In particular, the yield of naphthalene (the raw material from which phthallic anhydride used in the plastic and plasticising industries is synthesised), of which there is at present a national and world-wide shortage, would be substantially reduced if the crude tar acids were not extracted from the naphthalene oil fraction, and the yield of pyridine and Coumarone resins would be reduced if the tar acids were not extracted from the carbolic oil and naphtha fractions. Road tar could not comply with current specifications unless the greater part of the tar acids were removed from the creosote oil which goes into road tar.

The relative values of the various products of the distillation of coal-tar which have been mentioned above represent an average for the whole of the tar distillation industry. They vary, however, very substantially between different types of tar according to the nature of the coking process by which they are produced. Thus, coal-tar coming from the gas industry contains about 7 per cent. by weight of tar acids of which only one-tenth or 0·7 per cent. is phenol, while coal-tar obtained in making blast furnace coke for the steel industry contains only 1½ per cent. of tar acids, of which one-third or 0·5 per cent. is phenol. Conversely, gas industry coal-tar contains only a negligible quantity of naphthalene while coking industry coal-tars contain about 5 per cent. The value of the tar acids is only about 9 per cent. of the total value of the products of distillation of coal-tar produced in making blast furnace coke, and the value of the phenol itself is only 5 per cent.; whereas the value of the tar acids in coal-tar produced at gas works is about 30 per cent. of the total value of the products of distillation of which phenol accounts for a little more than 7 per cent. Price movements in the various products of tar distillation and refining, particularly in tar acids and naphthalene, may thus have very different effects upon the profits of tar distillation according to whether the tar is produced by the gas industry or by the blast furnace coke industry. Whether it is profitable to distill tar instead of selling it for burning if a market can be found depends upon the total value of all the products of tar distillation and not merely upon one of those products.

The chemical characteristics of all the tar acids are to some extent similar, and in some industrial processes some of the others can be used as a substitute for phenol. The characteristics of ortho-cresol, however, are different from those of the other tar acids. Its main use is for selective weed-killers and the supply of this product, at present, exceeds the home demand. The meta- and para-cresol mixtures can in some processes in the plastic industry be used as a substitute for, or mixed with, phenol, but have other uses of their own for which phenol is not suitable. The same applies to the xylenols which are at present in short supply. Even in those processes where substitution of one tar acid for another is chemically possible, however, there would be a natural reluctance on the part of the user to make alterations in his manufacturing process necessitated by the substitution unless there was a substantial economic incentive to do so.

In addition to the possibility of substitution in manufacturing processes of the tar acids inter se, the plastic industry, particularly in the manufacture of synthetic resins, offers some possibilities of substitution of entirely different products such as urea resins which are not made from coal-tar for phenol resins, and phenol plasticisers for phthallic anhydride plasticisers, which are made from naphthalene, a product of coal-tar; but there would be a similar reluctance on the part of the manufacturer to make consequential changes in his manufacturing processes.

The association can be said to have begun in the year 1927. In that year, the three main British phenol-producing companies received from a group of German and other continental phenol-producing companies an invitation to discuss the market situation, as over-production was feared. Meetings ensued, and, on November 7, 1927, an agreement was made between the three British companies, and, on January 25, 1928, an agreement was made between the British group comprising the three companies and the German group. These agreements provided for the fixing of minimum prices for phenol, and, up to about September, 1939, prices were fixed from time to time and were observed by the companies in the British group and by the companies in the German group. There were three other arrangements initiated in 1927 or 1928. The agreement of November 7, 1927, established a quota system for the British companies inter se, and this seems to have continued with modifications up to about September, 1939. Secondly, the agreement of January 25, 1928, established a quota system as between the British group and the German group, and it was operated for some years but then lapsed owing to exchange and other difficulties. The third arrangement arose in 1927 or 1928 in this way: a German company, which was a large consumer of phenol, was proposing to start production of synthetic phenol; the producers of natural phenol, both German and British, wished to prevent this; accordingly, an arrangement was made whereby the German consumer company, in consideration of its refraining from production of synthetic phenol, would receive supplies on preferential terms from the producers of natural phenol, both German and British. This arrangement was in operation up to about 1933. In 1935, a somewhat similar situation arose in the United Kingdom; a company which consumed phenol and itself produced some natural phenol, proposed to commence production of synthetic phenol. The other British producers of natural phenol wished to restrict this; accordingly, an arrangement was made, of which the effect, summarised very shortly, was that for each prospective six-monthly period it would be decided in advance either (i) that the producers of natural phenol could supply all the requirements of the consumer company and would do so on preferential terms, or (ii) that the producers of natural phenol could not supply all such requirements and therefore the consumer company should produce synthetic phenol. This arrangement operated until July, 1939, with the result that during some six-monthly periods the synthetic plant was closed and during others it was operating.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1960

Phenol Producers' Agreement, In re.

The association sought to justify the restrictions under paragraph (b) of section 21 (1) of the Act, it being contended, inter alia, that the public as purchasers, consumers or users of other products of crude tar and of tar acids, and goods produced from such products, enjoyed the following three benefits and advantages by virtue of its agreement: (i) the quantity of such products produced and available to the public; (ii) the stability of the price of such products to the public; (iii) the reasonableness of the price of such products.

Further facts are stated in the judgment.

B. J. M. MacKenna Q.C. and P. J. Grant for the association.
T. G. Roche Q.C. and Robin Dunn for the registrar.

No cases were cited in argument other than the case referred to in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 7. Pearson J. read the following judgment of the court, in which he stated the facts set out above, and continued: The basic price of phenol was raised from 6⅝d. per lb. to 7⅝d. per lb. on October 1, 1939, and in January, 1940, to 8⅛d., and in July, 1940, to 9¼d. The chairman of the association, when giving evidence, was asked what led to the increases up to 9¼d., and he said it would be the supply and demand situation at that time, and, on being asked whether that had always been the guiding influence on the association in fixing prices, he said it had been one of the factors which were taken into consideration.

In the war period there was a shortage of phenol and all the producers, including the one producer of synthetic phenol, produced up to the full capacity of their plants. From about 1940 onwards the supplies of tar acids and the distribution of phenol were regulated by the Coal Tar Controller. The price was not controlled under government order, but arrangements were made by which the two producers of phenol who were not yet members of the association should become members, and the association's price should be a fixed (not merely a minimum) price to be approved by the controller, and not afterwards to be altered without his consent.

Under these arrangements the price of 9¼d. was approved and remained in force for 18 months until January 1, 1942, when it was raised to 9½d. It remained at 9½d. for five years. In 1946 the association applied to the controller for his approval to be given for an increase in the price, and at his request figures showing the increased cost of production were collected and presented. The figures, however, showed only the increases in particular items of costs such as steam, wages, carriage, etc., in 1946 as compared with 1941. The actual cost of producing phenol at any time was not ascertained. The price was raised to 10½d. per lb. on January 1, 1947, and it remained at that figure until the end of 1949, when the control was abolished. In that year, 1949, there was a proposal to reintroduce quotas, but it was not adopted. After discussions in the early part of 1950, the price was raised to 11½d. per lb. as from July 1, 1950. Later in the year 1950 the price was raised again to 1s. 1d. as from January 1, 1951. Then at a meeting, on May 9, 1951, the price was raised again to 1s. 6d. a lb. as from July 1, 1951. Thus, in a period of just over a year the price was raised from 10½d. to 1s. 6d. a lb., an increase of over 70 per cent. The price remained at 1s. 6d. a lb. for two years up to July 1, 1953, when it was reduced to 1s. 4d. a lb. Numerous questions were put to the associations' witnesses about the policy of price-fixing in the period 1950–53. There was a changing market situation: in the early part of the period there was a scarcity of phenol, especially in the year 1951, when the world price was very high and imported phenol fetched as much as 5s. a lb. in the United Kingdom: then supplies in the United Kingdom increased, largely by reason of new synthetic production, and, by about April or at latest June, 1952, it was realised in the trade that the scarcity was ending and a surplus was to be anticipated. It is clear from the evidence that the price-fixing was not based on costs of production. The chairman said: "I should make it quite clear that, although the "members of the association undoubtedly have in mind the "variation in their costings of refining tar acids . . . the fixing of "the price of phenol is not based on any costing data." He was then asked whether the price was based on what the traffic would bear or on some other basis, and he said: "It is based on "that. We acknowledge that we must give a fair return to the "producer of our raw material. We have in mind, and must have "in mind the domestic prices in the main producing countries, "and there I mention Germany and America." It should be explained that the chairman's words "a fair return to the pro-"ducer of our raw material" impliedly referred to the industry's numerous co-operation schemes under which for supplies of raw material—tar to the distilleries or crude tar acids to the refineries—the suppliers receive a share of the net proceeds realised on the disposal of the refined products. At a later stage, the chairman was asked: "Would it be fair to say that your system "was opportunism tempered by a collective sense of caution?" and his answer was: "That puts it very nicely." The association's principal trade witness, who has been a prominent member of the association for many years, had been recorded in the minutes of the meeting of May 9, 1951, as making "a point that "the tar distillers were, in effect, the custodians of the "nationalised industries which produced the crude tar, and as "such they had a responsibility to the nationalised bodies to "give them a reasonable return for the crude tar." In the course of his evidence, he was asked what were the considerations which the association had applied in trying to fix prices, and his answer was: "The main consideration is, first of all, the state "of the world market, and bearing in mind the fact that we "cannot put our customers into a situation whereby they cannot "compete with their like industries and so on. That has been "our first major consideration. Having taken into account that, "our next consideration has been the fact that we are obligated "under our schemes for distilling tar to do the best we can for our "tar producers. Within the bounds of the first consideration, "we adjust the price of phenol accordingly." The secretary of the association, who is also a chartered accountant, said that his impression of the discussions at meetings held to fix prices was that members had in mind their own increases of costs since the price was last fixed, the demand for the product, whether it would be wise to fix the price at a certain figure in order to encourage a new use, and many other factors. He agreed, when asked by Mr. Roche, that the real factor was the question of trying to gauge what price the trade would stand.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1960

Phenol Producers' Agreement, In re.

Another matter to be considered in respect of the period 1950–53 is whether the prices fixed by the association from time to time were reasonable or unreasonable. If for this purpose the costs of production have to be taken into account, the evidence is defective because there were not at any time any adequate costing data. If the costs of production are left out of account, regard must be had to the market situation. The sharp increase of the price from 1s. 1d. to 1s. 6d. by the decision at the meeting of May 9, 1951, though it was agreed unanimously, was afterwards felt by some members to have been perhaps immoderate, and a second meeting was held at which different opinions were expressed, and the decision was confirmed only by a majority vote with some members dissenting. Whether or not there was lack of moderation, we find that there was lack of flexibility in the price-fixing. There was some indication in the evidence of the rise in price being too long delayed, because phenol and its raw material (tar acids) were being exported to obtain the high world price, and there was some deficiency in the supplies of phenol for the home consumer. When the price was raised to 1s. 6d. as from July 1, 1951, by a decision at the meeting in May, possibly that price was for the time being not excessive in relation to the prevailing scarcity of phenol and the high world price. But then the price was artificially held at 1s. 6d. from July 1, 1951, to July 1, 1953, although in the meantime, from quite early in 1952, the market situation was changing from a scarcity to a surplus of phenol. This ought to have brought about a reduction in the price. The home consumer then had the more usual complaint of the price being too high. There were vigorous complaints by consumers that, having bought their phenol at the high United Kingdom price, they could not compete in export markets with foreign makers of plastics who had bought their phenol at the lower foreign prices.

As from July 1, 1953, the price was reduced to 1s. 4d. a lb. and has remained at this figure ever since. We do not know whether this price at that time was an economic one, but, if so, the association can claim credit for not having raised the price of phenol in the long period of six-and-a-half years, when prices of many other materials and rates of wages have been raised. On the other hand, there were from time to time complaints from consumers that the home trade price was higher than the export price. Also it is admitted that at the present time the association's price of 1s. 4d. is much higher than the free market price would be if there were no price restriction. That is a further illustration of the inflexibility of the fixed price in the sense that it does not respond at all readily to changes in market conditions. In another sense there are elements of inflexibility in the terms and conditions of sale. For instance, there is the uniform delivered price, which is no doubt administratively convenient for a fixed price system but does mean that a buyer whose premises are within one mile of the seller's works must pay the same price for deliveries as a buyer whose premises are two hundred miles away, and that no price concession can be given to a buyer who is willing to fetch the goods in his own vehicles. Moreover, since the abolition in 1955 of a "Large Consumers' Schedule," no price concession can be made for a long-term or large-scale contract.

Some of the main factors in the market situation can be shown in a table. The figures are in tons.

PHENOL, NATURAL AND SYNTHETIC

Year	U.K. Production	Imports	Home Trade Deliveries from U.K. Producers	Exports
1949	13,000	918	11,393	—
1950	16,601	1,485	15,786	760
1951	19,615	2,223	19,683	180
1952	21,776	2,720	18,189	1,900
1953	23,374	55	16,401	7,800
1954	27,565	681	25,221	2,600
1955	29,341	5	26,246	3,100
1956	34,732	—	28,487	5,111
1957	36,733	—	29,927	7,454
1958	40,879	—	31,116	8,757
1959	45,591	—	36,550	10,373

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1960

Phenol Producers' Agreement, In re.

The estimated production in 1960 is 54,000 tons, the increase being due to the opening of a large new plant for the production of synthetic phenol. The figures in this table are not reliable for measuring fluctuations in trade, because the movements of stocks (whether of pure phenol or of intermediates containing 40 per cent., 60 per cent. or 80 per cent. of phenol) are not shown and may have been important. Nevertheless, the main trends are unmistakeable. First, there is the rapidly and consistently rising production: the production in 1960 is expected to be more than four times the production in 1949. Secondly, imports were an important supplement to the home production when phenol was scarce in 1951 and early 1952, but have since died away. Thirdly, home trade deliveries from United Kingdom producers have risen remarkably, though not quite so much as the production. Lastly, exports have become a large and increasing outlet for the industry's output.

Figures have been given of the domestic prices in the United States of America and West Germany, but they cannot readily be used for purposes of comparison with the association's price because adjustments may be required for differences in the terms and conditions of sale or in the quantities supplied. For instance, a price "delivered" may have to be compared with a price "ex "works," and it is necessary to know whether a foreign price or price range is for a large quantity or a small quantity or a range of quantities. It seems clear that, from late 1952 onwards, American and West German domestic prices have been lower than the association's price, but we cannot say how much lower. It also appears that American and West German prices have been lower in 1959 and 1960 than they were up to the middle of 1958, whereas the association's price has remained fixed.

Again, export prices received by association members are not directly comparable with the association's price, as they are shown in appendices to the agreed statement of facts at "f.o.b. "equivalent in free packages." The weighted average prices per lb. are given as 14·269d. in 1954, 13·218d. in 1955, 13·821d. in 1956, 14·522d. in 1957, 13·680d. in 1958 and 12·618d. in the first nine months of 1959. The association's price, which is the United Kingdom domestic price, is 16d. Owing to the difficulties of comparison, we cannot express a firm opinion as to the position in earlier years, but it seems clear that at any rate after the fall in the average export price in 1958–59 the association price has been substantially above the world price.

Large purchases of synthetic phenol have been made and are being made from producers outside the association at prices below the association price. Such purchases in very large quantities by an oil company's chemical subsidiary were made in the years 1956–59 from one producer outside the association, and are now being made from another. The association's chairman, in his evidence, said that he knew of three other cases of such purchases being made, involving, according to his guess, about 2,000 tons in a year, and that in two of the cases the price was at a 5 per cent. discount from the association price; he did not know what the price was in the third case. Some of the customers concerned were called as witnesses; they were understandably reticent as to the actual prices which they were paying, but their evidence tended to confirm what the association's chairman had said.

The prices of the related products are fixed by associations, which have been described as off-shoots of the Tar Distillers' Association. The prices are for pure ortho-cresol 1s. 2d. a lb., for high ortho-cresol mixture 8½d. to 9½d. a lb., for meta-para-cresol 10½d. to 1s. 2d. a lb., for cresylic acid 7d. to 8d. a lb., for xylenols 6d. to 8½d. a lb., and for high-boiling-point tar acids 5d. to 5½d. a lb. There is no synthetic production of the related products except a very small amount of pure para-cresol. Ortho-cresol has special uses of its own, and its price is independent of the price of phenol except in so far as the customers might expect some reduction in the price of ortho-cresol to be associated with or to follow a reduction in the price of phenol and their expectations might have some influence. There is a surplus rather than a shortage of ortho-cresol. Meta-cresol is partly used as a substitute for phenol, where it is suitable, and also has some special uses of its own. The supply and demand for meta-cresol are in balance. Cresylic acid, which is a mixture of the related products and may have some phenol content, is used in the plastics industry, and can be exported as "American duty-free" to the United States of America, where there is always a market for it. Xylenols are cheap materials, the use of which in the plasticiser industry has been developing; they are in good demand and a shortage can be foreseen. There was not much evidence as to high-boiling-point tar acids, and no special uses for them were mentioned.

Several of the customers, who gave evidence, expressed a preference for a free market for phenol on the ground that with their substantial requirements they would be able to negotiate more favourable prices. One buyer spoke in favour of a stable price, but from further explanation it appeared that he had in mind, as an example of instability, a commodity the price of which fluctuated between £50 and £150 a ton, and that, if the price of phenol were free from restriction and fluctuated between 1s. 1d. and 1s. 3d. a lb., he would regard that as a stable price.

Although the costs of production had never been ascertained for the purpose of fixing the price, determined efforts had been made by the parties' respective accountants, assisted by the chairman of the association, to obtain some figures of costs for the purposes of this case. The attempt to obtain costs of production for natural phenol met great difficulties. No producer had costs relating solely to natural phenol, because that is only one of several products arising from the refining of crude tar acids. Costs have to be apportioned between the products. Moreover, there was a special difficulty in attributing a cost to the crude tar acids, which are the raw material concerned, in that no member pays or receives a real market price for them. Although there are several different arrangements, under each of them the supplier of the tar or crude tar acids receives in one way or another a share of what is realised by the disposal of the refined products. To obtain a notional cost for the crude tar acids use was made of a price formula by means of which the price of tar acids purchased by some of the members is calculated. This formula establishes a price for the raw material by reference to the realised prices of refined products, and it includes an element for the phenol content as well as elements for the "cresol A" and "cresol B" contents. The element included in the formula for the phenol content was taken, for the purposes of the costing in the present case, to represent the cost of crude tar acids attributable to the production of phenol. That may well have been the best that could be done in the circumstances, but the results were inevitably artificial. The members were requested to furnish returns of their costs of production and receipts in respect of natural phenol, and instructions were given as to the use of the price formula for determining the raw material cost and as to the apportionment of costs. Members duly furnished returns, and from them a summary was made by the accountants for the information of the court. The returns, however, had not been checked, and so it was not known what degree of uniformity had been achieved in the interpretation and application of the instructions. It was clear from the evidence of the accountants and other witnesses that the costing figures so obtained for the production of natural phenol were not a reliable foundation for estimating the profits earned. The costs were notional, and, consequently, the apparent profits must be notional. The figures might be useful for comparisons between members, but not for any other purpose. Indeed, Mr. MacKenna, for the association, contended that the figures were valueless. At a later stage of the hearing, the association produced a revised summary showing costs and receipts for the whole process of extracting products from crude tar acids. That avoided some of the difficulties of apportionment, but there was still no market price for the crude tar acids and the formula still had to be used. The figures appear to show a satisfactory, or even a high, rate of profit on turnover for the leaders of the industry, but, having regard to the difficulties that have been mentioned, we consider that no firm conclusion can be reached as to the degree of profitability of the production of natural phenol, and we cannot assess the extent of the return on capital employed.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1960

Phenol Producers' Agreement, In re.

The returns and the summary relating to the costs and receipts in respect of the production of phenol included figures for the production of synthetic phenol by one of the member companies. In contrast to the generally shared misgivings about the figures for natural phenol, it was contended on behalf of the association that the figures for this company's production of synthetic phenol were reliable, and were indeed the only figures showing real costs of production. Certainly these figures were inherently more realistic, as the actual cost of the raw materials used could be given, and there was a separate plant producing only phenol and one by-product, so that no elaborate or difficult apportionment would be required. There was, however, not enough information to enable firm conclusions to be reached with regard to the costs and profits of this company producing synthetic phenol. No representative of this company gave evidence, and we had no evidence as to whether the year 1957, for which the figures were given, was a normal year in respect of production and costs, or whether it could be adopted as indicative of present conditions in synthetic production, or as to the proportion of working capacity employed in that year. Moreover, the figures were prepared in accordance with the special instructions given for the purposes of this case with a view to comparison with the figures for natural phenol production, and most probably differed from the company's normal costings.

In our view, there are four main features of the association's price-fixing scheme:

(1) The fixed price is substantially above the level at which the price would tend to settle, or round which it would tend to fluctuate, if it were freed from restrictions and left to be determined by the interplay of supply and demand in competitive conditions.

(2) The price fixed by the association from time to time is not and never has been based upon or related to or limited by any figures of costs of production, and the fixing of the price is left entirely to the unfettered discretion and decision of the members of the association without regard to any formula.

(3) The policy of the association in their price fixing has been and still is to "charge what the traffic will bear." As sellers they have to pay some regard to the interests of their customers, because they would spoil their own market if their prices were so high as to damage the customers' businesses. Their dominant object, however, is to obtain a good return for themselves and for their suppliers associated with them in co-operative schemes. This is a producers' price scheme, operated with some degree of caution, but, predominantly, in the interests of the producers.

(4) There is the usual rigidity of a price-fixing scheme. The customer cannot negotiate for any preferential terms or concessions to assist him in his export trade, or in recognition of the proximity of his premises to the sellers' works, or to reward him for fetching the goods in his own vehicles, or even in consideration of a long-term or large-scale purchase contract. The price with its concomitant terms and conditions is as fixed by the association, and the customer must agree to pay it or do without the goods. Moreover, the fixed price tends to remain unchanged at times when the price in a free market would be changing in response to changes in the relation between supply and demand.

R. P. Ct.
(E. & W.)

1960

Phenol Producers' Agreement, In re.

Rigidity is quite usual and perhaps unavoidable in a price-fixing scheme, but it must nevertheless be reckoned as one of the prominent features of this scheme.

Prima facie all those four main features of the scheme are not benefits or advantages but detriments to the public as purchasers, consumers or users of any goods (including phenol and goods partly made from phenol and any other relevant goods), and the removal of the restrictions by which the scheme having those features would be brought to an end would not deny to that public any benefit or advantage but would relieve them of detriments.

Thus the association, in the present case, in addition to bearing the ordinary burden of proof which rests upon respondents under section 21 of the Act of 1956, start with the handicap imposed by the obvious and prominent features of the scheme. In order to bring the scheme within paragraph (b) of subsection (1) of section 21 of the Act (which is the first step and must be accomplished before the balancing provision at the end of the subsection is reached) they must present and prove some special aspects or features of the scheme or of its results and effects, by virtue of which it could be said that the removal of the restrictions inherent in the fixed price scheme would deny specific and substantial benefits or advantages to the public as purchasers, consumers or users of any goods.

The association have responded to the challenge by presenting an elaborate and carefully prepared case in support of a number of contentions. The first of these contentions, as outlined by Mr. MacKenna in his opening speech and developed in the evidence, is by far the most important and received the most attention throughout the hearing and needs to be considered in some detail. For convenience, the argument for this contention will be divided into separate steps, so that each step may be considered in turn.

(a) It is alleged that there is now for the time being an excess of supply over demand and the probability is that this excess will increase in the near future and persist for a period of about five years, while demand is gradually overtaking supply, but after that there will be a shortage of supply in relation to demand.

(b) It is alleged that the removal of the fixed-price restrictions would cause (i) a fall in the price of phenol of about 25 per cent., from 1s. 4d. a lb. to about 1s. a lb., and (ii) a fall of about the same magnitude, about 25 per cent., in the price of each of the related products.

(c) It is alleged that those falls in the prices of phenol and the related products would so reduce the revenue accruing to the coal tar producers from the distillation of tar and the refining of the tar acids that they would be able to obtain greater financial advantages by using the tar as fuel or selling it for use as fuel; and, consequently, within three or four years a large proportion, estimated at 50 per cent., of the tar would be diverted from the distilleries to the more profitable use or sale of it as fuel (shortly stated, from distillation to burning); and the result would be that some of the distilleries and refineries would have to be closed down; and it would not be feasible to reopen them on a subsequent rise in the prices of phenol and the related products.

(d) It is alleged that, in consequence of such diversion of the tar and closing down of distilleries and refineries, the products of tar distillation and tar acid refining, for which there are no alternative sources or none so cheap, would to a large extent be permanently lost; and so there would be denied to the public as purchasers, consumers or users the benefit of having those products and goods made from those products.

These allegations will now be considered in the same order.

(a) It may well be that there is, at present, an excess of supply over the demand for phenol in the home market at present prices, and that such excess recently has been, and perhaps for a time will continue to be, increased by the development of the production of synthetic phenol by the Cumene process, which will more than offset some fall in the production of natural phenol. In our view, however, it is wrong to leave out of account, in this connection, the fixed price; lower prices can generate new uses and new demand. Equally it is wrong to leave out of account the export market, which is an important outlet for the products of the British phenol industry. No evidence, or no sufficient evidence, has been given of any worldwide over-supply of phenol, nor of any difficulty in disposing of British-made phenol in the export market at the prices prevailing abroad. There has been a remarkable expansion both in the deliveries to the home trade and in exports: deliveries to the home trade rose steadily from 25,221 tons in 1954 to 31,116 tons in 1958 and then jumped to 36,550 tons in 1959, exports rose steadily from 2,600 tons in 1954 to 10,373 tons in 1959—at least one company was running down its stocks in 1958 and 1959. There is no evidence of excess of supply over total demand, when the demand for exports as well as the home demand is taken into account. Even if the export demand is excluded, the rapid expansion of the British plastics industry, in particular, precludes any reliable estimate of the period which must elapse before the home trade demand overtakes, or reaches the amount of, the present supply. Moreover, it cannot be assumed that the supply will remain stationary throughout that period: it may be expanded by an enlargement of the synthetic production in reasonable anticipation of the still further demand and, if so, the anticipated shortage of supply in relation to demand some years hence will not occur.

(b) (i) It is common ground between the parties, and accepted by the court, that after the supposed removal of the association's price restrictions there will be a substantial fall in the price of phenol. The extent of the expected fall of the price, and the extent to which this should be attributed to the supposed removal of the restrictions, are not agreed and cannot be determined with certainty, but there are some points which seem fairly clear. In view of the market situation, which has been described above, we think that, if the price restriction scheme remained in force, the association would not be able to hold the price indefinitely at 1s. 4d. a lb. and would have to make some reduction, though not necessarily a large one. Accordingly, that amount of reduction, as it would have occurred in any case, is not attributable to the supposed removal of the restrictions. Next, we think that the lower limit—the "floor" as it is sometimes called—for the new home trade price level is likely to be somewhat higher than the level of export prices, because, on the one hand, the home trade price has tariff protection, and, on the other hand, the export price f.o.b. at the British port has to be low enough to compete with the foreign domestic price after bearing the cost of freight, insurance, additional land transport, agents' charges and perhaps an import duty. Thirdly, the home trade price is likely to be influenced to a considerable extent by important factors on which there is hardly any evidence before the court, namely, the costs of production and price policies of the large producers of synthetic phenol who are outside the association. It seems unlikely that the fall in the price of phenol, at any rate in so far as it would be caused by the removal of the price restrictions, would be as much as 4d. a lb., but we cannot make any definite forecast on this point.

(b) (ii) Be it supposed, however, that the removal of the restrictions on the price of phenol would cause it to fall by 25 per cent. Would it also cause a 25 per cent. fall in the prices of the related products? In our view, there is only a speculative possibility, and not a probability, that this would happen. It is possible that the association or associations controlling the prices would simply make an all-round reduction of 25 per cent. It is more likely, however, that in relation to each particular product they would have regard to the market factors affecting that product. Reference has already been made to the relevant market factors, including the scarcity and low price range of xylenols, the special export demand for cresylic acid under the guise of "American duty free," the special uses of ortho-cresol, some use of meta-cresol otherwise than as a substitute for phenol, the absence of any substantial synthetic production of any of these related products, and the prospect of some diminution of the supply. It cannot be found from the evidence that removal of restrictions on the price of phenol would bring about an all-round or average reduction of or in the region of 25 per cent. in the prices of the related products.

(c) Consideration of the next step in the argument requires assumptions to be made (although in our view they are improbable) that removal of the association's restrictions on the price of phenol would cause a 25 per cent. fall in the price of phenol and an all-round or average 25 per cent. fall in the prices of the related products. Would these assumed price falls cause the tar producers to divert a large proportion of the tar from distillation to burning? There are important differences between the two main classes of tar producers, namely, the steel companies operating coke ovens in or in connection with their steel works and the gas boards operating their gas works. The steel companies are for general reasons more likely to make the diversion, because tar is a good fuel for giving radiant heat in open hearth furnaces and in many cases the coke ovens are situated near the furnaces, and some of the steel companies are already burning tar. These companies, eight in number, already burn nearly the whole of their crude tar production and are responsible for nearly the whole of the amount of the crude tar now burnt. On the other hand, phenol and its related products form only a small proportion of the products of coke oven tar, so that the supposed fall in their prices would have only a small effect on the revenue resulting from the distillation of coke oven tar. Moreover, any fall in the revenue from phenol and its related products would be offset, to some extent at any rate, by improved revenue from naphthalene, which is an important product of coke oven tar, is scarce throughout the world, is in general demand and has a rising price trend. In the absence of direct evidence on the point, it cannot be found that the supposed fall in the prices of phenol and its related products would have any significant effect on the policies of the steel companies as to the use or disposal of their coke oven tar. No witness was called from any of the steel companies to give evidence on this point. The position of the gas boards is different. The carbonisation process in their continuous vertical retorts produces tar containing a comparatively large proportion of phenol and its related products and a comparatively small proportion of naphthalene. The revenue derived from the tar is in one way or another directly dependent on the revenue realised from the products obtained by distilling the tar and refining the tar acids. At least one gas board carries on its own distilling and refining operations for a proportion of its tar; others have long-term co-operative schemes, under which the preponderant share of the net realisation comes to them, and there are cases in which the tar acids are sold to refineries at a price ascertained by the use of a formula based on realisation. The revenues of the gas boards from this source would be reduced by the supposed falls in the prices of phenol and its related products. Would they be induced to divert their tar from distillation to burning? It might not be easy to find a market. So far the sales of tar as fuel have been on a very small scale, and the market for it on a large scale is untested. There were conflicting expert opinions as to the suitability of tar (not dehydrated) for use as fuel, and as to the price which tar as fuel would be likely to fetch now or in the future in competition with heavy fuel oil. It is uncertain whether the return from tar as fuel would be greater than the return from tar as a raw material for production of chemicals. If it were, the distilling and refining companies might be willing to accept a reduced share of the realisation and thereby increase to some extent the returns to the gas boards. The gas boards have a considerable stake or vested interest in the tar distilleries and tar acid refineries, partly by direct ownership, partly through the long-term co-operative schemes and partly by shareholdings. So long as the distilleries and refineries remain in existence and in operation the gas boards have a sure outlet for their tar. But suppose that a large part of the tar were diverted to the fuel market, and consequently some of the distilleries and refineries were closed down; then the gas boards would have to depend on the fuel market for disposal of much of their tar and would be in competition with the suppliers of oil and coal and any other fuel that may be developed. A cautious attitude on the part of the gas boards would not be surprising. We have the evidence of the chairman of the Eastern Area Gas Board which is exactly on the point. He estimated the loss of revenue to his gas board from the supposed fall in the prices of phenol and the related products, and he said that this loss of revenue would not be sufficient to induce his gas board to divert their tar from distillation to burning. There was no evidence to show how any other gas board would be affected. We accept his evidence, and, in our view, his evidence, taken in conjunction with the other matters which have been mentioned, makes it impossible for the association to establish the third step in their argument, even if they had successfully accomplished the first two steps.

R. P. Ct. (E. & W.)

1960

Phenol Producers' Agreement, In re.

(d) Consideration of the fourth step would have raised complex and far-reaching questions, on which it is not now necessary to express opinions.

The association have a second main contention, which was stated by Mr. MacKenna in his opening speech for the association in these terms: "Secondly, we say that our system of price "control when demand exceeds supply operates to keep prices "down, and that the result of the stability of price at that lower "level is for the benefit of the public. We say that if, as a "result of our arrangement being determined, the production of "natural phenol is reduced, sooner or later the increasing demand "for phenol will overtake the diminished supply, and the price "of phenol, uncontrolled, is likely to be higher than would other-"wise be the case."

To a large extent the points involved in this contention have already been dealt with. The present effect of the association's price fixing is admittedly to keep the price of phenol at an artificially high level—higher than the price would be in free market conditions. It is not clear that the association's price fixing has normally had a different effect in the past, and there is no guarantee that it would normally have a different effect in the future. In In re Wholesale and Retail Bakers of Scotland Association's Agreement [1] this court said: "It is not stabilisation of "price by itself alone which is a benefit or advantage; it can only

[1] (1959 L.R. 1 R.P. 347, 376; [1959] 1 W.L.R. 1094; [1959] 3 All E.R. 98.

"be stabilisation at the right level; it is difficult to envisage "circumstances in which stabilisation at an excessive price level "could be held to confer benefit on the consumer. We reaffirm "the view already expressed by this court in In re Yarn Spinners' "Agreement[2] that, as a general rule, price stabilisation as an "alternative to a free market is not a benefit to the consuming "public. Stabilisation does not appear to us to be necessarily a "virtue." In our view, as stated above, the rigidity of the fixed price and its ancillary terms and conditions is a disadvantage to the purchasers. The estimate of an increasing demand overtaking the diminished supply and causing a scarcity is not accepted, because the synthetic production of phenol can be expanded to meet or anticipate further increase in the demand.

The association have a third main contention, which was stated in these terms: "Thirdly, we say that our system of price "control has ensured the increase of the supply of phenol to meet "an erratically increasing demand, and that the continuance of "our system gives the best security that the future supply of "phenol will be in line with the future demand."

In our view, that is claiming too much for the effect of the price-fixing scheme. The effective reason for the increase in supply has been the rapid and on the whole steady increase in the demand for phenol, especially from the growing plastics industry. Two of the large synthetic producers are outside the association and making at any rate some sales below the fixed price. Their decisions as to expanding their production of synthetic phenol are likely to be governed by their forecasts of the future demand rather than by the continuance or cessation of the association's price-fixing scheme.

Other contentions were set out in the association's statement of case and were referred to and relied upon in Mr. MacKenna's opening speech. These have been taken into account.

We have come to the conclusion that the association have failed to prove their case under section 21 (1) (b) of the Act of 1956. Accordingly, there will be a declaration under section 20 that the restrictions are contrary to the public interest. The parties will no doubt wish to discuss and if possible to agree the exact form of the declaration and any further order that may be required, and there is liberty to apply.

Declaration accordingly.

Solicitors: March, Pearson & Green, Manchester; Treasury Solicitor.

N. P.

[2] (1959) L.R. 1 R.P. 118, 188, 189; [1959] 1 W.L.R. 154; [1959] 1 All E.R. 299.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

1959
Nov. 27.

Marshall J.

* PACHNER v. PARKER (FORMERLY PACHNER).

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Divorce—Time bar—Application several years after decree—No prayer for maintenance in petition—Effect of new rules and legislation between decree and application—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (14 Geo. 6, c. 25), ss. 19 (3), 29 —Matrimonial Causes (Property and Maintenance) Act, 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 35), s. 1—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957 (S.I. 1957, No. 619), rr. 3 (3) proviso (ii), 44 (1) (as amended by Matrimonial Causes (Amendment) Rules, 1958 (S.I. 1958, No. 208), r. 12).

A wife presented a petition for divorce in June, 1949, in which no prayer for ancillary relief was included. She was granted a decree nisi in October, 1949, which was made absolute in November, 1949, in an undefended suit. She made no application for maintenance until February, 1959, when she filed and served the appropriate notice. At the time when her decree was made absolute it was provided by rule 44 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, that "no application for maintenance shall be made later than two "months after final decree except by leave." That proviso, which was repeated in rule 44 of the rules of 1950 and 1957, was omitted by the amendment rules of 1958 as from January 1, 1959, following upon the Matrimonial Causes (Property and Maintenance) Act, 1958, s. 1.[1]

[1] Matrimonial Causes (Property and Maintenance) Act, 1958, s. 1: "(1) Any power of the court, under "the enactments mentioned in the "next following subsection, to make "an order on a decree for divorce, "nullity of marriage or judicial "separation shall (subject as mentioned in subsection (3) of this "section) be exercisable either on pronouncing such a decree or at any "time thereafter. (2) The said enactments are the following provisions "of the Matrimonial Causes Act, "1950 (in this Act referred to as 'the "'Act of 1950') that is to say,—(a) "subsections (2) and (3) of section 19 ". . . and those subsections as "extended by subsection (4) of that "section . . . (b) subsection (3) of "section 26 . . . and (c) subsection "(2) of section 20 . . . and that subsection as extended by subsection "(3) of that section . . . (3) In relation "to the provisions of the Act of 1950 "specified in paragraphs (a) and (b) "of the last preceding subsection,— "(a) any reference in subsection (1) "of this section to a decree shall be "construed as a reference to a decree "nisi, and the reference to any time "after a decree shall be construed as "a reference to any such time whether "before or after the decree has been "made absolute; but (b) nothing in "subsection (1) of this section shall "be construed as affecting the provisions of section 29 of the Act of "1950 as to the commencement of "proceedings for an order under the "provisions specified in those paragraphs or as to the making or effect "of such an order. (4) In accordance "with the preceding provisions of "this section, the provisions of the "Act of 1950 specified in the Schedule "to this Act shall have effect subject "to the amendments specified in that "Schedule. (5) Nothing in this section, or in any amendment made by "this section in any of the enactments referred to therein, shall be "construed as requiring the court, in "determining any application for an "order under any of those enactments, to disregard any delay in "making or proceeding with the "application."

"In section 19 (2) [which relates "to a secured provision], for the words "'On any decree for divorce or nullity "'of marriage' there shall be substituted the words 'Subject to the pro-"'visions of section 29 of this Act, "'[which relates to the commence-"'ment of proceedings under sections "'19, 24, 25 or 26 (3) of the Act], "'on pronouncing a decree nisi for "'divorce or nullity of marriage or at "'any time thereafter, whether before

Under rule 3 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes, Rules, 1957,[2] however, it became necessary for a claim for maintenance to be made in the petition (or in an answer where relief was claimed), although it was provided that a judge might give leave for an application for ancillary relief, which should have been made in the petition or answer, to be made later.

The registrar held that in view of section 1 of the Act of 1958 the wife was under no obligation to obtain leave to file her application for maintenance, notwithstanding the time which had elapsed since decree absolute. The husband appealed:—

Held, that the rules to be applied were those of 1957, they being the only rules in operation at the time that the wife made her application; and although the long delay did not of necessity debar her from proceeding, the wife could only do so with the leave of a judge in accordance with the proviso to rule 3 (3) of the rules of 1957.

SUMMONS adjourned into court.

The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment: The parties were married at the Town Hall, Prague, on July 10, 1935. At the time both were nationals of and domiciled in Czechoslovakia. They were both educated people. The wife was 25 and single, and was an actress and a member of the Svando Theatre. The husband was 28, a widower, and a partner in a chemical firm in Prague. The court was satisfied upon the evidence that on September 2, 1937, after living together for a little over two years, the wife filed in the Civil District Court of Prague a petition for a decree of separation of bed and board in respect of the marriage of July 10, 1935, based on the guilt of both parties. Her petition set out her case, inter alia, in the following terms: "We are both Czechoslovak citizens. Our "marriage was at first happy, later on, however, a deep disrup- "tion of matrimonial relations arose, for which reason we cannot "in fairness be expected to continue married life together. The "disruption is not due to predominant guilt of either party. "The respondent has rudely insulted my honour on several "occasions and used terms of abuse against me, the mildest of "which were 'silly goose,' 'you immoral, dissolute woman' and "the like. He did not have any friendly word for me in the "course of our past life together and in the course of time

"'or after the decree has been made "'absolute'; and in subsection (3) "[which relates to monthly or weekly "sums for maintenance], for the "words 'On any decree for divorce or "'nullity of marriage,' there shall be "substituted the words 'Subject to "'the provisions of the said section 29, "'on pronouncing a decree nisi for "'divorce or nullity of marriage or at "'any time thereafter, whether before "'or after the decree has been made "'absolute.'" [The Schedule also amends sections 20 (2) and 26 (3).]

[2] Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957, r. 3: "(3) Every application for an- "cillary relief, being an application ". . . (c) for the payment, on a "decree for divorce or nullity of mar- "riage, of monthly or weekly sums by "the husband for the maintenance and "support of his wife . . . shall be "made in the petition or, where an "answer claiming relief is filed, in "the answer: Provided that . . . (ii) a "judge may give leave for ancillary "relief which should have been made "in the petition or answer to be made "subsequently . . ."

1959

PACHNER
v.
PARKER.

"complete mutual estrangement and coldness has arisen, for "which reason there is no solution other than a separation. Our "mutual property position also contributes to the disagreement, "and I have reached the conviction that with so deep a disrup-"tion no improvement can be expected."

After hearing the parties, the Civil District Court of Prague by a final judgment granted a separation from bed and board in respect of the marriage by reason of the guilt of both parties. In accordance with the law of Czechoslovakia, the husband applied to the Civil District Court of Prague for a decree of divorce; and on January 19, 1938, the same court pronounced a final decree of divorce in respect of the marriage of July 10, 1935, which became absolute on March 2, 1938. Such final decree of divorce would not have become absolute on March 2, 1938, unless and until the court had been satisfied that a copy of a decree of divorce had been served upon the wife.

At the time of these proceedings the husband was living in Prague, Czechoslovakia, which was then his permanent home; and both he and the wife had retained their Czech nationality. Both were Jews, and as a result of political developments in Czechoslovakia, and later the outbreak of war, the wife came to England some time in 1939. The husband, who was then in the Czechoslovak Forces in England, joined the wife in 1940. They resumed cohabitation; and by representing to the Czechoslovak Army authorities that no final decree of divorce had been obtained, but only a separation order, the husband obtained a marriage allowance in respect of the wife during his period of service in the forces. They continued to live together until April, 1948, when the husband left the matrimonial home in London.

On June 15, 1949, the wife filed a petition for the dissolution of her marriage of July 10, 1935, in Prague on the ground of the husband's adultery; her petition contained no claim for maintenance. The husband signed an acknowledgment of service, but entered no appearance and filed no answer. When interviewed in July, 1949, by an inquiry agent, he made a written confession as to his adultery and added the words: "I have no intention of "returning to live with my wife." On October 10, 1949, Mr. Commissioner Grazebrook, K.C., after hearing evidence from a Czechoslovakian lawyer, the petitioner wife and an inquiry agent, pronounced a decree nisi. During her evidence the wife swore that the marriage was happy down to 1945. She made no reference to any proceedings in Prague whether for a separation or for a decree of divorce.[3] The decree was made absolute on November 24, 1949.

On February 26, 1959, the wife filed a notice of application for ancillary relief seeking "such weekly or monthly sum as may [3] Reporter's Note: In Tursi v. Tursi [1958] P. 54, 70, Sachs J. supported the suggestion of the Queen's Proctor that the disclosure of proceedings before a foreign court should be made obligatory under rule. 4.

"be just by way of maintenance." On May 20, 1959, she filed an affidavit praying for "leave to file an application for maintenance notwithstanding the fact that the time for so doing has expired." Mr. Registrar Forbes in his report stated that: "At the time when the decree absolute was pronounced the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, were in operation, and rule 44 (1) thereof, which was then applicable, provided that 'no application for maintenance shall be made later than two months after final decree except by leave.' Having regard, however, to section 1 of the Matrimonial Causes (Property and Maintenance) Act, 1958, I did not consider that the wife was now under any obligation to obtain leave to file her present application for maintenance out of time."

[The registrar also dealt with a submission on behalf of the husband that the decree pronounced by the English court was a nullity, in view of the proceedings in Prague, and that the court, accordingly, had no jurisdiction to make any order for maintenance; and held that while it would be exceeding the powers exercisable by a registrar on an application for ancillary relief to hold that an English decree absolute was a nullity, whatever the husband's evidence might be, he was in fact estopped from asserting that the English decree was a nullity.]

The husband appealed.

For reasons appearing at the end of the judgment, the case is reported only upon the question of obtaining leave to make the application for maintenance.

S. Goldblatt for the husband.

A. B. Ewbank for the wife.

No cases were cited in argument relevant to the subject-matter of the report.

Cur. adv. vult.

MARSHALL J., after stating that he was in considerable sympathy with the view of the registrar that a registrar would be exceeding his powers were he to hold an English decree absolute a nullity, stated the facts and continued: The delay of between nine and ten years between November 24, 1949, the date of the decree absolute, and February 26, 1959, when the first claim for ancillary relief by way of maintenance was made, has given rise to a difficult legal problem.

The decree was made absolute when the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, was in operation and the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, were in force. The Act of 1937 was repealed by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, which came into operation on January 1, 1951. The Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, were replaced by other Matrimonial Causes Rules, and at the time that the claim for ancillary relief by way of maintenance was first made

1959

PACHNER
v.
PARKER.

Marshall J.

the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957 (as amended), were in operation.

Under rule 3 (2) of the 1947 Rules every application in a matrimonial cause for ancillary relief had to be made by notice in accordance with Form 2 issued out of the divorce registry; and although by rule 4 (2) a wife petitioner could include in her petition a claim for maintenance, she was under no obligation to do so. By rule 44 (1) of those rules, if no prayer for maintenance had been included in the petition, no application for maintenance could be made later than two months after the final decree except by leave.

Under the 1957 Rules, which came into operation on April 30, 1957, and which have been amended by the Matrimonial Causes (Amendment) Rules, 1958, the position with regard to claims for maintenance changed materially. (The Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1947, had been repealed by the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950, which came into operation on January 1, 1951.[1])

By rule 3 (3) of the 1957 Rules every application for ancillary relief being an application for the payment, on a decree for divorce, of maintenance has to be made in the petition, subject to the proviso that a judge may give leave for an application for ancillary relief, which should have been made in the petition, to be made subsequently, either by notice in accordance with Form 2 issued out of the divorce registry, or at the trial.

It will be seen that under both the 1947 and the 1957 Rules, whichever applied, leave whether by a registrar under the 1947 Rules, or by a judge under the 1957 Rules, would be required before this application for maintenance could proceed.

Mr. Registrar Forbes has, however, held, that by reason of section 1 of the Matrimonial Causes (Property and Maintenance) Act, 1958, the wife was not now under any obligation to obtain leave to file her present application for maintenance out of time.

[His Lordship read the section and continued:] As amended by section 1 of the Act of 1958, and by the Schedule to that Act, section 19 (3) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, in its relevant parts now reads as follows: "Subject to the provisions of section "29 [of this Act], on pronouncing a decree nisi for divorce or "nullity of marriage, or at any time thereafter, whether before "or after the decree has been made absolute, the court may, if it "thinks fit, by order direct the husband to pay to the wife, during "their joint lives, such monthly or weekly sum for the main-"tenance and support of the wife as the court may think "reasonable . . ."

Finally, the relevant part of section 29 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, is in the following terms: "When a petition "for divorce or nullity of marriage has been presented, proceed-"ings under section 19 . . . may, subject to and in accordance

[1] The material parts of rules 3 (2) and 4 (2) were not altered by the 1950 Rules.

"with rules of court, be commenced at any time after the pre"sentation of the petition."

Having considered the circumstances of the present application for maintenance of the petitioner wife I have come to the following conclusions:

(1) Having delayed making her application until February 26, 1959, the relevant provisions under which it must now be decided are sections 19 and 29 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, as amended by section 1 of the Matrimonial Causes (Property and Maintenance) Act, 1958.

(2) The rules to be applied are the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957, as amended, they being the only rules in operation at the time of making her application.

(3) Although the long delay in making her application does not of necessity debar her from proceeding, she can only do so with the leave of a judge sought by way of summons in accordance with rule 3 (3) proviso (ii) of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957. I have not overlooked rule 83 of the 1957 Rules,[2] for, in my judgment, apart from the fact that that rule does not assist and apply in this case, as the proceedings were started after these rules came into operation, they also cannot override the provisions of the section of the Act of Parliament to which I have referred.

Having regard to this conclusion it would not be appropriate for me in these proceedings to deal with the other two points raised on this appeal. They may well have to be considered if and when leave of a judge to proceed is sought hereafter.

The husband's appeal from the decision of Mr. Registrar Forbes, dated October 12, 1959, is accordingly allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: A. Oldschool & Co.; R. H. Marcus, the Law Society, Divorce Department.

J. B. G.

[2] Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1957, r. 83: "Rules 55 and 56 [which "relate to injunctions restraining "removal of children and to separate "representation of children] shall "apply to proceedings commenced "before these rules come into opera-"tion but, save as aforesaid, these "rules shall not apply to any such "proceedings, to which the rules in "force immediately before the com-"mencement of these rules shall con-"tinue to apply."

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

* In the Estate of COCKE, DECD.

1960
Feb. 10.

Lloyd-Jones J.

Will—Dependent relative revocation—Two wills—First will followed by subsequent will containing revocation clause and inchoate clause referring to residue—Both wills treated as composite document.

[Reported by D. R. ELLISON, Esq., Barrister-a-Law.]

1960

COCKE, DECD., In the Estate of.

The testatrix duly executed a will appointing C. to be her executor and, after certain bequests and legacies, leaving the residue of her estate to C. absolutely. Later, the testatrix duly executed a second will, revoking all previous wills, again appointing C. to be her executor and, after certain bequests and legacies, which were different from those in the first will, containing a clause which was left inchoate in such a way as to leave the residue undisposed of:—

Held, that the second will, omitting the revocation clause, and the first will, omitting those clauses which were inconsistent with the provisions of the second will, should both be admitted to probate as together constituting the true last will of the testatrix.

MOTION.

The testatrix executed a will on November 28, 1956, by which she appointed the applicant to be her executor (clause 1), made certain bequests to the applicant (clause 3), left certain legacies to other persons (clause 4), and left the residue of her estate to the applicant absolutely (clause 5). The will contained a solicitors' charging clause (clause 6) and was deposited at the testatrix's bank, where it remained until after her death. In June, 1958, the testatrix was supplied with a completed copy of that will. This copy will was found amongst the testatrix's papers after her death. It had been altered in the handwriting of the testatrix.

On September 22, 1958, the testatrix duly executed a second will. It was apparent that the completed copy of the first will had been used by the testatrix as a draft for the will of September 22, 1958, which was wholly in the testatrix's handwriting. By this second will, the testatrix revoked all previous wills (clause 1), appointed the applicant to be her executor and trustee (clause 2), made certain specific bequests to him (clause 3) and gave certain legacies (clause 4). The legacies contained in this will differed, both in amount and in the identity of the legatees, from the previous will. The testatrix dealt with the residue of her estate in a clause which ran thus: "(5) I devise and bequest the whole "of the residue of my estate both real and personal unto my "trustee upon trust to sell call in and convert the same into "money with power to postpone the sale calling in and conversion "thereof for so long as my trustee shall in his or her absolute "discretion, and after payment of my debts and funeral "expenses." The charging clause in the previous will was omitted. The testatrix died on February 9, 1959, leaving no known next-of-kin and an estate of the approximate value of £8,000. The applicant moved the court for a grant of probate of both wills, with the omission of clauses 3, 4 and 6 of the will of November 28, 1956, and of clause 1 of the will of September 22, 1958.

R. J. A. Temple Q.C. and A. J. Balcombe for the applicant. This is a case of dependent relative revocation. The revocation clause in the second will was inserted because the testatrix thought she had completed the disposition of her estate. Since she was mistaken in this, the revocation clause is of no effect, and should be omitted from the last will: In the Goods of Hope Brown.[1] From this it follows that the first will (not revoked) and the second will (excluding the revocation clause) together constituted the true last will, both documents having been validly executed. The next step is to consider whether any part of the first will ought to be omitted, in order that effect might be given to the undoubted testamentary intentions of the testatrix. On the facts, it is plain that the testatrix herself copied from a completed draft of the first will, when writing out the second will. Clauses 3 and 4 of the first will were reproduced, with variations, in the second will; clause 6 of the first will was omitted from the second will; clause 5 of the second will was left incomplete, in a way which left the beneficial interest in the residue of the estate undisposed of. Clause 5 of the first will ought to stand, because it was in the belief that this clause was wholly reproduced in the second will, and that the residue was thereby disposed of, that the testatrix purported to revoke the first will. Clauses 3, 4 and 6 of the first will ought to be omitted; clauses 3 and 4 of the second will were complete in form but different in content from clauses 3 and 4 of the first will, and clause 6 of the first will was not to be found in the second will. Reliance is placed on Garnett-Botfield v. Garnett-Botfield[2] and In the Goods of Irvine.[3] The present case was envisaged by Sir F. H. Jeune P. in Garnett-Botfield v. Garnett-Botfield when he said[4]: "I can conceive that, in "the future, the court may be called upon to consider very care-"fully whether in certain circumstances a revocation clause may be "so dealt with as to make of an earlier and later will a composite "document; and although this may appear very like a suggestion "that a new will might be made for a testator, the true state of "facts may possibly be that you cannot get at and give effect to "the real wishes of a testator without putting two documents "together."

C. Trevor Reeve, for the Treasury Solicitor, did not oppose the motion. He referred to an article in the Law Quarterly Review, vol. 71, p. 374, by Prof. F. H. Newark entitled "Dependent "Relative Revocation," and to an unreported Northern Ireland case in 1952, In the Goods of Agnes Evans, in which the testatrix, by her first will, left small pecuniary legacies and the residue to an institution for the blind. By a second will executed two days later she varied the pecuniary legacies and left the residue to her solicitor for his own use. There being no independent advice, the gift of the residue failed, and the court held that the provisions of the later will relating to revocation could not be admitted to probate, these provisions being conditional upon the validity of the provision for the disposition of the residue of the estate.

[1] [1942] P. 136.
[2] [1901] P. 335.
[3] [1919] 2 Ir.R. 485.
[4] [1901] P. 335, 344.

1960

COCKE, DECD., In the Estate of.

LLOYD-JONES J. ordered that the will dated September 22, 1958, with the omission of clause 1, be admitted to probate, and that the will dated November 28, 1956, with the omission of clauses 3, 4 and 6, be also admitted to probate, both wills together constituting the true testamentary dispositions of the testatrix. The Treasury Solicitor's costs were ordered to be paid out of the estate.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Oldschool, Cutner & Co.; Treasury Solicitor.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

1960 April 14.

* PRACTICE DIRECTION (APPEARANCE).

Practice — Appearance — Post, by — Modified form of writ — R.S.C., Ord. 12, r. 8 (as amended by R.S.C. (No. 1) 1960, (S.I. 1960, No. 545), r. 1).

As from May 2, 1960, when R.S.C. (No. 1) 1960 comes into force, defendants' solicitors as well as defendants personally will be able to enter appearance by post.

In consequence of this new rule the masters of the Queen's Bench Division have prescribed modified forms of writs for use in London and also in district registries. These modifications refer to appearances by defendants mentioned in the footnotes on the writs and, in substance, are as follows:

"MEMORANDUM ON LONDON WRITS.

"The defendant may enter appearance personally or by solicitor either by handing in the appropriate forms, duly completed, at the Central Office, Royal Courts of Justice, London, or by sending them to that office by post. The appropriate forms may be obtained by sending a postal order for 10d. with an addressed envelope, foolscap size, to the Controller of Stamps, Royal Courts of Justice, London.

"MEMORANDUM ON DISTRICT REGISTRY WRIT.

"A defendant who resides or carries on business within the above-named district must enter appearance either personally or by solicitor by handing in the appropriate forms, duly completed, at the office of the district registrar, or by sending them to that office by post.

"A defendant who neither resides nor carries on business within the above-named district may enter appearance personally or by solicitor either

"(1) by handing in the appropriate forms, duly completed, at "the office of the district registrar or by sending them to "that office by post, or

"(2) by handing in the said forms, duly completed, at the "Central Office, Royal Courts of Justice, London, or by "sending them to that office by post.

"If a defendant enters an appearance in London personally "or by solicitor there must be endorsed on the memorandum of "appearance and on the copy thereof (1) the name of the district "registry, (2) a statement that the defendant neither resides nor "carries on business within the district of the district registry, and "(3) the name of the plaintiff or his solicitor and his address for "service."

There will be no fixed date for bringing these new forms into use—the existing forms may still be used until the supply is exhausted. It is for this reason in particular that the attention of solicitors is drawn to this new method of appearance so that they may insure that the appropriate forms are filled up properly; as failure to do so may cause the memorandum of appearance to be rejected, and before any corrections can be made in it the plaintiff may have signed judgment in default.

WILLIAM H. REDMAN,
Secretary to the Masters of the Queen's Bench Division.

April 14, 1960.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

* In the Estate of LITTLE, DECD.

1959
Dec. 16.

Sachs J.

Will—Execution—Will consisting of several sheets—Duly executed while pressed together by hand of deceased—Subsequent holograph additions inserted above signature—Testamentary intention—Wills Act, 1837 (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26), s. 9—Wills Act Amendment Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 24), s. 1.

A draft will consisting of four sheets of paper and a back sheet, all stapled together, were sent to the deceased by his solicitor. The evidence as to attestation was that on November 21, 1957, the deceased placed a number of apparently unattached sheets of paper on a table with the reverse of the back sheet on the top, wrote his own name some eight inches down the page and caused the attesting witnesses to sign beneath. On the death of the deceased the will was retrieved from deposit in a bank stapled together in the order in which it had been dispatched from the solicitor but containing on the upper half of the back sheet above the signatures a disposition of certain specific chattels to the daughter of the deceased. The word "Draft" on the face of the back sheet preceding the word "Will" had been struck out. On an action by the executor praying that the will be admitted to probate which was defended on the ground of lack of due execution:—

Held, that, even if there were no mechanical attachment of the separate sheets of the will at the time of execution the pressing of the sheets together by the deceased constituted a sufficient nexus to produce a single testamentary document.

1959

Little, decd., In the Estate of.

Lewis v. Lewis [1908] P. 1; 24 T.L.R. 45 applied.

The fact that, at the time of execution, a blank space intervened between the body of the will and the signature of the deceased did not, in itself, render the will invalid and, in all the circumstances of the case, the intention of the deceased at that time was to give effect to the document as a testamentary disposition immediately and not after the adding of the provision disposing of the specific chattels; that disposition was, therefore, of no effect and the will in the form in which it was on November 21, 1957, was duly executed and must be admitted to probate.

Gregory v. Queen's Proctor (1846) 4 Notes of Cases 620 applied.

Probate action.

On September 17, 1956, the deceased went to his solicitor and gave him instructions to the effect that he had made, in his view, ample provision for his daughter and his sons during his lifetime, and that he wished his estate on his death to be held in trust for his grandchildren, three in number. At the end of that same month there were sent to him by his solicitor the five foolscap sheets which constituted the will sought to be propounded. There was at the same time made out on the typewriter in the solicitor's office a carbon copy of those five sheets as sent out. The sheets as sent out were fastened together by a staple. On sheet 1 was the stock form commencement of a will, leaving blank the names of the executors and trustees and leaving blanks for names and amounts which could be inserted to show who were to be beneficiaries of specific legacies. Sheet 2, after certain common form instructions, contained the directions for the residue to be accumulated during the lives of the three grandchildren. Sheet 3 contained the bulk of the disposing provisions. Sheet 4 contained stock matters relating to the functions of the trustees, it was fully filled by those instructions, and ended up at the very foot with the words, "In Witness," etc. The unnumbered sheet 5 was, in fact, a back sheet, and the inside of that back sheet as sent out was blank.

Towards the end of November, 1957, those five sheets were deposited with the Westminster Bank in a sealed envelope numbered 1835. The condition in which they were deposited was that which was revealed upon the envelope being opened shortly after the death of the testator in 1958, and, largely due to the exemplary care shown by the solicitors, that condition remained in essence the same up to the moment the will was deposited in the Probate Registry. From certain photographs which were taken after that deposit it could be seen that the holes in the five sheets through which the staple was placed were no different (and were, when placed in the Probate Registry no different) to the state in which they must have been when they left the solicitor's office. A fold or crease mark, close to the holes, was to be found on each of the five sheets, and it appeared that, as regards sheet 5, the critical sheet, such a fold mark or crease existed at the earliest moment when attention was drawn to the questions in issue in the action. Further, as regards sheet 5, no such fold mark would necessarily have been made when typing copies of the will as a whole. That was the physical condition of the five sheets as they emerged from the Westminster Bank.

Since the five sheets had left the solicitor's hands as a draft the following matters had been added in writing. On sheet 1 the executors' names were filled in, and also the names and amounts in the blanks which had been kept for the insertion of pecuniary legacies. On sheet 2 there was an alteration, initialled in ink, of the provision relating to the period of accumulation. Sheets 3 and 4 showed no alterations. Upon sheet 5 a considerable amount of writing had been placed, consisting of some eight lines which provided for the daughter, Mrs. Cooper, to take certain chattels as specific legacies (chattels which formed only a minor portion of the estate of the deceased) a full attestation clause and the signatures of the deceased and two attesting witnesses. On the back sheet the word "Draft" had been struck out before the word "Will."

Between November 21, 1957, and the date the document was deposited with the bank the deceased had a conversation with one of the executors, Mr. Foster; and Mr. Foster also had a further conversation with the deceased apparently on January 10, 1958, after the deposit of the will at the bank. In January, 1958, Mr. Foster made a note that the deceased's testamentary intentions was that the whole residue was to go to the daughter's daughter, when she was 21.

The action was brought by the executors praying that the court pronounce for the will of November 21, 1957. It was defended by the daughter of the deceased who alleged that the will had not been duly executed and should, therefore, not be admitted to probate.

Mr. Newton, a neighbour of the deceased and one of the attesting witnesses, said, in evidence at the hearing of the action, that after a telephone conversation the deceased came round to Mr. Newton's house about 2.30 or 3 p.m. on November 21, 1957; the deceased pulled out of his pocket a number of foolscap sheets, of the order, so far as he could see, of six or so, and those sheets were placed on a table with a blank sheet uppermost. Mr. Newton saw nothing of any of the other sheets. At the moment of placing on the table and thereafter the deceased, according to Mr. Newton, made what might be called a trimming movement, rather of the style that is made when one has shuffled a pack of cards; the objective of that movement was clearly to get the papers straight. Then the deceased placed his left hand on those sheets of paper, the top one of which was entirely blank. The blank sheet was the inside of the back sheet. On that back blank sheet the deceased first of all wrote his own name some 8 inches or a little more from the top. He then, according to Mr. Newton, wrote on succeeding lines the words,

1959

LITTLE, DECD., In the Estate of.

"Witness: Address: Occupation:" and did so twice, the topmost of those six lines being some 2½ inches from the bottom of the sheet. Then Mr. Newton and his wife, with the deceased still holding the various sheets down with his left hand, were asked to, and did, subscribe their signatures, addresses and occupations. Then the sheets were again folded up, put inside the testator's pocket and he went away. It was Mr. Newton's firm evidence that when the deceased was in the act of taking the folded sheets from his pocket to place upon the table he turned over one of the sheets, which then appeared blank, on top of the others when on the table. He was firm that it was an independent sheet which was being turned over and not one which was attached by the staple.

R. J. A. Temple Q.C. and K. Elphinstone for the plaintiff.

Alan Garfitt for the first defendant, who contested the will.

H. S. Law and J. Hazel for the second, third and fourth defendants, the grandchildren of the deceased, by their guardian ad litem.

The cases referred to in argument are cited in the judgment.

SACHS J. The issues which have been so well argued before me centre round the last sheet of the will, sheet 5. The arguments of mixed fact and law revolve around questions as to what is the effect if sheet 5 was, at the moment of execution, not attached to sheets 1–4 of the will and what is the effect of that large space on sheet 5 which now has a considerable amount of holograph writing on it, having been substantially blank at the moment when the deceased and the witnesses put their signatures upon it—with particular regard to the deceased's signature having been so placed as to leave that large space above it. [His Lordship referred to the facts and to the evidence of Mr. Foster, the executor, and Mr. Newton and continued:] If the recollection of Mr. Foster is right the deceased had altered his intention since November 21, 1957, and intended that one of his grandchildren should have all the residue and not that it should be shared between the three grandchildren. Whatever change there may have been in his intentions it seems clear that in no circumstances was he minded to leave his residue to his daughter whom he considered fully provided for.

The first inference, and perhaps the most important one which I draw, is to my mind quite clear. Indeed, Mr. Garfitt was not, in the end, prepared to argue to the contrary—and I may add that Mr. Garfitt in his closing address presented his case with praiseworthy moderation. The inference I draw is that under the blank sheet were the four other sheets of this will. (I may add that it is both obvious and common ground that the present case is one of those in which there is no possibility, no suggestion, not the faintest idea, of fraud of any sort or kind.)

Then I turn to the question of fastening. I am disposed to apply the presumption referred to in Rees v. Rees,[1] "that the "sheets bound together and constituting the will, as found . . . "were so bound together at the time of the execution and "attestation." I am disposed to the view that, honest witness though Mr. Newton clearly was, this is one of those not infrequent cases where the court takes account of the frailties of human recollection and does not necessarily give effect to that recollection on quesions which, in essence, depend on a balance of probabilities. Be that as it may, whilst disposed to take the above views on matters which are largely ones of inference, I need not and do not rest the decision in this case on those views.

I will turn to the position that arises on the footing that for some reason or other sheet 5 was not attached by the staple to the other sheets. First of all, I should mention that no point has been argued, and indeed to my mind no point could be argued, that merely because the last sheet was on top of the others, that could in any way impugn the validity of a will, for it is clear that whatever place a sheet of paper may have in a given bundle at a given time, if it is intended to be in effect the last sheet, then the law so regards it.

Next I mention that there was clear evidence, wholly undisputed, that, during the period of signing, the five sheets were pressed together on the table by the deceased. In my view, even though there was no mechanical attachment between those sheets, such a pressing provides a sufficient nexus between all five of them for the purpose of establishing that there was a single testamentary document. In that behalf I follow the lead given in Lewis v. Lewis,[2] where it was stated that two pieces of paper being held together for the moment by the testator's finger and thumb was a sufficient nexus.

I should also mention, of course, that Mr. Elphinstone in his helpful argument referred to the careful judgment of Hanna J. in In the Goods of Tiernan, decd.[3] There, at the end of a close consideration of the English authorities, Hanna J. stated[4] that, in his opinion, they established "that if a will be written on "several separate and disconnected sheets of paper and the last "only be attested, although no part of the will may have been "seen by the witnesses, it should be admitted to probate on the "presumption that the whole will was in the room and under "the control of the testator at the time of execution." All I need say is that on the facts of the case before me there is no need for the plaintiff to rely on the wider presumption stated by Hanna J. and I do not need to have to consider it here.

Accordingly, subject to the resolution of the further point of whether this document was intended to operate forthwith as a

[1] (1873) L.R. 3 P. & D. 84; 29 L.T. 375.

[2] [1908] P. 1; 24 T.L.R. 45; 98 L.T. 58.

[3] [1942] Ir.R. 572.

[4] Ibid. 580.

1959

LITTLE, DECD., In the Estate of.

Sachs J.

testamentary disposition, I hold that it was properly executed and conforms with the provisions of the Wills Act, 1837.

The further point arises thus: what inferences ought to be drawn from the fact that the testator's signature was placed, and to my mind was deliberately so placed, as to leave a blank of half a foolscap sheet above it? The first inference is that it can hardly have been left otherwise than with an intention to add something above it in addition to the words of the attestation clause. That inference is to my mind supported by the fact that within the very few days before the deposit of the will at the bank the eight lines to which I have already referred were in fact added—eight lines making minor dispositions of chattels to the daughter of the deceased.

I think, moreover, that this inference is, if anything, supported by the words which the testator wrote when addressing Mr. Foster in a letter of January 1, 1958. There he refers to his last visit to Mr. Foster and says, "Incidentally, following my "last visit to you I completed the necessary documents which "were duly witnessed and deposited with my bankers in "Banstead." That passage is equivocal in some respects and should not be too much relied upon, but it does tend at least to support something of what I have inferred. To my mind it seems to show that these eight lines, the intent of which may well have been forming or have already been formed in the mind of the testator on November 21, 1957, were probably added not on November 21 itself, but a few days later.

The point that then arises is this: which of two inferences as regards the mind of the testator should be adopted—those two inferences having opposite effects on the question of the validity of the will?

Each inference assumes some degree of ignorance of the law applicable to wills on the part of the testator. The first possible inference is that at the moment of signing he was minded that the document should have immediate testamantary effect but was also then minded later to add some words rather in the nature of a codicil. The second inference could be that he intended that the document should have no such effect until he added to and thus completed the will.

I pause only to note that the mere fact that there is a blank immediately above the signature is of itself no bar to the validity of a will. The Wills Act Amendment Act, 1852, section 1, in so far as relevant reads, "Every will shall, so far only as "regards the position of the signature of the testator . . . be "deemed to be valid . . . if the signature shall be so placed at "or after . . . the end of the will, that it shall be apparent on the "face of the will that the testator intended to give effect by such "his signature to the writing signed as his will"; and provides that no such will shall be affected by the circumstance that a blank space shall intervene between the concluding words of the will and the signature.

Rees v. Rees,[5] which I have already quoted, contains a passage which represents a well-known principle of the law of probate,[6] "If any theory consistent with the validity of the will "can be suggested, which appears to the Court to be as probable "as the theory on which the argument for its validity is based, the "will as found must be maintained." Moreover, my attention has also been called to Gregory v. Queen's Proctor.[7] That was a case in which the solicitor for the deceased found him in his usual sitting-room; the deceased thereupon pointed to the table and said, "There, Amos, see what I have done. I have made "a new Will and the servants have witnessed it in pencil so that "we can alter it." The documents to which the deceased in that case pointed were admitted to probate without there having been upon it any further signature of the deceased or any further attesting signature.

I take account also of the fact that at the time this document was executed in the present case nothing was said by the deceased as to any intention that it should not take immediate effect: and Mr. Temple has pointed out that as produced there is a deletion of the word "Draft" before the word "Will."

No case has been cited to me in which blanks in a will have precluded its admission to probate, and it is well known that there are a number of cases when it has fallen to the Chancery Court to construe wills which have indeed had blanks of no inconsiderable order.

In those circumstances, my view is that the correct inference to be drawn is as follows: that the testator did intend that this document should have effect immediately as a testamentary disposition, but, being ignorant of the law, he intended before long to add something to it in the nature of a codicil. That brings the matter four-square within the old authority of Gregory v. Queen's Proctor,[8] to which I have just referred, and the result is that the subsequent insertion of the provisions with regard to specific chattels has no more effect than it did in the case of In the Goods of Arthur, decd.,[9] where such a disposition was attempted to be made by inserting, after the execution of the document, a clause in a space very much narrower than the present. The result is that I pronounce for the will as prayed.

The question next arises as to whether I pronounce for it with or without certain passages which have been inserted in holograph. The authorities on the matter are clear, and I do not think there was any argument about this point. I need only, accordingly, say that I propose to include in the pronouncement those parts which are holographed on sheet 1; omit the small holograph alteration

[5] (1873) L.R. 3 P. & D. 84.
[6] Ibid. 86–87.
[7] (1846) 4 Notes of Cases 620.
[8] Ibid.
[9] (1871) L.R. 2 P. & D. 273; 25 L.T. 274.

1959

LITTLE, DECD., In the Estate of.

on sheet 2; and exclude the whole of the disposing provisions as regards to chattels on sheet 5.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Enever, Strong, Freeman & Co. for Robert H. Kerrison, Coulsdon; Kinch & Richardson.

E. J.

[SHEFFIELD ASSIZES.]

1960 March 1, 2.

Salmon J.

* BURNETT & HALLAMSHIRE FUEL LTD. v. SHEFFIELD TELEGRAPH & STAR LTD.

Libel and Slander — Newspaper — Absolute privilege — Statement by solicitor at criminal trial—Whether newspaper bound to verify accuracy.

In an action for an alleged libel contained in a newspaper report of judicial proceedings the defence of a fair and accurate report applies to a report of counsel's or a solicitor's address in court, and there is no rule of law that a newspaper, before publishing the report, is bound to verify whether what the counsel or solicitor has said is accurate.

Dictum in Flint v. Pike (1825) 4 B. & C. 473; 6 Dow. & Ry. K.B. 528 not followed.

ACTION for libel tried with a jury.

On October 22, 1958, a man named Albert Darwent pleaded guilty at the Sheffield Magistrates' Court to stealing a quantity of coal of the value of 6s., the property of Burnett & Hallamshire Fuel Ltd., the plaintiffs. He consented to be dealt with summarily. Mr. Pitt, the solicitor who was prosecuting for the Sheffield Corporation, made a speech to the magistrates telling them what the case was all about in his view. Evidence was called of the accused's character which included previous convictions, and he was fined £10.

A reporter from the defendants' newspaper was present in court and took a shorthand note, though not a verbatim account of the proceedings. Within ten minutes of having made that note he wrote out a report which was edited by one or more sub-editors, and finally the article or report found its way into the defendants' newspaper, "The Star," on the same evening as the conviction. It read:

"COAL FIRM 'CONNIVES AT DISHONESTY'—SOLICITOR.

"A large firm of city coal merchants had 'connived at dis"'honesty' by employees, said Mr. George Pitt, prosecuting in "Sheffield today. They knew that employees were stealing but "turned a blind eye to the thefts, Mr. Pitt said, adding that the "firm were reluctant to bring prosecutions, and even when a

[Reported by G. M. SMAILES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

" policeman caught a man in the act of stealing coal, said they " did not wish a case to be brought.

" Albert Darwent, 36-year-old lorry driver, of Ironside Road, " Sheffield, was fined £10 after pleading ' guilty ' to stealing coal " worth six shillings the property of Burnett & Hallamshire Fuel " Ltd.

" Previous Thefts.

" Mr. Pitt said that Darwent, who had three children, had " previous convictions for stealing coal and had been sent to prison " for six months last year for such an offence.

" Darwent, Mr. Pitt continued, was employed as a lorry driver, " taking coal from an opencast site to Neepsend Power Station.

" A police constable who stopped Darwent's lorry found two " hundredweights of coal in bags in the cab. Darwent admitted " that he had stolen it and intended taking it home.

" The constable had done a public service in uncovering this " type of offence, Mr. Pitt added."

The plaintiffs claimed that by those words the defendants meant, and were understood to mean, that the plaintiffs connived at thefts by employees, including Darwent, which they knew to be taking place, and tried to protect their employees when caught in the act, and preferred to deliver short weight to their customers rather than do their duty by prosecuting such employees.

By their defence, the defendants admitted that they printed and published the above words but did not admit that they printed or published them of or concerning the plaintiffs. They denied that the words meant or were understood to mean or were capable of the alleged or any meaning defamatory of the plaintiffs. The defendants also claimed that the words were a fair and accurate report of proceedings publicly heard before the court on the hearing of the charge. It was conceded by counsel for the defendants that to say of the plaintiffs, or of anyone, that they had connived at dishonesty was defamatory.

Albert Darwent happened to be employed by a man who was a coal merchant and contractor, and who was under sub-contract to carry coal for the plaintiffs, and it was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that, on the facts, it was not proved that Mr. Pitt was criticising the plaintiffs at all, and that he might well have been criticising the sub-contractor, and that the report could not therefore have been a fair and accurate one.

The case is only reported on that part of the summing-up to the jury which dealt with the question whether the defence of a fair and accurate report of judicial proceedings applied to the solicitor's address in court.

Colin Duncan and D. T. Lloyd for the plaintiffs.

Helenus Milmo and G. F. Leslie for the defendants.

1960

BURNETT & HALLAMSHIRE FUEL LTD. v. SHEFFIELD TELEGRAPH & STAR LTD.

The following cases were cited in argument: Flint v. Pike [1]; Saunders v. Mills [2]; Lewis v. Walter [3]; Roberts v. Brown [4]; Kimber v. Press Association [5]; Farmer v. Hyde [6]; also Gatley on Libel and Slander, 4th ed., at pp. 300–303.

SALMON J. Members of the jury, when a case is heard in court, any advocate—that is to say, any barrister or solicitor—or any witness or any judge, is absolutely privileged in what he says. It may be—and sometimes is—the duty of an advocate or a witness or a judge to say something which is highly defamatory about some person, but that person can have no redress in law, and it is a matter of the most urgent public policy that that should be so. It is of supreme importance that justice shall be done, and justice could never be done if an advocate or a witness or a judge was constantly looking over his shoulder and saying: "If I say so-and-so, "someone may sue me for damages." For many, many years now it has been clearly established that anything said in open court is absolutely privileged so far as the law of libel is concerned.

There is another principle which is of equal importance. Not only should justice be done, but it must manifestly be seen to be done. Justice is not a cloistered and secluded virtue. Behind closed doors, justice withers and dies, that is why in this country the doors of our courts are open to every member of the public so that the public may walk into court and see justice being done. But, members of the jury, the vast majority of the public have other occupations than attending court, and a principle has grown up which is merely an extension of the principle which I have indicated to you, that the press has the freedom to report any proceedings in open court, providing that the report is fair and accurate, so that justice is seen to be done not only by the few members of the public who can spare the time to come to court, but by the whole, vast public which is reached by our press. One of the reasons, at any rate, why the standard of the administration of justice in this country is as high as it is today is because justice is done so publicly, and it would be a very sad day if the principle that a case may be reported—if the report is fair and accurate—should ever be doubted or departed from, because it is one of the principles upon which our whole system of administering justice is based.

Members of the jury, from the point of view of the individual concerned, it is equally important that the press, in reporting any proceedings in open court, should not report the proceedings in a way which is unfair and inaccurate. Let me give you an illustration of what I mean: supposing a case has gone on for a whole

[1] (1825) 4 B. & C. 473; 6 Dow. & Ry.K.B. 528.

[2] (1829) 6 Bing. 213; 3 Moo. & P. 520.

[3] (1821) 4 B. & Ald. 605.

[4] (1834) 10 Bing. 519; 4 Moo. & S. 407.

[5] [1893] 1 Q.B. 65; 9 T.L.R. 6, C.A.

[6] [1937] 1 K.B. 728; [1937] 1 All E.R. 773; 53 T.L.R. 445, C.A.

day, and during part of the day counsel on one side or the other has said something, upon instructions, highly defamatory about one of the parties to the case but the evidence given later in the day entirely fails to support what counsel has said. The newspaper, in reporting the case next day, is entitled to report the opening and the evidence, but not the opening alone, for to leave out the evidence would give an entirely unfair slant to the whole report.

An even stronger case—and there have been such—is where a judge or a jury has found that there is nothing in the allegations made against one of the parties, and yet a newspaper in reporting the case has reported the allegations but not the finding. In such a case you would have no difficulty—and no jury would have any difficulty—in saying that that report was unfair and inaccurate.

But in considering whether a report is fair and accurate, you have got to use your common sense. You do not go through a report with a toothcomb and say: "If I can find that little inaccuracy, "that is the end of the defence." Minor and irrelevant inaccuracies are of no consequence. This principle that you are free to report anything provided it is fair and accurate would not be worth much—human nature being what it is—if, through some slight, inconsequential slip, you were to be deprived of that defence; the law takes a broad and sensible view that a minor and immaterial inaccuracy is of no importance. If there is an omission or inaccuracy, it is for you the jury to consider whether it really is significant, and the only help I can give you is this: if you say to yourselves: "It would not have mattered whether that was in "or not," then it is of no consequence. But if you say: "This "makes a real difference to what was being said about the "plaintiffs, and if this had not been added, anyone reading the "newspaper would not have taken an adverse view, or such an "adverse view of the plaintiffs as they would on the report as it "is published," then the defence fails. [His Lordship referred to the facts and continued:]

Members of the jury, I reminded you that a judge, a witness and an advocate are completely protected in respect of what they say in court, but there is a corresponding rule of practice that no advocate ought to make a charge of dishonesty unless he is satisfied that there is material to support the charge. There is another rule of practice that you do not attack the integrity of someone who is not before the court and therefore unable to defend himself, save in the most exceptional circumstances. In this case, however, you are not deciding whether Mr. Pitt was fair to the plaintiffs in what he said. What you have to decide is whether the report of those proceedings against Darwent on October 22 was a fair and accurate report. Was the report of the judicial proceedings fair and accurate? That is the point for you to consider.

It has been submitted to you by counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs that there is a rule of law that this defence of a fair and accurate report of judicial proceedings does not apply to a report of a counsel's address in court or a solicitor's address in court unless what the solicitor says is warranted by the facts, and in support of that contention counsel has cited to you Flint v. Pike,[1] a case which was decided in 1825. Members of the jury, I tell you—and you must take the law from me—that that case, in my judgment, decides nothing of the kind. There are certain observations made by one of the judges in that case which were not essential for the decision of the case and which do appear to support the argument on behalf of the plaintiffs; but I am bound to direct you that, in my judgment—I will not bore you with the reasons because you are not concerned with the reasons—that argument is wrong. You were also referred by counsel to Gatley on Libel and Slander, and so far as the passage in Gatley appears to support the argument, that, members of the jury, is equally wrong.

1960

BURNETT & HALLAMSHIRE FUEL LTD. v. SHEFFIELD TELEGRAPH & STAR LTD.

Salmon J.

What was said by the judge in 1825 does not correctly state the law of England today in 1960, and I profoundly doubt if it stated it correctly in 1825. There is no rule of law that a newspaper, before publishing a report of proceedings in court, is bound to verify whether what counsel, a solicitor or a witness has said is accurate. The function of a newspaper is to give a fair and accurate account of what happens in court. The public is entitled to be in court and listen, and the public is entitled to know what is going on in the court through their newspapers. That is a fundamental right of the public, and it depends to no little extent upon what is called the freedom of the press. It is really the freedom of us all. So you can consider whether this is a fair and accurate report untrammelled by any rule of law. It is entirely a matter of fact for you to say, "Is that a fair and accurate report of those "judicial proceedings?"

Judgment for the defendants with costs.

Solicitors: Kershaw, Tudor & Co., Sheffield; Neal, Scorah, Siddons & Co., Sheffield.

[1] (1825) 4 B. & C. 473, 478.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

* BRYAN v. ROBINSON

1960
April 8.

Lord Parker C.J., Ashworth and Salmon JJ.

Metropolis—Insulting behaviour occasioning breach of peace—Touting—Hostess standing in door of restaurant beckoning to passers-by—Metropolitan Police Act, 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 47), s. 54 (13).

The defendant, who was employed as a hostess at a non-alcoholic refreshment house, stood in the doorway, leaned out, smiled, beckoned and spoke to three men who were walking in the street past the front door of the premises. The men, being annoyed by the defendant's conduct, walked across the street away from the premises. The defendant was charged with using insulting behaviour whereby a breach of the peace might have been occasioned, contrary to section 54 (13) of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839 [1]:—

Held, that in order to constitute an offence under section 54 (13) there must be not only insulting behaviour but the behaviour must be of such a character that a breach of the peace might be occasioned and, in the circumstances, even if the defendant's gestures were insulting, they were not such as might occasion a breach of the peace, accordingly, she was not guilty of an offence under the subsection.

CASE STATED by the chief metropolitan magistrate.

On May 6, 1959, an information was preferred by the prosecutor (a metropolitan police officer) against the defendant, Lorraine Bryan, that she on May 1, 1959, at Dean Street W.1, did use insulting behaviour whereby a breach of the peace might have been occasioned, contrary to section 54 (13) of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839. The chief magistrate found the following facts:

At 10.55 p.m. on May 1, 1959, the defendant was present in Dean Street and standing in the doorway of premises at No. 48 thereof, which premises contain a non-alcoholic refreshment house licensed under the Refreshment Houses Act, 1860 (colloquially known as a "near-beer" establishment). The defendant, from her position in the doorway, leaned out, smiled, beckoned and spoke to three men who were walking in the street past the front door of the premises. The three men were annoyed by the defendant's conduct and immediately walked across the street and away from the premises. On that evening, the defendant was working at the refreshment house as a hostess. Hostesses took it in 15 minutes turns each to stand in the doorway of the refreshment house for the purpose of attracting customers. Each hostess (including the defendant) was given commission by the proprietors of the refreshment house on drinks bought by customers introduced by her and in her company. The defendant, during her 15 minutes turn at the doorway, was touting for customers on behalf of the proprietors of the refreshment house. It would be impossible for anyone so touted or solicited without inquiry to appreciate the purpose of the solicitation. That a solicitation for this purpose in the circumstances of the time and locality was of a nature to affront persons so solicited and might provoke a breach of the peace.

It was contended by the defendant that the offence had not been committed either in a public place or in a thoroughfare as required in section 54 of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839; and that the facts as adduced in evidence by the informant (and

[1] Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, s. 54: "Every person shall be liable "to a penalty not more than 40s., "who, within the limits of the metro-"politan police district, shall, in any "thoroughfare or public place, commit "any of the following offences: (that "is to say,) . . . (13) Every person "who shall use any threatening, "abusive, or insulting words or be-"haviour, with intent to provoke a "breach of the peace, or whereby "a breach of the peace may be "occasioned."

1960

BRYAN
v.
ROBINSON.

accepted by the magistrate) were insufficient to constitute the offence as contained in section 54 (13).

It was contended by the prosecutor that the offence had been committed in a public place or thoroughfare, and that the evidence adduced was sufficient to support a finding that an offence under section 54 (13) had been committed.

The chief magistrate found that the offence had been committed in a public place or thoroughfare, and that the above-mentioned facts were sufficient to constitute the offence under section 54 (13) and, accordingly, he convicted the defendant and fined her 40s. The defendant appealed.

Michael Beckman for the defendant.
Paul Wrightson for the prosecutor.

The following case was cited in argument: Wilson v. Skeock.[2]

LORD PARKER C.J. This is an appeal by way of case stated by the chief magistrate sitting at Bow Street, before whom the defendant was charged for that "she on May 1, 1959, at Dean "Street, W.1 in the County of London, did use insulting "behaviour whereby a breach of the peace may have been "occasioned, contrary to section 54 (13) of the Metropolitan Police "Act, 1839." The chief magistrate found the offence proved and fined her 40s.

The short facts, as found by the chief magistrate, are these: The defendant was employed as a hostess at a non-alcoholic refreshment house in Dean Street. The establishment had a number of hostesses who took turns for 15 minutes to stand in the doorway of the refreshment house in order to attract customers. Each hostess was given a commission by the proprietors of the establishment on drinks bought by customers introduced by her and in her company. At 10.55 p.m. on May 1 the defendant was so employed and from her position in the doorday leaned out, smiled, beckoned and spoke to three men who were walking in the street past the front door of the premises. The three men were annoyed by the defendant's conduct and immediately walked across the street and away from the premises.

Two points were taken on the case stated. The first, which has been quite rightly, in my judgment, abandoned by Mr. Beckman, was that in any event this did not take place, to use the words of the Act, "in any thoroughfare or public place."

The second point is that the primary facts found by the chief magistrate, to which I have already referred, could not in law support a finding that an offence under the section had been committed. Section 54 of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, provides: "Every person shall be liable to a penalty of not more "than 40s., who, within the limits of the metropolitan police

[2] [1949] W.N. 203; 65 T.L.R. 418; 113 J.P. 294, D.C.

"district, shall, in any thoroughfare or public place, commit any "of the following offences, that is to say"; there are then set out 17 subsections of offences. Subsection (13) provides: "Every "person who shall use any threating, abusive, or insulting words "or behaviour with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or "whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned." The relevant words for the purposes of this case are: "Every person "who shall use any . . . insulting . . . behaviour whereby a breach "of the peace may be occasioned." It is said that the mere finding that this woman leaned out from the doorway, smiled and beckoned, coupled with the finding that three men were annoyed, is sufficient to justify the inference or the finding that she used insulting behaviour whereby a breach of the peace may have been occasioned. It is clear from the case stated that this woman was merely touting for this refreshment house. There is no suggestion here that it was a disreputable establishment or brothel, or that her solicitation was for the purposes of prostitution. In my judgment, the words of subsection (13), to which I have referred, must be read as one; there must be insulting behaviour of such a character that a breach of the peace may be occasioned. Looked at in that way, I find it very difficult to see how a mere leaning out, smiling and beckoning without more could amount to such insulting behaviour of a character whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned. It is true that three men were annoyed, but quite clearly somebody can be annoyed by behaviour which is not insulting behaviour. The mere fact that they were annoyed really carries the matter no further. Even if it can be said that a reasonable person would be likely to treat the gestures as insulting, they were certainly not, in my judgment, of such a character whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned. Accordingly, in my judgment this appeal will have to be allowed.

There is little doubt that this practice in London may be highly objectionable, and it may be that steps will have to be taken to prevent this sort of thing occurring; but what this court is concerned with is whether the actions in question could be brought within the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839, and in particular section 54 (13). In my judgment they cannot. Accordingly, I would allow this appeal, with costs here, and costs below to be taxed out of court.

ASHWORTH J. I agree.

SALMON J. I agree.

Appeal allowed with costs.

Solicitors: Joelson & Co.; Solicitor for Metropolitan Police.

J. D. P.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.

1960
March 15, 16, 17, 18.

Lord Evershed M.R., Pearce and Harman L.JJ.

* DUPLE MOTOR BODIES LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

SAME v. OSTIME (INSPECTOR OF TAXES).

Revenue — Income tax — Work in progress — Method of valuation — Whether "on cost" or "direct cost" method to be applied— Whether any principle involved.

Fact or Law—Income tax—Profits of trade—Work in progress—Method of valuation.

The taxpayers, a company, carried on the business of building to order bodies for road vehicles, mostly motor-coaches, and at the end of each accounting period the taxpayers had in hand a number of unfinished bodies. The taxpayers had for a number of years for the purpose of computing the value of work in progress for income tax purposes used the direct cost method; on that basis only the direct cost of materials and labour expended on such work was taken into account. For the three tax years in question the Crown sought to value the work in progress on an "on-cost" basis by adding to the direct cost a proportion of indirect expenditure incurred, such as overheads. It appeared, on the facts, that in the year when the taxpayers were not working to full capacity the direct cost method showed that the work in progress was £2,000 less in value at the end of the year than at the beginning, with the result that taxable profits would be reduced by £2,000. The application of the on-cost method in the same year showed the value of the work in progress as £14,000 more than at the beginning of the year, so that the taxable profits or gains were increased by £14,000. The Crown sought to have decided as a matter of broad principle that the "on-cost" method was the right principle to apply in valuing work in progress for income tax purposes. The special commissioners found that the accountancy profession as a whole was satisfied that either method would produce a true figure of profit. The commissioners, however, found in favour of the "on-cost" method of valuation. Vaisey J. reversed their decision:—

Held, that it would be wrong for the court to lay down as a matter of broad general principle that the "direct cost" method or the "on-cost" method was the right method of valuation of work in progress. The court should only deal as a question of facts and figures with the circumstances of particular cases and decide on those facts and figures what was fair as between the Crown and the taxpayer (post, pp. 520, 525), and that, on the facts and figures of this particular case, the on-cost method had been shown to produce an unfair result, and the direct cost method was the right one to employ for the assessment of the taxpayer's real profit for the years in question.

Whimster & Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners, 1926 S.C. 20; 12 T.C. 813, and Patrick v. Broadstone Mills Ltd. (1954) 35 T.C. 44; [1954] 1 All E.R. 163, C.A. considered.

Decision of Vaisey J. affirmed.

APPEALS from Vaisey J.

These two appeals were heard together, both were concerned with the same facts, the one related to the assessment of the taxpayers' income tax, the other with the assessment of their profits tax. The appeal in regard to income tax was alone argued.

Duple Motor Bodies Ltd., the taxpayers, appealed to the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts against assessments to income tax under Case I of Schedule D for the years 1951–52, 1952–53 and 1953–54 in the sums of £250,000, £200,000 and £1,000 respectively.

The commissioners summarised the questions for their determination as follows: (1) Whether, in arriving at the cost of work in progress for the purpose of computing the profits of the company for income tax purposes, the cost of direct materials and labour only ("direct cost") should be taken into account, or whether there should be added to the direct cost a proportion of indirect expenditure ("on-cost"); and (2) if on-cost was to be taken into account what items of indirect expenditure fell to be included.

It was common ground that there was no question of market value of work in progress as it could not be regarded as saleable in its unfinished state.

It appeared from the case stated that the taxpayers were incorporated in July, 1946, and took over the business of a company which had been incorporated in 1919. Their business was that of building to order bodies for different types of road vehicles, mostly motor-coaches, and the turnover in the period 1948 to 1954 had been in excess of £1,000,000 per annum. Since the business was almost entirely that of building bodies to order, very few finished bodies were included in work in progress at the end of an accounting period.

Since 1924 the taxpayers or their predecessors had used the direct cost method in ascertaining the cost of work in progress in their annual accounts.

The commissioners were asked in the first instance to decide as a broad matter of principle whether the direct cost method or the on-cost method was to be applied in ascertaining the cost of work in progress for the purposes of computing the Case I profits; and on this basis to consider the accounts for the year to March, 1951, as an example.

In the balance-sheet for the year to March 31, 1951, there was an item "work in progress and finished stock £136,109." This figure represented only the cost of labour and materials. From the nature of the business—i.e., almost entirely building bodies to order—and from the method of keeping records, it was possible to identify the cost of materials used and labour employed in the making of each body. The figure of £136,109 was the actual cost of the materials used in each separate job and the actual cost of the labour of individual men working on each job. The balance-sheet showed debits for unproductive labour and works costs amounting to £93,750 and for sundry charges amounting to £91,078.

C. A.

1960

Duple Motor Bodies Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs.

The commissioners, after considering the figures in the accounts, stated:

"7. As regards these two methods of ascertaining the cost of "work in progress (the direct cost method and the on-cost method) "we find that the position is as follows:

"(a) Both methods are recognised by the accountancy pro- "fession as correct accountancy. There is no cleavage of "opinion in the profession as a whole in the sense that the "advocates of one method consider the other method wrong or "unsound. We think it right to say, however, that [the tax- "payers' accountant] himself considered the on-cost method "definitely unsound, but he thought—and we so find—that he is "in a minority in holding this opinion.

"Professional accountancy opinion is rarely static on questions "of this kind: we find that up to fairly recently the weight of "accountancy opinion was in favour of the on-cost method, but "that now the trend in the profession is slightly away from this "method.

"(b) On the evidence adduced before us we find—and this "naturally has caused us difficulty—that the accountancy pro- "fession as a whole is satisfied that either method will produce a "true figure of profit for income tax purposes.

"In this state of affairs we find that it is very much a matter "of policy for the decision of the directors of a company which "method should be used.

"(c) In dealing with the Inland Revenue the majority of tax- "payers either submit accounts in which the on-cost method has "been applied in the accounts, or, if this method has not been "applied in the accounts, computations of the Case I profits in "which the on-cost method is applied are submitted together with "the accounts.

"(d) There are several different ways of applying the on-cost "method. Indirect expenditure is quite commonly divided by "cost accountants into headings of:—(a) factory expenses; "(b) office expenses; (c) selling expenses; (d) dispatch and "financial expenses.

"It is a common, but not universal, method of applying the "on-cost method to include in the cost of work in progress a "proportion of either all the factory expenses or of some only of "them, and to exclude the other headings of indirect expenditure.

"(e) If the on-cost method is applied, different accountants "may apply different recognised variations of this method; and, "whatever recognised variation of this method is applied, the "accountancy profession as a whole would not condemn any "particular recognised variation as being unsound. Furthermore, "we find that there is considerable scope for difference of opinion "as to how a recognised variation of the on-cost method should be "applied to the facts of each particular case.

"(f) In the application of the direct cost method there is room " for difference of opinion in the accountancy profession, and also " for an element of estimation. [The taxpayers' accountant] had " earlier considered certain items of expenditure to be items of " indirect expenditure; but before us he stated that he had come " to the conclusion that some of these items were items of direct " expenditure, and that as to others he had a doubt, but they " could, not unreasonably, be considered direct expenditure.

" Some items which [he] considered were items of direct " expenditure were, in this particular case, for practical reasons " estimated. For example, it would be possible by various meter- " ing devices to ascertain precisely what proportion of the cost " of power and of gas was appropriate to a particular body; it was " not reasonably practical to do this, and an estimate would be " made; but this estimate would be regarded as direct expenditure.

" (g) One result of the on-cost method is that the cost of work " in progress varies with the rate of production. If a factory is " not working at full capacity, the cost of work in progress com- " puted by this method is higher than if the factory is working at " full capacity. On the direct cost method the cost of work in " progress is not affected by the rate of production. . . .

" 9. It was contended on behalf of the appellant company: " (1) that in computing profits for income tax purposes the " amount to be taken into account in respect of work in progress " is the amount of expenditure actually incurred directly and " proximately in producing it, that is to say, the cost of materials " used, labour expended and other direct expenses; (2) that all " other expenses are properly deductible in arriving at the profits " of the year in which they are incurred; (3) that the level of " overhead expenses of a business depends upon the general " extent and organisation of that business, does not vary directly " with the volume of production and so is not directly connected " with that production; (4) that on the evidence it could not be " said either that the direct cost method of valuation was incon- " sistent with the principles of commercial accounting, or that it " did not produce a true figure of profit for income tax purposes; " (5) that the method (direct cost) adopted by the company in " computing its profits could not be displaced by the Revenue " unless (which was not the case) it was shown to be inconsistent " with the principles either of commercial accounting or of income " tax; (6) that the direct cost method contained no element of " arbitrary estimation, whereas the on-cost method did contain " such an element; (7) that, for the purposes of ascertaining the " true income tax profits for a year of assessment, a method which " contained no element of arbitrary estimation was preferable to a " method which did contain such an element; (8) that for these " reasons the direct cost method should be applied in this case.

" 10. It was contended on behalf of the respondent (H.M. " Inspector of Taxes): (1) that, where there is more than one " method for arriving at the profits for a relevant period, that

C. A.
1960
Duple Motor Bodies Ltd.
v.
Inland Revenue Comrs.

"one which shows most accurately the position between the "Revenue on the one hand and the taxpayer on the other so as "to give the true profit of a particular accounting period ought "to be adopted; (2) that accordingly, in arriving at the company's "true profits for income tax purposes, the value of work in "progress and finished goods at the end of an accounting period "must be credited in the accounts at full cost, that is to say, the "direct cost with the addition of the proportion of overhead "expenses referable to such work in progress and finished goods; "(3) that to exclude all overhead expenditure from the cost of "work in progress is in effect to allocate the whole of such "expenditure to the sales which had been effected during the "accounting period; (4) that at least some part of indirect "expenditure has been expended on work in progress, and that "it cannot be correct in arriving at the Case I profits of an "accounting period to allocate (as the "direct cost" method "does) the whole of this indirect expenditure to sales which have "been effected during that accounting period; (5) that the on-cost "method produces the true view of the Case I profit for a year of "assessment and that the direct cost method does not, and that "therefore the on-cost method should be applied in this case.

"11. We, the commissioners, who heard the appeal gave our "decision in principle as follows:

"We have been asked to decide this appeal on a broad ques-"tion of principle, and we are going to do that, fully aware that "in doing so we shall be leaving open a wide field for discussion "between the parties; but we feel that, having to decide this as a "broad question of principle, that is really inevitable and cannot "be helped.

"We think that on the broad general question the appeal fails. "The position here is that we have a company manufacturing "vehicle bodies, and at the end of every year this company has "on hand a number of finished but unsold bodies, and also a "number of unfinished bodies; and it is agreed between the "parties that these finished and unsold bodies and unfinished "bodies—that is to say, work in progress and stock—have to "come into the profit and loss account at the end of the year. It "is further agreed that those things must come in at cost; it is "agreed that there is no question before us of market value.

"The problem is one very easy indeed to state, however "difficult it is to answer. We have found the problem very "difficult. The simple question is: How do you get at the cost "of this work in progress? In the accountancy world there are "two views. The view of the appellants (which we will call the "'direct cost' view) is that the cost is to be ascertained by taking "only the cost of labour and material involved in any particular "body, and that cost only. The method adopted by the Crown is "the 'on-cost' method. They say that to ascertain the cost of "work in progress you have to add some proportion of overheads.

"The appellants say that indirect costs, such as overheads, are "incurred whether production is continuing or not, and that to "apply the 'on-cost' method will in certain circumstances "produce a distortion of the figure of profits. The appellants also "say: 'We work on known or perfectly accurate ascertainable "'figures, and on this kind of basis you arrive at a truer view of "'cost than you do on the "on-cost" method.'

"The Crown contend that some part of these overheads must "go into the cost of work in progress. When the factory is not "running at full capacity, the Crown say it is obvious that pro-"duction costs more—that is, it costs more if the factory is not "running at full capacity to make a particular vehicle. That is a "fact, the Crown contend, and that kind of fact ought to be "reflected in the accounts, and the 'on-cost' method does reflect "that kind of fact. . . .

"In that position on the evidence, and guided by the authori-"ties, we can state our opinion very shortly. We feel in the end "that to get at the true cost of producing an article—that is the "cost of making the thing—there is really something more in the "cost than the mere cost of labour and the cost of the material "that has gone into that particular article. It seems to us that "it has really cost more to build a vehicle body than just the cost "of labour and material. The object of the 'on-cost' method—"whether we are right or wrong about this—is really to get at the "cost; and as we are coming down on the side of the 'on-cost' "method it appears to us that any proportion of overheads, which "on that method is to be attributed to cost, should be limited to "factory overheads, namely, the overheads of the place where the "thing is actually being made. We realise that the expression "'factory overheads' is rather vague; but, since we are asked "to decide this matter on a broad question of principle, we feel, "as we have already said, that it is inevitable that a wide field "for discussion should be left open and we do not feel able to "define the term 'factory overheads.' We think that the pro-"portion of overheads to be attributed to the cost of building a "vehicle body should be limited to a proportion of factory "overheads. . . .

"We finish where we began by saying we know full well that "we have left a wide area open. We do not think we can help "that. If, of course, the parties are unable to come to any "settlement on the basis of what we have said today, they will "come back to us. The appeal fails."

The commissioners stated the questions of law for the determination of the court as follows: "(1) whether, on the evidence "and in view of our findings set out above, our decision that the "on-cost method should be applied in arriving at the cost of work "in progress for the purpose of computing the company's Case I "profits was erroneous in law; (2) on the basis that we were "correct in applying the on-cost method, whether our decision as

C. A.
1960
DUPLE MOTOR BODIES LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMRS.

"to what items should be included in arriving at cost on this "method was erroneous in law."

The actual figures considered by the commissioners are more fully stated in the judgment of Lord Evershed M.R.

Vaisey J. allowed the taxpayers' appeal and dismissed the Crown's cross-appeal, holding that the directors of the taxpaying company were entitled to decide which of the two methods of valuation should be adopted. They decided that the direct cost method was right, and it was not for the commissioners to direct an alternative method of valuation.

The Crown appealed on the ground that the commissioners were right in law in holding that in arriving at the cost of work in progress in order to compute the taxpayers' profits for income tax purposes there should be added to the direct cost of the labour and materials a proportion of indirect expenditure, but that the commissioners were wrong in law in holding that the on-costs, which should be added to the direct costs, should be restricted to "factory overheads" of the place in which work in progress was actually made.

F. N. Bucher Q.C. and Alan Orr for the Crown.

R. E. Borneman Q.C. and C. N. Beattie for the taxpayers.

The following cases, which were cited in argument, are not referred to in the judgments: Minister of National Revenue v. Anaconda American Brass Ltd.[1]; Edwards v. Bairstow and Harrison[2]; Southern Railway of Peru Ltd. v. Owen[3]; Vallambrosa Rubber Co. Ltd. v. Farmer[4]; Naval Colliery Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[5]; Albion Rovers Football Club Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners[6]; Ryan v. Asia Mill Ltd.[7]

LORD EVERSHED M.R. The question for the decision of this court may be taken as it was formulated by the special commissioners at the end of the case stated. It is as follows: "Whether, "on the evidence, and in view of our findings, our decision that "the 'on-cost' method should be applied in arriving at the cost "of work in progress for the purpose of computing the company's "Case I profits was erroneous in law." The question as formulated did not (and I will assume deliberately did not) limit the subject-matter to the company's Case I profits for particular years; but I wish to say at the beginning that the problem before the special commissioners and before us should be treated as so limited. At the beginning of the case three years are referred to (though, for the purposes of this judgment and of the argument,

[1] [1956] A.C. 85; [1956] 2 W.L.R. 31; [1956] 1 All E.R. 20.
[2] [1956] A.C. 14; 36 T.C. 207, 227; [1955] 3 All E.R. 48, H.L.
[3] [1957] A.C. 334; (1956) 36 T.C. 602; [1956] 2 All E.R. 728, H.L.
[4] 1910 S.C. 519; 5 T.C. 529.
[5] (1926) 12 T.C. 1017, H.L.
[6] (1952) 33 T.C. 331.
[7] (1949) 32 T.C. 275, 293, H.L.

one particularly has been mentioned), namely, the year 1951–52 and the two succeeding years. I repeat that I shall treat the question posed as relating to those three years. The special commissioners then put a second question, to which I may make some brief allusion hereafter.

The question arises in connection with the computation of the profits of the company, Duple Motor Bodies Ltd., for the purpose of income tax under Case I of Schedule D. Put in the language of the statute, which language is now enshrined in section 127 of the Income Tax Act, 1952, the real question to which this matter is related is: For the years in question, what were the full amounts of the profits or gains of this company's trade? Before Whimster & Co. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners,[1] the profits or gains of a trade were, I understand, ordinarily arrived at, in the case of a company such as this, by discovering what the trading receipts were for the year in question and then deducting from those receipts the proper expenses which were allowable according to the income tax legislation. But since the Whimster case [1] it has been recognised that, for the purpose of ascertaining the full amount of the profits or gains of a trade, it is (or, at any rate, it may be) also necessary to bring into the account at the beginning and at the end respectively of the relevant period the values of the work in progress or the stock-in-trade, or perhaps both; and that such values will, again in the ordinary case, be arrived at by looking at the market value or the cost, whichever is the less. The effect of bringing these matters into the account is this, that, if at the end of the year, the value of the work in progress or stock-in-trade is shown to be greater than it was at the beginning, then, to that extent, the full amount of the profits will be increased; and vice versa if, at the end of the year, the value of such items is less than it was at the beginning.

In the present case, it is to be noted that we are here concerned not with stock-in-trade but with work in progress. The reason for that is the nature of this company's business of manufacturing motor bodies, and we were informed by Mr. Bucher in his opening that in truth the business wholly, or at any rate very substantially, consists of making these bodies to order. That being so, there would, of course, be no question of a market value for any bodies, either partly finished or wholly finished, but still on the premises of the company; and that, indeed, is so stated in the case stated, where, in the course of formulating their decision, the commissioners say: "It is agreed that there is no question "before us of market value."

I can now state again, and more precisely, the nature of the question we have to decide, and I can further explain the reference to "on-cost" in the question as it was posed by the special commissioners. The problem is, in relation to the taxpayers' trading for the years I have mentioned, how you should arrive

[1] 1926 S.C. 20; 12 T.C. 813.

C. A.

1960

DUPLE MOTOR BODIES LTD.
v.
INLAND REVENUE COMRS.

Lord Evershed M.R.

at the value, at the beginning and end of the periods, of their work in progress. It appears quite clearly that in the profession of accountancy there are two methods or theories which are current, both of which appear to have their devotees. The methods or theories are known, the one as the "direct cost" method and the other as the "on-cost" method. The direct cost method, as the words naturally import, means that you value the subject-matter—in this case the work in progress—by looking, at the beginning and end of the relevant periods, at what has been expended on the work in progress, and expended exclusively upon it—namely, for practical purposes (or, at any rate, in this case) the cost of the materials used and the wages of the labour directly employed. The on-cost method goes further; it says that you should not exclude a proper proportion of other, more general costs of the company's business, some part of which should be attributed to the work which was in progress at the relevant dates.

When Mr. Bucher opened the case for the Crown before us, he made it plain that what the Crown desired was that we should decide this matter as one of broad principle: that of the two champions being displayed before us, we must decide as a matter of broad principle between Sohrab and Rustum. Similarly, Mr. Borneman, for the taxpayers, invited us to decide that the direct cost method was the one that, generally speaking, should receive the imprimatur of this court. In support of these views, general arguments were put before us which clearly have much force. It was said by Mr. Bucher that if you are inquiring what is the value of, say, stock-in-trade, and in the circumstances you are to arrive at it by looking at what it has cost you to produce it, then it is not realistic to exclude any part of the general costs of the company's business, and so to do simply loads those costs unduly upon the sold articles. On the other side, Mr. Borneman has said that here you are only concerned to arrive at a valuation, and in doing so—because, after all, you are merely comparing two dates—it is only necessary and only safe to look at the costs which can be certainly discovered and ascertained, and that you should not go beyond that into territory which at once becomes vague and uncharted. He supports that by saying that in this case the special commissioners, having decided in favour of on-cost, were then unable to express any concluded view as to what of the possible items of indirect expenses are those which should be included.

The special commissioners were persuaded to deal with this matter as one of general principle, and they so stated; and, as a matter of general principle, they expressed their own preference in favour of the on-cost method. In so far as they did that, it seems to me inevitable that they were not deciding a question of fact but a question of law—or, at least, of mixed law and fact. I am for my part quite clear that it would be wrong for this court to deal with this matter as one of principle, and to decide now that either for all purposes of this company or, still less, for all purposes in the case of trading companies, one method is the right and proper method and the other is not. So to do would, I think, go altogether outside the function of the court, which is to decide the particular problem presented by the particular case before it. As Mr. Bucher more than once emphasised, that with which we are in the case concerned, and only concerned, is the full amount of this particular company's profits or gains for tax purposes for certain years. Moreover, to decide the matter as one of principle, one way or the other, would, I think, fly in the face of what has been found to be professional opinion among chartered accountants. I would also add that I entertain the strongest inclination that, if we were to decide now in favour of one champion rather than another, in a very short time a case would arise which would show quite clearly that, on those facts, the decision of this court could not be right. I add also that if we were to decide in favour of the on-cost method as a general proposition, the result, so far as I can see, would at best be inconclusive; and certainly, if we adopted the drawing of the line which was indicated by the special commissioners and which Mr. Bucher was inclined, I think, to accept, though he thought it was wrong, we should be giving our sanction to a purely arbitrary definition of the limits of indirect costs which should be taken into account. What we have to do, I repeat and emphasise, is to apply our minds to the question of the proper way of valuing work in progress at the beginning and end respectively of the three years with which we are concerned as it affects the profits or gains of the Duple Motor Bodies Ltd.

At this stage I will cite two statements which were cited by Singleton L.J. in Patrick (Inspector of Taxes) v. Broadstone Mills Ltd.[2] The first citation comes from the opinion of Lord President Clyde in the Whimster case[3] itself. It is as follows: "'In computing the balance of profits and gains for the purposes of income tax, or for the purposes of excess profits duty, two general and fundamental commonplaces have always to be kept in mind. In the first place, the profits of any particular year or accounting period must be taken to consist of the difference between the receipts from the trade or business during such year or accounting period and the expenditure laid out to earn those receipts. In the second place, the account of profit and loss to be made up for the purpose of ascertaining that difference must be framed consistently with the ordinary principles of commercial accounting, so far as applicable, and in conformity with the rules of the Income Tax Act, or of that Act as modified by the provisions and schedules of the Acts regulating excess profits duty, as the case may be. For example, the ordinary principles of commercial accounting require that in the profit

[2] (1954) 35 T.C. 44, 65, 67; [1954] 1 All E.R. 163, C.A.

[3] 12 T.C. 813.

C. A.
1960
DUPLE MOTOR BODIES LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMRS.
Lord Evershed M.R.

" ' and loss account of a merchant's or manufacturer's business the " ' values of the stock-in-trade ' "—and I would add here, though it is not in the opinion, " or work in progress "—" ' at the begin- " ' ning and at the end of the period covered by the account should " ' be entered at cost or market price, whichever is the lower; " ' although there is nothing about this in the taxing statutes.' "

The second citation is a brief citation from the speech of Lord Loreburn L.C. in Sun Insurance Office v. Clark,[4] where he said: " ' An estimate being necessary ' "—that is, for the purpose of arriving at the value of the work in progress—" ' and the arriving " ' at it by in some way using averages being a natural and prob- " ' ably inevitable expedient, the law, as it seems to me, cannot " ' lay down any one way of doing this. It is a question of fact " ' and of figures whether what is proposed in each case is fair both " ' to the Crown and to the subject.' " Founding myself upon those two citations, it seems to me that you proceed in this case and in other cases to say: What is the normal, proper accounting practice in regard to this matter, and does what is normal produce a fair result? Or, if there are alternatives, which is shown on the facts of the particular case to produce the fairer result?

With that premise, I now turn to make one or two references to the case stated. In paragraph 7, the special commissioners, who are persons of great experience, refer to certain expert evidence given, and then, in paragraph (b) they say: " On the " evidence adduced before us we find—and this naturally has " caused us difficulty—that the accountancy profession as a whole " is satisfied that either method will produce a true figure of profit " for income tax purposes." Mr. Bucher somewhat criticised the addition of the last four words, but I do not think that criticism is justified. If either method is a proper method for arriving at profits for general commercial purposes, then it satisfies the test which is suggested by Lord President Clyde, but, of course, it still leaves it to be debated whether, in the particular circumstances of a particular case, it is fair.

The commissioners went on: " In this state of affairs we find " that it is very much a matter of policy for the decision of the " directors of a company which method should be used." A little lower down the commissioners proceed to deal with the still more vexing problem, as they thought and as I think: If in any particular case you do choose the on-cost method, then what of the indirect costs do you include? As regards that, they said: " If the on-cost method is applied, different accountants may " apply different recognised variations of this method; and, what- " ever recognised variation of this method is applied, the " accountancy profession as a whole would not condemn any " particular recognised variation as being unsound. Furthermore, " we find that there is considerable scope for difference of opinion

[4] [1912] A.C. 443, 451; 28 T.L.R. 303; 6 T.C. 59, H.L.

" as to how a recognised variation of the on-cost method should be " applied to the facts of each particular case."

I pass at once to that part of the case in which their decision is recorded, and I will first of all read some four or five passages without comment. They begin: " We have been asked to decide " this appeal on a broad question of principle, and we are going " to do that, fully aware that in doing so we shall be leaving " open a wide field for discussion between the parties; but we feel " that, having to decide this as a broad question of principle, that is " really inevitable and cannot be helped." Then, after stating what the problem was, and referring briefly to certain arguments, they say: " The Crown contend that some part of these over- " heads "—that is, the general business overheads—" must go into " the cost of work in progress. When the factory is not running " at full capacity, to make a particular vehicle. That is a fact, " the Crown contend, and that kind of fact ought to be reflected " in the accounts, and the on-cost method does reflect that kind " of fact."

In the next paragraph they deal with the expert evidence, and as regards one of the accountants, they say: " Mr. Clark's " evidence comes really to this, that the two methods are both " accepted in the accountancy profession, and that you cannot " say there is a general opinion in the accountancy profession that " the on-cost method is unsound. Mr. Clark told us that each " method will produce a true view of profits for income tax " purposes "—and I emphasise the last words, to show justification for what I have already read—" and I think we might say " here that we consider it important that ascertaining profits for " income tax purposes does involve ascertaining profits year by " year." I should add that it had earlier appeared to have been his evidence that although, as he stated, both methods were regarded as acceptable and proper, there seemed recently to be a swing against the on-cost method within the accountancy profession.

The commissioners then say this: " We feel in the end that " to get at the true cost of producing an article—that is the cost " of making the thing—there is really something more in the " cost than the mere cost of labour and the cost of the material " that has gone into that particular article. It seems to us that " it has really cost more to build a vehicle body than just the " cost of labour and material. The object of the on-cost method— " whether we are right or wrong about this—is really to get at " the cost; and as we are coming down on the side of the on-cost " method it appears to us that any proportion of overheads, which " on that method is to be attributed to cost, should be limited " to factory overheads, namely, the overheads of the place where " the thing is actually being made. We realise that the expres- " sion ' factory overheads ' is rather vague; but, since we are " asked to decide this matter on a broad question of principle, " we feel, as we have already said, that it is inevitable that a wide

C. A.

1960

DUPLE MOTOR BODIES LTD.
v.
INLAND REVENUE COMRS.

Lord Evershed M.R.

"field for discussion should be left open and we do not feel able "to define the term 'factory overheads.'" They conclude: "We "finish where we began, by saying we know full well that we "have left a wide area open. We do not think we can help that."

I cannot refrain from observing that it seems to me an obvious criticism of the Crown's argument that if, as a broad principle, we must give our imprimatur to the on-cost method, then, according to the special commissioners, that leaves quite undecided (and they thought really incapable of decision) what are the exact items which should be included. That is not indirectly to say that I am intimating that the direct cost method is the proper method as a broad matter of principle, but it shows what has been emphasised in the passages I have cited: that the court should deal—and the court can only deal, as I think—as a question of fact and figures with the particular circumstances of particular cases, and say: On these facts, on these figures, is this way of doing it fair as between the Crown and the subject, or is that way the fair way of doing it?—and I do venture most strongly to emphasise that aspect of the matter.

Vaisey J. resolved the conflict in a different sense from that of the special commissioners. Mr. Bucher somewhat criticised his judgment, because he said that the commissioners had found that it was proper accounting practice to use either method, whereas, said Mr. Bucher, what the commissioners said was that they had found that the accountants were satisfied that it was proper to use either method; but, without repeating what I have already said, in my judgment that is exactly the same thing for this purpose, having regard to the Lord President's opinion. I do not therefore think, if I may say so, that there is anything in that criticism. On the other hand, I agree with Mr. Bucher that for income tax purposes you cannot say: "Well, it is a matter "for the directors. If the directors had decided to adopt in a "particular year or years the direct cost method, that concludes "it for income tax purposes." The duty of the directors is to make their decision on this matter in the best interests of the company, looking at it as a business entity, and quite plainly it could not be said that their conclusion, quite properly come to as responsible for the company's management, was decisive of the matter for income tax purposes.

I have already said more than once—and I shall be forgiven because I wish to emphasise it as strongly as I can—that I think it is wrong, and would be wrong, to decide this matter on general principle. I base that view partly on the citations I have made from the Broadstone Mills case [5] and also on the results it would or might appear to lead to, of which the citations from the case stated will have given sufficient illustration. I take by way of example what was said at the beginning of the Crown's contention—and I gather the special commissioners in some sense founded themselves upon this—that obviously, if you are asking how much it cost to produce something, you should not exclude altogether overheads, and it is unrealistic to do so. But the conclusion of the passage I have read seems to me to be this, that if, as the commissioners say, production is slack, it follows that the proportion of overheads attributable to the work in progress is larger, from which they apparently are led to the conclusion that the taxable profits are necessarily larger—a proposition which I venture to think is self-condemnatory.

[5] (1954) 35 T.C. 44.

But I return to the facts of this case. There have been exhibited certain schedules, and I will make some reference to the figures. For the first year which has been the subject of debate, ended March 31, 1951—since, by section 127, you look at the preceding year—you find this on the figures: the work in progress at the end of the year according to the taxpayers' method of computation—based, that is, on direct cost—was worth £136,000 odd; at the beginning of the same year it was worth £138,000 odd. The result is that the work in progress was £2,000 less in value at the end of the year than at the beginning, with the further result, no doubt, that the taxable profits would be reduced by £2,000. The application for the same year of the on-cost method shows that if the sums are added, at the beginning and end of each year, which the Crown suggests should be added, however arbitrarily selected from overheads—and I repeat that the Crown seem to have accepted the arbitrary selection, though they said in the plainest language in opening the case that this geographical limitation is quite wrong; but, still, adding them—the curious result is that the value of the work in progress at March 31, 1951, is not £2,000 less but is £14,000 more than it was at the beginning of the year in question. So that, according to this computation, the full amount of the profits or gains to be taxed must be increased by £14,000 instead of being reduced by £2,000 in respect of that item.

Of course, if the truth is that upon a fair view the profits were £14,000 more and not £2,000 less, then it would be unfair that the tax liability should depend upon the latter and not the former calculation. But what evidence is there to show that the right view is that work in progress should be taken in at £14,000 more at the end than at the beginning? We have no idea, because there is (for example) no evidence whatever of the number of unfinished motor bodies that there were in fact on the taxpayers' premises at the beginning or at the end of the year in question. What we do know, however, is that during this year ended March 31, 1951, there was a considerable slackening off of the taxpayers' business. Whereas for the year ended March 31, 1950, the wages paid to labour were £534,000 odd, for the year ended March 31, 1951, it was £347,000 odd—nearly £200,000 less. I suppose that, as a judge, I may take some account of the general knowledge that there has been no tendency towards a reduction

C. A.
1960
DUPLE MOTOR BODIES LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMRS.
Lord Evershed M.R.

in wages, at any rate on that scale, during the past decade, and it therefore seems quite plain that there was far less work being done.

That of itself, of course, supports what I indicated earlier, that the special commissioners seemed to be basing themselves on the passage I have quoted. They were saying that because, owing to a slackening off of business, a greater share of overheads must be applied to work in progress, therefore the taxable profits of the taxpayers were greater. I add only this, that in order to arrive at the figure for which the Crown contend—namely, £14,000 excess of value of work in progress at the end as compared with the beginning—the proportion of overheads taken in as at March 31, 1950, was 27·9 per cent. of the whole, and at the end it was 40·5 per cent. The justification for these percentages has not been debated, but they make it perfectly plain that the increased value of the work in progress depends obviously on the fact that these taxpayers were doing less work.

There was before us some discussion on the matter of onus of proof, and, of course, I accept it that where the taxpayer is assessed and complains that the charge made upon him is wrong, he must show it to be wrong; but also, as we all know, and as Mr. Bucher naturally and frankly conceded, in discussing the case the onus may shift from time to time from one party to the other. In considering the proper way to formulate a conclusion here, I venture to think certain facts are relevant in this particular connection. In the first place, it is conceded by the Crown that the taxpayers, and their immediate predecessor, have been taxed upon the full amount of profits and gains, arrived at so as to include the value of work in progress calculated by reference to the direct cost method, for rather more than a generation, and throughout that period the Crown have accepted that method of arriving at the value, or the comparative value, of the work in progress, as being fairly represented by the application of the direct cost method. Further, as Mr. Bucher again frankly conceded, in the tax years with which we are concerned there was no relevant change of circumstances in the taxpayers' general affairs at all. In those circumstances, I should have thought that at any rate there was some obligation upon the Crown to show why they have now come to the conclusion that the on-cost method should be adopted and the direct cost method should be discarded. What I have said perhaps supports the view that, for reasons which I assume may be quite good—at any rate, it is not a matter on which we have to express an opinion—it is thought that now is the time to strike a blow for the on-cost method in this sort of case. It also may support the view or the suspicion—which accounts for this matter of principle not having been raised before—that in the end of all (that is, over a period of years) it matters not at all which method is adopted; in the end of all, it comes to the same thing.

In the result, however, if on the figures, on the facts, on the evidence, it were necessary for this court to reach an affirmative decision, I must say I would be prepared to conclude that for these particular years and in relation to these particular taxpayers, the on-cost method was shown to produce, on the face of it, an unfair result; but again, let me say that this is not an oblique way of saying that I am affirming the view as a matter of principle that the direct cost method is the right one. In those circumstances, I am quite content to put it in this way: referring back to the question posed by the special commissioners, I think that, in relation to the particular years and to these particular taxpayers, which is the only matter with which this case is concerned, the decision of the special commissioners was wrong in law. Having come to that conclusion, I would therefore dismiss this appeal.

PEARCE L.J. I agree. There is a divergence of view in the accountancy profession as to the respective merits and defects of the direct cost and the on-cost methods. The commissioners were asked by both sides to regard this case as a conflict à outrance between the two methods, and to give their verdict to the winner. We, too, have been asked to give such a verdict, but it would be wrong to lay down such a general rule as if it were a matter of law. It is a question of fact in each case to ascertain the true profit.

The result has been that the ascertainment of the particular profits for the particular year—which, after all, was the real object of the inquiry—has been a little submerged by this ideological dispute. The costing of the work in progress, though it is a necessary part of accounting both from a commercial point of view and, since the Whimster case,[6] from the income tax point of view; yet it is only a means to the ascertainment of the profit and not an end in itself. Moreover, one year will correct the errors of another. And it would be unfortunate if dogmas of method obscured the real purpose—the finding of a fair, true and reasonable assessment of the real profit of the business for the year. Whatever the merits of the on-cost method as seen from one point of view, in a certain set of circumstances it can produce an unfair result. As the Master of the Rolls pointed out in argument, not only can it produce such a result, but that particular set of circumstances does apparently arise in this particular case.

When a factory has an idle and unprofitable year, the costing of the work in progress is inflated by the fact that it has, under the on-cost method, to bear an abnormally high proportion of the overheads during an uneconomic period. As a result, the profits are notionally increased, whereas in fact there are no true profits to justify that increase. In such a case, an actual loss could be converted on paper into a theoretical and untrue profit.

Both theories rest ultimately on the fact that cost is a guide to value. When, owing to trade difficulties, cost parts company from value, difficulties arise; and it may well be that the more

[6] 12 T.C. 813.

C. A.
1960
DUPLE MOTOR BODIES LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMRS.
Pearce L.J.

realistic the costing the greater the difficulty. It has been argued that an unfair result can always be avoided by the proviso that the market value can be taken as the touchstone wherever the on-cost calculation would produce too high a figure; but here it was common ground that the market value was not appropriate to the facts of this case. Here it would seem that a substantial amount of the figure added by the on-cost method is due to lack of work in the factory. The profits are thereby notionally increased owing to that unprofitable lack of work. That result—which, owing to the general nature of the argument, had not received the prominence to which it was entitled—must be of very great importance in these assessments; and once it is fully appreciated it becomes plain, in my view, that it would be wrong in the circumstances of these particular assessments, in these particular years, to depart from the simpler, direct cost method that had always been used by this company over so many years. For that reason, and for those that have been given in greater detail by my Lord, I agree that the appeal fails.

HARMAN L.J. I, too, agree. This case has been a good illustration of the sometimes forgotten fact that an English law suit is not a moot or a debate, but an attempt to arrive at a result on the facts before the court: broad academic arguments are quite unsuited to the processes of the English law.

Here, on-cost has been declared by the commissioners to have their vote as a general matter, regardless of the fact that when the details are looked into it produces an absurdity. Judged by that touchstone, the commissioners could not have come to the conclusion they did; but they were not looking at the facts, but at the theories which were so largely debated before them. The result is that, taking their eyes off the ball, so to speak, they came to a conclusion which is not, when the facts are looked at, tenable. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, though not quite on the ground on which the judge below dismissed it, for he decided upon the footing that the directors had the right to choose the method of costing for income tax purposes. In fact, of course, they have the right to choose the method vis-à-vis their shareholders and for the good of the company, but it cannot be that they are the arbiters when it comes to assessing the costs from any income tax point of view. It is, of course, well known that many things—reserves, and so on—which are not allowable as deductions for income tax purposes are proper deductions when setting out the profits of the company. But although we do not agree with all the reasoning of the judge, we do agree with his conclusion.

Appeal dismissed with costs.
Leave to appeal to House of Lords refused.

Solicitors: Solicitor of Inland Revenue; Wilkinson.

B. A. B.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

* KIMPTON v. STEEL COMPANY OF WALES LTD.

C. A.

1960
March 23, 24, 25.

[1957 K. No. 1661.]

Sellers, Ormerod and Upjohn L.JJ.

Factory—Staircase—Handrails—Meaning of "staircase"—Three steps wedged into platform—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 25 (2).

The plaintiff, a maintenance electrician employed by the defendants, was descending three steel steps in the defendants' factory during his employment when he slipped, fell, and sustained personal injuries. The steps were just over three feet in height, and were securely wedged into a platform, to which they gave access and egress, but they were otherwise removable. The steps were not provided with a handrail.

On the question whether the steps constituted a staircase within the meaning of section 25 (2) of the Factories Act, 1937,[1] and, therefore, required the provision of a handrail:—

Held, that notwithstanding that the three steps complied with the dictionary definition of "staircase," when considering the term under the Factories Act it should be given its ordinary everyday construction and, in the circumstances, the term "staircase" in section 25 (2) was not apt to describe the steps in the present case; accordingly, the defendants were not liable to the plaintiff for breach of statutory duty.

Dictum of Somervell L.J. in Bath v. British Transport Commission [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1013, 1015; [1954] 2 All E.R. 542, C.A applied.

APPEAL from Edmund Davies J., sitting at Cardiff.

The plaintiff, Peter Charles Kimpton, was a shift maintenance electrician employed by the defendants, The Steel Company of Wales, Ltd., at their Abbey works, Port Talbot, Glamorgan. On February 9, 1956, the plaintiff was descending, in the course of his work, three steel steps in the factory where he was employed when he slipped. The judge found that in descending the steps the plaintiff probably slipped on the second step through no fault of his own, that the plaintiff thereby struck his back, and that the accident would probably never have occurred if there had been a handrail, because if a handrail had been available, the plaintiff might have been able to save himself in some way from falling.

[1] Factories Act, 1937, s. 25: "(1) "All floors, steps, stairs, passages "and gangways shall be of sound "construction and properly main-"tained. (2) For every staircase in a "building or affording a means of "exit from a building, a substantial "handrail shall be provided and "maintained, which, if the staircase "has an open side shall be on that "side, and, in the case of a staircase "having two open sides, or in the "case of a staircase which, owing to "the nature of the construction there-"of or the condition of the surface of "the steps or other special circum-"stances, is specially liable to cause "accidents, such a handrail shall be "provided and maintained on both "sides. Any open side of a staircase "shall also be guarded by the provi-"sion and maintenance of a lower rail "or other effective means."

C. A.
1960
Kimpton v. Steel Co. of Wales Ltd.

The three steps had been placed in position at the time of the construction of the part of the factory in which they were located in 1951, and there had been no mishap in regard to them. The steps were just over three feet in height, and gave access to and means of descent from a table or platform or cat-walk. The steps were made of steel, and the treads of the steps were studded so as to give a better foothold or grip.

The steps were not attached to the building, that is the steps were not built into the building in any way; they were removable or detachable. But they were a solid structure of considerable weight and were wedged in securely, there being an inset into the uppermost step of some part of the platform which prevented lateral movement.

The plaintiff claimed damages against the defendants in respect of his injuries, alleging negligence by the defendants at common law and breach of statutory duty. At the trial, the plaintiff alleged that the steps wobbled and were unsafe so that there was a breach of section 26 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and that at the time of the accident they were greasy and oily so that there was a breach of section 25 (1) of the Act of 1937. The judge rejected both these allegations and there was no appeal in respect of them. The plaintiff further contended that at common law the defendants ought to have provided a handrail, and that the same duty was imposed on them by section 25 (2) of the Act of 1937. The judge accepted both these contentions and awarded the plaintiff damages. The defendants appealed. The case is only reported on the construction of statute.

John Thompson Q.C. and Alun T. Davies for the defendants.
F. Elwyn Jones Q.C. and David Pennant for the plaintiff.

The following cases on the construction of the statute were cited in argument, in addition to those referred to in the judgments: Harrison v. National Coal Board[2]; Legge v. Alan West & Co. Ltd.[3]

Sellers L.J. The court is indebted to counsel for their argument in what is, I think, on both points a difficult case. [His Lordship then stated the facts, read section 25 (2) of the Factories Act, 1937, and continued:]

The judge has found that the three steps were a staircase within the meaning of section 25 (2) of the Factories Act, 1937, and, he held, therefore, that there had been a breach of that section by there not being any handrail or, as it would have required, two handrails. He, also, found liability at common law.

Both points (which on the face of it seem quite simple matters) have created some difficulty. The judge has stated in his judgment the arguments whether these three movable steps should be called a "staircase" or not, and, having so done, he came to the conclusion that they did constitute a "staircase." Reference was made to section 25 (1), which provides: "All "floors, steps, stairs, passages and gangways shall be of sound "construction," drawing a distinction between "steps" and "stairs," as indeed there is or may be. Subsection (2) does not repeat the terms "steps" or "stairs" but refers to a "staircase."

[2] [1951] A.C. 639; [1951] 1 T.L.R. 1079; [1951] 1 All E.R. 1102, H.L.

[3] Unreported, C.A., March 4, 1957.

The judgment likewise sets out the material parts of dictionary definitions of what may be a "staircase" and a "flight" of steps, or a "series" of steps. I think there is little doubt that on the strict dictionary definition one might say that these three steps fell within a dictionary definition. The judge, however, I think rightly, did not decide this point on a strict dictionary definition. He was no doubt guided by it (as any court would be), and arrived at his conclusion having considered what those definitions were. He took the view, looking at all the circumstances of the case, that this particular structure was a "staircase."

The approach to this matter must be I think, first of all, to recognise that the Act of 1937 does not itself define a "staircase" or, indeed, a "step" or "stairs." It is dealing with the safety of factories, and using words which have to be considered in the ordinary everyday fulfilment of what is required by its remedial and protecting measures, what is required to be done. I think that the whole Act has regard to what is the ordinary description of things in a factory.

The matter is not without some authority and we were referred to the observations of Somervell L.J. in Bath v. British Transport Commission.[1] That case was referred to in a later case which came before this court, Tate v. Swan Hunter & Wigham Richardson Ltd.,[2] in which Morris L.J. referred to what Somervell L.J. had said in the earlier case in this way[3]: "I find myself, "in approaching this case, feeling very much as Somervell L.J. "did when he expressed himself in his judgment in Bath v. "British Transport Commission. In that case it was held that "it was impossible to regard an excavation which constitutes a "dry dock as an 'opening' within the meaning of subsection (3) "of section 25, and Somervell L.J., in this court, said[4]: 'I do "'not think that I can add much on that point. One is some-"'times tempted to construe perfectly familiar words, but if they "'are, as these words are, perfectly familiar, all one can do is to "'state whether or not one regards them as apt to cover or "'describe the circumstances in question in any particular

[1] [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1013, 1015; [1954] 2 All E.R. 542, C.A.
[2] [1958] 1 W.L.R. 39; [1958] 1 All E.R. 150, C.A.
[3] [1958] 1 W.L.R. 39, 44.
[4] [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1013, 1015.

C. A.
1960
Kimpton v. Steel Co. of Wales Ltd.
Sellers L.J.

"'case.'" That particular case, which Morris L.J. was considering, concerned the definition of the word "floor." We have been referred further by Mr. Thompson to some observations of Lord Reid in Richard Thomas & Baldwins Ltd. v. Cummings,[5] where the noble Lord said: "The fact that the interpretation for "which the respondent contends would lead to so unreasonable "a result is, in my opinion, sufficient to require the more limited "meaning of 'in motion' to be adopted unless there is some very "strong objection to it, and none was suggested. It is true that "the Factories Act is a remedial statute, and one should there-"fore lean towards giving a wide interpretation to it, but that "does not justify interpreting an ambiguous provision in a way "which leads to quite unreasonable results."

Approaching this question on the facts of this case, I have formed the view that it would be unreasonable to require that these few steps should be dealt with in the way that section 25 (2) provides, and that, looking at the matter from the approach which these cases indicate, it could not be said that this was a "stair-"case." It is not the way it would be described; indeed, it was not the way it was described by the witnesses in the case who were familiar with it.

There was a somewhat similar set of steps, although one cannot usefully make comparisons with those in different premises, which came for consideration before this court in Rogers v. News of the World. That case, in which judgment was given on November 19, 1958, is unreported. The photographs of the stairway in Rogers' case were made available to this court by counsel for the defendants, as Mr. Thompson appeared there for the appellant. Lord Evershed M.R. said: "The first question . . . is this: do these "three steps constitute a 'staircase' within the meaning of "subsection (2) of section 25 of the Act? If you get into a debate "upon the meaning of the words 'steps,' 'stairs,' 'stairway,' "'staircase,' you find yourself, I think, in an atmosphere which "might have been appropriate to the ancient sophists; but I "agree with the judge that the construction of these words in this "Act, which are ordinary English words, must be determined "according to the ordinary standards of common sense; and if "that is right, I would myself avoid any attempt at definition "and philosophical discussion; I would confine myself to the "question posed as I have earlier posed it—looking at these three "steps as there illustrated in these photographs, do they "constitute a 'staircase' within the meaning of subsection (2) of "section 25 of the Act? With all respect to Mr. Thompson's "argument, attractive as it always is, I must say that I would "answer that question unhesitatingly in the negative."

I recognise that it is not a highly scientific basis on which to base a conclusion, but it is a very practical one, and I think one to be preferred to a rigid attempt to apply a dictionary definition disregarding the setting and the background in which this Act has to be construed and applied. [His Lordship then considered the judge's alternative finding that the defendants had been negligent at common law in not providing a handrail, and held that that finding was justified. He continued:] I differ from the judge with regret on the first point with regard to the staircase. I think it is a difficult point. I prefer the other view supported as it is by authority. I would uphold the judge on the second point.

[5] [1955] A.C. 321, 334; [1955] 2 W.L.R. 293; [1955] 1 All E.R. 285, H.L.

I would therefore dismiss the appeal on that ground.

ORMEROD L.J. I agree, and I would only add a few words as we are differing from the judge on the question of whether there is a breach of statutory duty in the present case.

Section 25 (2) of the Factories Act provides: "For every stair-"case in a building or affording a means of exit from a building, "a substantial handrail shall be provided and maintained. . . ." The question is whether the structure in this case (which has been variously described, but generally described by the witnesses in the case as "steps") can be regarded as a "staircase" within the meaning of that section. Mr. Elwyn Jones has submitted that the proper approach to this question is what I may term the dictionary approach, and has argued that the definitions of the words "staircase" and "flight" as given in the Oxford English Dictionary are wide enough to cover this particular structure. I have no doubt that, if one relies on the definitions, Mr. Elwyn Jones is perfectly right in that submission, but that, in my view, is not the way that this matter must be approached. As Somervell L.J. said in Bath v. British Transport Commission[6]: ". . . if they are, as these words are, perfectly familiar, all one "can do is to say whether or not one regards them as apt to cover "or describe the circumstances in question in any particular case." The word "staircase" is one with which we are perfectly familiar, and one which is in common and daily use in our language. As I see it, the way to approach the question is to ask oneself whether in the circumstances, looking at this structure, one can properly say that it would be described as a "staircase." In my judgment, looking at the photograph and plan of this structure (which is, of course, all we have before us), it is not a staircase and, therefore, section 25 (2) does not apply to it.

[His Lordship then considered the issue of common law liability, and held that the judge's conclusion was right.]

UPJOHN L.J. I agree. I only desire to add a very few words because Mr. Elwyn Jones has invited us to clarify the law for the future by giving a definition to the word "staircase" to be found in section 25 of the Factories Act, 1937, and, in particular, to adopt the definition to be found in the Oxford Dictionary. It is to be observed, however, that the Act itself has carefully refrained

[6] [1954] 1 W.L.R. 1013, 1015.

C. A.
1960
Kimpton v. Steel Co. of Wales Ltd.
Upjohn J.

from any such definition. I think it would be wrong for this court to attempt to do so. Whether a structure is or is not a staircase must depend on the circumstances and facts in each particular case, and it is not possible to lay down any rule of general application.

When the court has to consider the meaning of ordinary words in common use in the English language such as "staircase," "floor," "steps," "stairs," "passages" and "gangways," the court must apply its own general knowledge and common sense to the solution of the problem. A dictionary may in some cases be of assistance, but it certainly provides no sure guide to the ultimate solution of the problem.

Like my Lords, having given the matter the best consideration I can, I have come to the conclusion that the structure in this case is quite clearly not a "staircase" for the purposes of the Act, though it may fall within the definition in the Oxford Dictionary.

[His Lordship then said that he agreed with the judge's finding on common law liability, and would dismiss the appeal on that ground.]

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: Kenneth Brown, Baker, Baker, for Gee & Edwards, Swansea; Rowley Ashworth & Co.

N. P.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.
1960
March 10, 11.
Lord Evershed M.R., Pearce and Harman L.JJ.

* HENRY BRIGGS, SON & CO. LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.

Revenue — Profits tax — Nationalised industry — Compensation — Dividends paid by subsidiary, a former colliery company in receipt of interim income payments—Subsidiary company remaining in being solely to receive compensation—Whether had "function" of holding property—Dividends received by parent company not "franked investment income"—Finance Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 54), s. 19 (4), Sch. 4, para. 7 (1A) (as substituted by Finance Act, 1947 (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 35), s. 32 (1)).

By section 19 (4) of the Finance Act, 1937: "Where the functions of a company . . . consist wholly or mainly in the holding of "investments or other property, the holding . . . shall be deemed "for the purpose of this section [the charging section for the tax "now known as profits tax] to be a business carried on by the "company . . ."

After the nationalisation of the coal industry in 1946 B. C. Ltd., a subsidiary of H. B., Son & Co. Ltd., and formerly a colliery company, decided that the company would remain in being for the purpose of receiving the compensation provided by the nationalising Act but would not embark on any trade or other activity. The compensation was finally paid in 1955 but in the meantime the company received certain interim payments and paid dividends to the parent company. The parent company appealed against assessments to profits tax on the ground that the dividends received from the subsidiary had been included in the computation of the profits. It was submitted that they ought to have been excluded because the subsidiary company was to be deemed for the purposes of section 19 (4) of the Act of 1937 to be carrying on the business of holding property, that is the right to receive the compensation, and so was franked investment income as defined by paragraph 7 (1A) of the Fourth Schedule:—

Held, that as from the date when the nationalisation came into force the subsidiary company had deliberately determined to have, and had in fact had, no function or activity whatever, and was not, therefore, within section 19 (4) carrying on the business of a property holding company.

Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Desoutter Bros. (1945) 62 T.L.R. 110; [1945] 2 All E.R. 532; 29 T.C. 155 applied.

Per Harman L.J. The statement in Carpet Agencies v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (1958) 38 T.C. 223, that in order for a company to come within section 19 (4) it must be shown that the function of making money by holding investments has "always . . . "or for a considerable time" been a function of the company, requires qualification by omitting the long continuance of that function.

Decision of Upjohn J. affirmed.

APPEAL from Upjohn J.

Henry Briggs, Son & Co. Ltd. (hereinafter called the "parent "company") appealed to the special commissioners against assessments to profits tax for chargeable accounting periods commencing on January 2, 1947, and ending on July 18, 1951, when the parent company went into liquidation. The question was whether the parent company was liable to include in the computation of its profits for the purposes of profits tax certain dividends received by the parent company between January 1, 1947, and April 20, 1951, from a wholly-owned subsidiary, Briggs Collieries Ltd. (hereinafter called "Briggs").

The facts proved or admitted before the commissioners (with certain amendments agreed at the hearing before Upjohn J. as to the composition of the boards and the dates at which the subsidiary Briggs went into liquidation) included the following:

(a) The parent company was incorporated on April 5, 1865, as a company limited by shares with a capital of £135,000. By special resolutions from time to time passed the capital was altered and ultimately (at July 18, 1951) the issued share capital was 710,000 5s. shares. The objects for which the company was established according to its memorandum of association were those of a colliery company. On incorporation the parent company took over the trade of coal mining previously carried on at Whitwood (near Leeds) and elsewhere by a partnership under the name of Henry Briggs & Son.

(b) The parent company held shares in a number of subsidiary companies. . . .

C. A.
1960
HENRY BRIGGS, SON & CO. LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMRS.

(c) In 1939 the parent company [with two subsidiaries] promoted a scheme under the Mining Industry Act, 1926, the Coal Mines Act, 1930, and the Coal Act, 1938, for the amalgamation of the trade carried on by them and for the formation of a new company to be called Briggs Collieries Ltd., to acquire and carry on the coal mining activities of the three companies. . . .

(d) Briggs Collieries Ltd. was incorporated on July 1, 1939, with a share capital of £1,200,000 divided into 1,000,000 ordinary shares of £1 each and 200,000 6 per cent. non-cumulative redeemable preference shares of £1 each, all of which were issued fully paid to the parent company.

(e) On July 1, 1939, Briggs acquired the colliery undertakings owned by the parent company and by [one of the subsidiaries], together with all property and assets owned and used in connection therewith, and carried on such undertakings thereafter.

(f) Subsequent to July 1, 1939, the parent company owned and operated a brick works, a lime quarry and (until 1940) a gas works. It also held 1,500 acres (more or less) of agricultural land originally acquired for the more convenient working of its collieries with approximately 400 leasehold houses. Such houses were previously occupied by its colliery employees but subsequent to July, 1939, were occupied mainly by the colliery employees of Briggs.

. . . . . .

(h) . . . The profit and loss account of the parent company for the year ended June 30, 1946, showed that out of total receipts amounting to £136,980 net dividends of £119,592 were received from Briggs so that by far the largest item of its receipts were the dividends from Briggs.

(i) The trade or trades of the parent company and of Briggs were closely integrated. Thus the parent company acquired all coal used in its brick works and in its lime quarry from Briggs. Approximately one-third of the bricks produced at the parent company's brick works were sold to Briggs for use in the collieries. The leasehold houses owned by the parent company were almost entirely occupied by colliery officials and workmen employed by Briggs, and the minerals underlying the land owned by the parent company were worked by Briggs.

(j) Of the ten members of the board of directors of the parent company at this time five were members of the board of Briggs, and of the eight members of the board of Briggs five were members of the board of the parent company. Such five common members were persons skilled in mining and matters connected therewith. The chairman of the parent company . . . was a member of the board of Briggs and was also general manager of Briggs. Of the five common members all were employed full-time by Briggs in various positions and were paid directors' fees by the parent company only. They received no directors' fees for their position as directors of Briggs.

(k) The day-to-day business of Briggs was managed by the board of directors of Briggs, which had informal conversations every day and a formal board meeting every month. Such formal meeting was held at 9.30 a.m. and was followed the same morning by a board meeting of the parent company. Although the board of Briggs had the normal powers and duties of a board of directors it was instructed by the board of the parent company to obtain the prior consent of the latter before it incurred expenditure upon any item of plant or otherwise amounting to more than £10,000 for one item, and if a question had arisen as to the acquisition of further seams of coal contiguous to those belonging to Briggs and the taking of leases for the working of such seams the ultimate decision would have rested with the board of the parent company. In addition to the five common members the board of the parent company had on it five persons who had no experience of mining but who had wide experience in the field of commerce. In regard therefore to any question upon which the board of Briggs had to obtain the consent of the board of the parent company the common members, who had already voted in favour of such expenditure, were in effect required to have their judgment considered and ratified by persons of wide experience outside mining.

(l) On January 1, 1947, the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946 . . . [came into force and all the] colliery assets owned by Briggs [and appearing in its balance sheet at £1,003,359] were transferred to the National Coal Board. A right to compensation in respect of the assets so vested accrued to Briggs and a like right accrued to the parent company in respect of the leasehold land still vested in it. Such land appeared in the balance sheet of the parent company at £80,318. [The parent company continued to carry on its other activities which were unaffected by the Coal Acts.]

(m) With the vesting of its assets in the National Coal Board the colliery trade of Briggs ceased, and the cessation provisions of the Income Tax Acts at that date contained in section 31 of the Finance Act, 1926, were applied. The board was reduced to four persons. Three of the directors who resigned from the board did so to take up posts with the National Coal Board, and a member who left the board in 1947 also took up employment with the National Coal Board. All executive and managerial staff below board level were transferred to employment under the National Coal Board on or shortly after January 1, 1947. No effort was made by Briggs to embark upon any other trade, but the whole energies of its directors were devoted towards the ascertainment and obtaining of the compensation to which it was entitled under the Coal Acts. This process was long and arduous, involving the furnishing of many particulars and the making of extensive valuations. The first payment of lump sum compensation under sections 10–21 of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946, was made in May, 1948, and the final payment in June, 1955. Payments of interim income received under section 22 of the Act of 1946 and section 1 (2) of the amending Act of

C. A.
1960
Henry Briggs, Son & Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs.

1949 were received from time to time, the first payment being in October, 1947, and the last payment in August, 1955. The company paid dividends out of such interim income from time to time to the parent company. It was always the intention that so soon as Briggs had recovered the compensation to which it was entitled under the Coal Acts it should go into liquidation, and it was in fact put into liquidation on October 17, 1952.

(n) The directors of the parent company realised by August, 1946, that their subsidiary Briggs would shortly lose all its trading assets and that with the exception of the comparatively small activities carried on by it the parent company would possess no trading activity and be in possession of a very considerable amount of investments. Accordingly, in August, 1946, they issued to their shareholders a circular in which they pointed out the position to their shareholders. They stated in the circular that, when the subsidiary Briggs had obtained its compensation and paid it over, the parent company would find itself substantially in the position of an ordinary investment holding company, a position which they considered far removed from the original business for which the company was formed. They added that they were advised that to conduct the business of an investment holding company would not be within the legal powers of the company, being outside the objects set out in its memorandum of association. They, therefore, invited the shareholders' consideration of a scheme of reorganisation of the company, under which it would amalgamate with a trust company in which over 75 per cent. of the shareholders in the parent company were already interested, such amalgamated company becoming an investment holding company. At the same time they pointed out that in the event of some such scheme being adopted the opportunity might later present itself of applying the resources of the company, or some of them, in the enlargement of the present commercial activities of the parent company not taken over by the Coal Board, or in some new activity. A questionnaire was enclosed with this circular asking for the views of shareholders. In the years 1947 and 1948 the directors of the parent company examined the prospects of purchasing three possible businesses, each of which was in some way connected with mining, and in regard to which the mining skill and experience of the directors would be of value, but in the end none of these three businesses was found to be suitable. After this the directors found that the preparation and prosecution of the claims for compensation under the Coal Acts were of such complexity, and demanded so much time, that they felt that they should devote all the time and energy of the small number of personnel remaining in the service of the company towards these objects, and that they should cease to seek for fresh businesses. By the beginning of 1949 it was felt that some part of the large amount of liquid assets in the possession of the company should be returned to shareholders, and under a scheme sanctioned by the High Court in March, 1949, 15s. in the pound was returned to shareholders. During the latter months of 1950 and the first three months of 1951 the parent company proceeded to realise its investments. On July 18, 1951, the parent company went into liquidation.

(o) By election of the parent company made in 1948, pursuant to section 22 of the Finance Act, 1937, the profits of the parent company and of Briggs were amalgamated for the purposes of profits tax. This treatment was withdrawn by the Inland Revenue in 1953 following on a decision of the special commissioners promulgated in another case.

It was contended on behalf of the parent company: (i) that the sole trade carried on by Briggs prior to January 1, 1947, was that of colliery owner, and that that trade necessarily ceased by virtue of the Coal Industry Nationalisation Act, 1946; (ii) that from January 1, 1947, Briggs was entitled to compensation under the Coal Industry Nationalisation Acts, and that such right was a right of property; (iii) that from January 1, 1947, the functions of Briggs consisted wholly or mainly in the holding of the said property; (iv) that the dividends, received by the parent company from Briggs from January 1, 1947, onwards, were therefore franked investment income; (v) that from July 1, 1939, the trades or businesses of the parent company comprised the making of bricks, the quarrying of lime, the distribution of gas and the ownership and management of the colliery undertaking of Briggs; (vi) that on January 1, 1947, with the vesting of the colliery undertaking of Briggs in the National Coal Board, the trade or business of the parent company (in so far as it consisted in the ownership and management of such colliery undertaking) necessarily ceased; (vii) that the dividends received by the parent company from January 1, 1947, from Briggs were not therefore profits arising from any trade or business carried on by the parent company during the chargeable accounting periods relevant; and (viii) that the parent company's shareholding at and after January 1, 1947, in Briggs, was not an investment in any way related to the trade or business carried on by the parent company during such chargeable accounting periods.

It was contended on behalf of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that the dividends received from Briggs from January 1, 1947, onwards were to be included in the computation of its profits because the company was throughout a company whose business consisted wholly or mainly in the holding of investments or other property within section 19 (4) of the Finance Act, 1937, and that such dividends related both before and after January 1, 1947, to such trade or business. Such dividends were not exempt as franked investment income because after January, 1947, Briggs carried on no trade or business to which section 19 of the Finance Act, 1937, applied.

The special commissioners decided, first, that the dividends received from Briggs were profits of the trade or business which the parent company was deemed to carry on. On the further question whether the dividends were franked investment income as being income received by way of a dividend or distribution of profits from a body corporate carrying on a business to which section 19 (4) of the Finance Act, 1937, applied, they decided that although the rights to compensation enjoyed by Briggs were "property," the functions of Briggs did not consist wholly or mainly in the holding of that property. Briggs was only kept in existence after December 31, 1946, so that the rights to which it was entitled might be realised and liquidated as early as possible. Accordingly, they decided that the dividends were not franked investment income. The parent company appealed but Upjohn J. affirmed the commissioners' decision on both questions. The parent company appealed on the second question.

C. A.
1960
HENRY BRIGGS, SON & CO. LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMRS.

Sir John Senter Q.C., Desmond Miller and Neil Elles for the parent company.

John Foster Q.C. and Alan Orr for the Crown.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgments, were cited in argument: Whitworth Park Coal Co. Ltd. (In Liquidation) v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [1]; Costa Rica Railway Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners [2]; Edwards v. Bairstow [3]; Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Westleigh Estate Co. Ltd. heard with Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Eccentric Club Ltd. [4]; South Behar Railway Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.

LORD EVERSHED M.R. By section 19 of the Finance Act, 1937, which constituted and defined the scope of what was then called National Defence Contribution, and is now known as profits tax, it was provided by subsection (2) that, subject to what was provided in later paragraphs in the section, "the trades and "businesses to which this section applies are all trades or busi-"nesses of any description carried on in the United Kingdom, or "carried on," as there described, "by persons ordinarily resident "in the United Kingdom." Subsection (4), which is the subsection particularly involved in this appeal, reads: "Where the "functions of a company . . . incorporated by or under any "enactment consist wholly or mainly in the holding of invest-"ments or other property, the holding of the investments or "property shall be deemed for the purpose of this section to be a "business carried on by the company . . ." [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:]

The facts show that the compensation which Briggs was entitled to receive was finally paid in or about the year 1955; but

[1] [1959] 3 W.L.R. 842; [1959] 3 All E.R. 703, H.L.

[2] (1942) 29 T.C. 34.

[3] [1956] A.C. 14; [1955] 3 W.L.R. 410; [1955] 3 All E.R. 48; 36 T.C. 207, H.L.

[4] [1925] A.C. 476; 41 T.L.R. 328; 12 T.C. 657, H.L.

in October, 1952, Briggs went into liquidation. What is more important is the finding of fact in the case stated that from the time when the Nationalisation Act operated Briggs ceased any activity whatever. It is stated in paragraph (m) of the case as follows: "No effort was made by Briggs to embark upon any "other trade, but the whole energies of its directors were devoted "towards the ascertainment and obtaining of the compensation "to which it was entitled under the Coal Acts"; and after stating that the process was long and arduous, the case goes on to point out that the decision was made, when the Act operated, that this company would embark on no other activity—and I deliberately use that word—but would await the receipt, or, at least, the final ascertainment, of the compensation, and would then go into liquidation. In the meantime, however, in accordance with the Nationalisation Act it received from time to time what were called interim income payments, and out of those income payments, or out of other resources which it had, it paid from time to time dividends to the parent company.

The terms of the Act of 1937 were in some sense modified by later provisions, particularly by the Finance Act, 1947. I need not, however, take time upon the modifications. It is sufficient to say that in certain circumstances income received by the parent company might be treated as "franked investment income" as defined in the Acts of 1937 and 1947, and as such would not be taken into account for purposes of profits tax assessment. There is now no doubt, because any point to the contrary is no longer put forward, that the parent company falls within one or other of the subsections of section 19 of the Finance Act, 1937, which I have read, so that it is itself liable to profits tax, and its liability can only be limited if it can show as regards the dividends from its subsidiary, Briggs, which I understand formed a most substantial part of the total income, that they were franked investment income; and they would fall within that definition if it could be said that for the relevant accounting periods Briggs fell within the scope of subsection (4).

The point, therefore, in this appeal, is narrowed to the single point, capable of short and simple statement: after the coming into operation of the Coal Nationalisation Act, 1946, and in the light of the decisions of the subsidiary company as I have extracted them from the case, can it be said that the functions of Briggs consisted wholly or mainly in the holding of property, so that the holding of that property should be deemed for the purposes of the section to be a business carried on by Briggs? The right, under the statute, which Briggs had to obtain, when ascertained, the compensation, and to receive in the meantime interim income or other payments, is conceded for the purpose of this case (and, I should have thought, rightly conceded) as a species of property; so that it can be said that Briggs at any rate held—that is to say, owned, or was possessed of—that right, that species of property; but so to say is not to conclude the matter in favour

C. A.
1960
Henry Briggs, Son & Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs.
Lord Evershed M.R.

of the parent company because it must be shown, first of all, of Briggs, as regards each accounting period, that its "functions" consisted wholly—and I can leave out "or mainly"—in the holding of investments or other property. In the end of all, therefore, the matter turns upon the significance and the use of the word "functions." Upjohn J. came to the conclusion that Briggs did not fall within the subsection. "Functions," he said at the end of his judgment, referring to the observations of Atkinson J. in the case he cited of Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Buxton Palace Hotel Ltd.,[1] "may be defined as being an activity "appropriate to any business of the company. Is the company "holding property as an activity appropriate to its business? A "company whose business is temporarily stopped by requisition "does not satisfy that test; nor does one which has given up "trading." "They do not bind me," says Upjohn J. of these observations, "because in this field every case depends on its "own facts once the true meaning of the word 'functions' has "been determined; and in this case it is true to say that Briggs "never could re-enter into its colliery activities. Nevertheless, "on ceasing to trade as a colliery company, a company might do "one of several things. It might decide to engage in some other "trading activity, in which case, in my judgment, it would remain "a trading company: it might decide to become an investment "trust company, in which case it seems to me clear that it would "engage in a new business of holding property. If it does neither, "but resolves to wind up, it does not seem to me to gain any new "character in the sense of carrying on an activity of holding "property as being appropriate to its business. It really has no "business."

I will say at once that I have myself come to the conclusion that the judgment of Upjohn J. is correct, and should be affirmed. The only way, as it seems to me, by which the parent company could escape from the conclusion stated in the light of the facts, is to say that the phrase "shall be deemed for the purpose of "this section to be a business carried on . . .", etc., imported this: that the subsection contemplated a case in which there was really no business but there was nonetheless deemed to be a business if the earlier part of the subsection was satisfied. But even so, that earlier part of the subsection must be satisfied. It must be shown, in other words, that of Briggs it could truly be said it had the function or functions of holding property. Unless that is done, it seems to me that subsection (4) must inevitably cover every case one can think of, whether it is active or passive, or whatever the company is doing or not doing. So I think the judge concluded rightly that the matter must turn upon the significance of "functions," and in its context I agree with him that it cannot be said of a company that it has the "function" of holding property if, as in this case, it has deliberately determined to have no function, no activity in any business sense whatever; if it said: "We make no further plan; "we will do nothing; we will simply wait until the money due to "us is paid and then we shall go into liquidation."

[1] (1948) 29 T.C. 329, 334.

The view taken by the judge gets some support from certain language used by my predecessor, Lord Greene M.R., in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Desoutter Bros.[2] That case related not to the language of the Act with which we are concerned, but to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939. But subsection (4) of section 12 of that Act is in terms identical with the subsection of the Act of 1937 with which we are concerned. Lord Greene M.R. said[3]: "I "should have thought that the objects of that subsection were "manifest. In my view it was intended, and quite clearly "intended, to bring into the net a type of corporation which "otherwise would or might have escaped it. The commonest "type of corporation with which the subsection is dealing is what "may be called a trust investment company, whose business is "the holding of investments and deriving income from them. "Such a corporation would not be said to be carrying on a "'trade or business' within the meaning of subsection (1)." To be within the meaning of subsection (1) would involve it also being within the meaning of subsection (2) of the section there under review, which in turn corresponds with subsection (2) of the Act of 1937. "Anyhow," Lord Greene M.R. said, "if it "were not absolutely clear, subsection (4) makes it quite certain "that that type of corporation is to be included, and its opera-"tions are to be regarded as the carrying on of a trade or business. "That seems to me to be the real and sole object of sub-"section (4)." Whether that statement puts the matter rather more strongly than I might, if the question were entirely free, put it myself, I need not consider. I was troubled, because it seemed to suggest that one could not say of a trust investment company properly so called that it was carrying on a business, although in one of his sentences Lord Greene M.R. said that such would be the case. If for "trust investment company" one substitutes "property company" (of the kind commonly met with) Lord Greene M.R.'s statement would, I venture to think, be free from difficulty. But however that may be, Lord Greene M.R. may well have intended no more than to say that if there should be any argument whether such a company was or was not within subsection (2), the purpose of subsection (4) was to make it clear. In any case, as I have said, on the particular facts of this case, whatever might be said as regards other cases, I have concluded, for the reasons indicated by Upjohn J., that this company, Briggs, had not got at the relevant date or dates, "functions," and had certainly not got functions of the kind indicated in the first two lines of the subsection.

Sir John Senter referred to certain other cases. He relied

[2] 62 T.L.R. 110; [1946] 1 All E.R. 58; 29 T.C. 155, C.A.

[3] 29 T.C. 155, 160.

C. A.
1960
Henry Briggs, Son & Co. Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs.
Lord Evershed M.R.

particularly upon certain language in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Butterley Co. Ltd.,[4] and in Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Parkhouse Collieries Ltd.[5]. I do not think, upon the final point on which this case turns, that those passages really assist. No doubt the rights conferred by the Coal Nationalisation Act were of a somewhat special kind, and as I have already said, they were proprietary. That they constitute a form of property is not in dispute, and the precise question with which we are concerned was not before the court in either the Butterley[6] or the Parkhouse[7] cases. I shall not, therefore, I hope, be thought disrespectful to Sir John Senter's argument if I make no further reference to those cases but confine myself to saying, as I have already done more than once, that I agree in the end of all with the conclusion of the judge and with his reasons for it, and I would, accordingly, dismiss the appeal.

Pearce L.J. I agree with what my Lord has said. In my opinion the view taken by the trial judge was correct, and I would dismiss the appeal.

Harman L.J. I also agree. Counsel for the Crown cited to the court a decision of mine on this subject, a case called Carpet Agencies Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.[8] I am there reported to have said that in order to get within section 19 (4) it must be proved not merely that the company is one that happens to hold some income-bearing investments, but that one of its functions—that is to say, one of its purposes—has always been, or has been for a considerable time, the making of money by the holding of investments. I want to say I think that puts it too high. I do not think one needs to say "has always been or has "been for a considerable time,"[9] but I do adhere to the part which says that one of its purposes is the holding of investments. Unless one can get so far one cannot get within the subsection. Subject to that, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.
Leave to appeal to House of Lords refused.

Solicitors: Thicknesse & Hull; Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

E. D.

[4] [1957] A.C. 32; [1956] 2 W.L.R. 1101; [1956] 2 All E.R. 197; 36 T.C. 411, H.L.
[5] (1955–56) 36 T.C. 675, C.A.
[6] [1957] A.C. 32.
[7] 36 T.C. 675.
[8] (1958) 38 T.C. 223.
[9] Ibid. 230.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

* STANTON v. EWART F. YOULDON LTD.

1960
Jan. 20, 21.

McNair J.

[1956 S. No. 3788.]

Fatal Accidents Acts — Damages — Funeral expenses — Tombstone — Erection of memorial over grave six months after funeral—Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934 (24 & 25 Geo. 5, c. 41), ss. 1 (2) (c), 2 (3).

The plaintiff, as executor, sued on behalf of himself and of his deceased wife's estate for damages in respect of her death. The plaintiff lived in comfortable circumstances and he received approximately £1,500 as sole beneficiary under his wife's will. His claim included a sum of £194 15s. for a marble memorial erected over his wife's grave six months after her death. No other stone had been erected over the grave:—

Held, that £40 of this sum should be allowed as the expense of a simple gravestone, which might properly be considered as part of the funeral expenses disbursed on behalf of the estate and so recoverable under section 1 (2) (c) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934,[1] if it were a reasonable expenditure for persons in the position of the deceased and of the relatives who were responsible for the actual ordering of the stone; but that in so far as the expense was merely of a memorial set up as a sign of love and affection, it was not recoverable.

Per curiam: Such reasonable expenditure may also be allowed upon a claim under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, by reason of section 2 (3) of the Act of 1934, notwithstanding that the plaintiff can prove no dependency, but such a claim must be subject to any benefits received from the estate, other than insurance benefits.

ACTION.

The plaintiff, Isaac Steingold Stanton, claimed as executor of the estate of his wife, Sarah Steingold Stanton, deceased, damages for her estate under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and on his own behalf as widower damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, in respect of injuries suffered by her in a road accident on January 28, 1956, and her death consequential thereon on February 6, 1956. The defendants, Ewart F. Youldon Ltd., admitted that the injuries and death were caused by the negligent driving of their servant or agent.

[Reported by GROVE HULL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.]

[1] Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, s. 1: "(2) Where "a cause of action survives as aforesaid for the benefit of the estate "of a deceased person, the damages "recoverable for the benefit of the "estate of that person—. . . (c) where "the death of that person has been "caused by the act of omission which "gives rise to the cause of action, "shall be calculated without reference "to any loss or gain to his estate consequent on his death, except that a "sum in respect of funeral expenses "may be included."

S. 2: "(3) In an action brought "under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 "to 1908, damages may be awarded "in respect of the funeral expenses of "the deceased person if such expenses "have been incurred by the parties for "whose benefit the action is brought."

1960

Stanton
v.
Ewart F.
Youldon
Ltd.

The plaintiff and his wife lived in comfortable circumstances. At the time of the accident they had been married for 42 years and the deceased was nearly 70 years old; she had suffered a mild cerebral thrombosis and suffered also from diabetes. The medical evidence was that her expectation of life was between five and seven years. During the nine days for which she lived after the accident, although suffering from severe injuries, she received only mild sedation and remained conscious and able to converse with her relatives. Under his wife's will the plaintiff received, as sole beneficiary, approximately £1,500.

By the statement of claim the plaintiff claimed, inter alia, damages for funeral expenses and also £194 15s., the cost of a memorial erected by him over his wife's grave about six months after her death; no other stone was erected. The plaintiff also claimed under other heads under the Fatal Accidents Act, but these claims were withdrawn at the trial. The remainder of the facts relevant to the point reported are set out in the judgment.

The case is reported solely upon the question whether the cost of the memorial was recoverable.

Glynn Blackledge Q.C. and L. J. Solley for the plaintiff.

N. R. Fox-Andrews Q.C. and Hugh Griffiths for the defendants.

The following case, which was not referred to in the judgment, was cited in argument: Hart v. Griffiths-Jones.[2]

January 21. McNair J. stated the facts set out above, awarded £75 damages for the deceased's loss of expectation of life and a further £75 for her pain and suffering, and continued: As regards the funeral expenses, the position both in fact and in law is a little more difficult. The legal position is that section 1 (2) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, provides: "Where a cause of action survives as aforesaid for the "benefit of the estate of a deceased person, the damages recover-"able for the benefit of the estate of that person—. . . (c) where "the death of that person has been caused by the act or omission "which gives rise to the cause of action, shall be calculated "without reference to any loss or gain to his estate consequent "on his death, except that a sum in respect of funeral expenses "may be included." It is clear, on the construction of that provision, that it enables the court to award damages in respect of funeral expenses to the extent that funeral expenses have been reasonably and properly incurred as a liability of the estate, and I do not think from that point of view that it matters whether the bills were in the first place paid out of the executor's account, as long as it can fairly and properly be said that those funeral expenses were expenses which were a liability of the estate.

[2] [1948] 2 All E.R. 729.

As regards the claim for funeral expenses made by the plaintiff on his own behalf under the Fatal Accidents Act, the position now is that section 2 (3) of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, provides: "In an action brought under the "Fatal Accidents Acts . . . damages may be awarded in respect "of the funeral expenses of the deceased person if such expenses "have been incurred by the parties for whose benefit the action "is brought." It seems to me that the legal position is that under the Fatal Accidents Act the plaintiff in this case can claim damages in respect of the funeral expenses which he has incurred, provided they are reasonable, notwithstanding that he has no other claim under that Act—notwithstanding that he can prove no dependency—but that his claim for the payment of damages for funeral expenses, like any other claim by a claimant under the Fatal Accidents Act, is subject to any benefit which he may have received from the estate other than those benefits which are expressly excluded by the Fatal Accidents Acts, namely, recoveries of insurance. That seems to me to be the legal position, and I now approach the factual position as regards the funeral expenses in this case. [His Lordship, having considered the facts, held that sums totalling £18 had been proved to have been disbursed by the plaintiff and were funeral expenses which were properly the liability of the estate. He continued:]

There remains for consideration an item of £194 15s., which was the amount of an account by J. Samuel & Sons, monumental masons. That account was rendered on August 27, 1956, and it covers the following items: "To marble memorial erected over "the grave of Sarah Stanton including 120 lead letters, £155; "to synagogue fees, £34 10s.; to 90 extra letters at 1s. 2d. each, "£5 5s.," making a total of £194 15s. That was paid by the plaintiff by two cheques, one for £100 dated September 3, 1956, and the other for £94 15s. dated October 10, 1956.

The question I have to consider here is whether any part of that account can properly be regarded as funeral expenses, either as funeral expenses of the estate or as funeral expenses reasonably and properly incurred by the plaintiff in his personal capacity. The evidence on this point is extremely scanty. I am quite clear that in so far as it is merely a memorial erected some six months later to the memory of the wife, although that is a perfectly proper payment for a man in the plaintiff's position to incur on his own behalf, I do not think on any view that it can be considered a funeral expense; on the other hand, if the truth be that there was no stone of any kind erected over the grave at the time, and that some time would have to elapse for the grave to settle completely, then some part of it ought to be considered as a funeral expense if a stone of some kind was necessary to complete the grave.

I think the legal position is, that a stone over a grave may properly be considered as part of the funeral expenses if it is a reasonable expenditure for the persons in the position of the deceased and of the relatives who are responsible for the actual

1960

STANTON v. EWART F. YOULDON LTD.

McNair J.

ordering of the stone; but in so far as it is merely a memorial set up as a sign of love and affection, then it would not be included. Making the best estimate I can, I have reached the conclusion that of this sum of £194 15s. the sum of £40 should be allowed in respect of the simple gravestone which would complete the funeral expenses. The result of that is that I do not find that the plaintiff on his own behalf incurred any proper funeral expenses, but that he did disburse on behalf of the estate some £58 in respect of funeral expenses. Accordingly, there will be judgment for Mr. Stanton in his capacity as executor for £208.

[On the matter of costs, his Lordship was informed that the defendants had paid into court the sum of £200 on May 20, 1957, and the further sum of £160 14s. on July 3, 1958. The first of these sums was allocated to the plaintiff's claim under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, but on the payment of July 3, 1958, this allocation ceased by permission of the master and thereafter both sums were referable to the whole of the plaintiff's claim. His Lordship, accordingly, ordered that the plaintiff should have his costs to May 20, 1957; that the defendants should have their costs from July 3, 1958; and that, having regard to the way the plaintiff's claim had been presented and persisted in, and the inevitable extra expense incurred thereby, there should be no order as to costs incurred between these dates.]

Judgment for the plaintiff.
Costs as above.

Solicitors: Harold Miller & Co.; Wm. Easton & Sons.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

* LONG v. LONG.

1960
March 9, 10.

Karminski J.

Husband and Wife — Practice (in matrimonial causes) — Pleading — Amendment to allege adultery—Discretion statement—Amendment at trial after discretion statement put in evidence—Costs.

The rule of practice that in order to succeed in an application for leave to amend pleadings at the trial of a divorce suit to allege matters contained in the discretion statement, once it has been put in evidence, the applicant must have shown reasonable activity in attempting to obtain information as to the matters likely to be contained therein does not apply unless the circumstances, including the prayer for discretion, are such as to put a reasonably diligent solicitor on inquiry as to the existence of acts of adultery which might form a ground for relief. A failure to make inquiries in the absence of such circumstances does not render the party who obtains leave to amend liable for the extra costs incurred.

Clear v. Clear [1958] 1 W.L.R. 467; [1958] 2 All E.R. 353, C.A. distinguished.

A husband filed a petition seeking the dissolution of his marriage in the exercise of the court's discretion on the ground of the wife's desertion. The wife, by her answer, charged the husband with cruelty, desertion and adultery, and cross-prayed for the dissolution of the marriage on those grounds. The adultery alleged occurred before 1951, at which date the parties ceased to cohabit and was alleged by the husband, in his reply, to have been condoned. Although some two years elapsed between the institution of the proceedings and the hearing of the suit no inquiries were made by the wife's solicitors as to the contents of the husband's discretion statement.

During the course of the hearing the husband put in evidence his discretion statement, which disclosed adultery subsequent to the separation. On an application by counsel for the wife leave was granted to amend her answer to include a charge based on the further adultery. She did not proceed with her charges of cruelty and desertion. At the conclusion of the hearing Karminski J. rejected the prayer of the petition and granted the wife a decree nisi on the ground of the husband's admitted adultery, holding that the pre-separation adultery, although condoned, had been revived by the post-separation adultery. On the question of costs:

Leonard Pearl for the husband submitted that, although the present case was distinguishable from Clear v. Clear,[1] in so far as the present prayer for discretion could have been taken to refer to adultery already known to the wife there was no reason why it should have been assumed to refer to that adultery only. Careful solicitors acting according to the established practice should have made inquiries as to the contents of the discretion statement and the wife, who was a woman of some means, should be ordered to bear the extra costs incurred by the failure to make inquiries and plead the subsequent adultery in her answer.

Keith McHale, for the wife, submitted that in the particular circumstances of the present case there was nothing in the prayer for discretion which should have put reasonably diligent solicitors on inquiry. It was common ground that the wife knew that the husband had committed adultery prior to the separation, and the nature of the reply was such as to direct the minds of the wife's solicitors to that adultery only. There was, therefore, no reason why the husband should not pay the entire costs of the suit.

KARMINSKI J. This case raises a somewhat unusual position on costs because of the course the suit has taken. [His Lordship referred to the relevant facts and continued:] I do not think that, in the circumstances of this case, any such obligation attached to the solicitors for the wife as was submitted by counsel for the husband, and for these reasons: It is clear from the form of

[1] [1958] 1 W.L.R. 467; [1958] 2 All E.R. 353, C.A.

1960

LONG
v.
LONG.

Karminski J.

the answer that the wife instructed her solicitors as to the adultery in 1951 which the husband had confessed to her, that it was one act which took place when they were living apart but before the final separation. The wife had no knowledge of the subsequent adultery admitted by the husband until he swore to his discretion statement; nor is it suggested that she had any means of finding out, nor that she was in any way put on inquiry by suspicious circumstances, or by any information as to the possibility of an adulterous association between the husband and any other woman since 1951. Looking at the reply the advisers to the wife may well have been confirmed in their view that the prayer for discretion related only to the adultery with the unknown woman in 1951; and for this reason, that, if that adultery had been condoned, as pleaded, by the wife cohabiting with her husband then it would require some other matrimonial offence to revive it. But the inference to be drawn from the reply is that the husband has not, by his conduct, been guilty of any other matrimonial offence sufficient to revive the condoned adultery.

On the pleadings, therefore, as it seems to me, any careful solicitor would be put off his guard or relieved from the duty of making further inquiries and that, in my view, is what happened here. I cannot myself see that the wife or her advisers could have, or should have, made these inquiries from the other side.

That being so, I see no reason to abate the full order for costs, and I condemn the husband in the costs of these proceedings.

Solicitors: Walford & Co.; Beach & Beach.

E. J.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

1960
April 27.

* PRACTICE DIRECTION (ADDRESS OF PETITIONER).

Husband and Wife—Practice—Pleading—Petition—Address of petitioner—Application for leave to omit address—Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1959 (S.I. 1959, No. 619), r. 4 (1) (d).

Where a registrar orders, under rule 4 (1) (d), that the residence of a petitioner be omitted from the petition, the registrar's order will contain, in addition to the directions specified in the Practice Direction dated March 5, 1957,[1] a direction that the petitioner's solicitors shall, on the request of the respondent's solicitors (or the respondent if he is acting in person), give notice in writing to him of any allegations contained in the affidavit in support of the application which are not referable to any specific allegations in the petition.

B. LONG,
Senior Registrar.

April 27, 1960.

[1] [1957] 1 W.L.R. 557; [1957] 1 All E.R. 860.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

* BEESLY v. HALLWOOD ESTATES LTD.

1960
March 24, 25;
April 11, 13.

Buckley J.

[1959 B. No. 402.]

Land Registration—Land charge—Estate contract—Option for new lease—Non-registration—Whether void against purchaser of reversion—Land Charges Act, 1925 (15 Geo. 5, c. 22), ss. 10 (1), Class C (iv), 13 (2).

Contract—Formation—No intention to create new obligations—Intention to give effect to believed existing rights—Mistake of law—Whether new contract created.

Estoppel — Conduct, by — Contract — Promise inducing — Unenforceable contract—No detriment to promisee—Whether promise can render enforceable.

Deed—Execution—Escrow—Intention to execute in duplicate—Execution of one part conditional on execution of counterpart—Whether delivery imported.

By section 10 (1) of the Land Charges Act, 1925, "The following "classes of charges on, or obligations affecting, land may be "registered as land charges in the register of land charges, "namely:— . . . Class C:—A mortgage charge or obligation affect-"ing land of any of the following kinds, . . . (iv) Any contract by "an estate owner . . . to convey or create a legal estate, including "a contract conferring either expressly or by statutory implication "a valid option of purchase, a right of pre-emption or any other "like right (in this Act referred to as 'an estate contract'). . . ." By section 13 (2): "A land charge of . . . Class C . . . shall (except "as hereinafter provided) be void as against a purchaser of the land "charged therewith, or of any interest in such land, unless the land "charge is registered in the appropriate register before the com-"pletion of the purchase: Provided that, as respects . . . an estate "contract created or entered into after the commencement of this "Act, this subsection only applies in favour of a purchaser of a "legal estate for money or money's worth."

By a lease dated May 21, 1938, for a term of 21 years from March 25, 1938, it was provided that on the tenants giving at least six months' notice in writing previous to the determination of the lease they should have the right to obtain a further lease for 21 years on the same conditions subject to certain amendments. The option was never registered as a land charge under the Land Charges Act, 1925. On January 10, 1948, the residue of the term was assigned to the plaintiff for valuable consideration; and, in August, 1955, the freehold reversion was purchased by the defendant company for money.

On July 1, 1958, the plaintiff gave notice exercising the option. Both the plaintiff and the directors of the defendant company were then of opinion that the option was binding on the defendant company. On August 27, 1958, the defendant company's solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors setting out the terms of the new lease and informing them that the grant of the new lease would be subject to an undertaking being given to redecorate the property. There was some further correspondence with regard to the terms of the undertaking but it was never given. On September 11, 1958, the defendant company's solicitors sent a counterpart lease to the plaintiff's

[Reported by Miss V. A. MOXON, Barrister-at-Law.]

1960

BEESLY
v.
HALLWOOD ESTATES
LTD.

solicitors for execution by the plaintiff. At some date between September 13 and 26, 1958, the seal of the defendant company was attached to the new lease; on September 24 or 25, 1958, the plaintiff executed the counterpart lease. At a board meeting of the defendant company held on September 26, 1958, it was reported that a new lease had been executed, when one of the directors suggested that the position as to the registration of the option should be investigated. The defendant company were advised that the option was void for lack of registration, and on October 8, 1958, a letter was written to the plaintiff's solicitors informing them that the defendant company had decided not to grant the new lease.

In an action in which the plaintiff claimed, inter alia, that the defendants were bound by the lease sealed by them, or were bound to grant her a new lease:—

Held, (1) that, although the option was not a "contract . . . to "convey or create a legal estate," it came within the words "including a contract conferring . . . a valid option of purchase" in section 10 (1), Class C (iv) of the Land Charges Act, 1925, and therefore, not having been registered, was void as against the defendant company by virtue of section 13 (2) of the Act (post, pp. 556, 558).

Helby v. Matthews [1895] A.C. 471; 11 T.L.R. 446, H.L. and Griffith v. Pelton [1958] Ch. 205; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 522; [1957] 3 All E.R. 75, C.A. considered.

(2) That, since the letters written between August 27 and September 26, 1958, were written with mutual intention of giving effect to what were believed to be the existing rights of the plaintiff, and not with the intention that any new contractual rights should be created, the correspondence could not create a contract to grant a new lease, nor, on the facts, could it have constituted a contract, for there was no unqualified acceptance of any offer contained in any earlier letter or letters (post, pp. 558, 559).

British Homophone Ltd. v. Kunz (1935) 152 L.T. 589 distinguished.

(3) That the doctrine of "promissory estoppel" could not be invoked to render enforceable a right which would otherwise be unenforceable and, therefore, a binding obligation on the defendant company to grant a new lease could not be created by any promises in the correspondence to grant the new lease; and that, in any event, the plaintiff had not in fact acted to her detriment in not enforcing her rights against the original lessors under clause 5 of the lease, for there being no privity of contract between her and the original lessor, she did not, at any relevant time, have any rights against them (post, pp. 560, 561).

(4) That the sealing of a deed by a corporate body prima facie imported delivery of the deed and, there was no reason for the court to conclude that the sealing of the new lease did not import delivery so that the defendant company must be regarded as having executed the new lease (post, p. 562).

(5) That, where a deed was intended to be executed in duplicate to give effect to a transaction between two parties, by which each undertook obligations towards the other, execution of the deed by one party prima facie imported that he executed it as an escrow conditionally upon the other party executing his part; and that the defendant company, in sealing the lease, intended to execute it as an escrow conditionally upon the plaintiff executing the counterpart, but not on the further condition of an undertaking being given to redecorate the property (post, pp. 561, 562).

(6) That although, when the new lease was executed, all parties mistakenly believed the option to be binding at law despite non-registration that mistake was a mistake of law and did not afford a defence to the claim that the defendant was bound by the lease which it had executed. Accordingly, subject to the plaintiff handing over the counterpart, the defendants were bound by the lease (post, p. 563).

Action.

By a lease made on May 21, 1938, the lessors, Dr. R. Collum's Representatives Ltd., granted to the tenants, Walter Weeks and Winifred Gertrude Weeks, a lease of property known as No. 132, 132a and 132b, Ewell Road, Surbiton, Surrey for a term of 21 years from March 25, 1938. Clause 5 of the lease provided that "On giving at least six months' notice in writing expiring previous "to the determination of this demise the tenants shall have the "right to obtain a further lease for twenty-one years on the same "conditions subject to the following amendments:—(a) That "there shall be no right of renewal of the said term at the end of "such further lease. (b) That the yearly rentals payable during "the said term shall be as follows:—(i) Two hundred pounds for "the first seven years. (ii) Two hundred and twenty-five pounds "for the second seven years. (iii) Two hundred and fifty pounds "for the last seven years. (c) The legal costs, stamp duties and "other expenses attendant on the granting of such further lease "shall be borne by the tenants." That option was never registered as a land charge under the Land Charges Act, 1925.

By an assignment dated January 10, 1948, made between the tenants and the plaintiff, Phyllis Eirene Beesly, the tenants, in consideration of a payment of £5,000, assigned the demised property to the plaintiff for the residue of the term subject to the rent, covenants and conditions reserved by and contained in the lease. The assignment also comprised the tenants' stock-in-trade and other chattels and the goodwill of the business carried on by them at the property. In August, 1955, the defendants, Hallwood Estates Ltd., purchased the freehold reversion expectant on the term for money. The defendants had notice of the option when they bought the property, and on August 13, 1955, their solicitors applied for an official search under the Land Charges Act, 1925, for entries affecting No. 132, Ewell Road, though not Nos. 132a and 132b under the names (inter alios) of the original lessors and obtained a certificate of no subsisting entries.

On July 1, 1958, the plaintiff's then solicitors wrote a letter to the original lessors, c/o Messrs. Whiddington, estate agents, on the plaintiff's behalf, enclosing a formal notice to exercise the option given to her by clause 5 of the lease. On August 27, 1958, the defendants' solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors that they had been instructed to act by the defendants. The letter continued: "We are instructed that the term is to be for 21 years "at a rental of £200 per annum for the first seven years, £225 "per annum for the next seven years, and £250 per annum for "the remainder of the term. In other respects the new lease will

1960

Beesly v. Hallwood Estates Ltd.

"be in similar terms to the existing one and this being so, "we shall be glad to know whether in the circumstances you "require to see a draft. Our clients inform us that the repairing "covenants have not been complied with by your client and that "the granting of the new lease will be subject to an undertaking "being given that the whole of the exterior and interior will be "redecorated within the course of the next six months, although "they understand that the work to the interior is already in "hand."

After some further letters, which are not material, the plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the defendants' solicitors on September 10, 1958, that "the rents are to be as set out in your letter and the "terms of the new lease are to be similar to those in the existing "lease. In these circumstances, we will gladly dispense with a "draft, but we should be glad to know by whom the new lease "is to be granted. Under the existing lease, the lessors are "Dr. R. Collum's Representatives Ltd." The letter also asked if the undertaking could be extended to nine months. On September 11, 1958, the defendants' solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors enclosing a counterpart lease for execution by the plaintiff and informing them that the lease would be granted by the defendants. On September 13, 1958, the defendants' solicitors wrote a further letter: "With reference to your letter to us of the "10th instant, our clients say that they are quite prepared for "the period of the exterior decorations to be extended from six "to nine months, and so far as the interior decorations are "concerned they understand that these will be completed shortly, "and they will be glad to hear from your client that this has been "done, so that they may make an inspection." At some date between September 13 and 26, 1958, the seal of the defendants was regularly attached to the new lease; and on September 24 or 25, 1958, the plaintiff executed the counterpart lease.

At a board meeting of the defendant company held on September 26, 1958, it was reported to the board as follows: "132, Ewell "Road, Surbiton. A new lease has been executed for the letting "of this property to Mrs. P. E. Weaver [the plaintiff] for a term "of 21 years from the 25th March, 1959, at a rent of £200 per "annum for the first seven years, £225 for the next seven years, "and £250 for the remaining seven years, the tenant to pay all "outgoings." At this time both the plaintiff and the directors of the defendant company believed that the option was valid; but one of the directors suggested that the position as to registration of the option should be investigated. The defendants were advised that the option was void for lack of registration, and on October 8, 1958, their solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors: "We are "instructed to inform you that our clients have decided not to grant "the new lease to your client." Further correspondence followed in which the plaintiff's solicitors called upon the defendants to execute the new lease.

On February 6, 1959, the plaintiff issued the writ claiming [as re-amended] (1) a declaration that the defendants were bound by the further lease sealed by them; (2) an order that upon her handing over to the defendants the counterpart of the further lease they should hand over the further lease to her; alternatively (3) a declaration that the plaintiff was entitled to a further lease of the demised premises upon the terms contained in clause 5 of the original lease; (4) an order that the defendants should execute a further lease in accordance with the terms contained in the counterpart lease or otherwise in accordance with the terms contained in clause 5; in either event (5) damages. By her re-amended statement of claim she alleged that she had duly exercised the option granted to her by clause 5; alternatively, that by their execution of the new lease and by all or some of the letters dated July 1, August 27, September 10, 11 and 13, 1958, the defendants had agreed to grant and she agreed to take a further lease; and that the defendants were bound by the new lease which they had sealed.

By their re-amended defence and counterclaim the defendants denied that the plaintiff had against them any right under clause 5 of the lease and relied on section 13 of the Land Charges Act, 1925. They also denied that they had executed the further lease and that they had agreed to grant or the plaintiff to take any further lease. Alternatively they alleged that, if an agreement was constituted by the alleged execution or the letters, it was a condition precedent of the granting of the further lease that the undertaking as to repairs should be given; and, in the further alternative, that the alleged agreement was entered into under a mistake of fact or as to private right common to both parties, in that they both believed that the defendants were under a binding obligation to grant the new lease. They also denied that the further lease was binding on them, and alleged that it was delivered as an escrow and was not to take effect until the undertaking had been given and/or until the document should have been exchanged with the counterpart; alternatively, they alleged that the lease had been executed under the mistake previously alleged. The defendants counterclaimed for possession of the part of the property occupied by the plaintiff personally and for mesne profits.

It was agreed that, unless the option was unenforceable by reason of non-registration, it was exercisable by the plaintiff against the defendants, although there had been no express assignment to the plaintiff of the benefits of the option and that, if the option was valid, the notice exercising it had been effectually served on the defendants.

The facts as to the sealing of the new lease and as to what occurred at the board meeting held on September 26, 1958, were unknown to the plaintiff until one of the directors of the defendant company gave evidence at the hearing in March, 1960. On April 8, 1960, after the conclusion of the legal argument on the other points, the plaintiff applied for leave to amend her statement of claim and leave was given. The question as to the effect of the sealing of the new lease by the defendants was argued at a further hearing on April 11, 1960.

1960

Beesly v. Hallwood Estates Ltd.

F. Bower Alcock for the plaintiff.

A. E. Holdsworth for the defendants.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgment, were cited in argument: Robertson v. Minister of Pensions[1]; Solle v. Butcher[2]; Stromdale and Ball Ltd. v. Burden[3]; Johnson v. Baker[4]; Exton v. Scott[5]; Phillips v. Edwards[6]; Tool Metal Manufacturing Co. Ltd. v. Tungsten Electric Co. Ltd.[7]; Doe d. Garnons v. Knight[8]; Gudgen v. Besset.[9]

Cur. adv. vult.

April 13. Buckley J. read the following judgment: In this action the plaintiff originally claimed, in effect, that she had effectually exercised an option for renewal contained in a lease dated May 21, 1938, of certain property known as Nos. 132, 132a and 132b, Ewell Road, Surbiton. By the first amendment of her statement of claim she claimed, alternatively, that by a contract by correspondence between her solicitors and the defendants' solicitors the defendants agreed to grant her a further lease of the property in question. By a further amendment she claims that the defendants are bound by a lease sealed by the defendants in purported pursuance of the option. The defendants counter-claimed for possession of No. 132b and mesne profits.

[His Lordship stated the facts and continued:] The first question for consideration is what is the consequence of the failure to register the option?

Section 10 (1) of the Land Charges Act, 1925, so far as relevant provides: "The following classes of charges on, or obligations "affecting, land may be registered as land charges in the register "of land charges, namely . . . Class C:—A mortgage charge or "obligation affecting land of any of the following kinds, created "either before or after the commencement of this Act, but if "created before such commencement only if acquired under a "conveyance made after such commencement, namely . . . "(iv) Any contract by an estate owner or by a person entitled at "the date of the contract to have a legal estate conveyed to him "to convey or create a legal estate, including a contract conferring "either expressly or by statutory implication a valid option of "purchase, a right of pre-emption or any other like right (in this

[1] [1949] 1 K.B. 227; 64 T.L.R. 526; [1948] 2 All E.R. 767.

[2] [1950] 1 K.B. 671; 66 T.L.R. (Pt. 1) 448; [1949] 2 All E.R. 1107, C.A.

[3] [1952] Ch. 223; [1951] 2 T.L.R. 1192; [1952] 1 All E.R. 59.

[4] (1821) 4 B. & Ald. 440.

[5] (1833) 6 Sim. 31.

[6] (1864) 33 Beav. 440.

[7] [1955] 1 W.L.R. 761; [1955] 2 All E.R. 657, H.L.

[8] (1826) 5 B. & C. 671.

[9] (1856) 6 E. & B. 986.

"Act referred to as 'an estate contract'). . . ." Section 13 (2) of the same Act is in the following terms: "A land charge of Class "B, Class C or Class D, created or arising after the commence-"ment of this Act, shall (except as hereinafter provided) be void "as against a purchaser of the land charged therewith, or of any "interest in such land, unless the land charge is registered in the "appropriate register before the completion of the purchase: "Provided that, as respects a land charge of Class D and an "estate contract created or entered into after the commencement "of this Act, this subsection only applies in favour of a purchaser "of a legal estate for money or money's worth."

The defendants having bought the reversion for money, the option is accordingly void as against them if it is an estate contract within section 10 (1), Class C (iv). A conditional contract to convey or grant a legal estate is registrable under the section: Sharp v. Coates.[1] An option to purchase a legal estate in land may have the appearance of a conditional contract on the part of the grantor to convey or create that estate, but this is not, I think, the true nature of such an option. In Helby v. Matthews[2] the House of Lords had to decide whether a person who had entered into a hire-purchase agreement for a piano under which he could terminate the hiring at any time was "a person having agreed "to buy goods" within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1889. It was held that what the hirer was entitled to, apart from the arrangements relating to the hire of the piano, was an option to buy the piano by continuing the stipulated payments for a sufficient period.

Lord Herschell said[3]: "It was said in the Court of Appeal "that there was an agreement by the appellant to sell, and that "an agreement to sell connotes an agreement to buy. This is "undoubtedly true if the words 'agreement to sell' be used in "their strict legal sense; but when a person has, for valuable "consideration, bound himself to sell to another on certain terms, "if the other chooses to avail himself of the binding offer, he may, "in popular language, be said to have agreed to sell, though an "agreement to sell in this sense, which is in truth merely an "offer which cannot be withdrawn, certainly does not connote an "agreement to buy, and it is only in this sense that there can be "said to have been an agreement to sell in the present case." I particularly draw attention to the words "which is in truth "merely an offer which cannot be withdrawn."

Lord Watson said[4]: "Apart from the arrangement for hire of "the piano, the only right given to Brewster by the agreement "in question was the option to become a purchaser. It is true "that whilst he was under no obligation to buy, the appellant was "legally bound to give him that option, and could not retract it,

[1] [1949] 1 K.B. 285; 64 T.L.R. 605; [1948] 2 All E.R. 871, C.A.
[2] [1895] A.C. 471; 11 T.L.R. 446, H.L.
[3] [1895] A.C. 471, 477, H.L.
[4] Ibid. 471, 479, H.L.

1960

BEESLY v. HALLWOOD ESTATES LTD.

Buckley J.

"if the other stipulations of the contract were duly observed by "the hirer. But the possession of such a right of option was, in "no sense, an agreement by Brewster to buy the piano; and the "appellant's obligation to give the option was not, in the sense "of law, an agreement by him to sell. In order to constitute an "agreement for sale and purchase, there must be two parties who "are mutually bound by it. From a legal point of view the "appellant was in exactly the same position as if he had made an "offer to sell on certain terms, and had undertaken to keep it "open for a definite period." A little later on Lord Wason said [5]: "Whilst, in popular language, the appellant's obligation might be "described as an agreement to sell, it is in law nothing more than "a binding offer to sell."

In Griffith v. Pelton [6] Jenkins L.J., delivering the judgment of the court, referred to an option to purchase land in the following terms [7]: "An option in gross for the purchase of land is a con-"ditional contract for such purchase by the grantee of the option "from the grantor, which the grantee is entitled to convert into a "concluded contract of purchase, and to have carried to com-"pletion by the grantor, upon giving the prescribed notice and "otherwise complying with the conditions upon which the option "is made exercisable in any particular case."

This language, at first sight, seems to be at variance with what was said in Helby v. Matthews [8]—which was not, apparently, brought to the attention of the Court of Appeal [9]—but I think that Jenkins L.J.[10] cannot have meant by the expression "conditional "contract" to describe a concluded contract under which the rights and liabilities of the parties were dependent on a condition, but a state of affairs capable of resulting in a concluded contract upon a certain contingency.

In my judgment, the option contained in clause 5 of the lease in the present case did not constitute a contract, albeit conditional, by the lessor to grant a further term in the land upon the exercise by the lessees of the option: it constituted an offer to grant such a term which the lessor was contractually precluded from withdrawing so long as the option remained exercisable. I am consequently of opinion that the option did not fall within what may be called the first limb of section 10 (1), Class C (iv).

Does it, then, fall within the second limb introduced by the word "including"? As a matter of syntax and interpretation according to the strict sense of the words used this phrase does not seem appropriate to extend the ambit of the paragraph, but merely to emphasise that options of purchase and the like, so far as they fall within the class of contracts to convey or create legal estates, come within the ambit of the paragraph. But if I am right in the views I have expressed as to the nature and effect of

[5] Ibid. 471, 480, H.L.

[6] [1958] Ch. 205; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 522, C.A.

[7] [1958] Ch. 205, 225, C.A.

[8] [1895] A.C. 471, 477, 479, 480, H.L.

[9] [1958] Ch. 205, C.A.

[10] Ibid. 205, 225, C.A.

an option (which must, I think, apply equally to a right of pre-emption or other like right), no such right would ever constitute a contract to convey or create a legal estate. Accordingly, I consider that in this context the word "including" must, as a matter of construction, be given the effect of "which for this "purpose shall be treated as including," and what I have called the second limb of the paragraph must be read as extending the operation of the paragraph. Indeed, both counsel before me argued upon this footing.

Did clause 5 of the lease create a valid option of purchase within the meaning of the paragraph? It is clear from section 20 (8) of the Act that, unless the context otherwise requires, the term "purchaser" includes a lessee and the term "purchase" includes a lease. It must follow, again subject to the context, that the term "option of purchase" includes "option of lease," or "option to take a lease."

Counsel for the plaintiff has referred me to section 142 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925. He says that, as the option runs with the land it is, under the express terms of that section, binding on the reversioner and enforceable by an assignee of the term. He points out that the section says nothing about registration. Reference may also be made to section 6 of the same Act. In their note to the last-mentioned section the editors of Wolstenholme & Cherry's Conveyancing Statutes, 12th ed. (1932), p. 246, say: "Thus no land charge has to be registered to protect lessor's "or lessee's covenants, for the lease is the charter of the title." With all respect to the editors, I think that statement is too wide.

Counsel for the plaintiff says that section 142 (1) of the Law of Property Act, 1925, and section 10 (1), Class C (iv) of the Land Charges Act, 1925, must be construed so as to be mutually consistent, and that the way to achieve this is to exclude from the latter any obligation which falls within the former. He says that the term "purchase" does not in its ordinary sense apply to a renewal of a lease. That may be so, but I am concerned with the statutory definition of the term and not merely with its ordinary meaning. Counsel relies, I think, upon section 142 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, as affording a context which requires me to construe "purchase" in paragraph (iv) of Class C otherwise than according to the statutory definition. I do not consider that it does so. Section 142 renders obligations to which that section is applicable enforceable against a reversioner for the time being "if and so far as the lessor has power to bind" such reversioner. The section does not empower a lessor to bind a reversioner in respect of any obligation which the legislature has said shall not be enforceable against such reversioner. If an obligation which would otherwise run with the reversion is of a kind which, unless registered as a land charge, will be void against a purchaser for money or money's worth, the lessor cannot, in my judgment, bind in respect of that obligation the reversionary estate in the hands of such a purchaser, who acquires the reversion at a time when the obligation is not registered. The effect of the Land Charges Act, 1925, is to take such an obligation out of the scope of section 142 upon a purchase of the reversion for money or money's worth taking place while the obligation is unregistered.

1960

BEESLY v. HALLWOOD ESTATES LTD.

Buckley J.

I consequently reach the conclusion that the option contained in clause 5 of the lease was registrable under section 10 (1), Class C (iv), and that, as it was not registered when the defendants bought the reversion immediately expectant on the term, it is void as against the defendants.

I now proceed to the question whether the parties entered into a new contract by correspondence. The letters relied on by the plaintiff in her statement of claim in this respect in conjunction with the sealing of the new lease by the defendants are those dated July 1, August 27, and September 10, 11 and 13, 1958, to which I have referred. These letters were all written at a time when the plaintiff and her solicitors and the directors of the defendant company and their solicitors all believed that the option was exercisable by the plaintiff and enforceable against the defendant company. They were written with the mutual intention of giving effect to what were believed to be existing rights of the plaintiff. I am satisfied that none of the parties concerned thought or intended at the time that any new contractual rights would or should be created by this correspondence, except, of course, so far as the exercise of the option (if valid) would have constituted a new contract. Any transaction between two or more parties can, in my judgment, only result in a contract between them if they enter into that transaction with an intention to create binding contractual obligations, or in circumstances in which such an intention must be attributed to them. The facts of the present case negative such an intention, for these letters were written with the intention of carrying out what were thought to be existing obligations, not of creating any new obligation. On this ground I am of opinion that no contract is shown to have been established by the correspondence.

This view is not, I think, in conflict with British Homophone v. Kunz.[11] In that case the well-known jazz pianist, Charlie Kunz, had entered into a contract of service with the plaintiff company containing an option for either party "to extend same "for a further period of twelve months on terms to be hereafter "agreed." This option was held to have no binding effect as being too uncertain. Neverthless, the company and Kunz, both believing that the clause was binding, before the expiration of the term of the agreement negotiated and entered into a new formal written agreement. This, it seems, was not merely a continuation of the earlier agreement, the terms being different. The company was anxious to retain the services of Kunz and he, although he would otherwise have wished to enter into a contract with another company—and had, in fact, done so, although he thought the arrangement was only provisional—felt himself bound by the option clause to contract with the plaintiff company if they offered him satisfactory terms. Counsel for Kunz (who had subsequently committed breaches of the later contract) contended that because both parties entered into the later contract in the mistaken belief that the option clause in the earlier contract was binding, Kunz was not liable in damages for breach of the later contract.

[11] (1935) 152 L.T. 589.

du Parcq J. said [12]: "I can deal shortly with Mr. Macaskie's "second contention. I know of no authority for the proposition "that if two parties enter into what is on the face of it a binding "contract, in ignorance of their legal rights, each believing the "other to be legally bound to enter into such a contract when he "is not so bound, the contract so entered into is not enforceable. "So to hold would be to decide that a common mistake of law "vitiated a contract, and I believe that such a decision would be "unsound in principle."

The judge was in that case [13] considering the binding character of a formal written agreement, the terms of which did not flow from an earlier contract but had been independently negotiated, and the case is, in my judgment, clearly distinguishable on its facts from the present case, where the correspondence was not, in my view, intended to create any new rights or embody any new agreement.

Even if I am wrong in the views I have expressed, I should still hold that the correspondence did not constitute a contract, for I cannot find in any of the letters an unqualified acceptance of any offer contained in any earlier letter or letters. If the letter of July 1 be regarded as an offer to take a lease incorporating such terms as are indicated in clause 5 of the existing lease, the letter of August 27 introduces a new term as to an undertaking to do interior and exterior redecorations within six months, which would give that letter the character of a counter-offer. The letter of September 10 asked for the period of the required undertaking to be extended to nine months, and so would constitute a further counter-offer. The letter of September 13 accepts the last proposal, but only as regards exterior decorations, and once again this would constitute a further counter-offer. The question of the form and extent of the proposed undertaking was never fully resolved on the correspondence; and no undertaking was ever given.

The defendants' sealing of the new lease cannot, in my judgment, advance the plaintiff's case in this respect. If it is to be regarded as an acceptance of an offer on the part of the plaintiff, it was never communicated to her and so cannot have constituted a contract. There is no other way in which it can be regarded as relevant to the question whether a contract to grant a new lease was ever concluded between the parties in 1958.

Accordingly, in my judgment, the plaintiff fails to make out her case of a contract for a further lease.

[12] (1935) 152 L.T. 589, 593. [13] Ibid. 589.

1960

BEESLY v. HALLWOOD ESTATES LTD.

Buckley J.

This renders it unnecessary for me to decide the validity of the plea in the defence that, if there was such a contract, it was entered into under a common mistake that the option was binding. As, however, the argument as to mistake is relevant to a later point, and would, of course, be relevant to the present point if the case were to go to a higher court, I should state my view on this.

Such a mistake would, in my judgment, have been a mistake of law; viz., a mistaken view held by all parties that on the known facts the option was binding at law irrespective of registration; for until September 26, 1958, none of them had addressed his mind to the question whether the option was registered, but all the other relevant facts were known. The mistake was as to the nature and effect of the general law applicable to those known facts. The mistake would not, I think, have been one that would have afforded a defence to a claim under the alleged contract.

By her amended reply the plaintiff claimed that the defendants could not in any case rely upon section 13 of the Land Charges Act, 1925, (a) because they had accepted rent from her since the end of the term (but I have had no evidence of payment of any such rent), and (b) because of promises said to be contained in the letters of August 27, September 11 and 13, 1958, which, as she alleges, were intended to, and did, induce her to believe that the defendants would grant the further lease and would not rely on the section. The plaintiff alleges that she acted on these promises in taking no steps to enforce against the original lessors her rights under clause 5 of the lease.

One short answer to this contention is that, as there was never any privity of contract between the plaintiff and the original lessors, the plaintiff did not at any relevant time have any rights which she could have enforced against the original lessors and, accordingly, she has not altered the position to her detriment in this respect.

On this part of the case Mr. Alcock for the plaintiff referred me to Central London Property Trust Ltd. v. High Trees House Ltd.,[14] Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co.,[15] and to the statement derived from Combe v. Combe,[16] which is contained in Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd ed., vol. XV, p. 175. As I understand this part of the law, which has been described as promissory estoppel, it is that where one party is under an existing legal obligation to another, who has so acted as to lead the former party to believe that the latter will not enforce that obligation, or not enforce it to its full extent, or for the time being, intending the former party to act on that footing, and the former party has so acted, the latter party may be restrained in equity from enforcing the obligation on any footing inconsistent with the belief so induced, and may be so restrained notwithstanding that he has received no consideration for the modification of his rights. The doctrine may afford a defence against the enforcement of otherwise enforceable rights; it cannot create a cause of action. It cannot, in my judgment, be invoked to render enforceable a right which would otherwise be unenforceable, nor to negative the operation of a statute.

[14] [1947] 1 K.B. 130; 62 T.L.R. 557; [1956] 1 All E.R. 256n.

[15] (1877) 2 App.Cas. 439, H.L.

[16] [1951] 2 K.B. 215; [1951] 1 T.L.R. 811; [1951] 1 All E.R. 767, C.A.

I now pass on to the question whether by sealing the new lease the defendants bound themselves. This falls into two parts: (a) whether the defendants ought to be regarded as having executed the new lease, and (b) if so, whether they ought to be regarded as having done so unconditionally, or as an escrow, and if so, on what condition?

It is clear from authorities which Mr. Holdsworth cited to me, including Murray v. Earl of Stair [17] and Bowker v. Burdekin [18]—and see Lady Naas v. Westminster Bank Ltd.[19]—that the latter question depends upon the intention of the executing party, and is a question of fact to be determined upon the whole evidence of the circumstances attending the execution.

Before I consider the law, I should say a further word about the facts. The minute of the board meeting of September 26, 1958, is in the following terms: "2. Chairman's report on the "matters in hand. (d): 132, Ewell Road, Surbiton. A new lease "has been executed for the letting of this property to Mrs. P. E. "Weaver [the plaintiff] for a term of 21 years from the 25th "March, 1959, at a rent of £200 per annum for the first seven "years, £225 for the next seven years and £250 for the remaining "seven years, the tenant to pay all outgoings." That is the whole of the relevant passage in the minute.

Mr. Holdsworth concedes that the seal of the defendants was regularly attached to the lease. I know nothing further about the actual circumstances of its being attached. It will be recollected that the correspondence to which I have made reference discussed an undertaking to be given by the plaintiff relating to certain decorations. By September 13, a point had been reached at which the defendants' solicitors had said that the defendants were quite prepared for the period of the exterior decoration to be extended from six months to nine months, inferring that the period of the interior decorations should be six months. The lease was sealed at some date before September 26, and, as I think, subsequent to September 13, but I have had no evidence enabling me to fix the date more precisely. The counterpart was executed by the plaintiff on September 24 or 25. Nothing, in my view, turns on the sequence of these events. The two parts were never exchanged.

In my view, in accordance with contemporary practice, where a deed is intended to be executed in duplicate to give effect to a transaction between two parties by which each undertakes obligations towards the other, the execution of such a deed by one of [17] (1823) 2 B. & C. 82, 87, 88.

[18] (1843) 11 M. & W. 128, 147.
[19] [1940] A.C. 366, 399; 56 T.L.R. 381; [1940] 1 All E.R. 485, H.L.

1960

BEESLY v. HALLWOOD ESTATES LTD.

Buckley J.

those parties prima facie imports that he executes it in escrow conditionally upon the other party executing his part of the contract so as to become bound thereby in respect of his obligations thereunder.

In this connection I respectfully accept what was said by Harman J. in Hollington Bros. Ltd. v. Rhodes.[20] In that case the court was not considering whether a deed was executed conditionally or unconditionally, but whether the sealing of a deed could be relied upon as establishing a contract to grant a lease, so that the point considered by the judge was rather different from the one I am at the moment concerned with; but what he said was this[21]: "It is a commonplace that in many, indeed, in "most cases, where a lease is to be granted everything remains in "negotiation until the lease and its counterpart are finally "exchanged between the parties, and it seems to me impossible to "spell out of the course of business which I have described, and "which appears from the correspondence, anything more than "the ordinary course of negotiations."

The sealing of a deed by a corporate body, in my judgment, prima facie imports delivery of that deed, either unconditionally or conditionally: Norton on Deeds, 2nd ed. (1928), pp. 12–13; Mayor, etc., of Merchants of the Staple of England v. The Governor and Company of the Bank of England,[22] and I see no reason, in the present case, to conclude that the sealing of the lease by the defendants did not import delivery so as to constitute due execution either unconditionally or in escrow. Indeed, the plaintiff being a "purchaser" within the meaning of the Law of Property Act, 1925, I think that I am bound, by section 74 of that Act, to treat the lease as having been duly executed by the defendants, and this, in my judgment, involves treating the lease as having been not only sealed but also delivered. The lease, being a deed intended to be executed in duplicate for giving effect to a transaction between the parties whereby each undertook obligations towards the other, was, in my opinion, executed by the defendants conditionally upon the plaintiff executing a counterpart: the crucial question, however, is whether it was also conditional on an undertaking being given in suitable form by the plaintiff in respect of the decorations.

In this connection I do not think that I am at all concerned with what was at this relevant time in the minds of the defendants' solicitors. What is of importance is what was the intention of the directors of the defendant company when the lease was executed. As I have already said, I know nothing about the circumstances in which the seal was actually affixed. I do, however, know that the seal is countersigned by the chairman of the board meeting of September 26, 1958, and that the minute of that meeting contains no reference to the execution of the lease being in any way conditional upon an undertaking being given by the plaintiff as to decorations. On the contrary, it is clear from the evidence that everybody present at the board meeting of September 26 regarded the lease sealed by the defendant company as binding, albeit they did so with regret. Whereas this attitude of mind would, in my opinion, not be inconsistent with the binding quality of the lease being conditional on the lessee binding herself by execution of a counterpart to obligations on her part expressed in the lease, it is inconsistent with any idea that it was also conditional on some matter wholly extraneous to the lease, as was the proposed undertaking as to redecoration.

[20] [1951] 2 T.L.R. 691.
[21] [1951] 2 T.L.R. 691, 694.
[22] (1887) 21 Q.B.D. 160, 165.

I, therefore, reach the conclusion of fact that the defendants, by sealing the lease, intended to deliver, and did deliver, it as their deed intended to bind them conditionally only upon the plaintiff executing a counterpart, but subject to no other condition.

The plaintiff has, as I have already stated, executed the counterpart, and in her statement of claim she alleges that she holds the same as an escrow. She is, and has at all material times been, ready and willing to exchange her counterpart for the lease executed by the defendants.

The defendants plead that the lease was executed under a mistake, namely, the mistake to which I have already alluded. The mistake having been a mutual mistake of general law would not, in my judgment, entitle the defendants to have the lease rescinded and they do not, in fact, claim rescission. Indeed, they claim no relief based on mistake but merely rely on the mistake as a ground of defence. In my judgment, the mistake can have no bearing on the question whether the defendants have executed the new lease (including delivery thereof) and, if so, whether unconditionally or as an escrow, or upon its binding effect upon them so long as the lease is allowed to stand unrescinded.

In these circumstances I propose to declare that subject to the plaintiff handing over to the defendants the counterpart lease referred to in paragraph 8 of the re-amended statement of claim duly executed by her, the defendants are bound by the lease referred to in paragraph 9 of the re-amended statement of claim, and I propose to make the order asked for in paragraph 2 of the plaintiff's claim at the end of the re-amended statement of claim.

Declaration accordingly.

Order that upon the plaintiff handing over to the defendants the counterpart of the further lease they should hand over the further lease to her.

Defendants to pay plaintiff's costs, including costs of re-amendment of statement of claim but excluding costs of application for leave to amend and further hearing.

Counterclaim dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: S. Sydney Silverman; George C. Carter & Co.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1960
May 2.

Pennycuick J.

* In re SERVERS OF THE BLIND LEAGUE.

[No. 00353 of 1960.]

Company—Winding up—Void dissolution—Bequest to company after dissolution—Application for declaration that dissolution void—Whether discretion of court should be exercised—Charity—Companies Act, 1948 (11 & 12 Geo. 6, c. 38), s. 352.

By her will a testatrix gave a fourth share in her residuary estate to a company established for charitable purposes. The company was dissolved before the date of death of the testatrix. On an application by the liquidator after the testatrix's death for an order under section 352 of the Companies Act, 1948,[1] declaring the dissolution of the company void:—

Held, that the purpose of an order under section 352 was, generally, to enable distribution to be made of an asset which belonged to the company before dissolution, but which had vested in the Crown as bona vacantia; and that, since the asset in question had never belonged to the company, and the order sought would dispossess other persons who had obtained a vested interest in the residuary share under a title not derived from the company, it was not a case in which the court should exercise its discretion under section 352 to declare the dissolution void.

MOTION.

The Servers of the Blind League, a charity, was a company limited by guarantee incorporated under the Companies Act, 1929. On September 20, 1955, it was resolved, by special resolution, that the company be put into voluntary liquidation and that the applicant, John Alfred Godfrey, be appointed liquidator. On February 17, 1958, the liquidator, in compliance with clause 9 of the memorandum of association of the company, executed an assignment of the assets, both present and future, of the company in favour of the Royal National Institute for the Blind. The final meeting of the company was held on February 18, 1958; and the liquidator filed his final accounts on March 6, 1958, pursuant to section 290 of the Companies Act, 1948. The company was accordingly dissolved, under section 290 (4) of the Act, on June 6, 1958.

By her will dated May 12, 1950, the testatrix, Margaret Moir Petrie, gave one fourth of her residuary estate to the company.

[Reported by Miss V. A. MOXON, Barrister-at-Law.]

[1] Companies Act, 1948, s. 352 (1): "Where a company has been dissolved, the court may at any time within two years of the date of the dissolution, on an application being made for the purpose by the liquidator of the company or by any other person who appears to the court to be interested, make an order, upon such terms as the court thinks fit, declaring the dissolution to have been void, and thereupon such proceedings may be taken as might have been taken if the company had not been dissolved."

The testatrix died on January 5, 1959, and her will was proved in the Principal Probate Registry on April 3, 1959.

On April 6, 1960, the liquidator issued a notice of motion seeking a declaration under section 352 of the Companies Act, 1948, that the dissolution of the company was void.

C. A. Settle Q.C. for the liquidator.

No cases were cited in argument.

PENNYCUICK J. stated the facts and continued: It is clear, apart from the order which I am now asked to make, that the gift of a residuary share to the company lapsed, and it must follow, in the absence of any express provision in the will, that the share devolved on the footing of a partial intestacy. I have not seen the will of the testatrix.

The liquidator now makes an application under section 352 of the Companies Act, 1948, for a declaration that the dissolution of the company is void. [His Lordship read section 352 (1) of the Act and continued:] The effect of this order, if made, would be that the dissolution would be void ab initio, with the consequence that the company must be regarded as having been in existence at the date of the death of the testatrix; and, accordingly, the gift to it of a residuary share would have been effective. Equally, the order would now divest the interest which the next-of-kin took on the date of death, and with which they were in a position to deal from that date.

In my judgment, it would not be right to make such an order. Generally speaking, the purpose of an order under section 352 is to enable distribution to be made of an asset which belonged to the company before dissolution but which, for some reason, was overlooked and has vested in the Crown as bona vacantia under section 354 of the Act. The position here is wholly different. The asset in question, namely, the residuary share under the will of the testatrix, never belonged to the company at all, and the order would dispossess other persons who obtained a vested interest in the asset under a title not derived from the company.

No authority for such an order has been cited. The power under section 352 is discretionary; and, without seeking to lay down any rule of universal application, I do not think it would be right for me to exercise the discretion in the present circumstances. I therefore dismiss the application.

I am informed that an originating summons is pending to determine the question whether, if the gift to the company failed, there was a general charitable intent. I would make it clear that nothing in this judgment is intended to prejudice that application.

Application refused.

Solicitors: Joynson-Hicks & Co.

[PROBATE, ETC., DIVISION.]

1960
April 27.

* PRACTICE DIRECTION (MAINTENANCE).

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Justices—Variation of registered order—Appeal—Procedure—R.S.C., Ord. 41*a, r.* 3 (3).

An appeal made under rule 3 (3) of Order 41a of the Rules of the Supreme Court to a judge of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division from an order of a magistrates' court varying or refusing to vary an order of the High Court made under sections 19–27 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, and registered in the magistrates' court under the Maintenance Orders Act, 1958, shall be by summons to a judge, in chambers in the first instance, issued within 14 days of the order appealed from.

The summons shall set out the terms of the magistrates' court order, the terms of the order asked for and the grounds of the appeal.

The appeal shall not, unless otherwise ordered, act as a stay of the order appealed from.

B. LONG,
Senior Registrar.

April 27, 1960.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

1960
March 22.

Roxburgh J.

* MORRIS MOTORS LTD. v. PHELAN.

[1960 M. No. 661.]

NOTE.

The final form of the order as drawn up on this motion (supra, pp. 352, 353) was as follows:

UPON MOTION for an injunction this day made unto this court by counsel for the plaintiffs

AND UPON HEARING counsel for the defendant

AND UPON READING the writ of summons issued March 8, 1960

AND the plaintiffs and the defendants by their counsel desiring that the said motion should be treated as a motion for judgment and consenting to this judgment

AND the defendant by his counsel undertaking that he will not do at any time hereafter (whether by himself or by his servants or agents or any of them or otherwise howsoever) the following acts or any of them that is to say advertise offer for sale or sell any motor vehicle not being a new motor vehicle of the plaintiffs' manufacture as and for a new motor vehicle or falsely represent that any motor vehicle of the plaintiffs' manufacture is new after it has been the subject of a retail sale by a distributor or dealer has been registered with the local county council has had number plates put upon it and has been driven away by the purchaser

THIS COURT DOTH ORDER that the defendant do pay to the plaintiffs their costs of this action such costs to be taxed by the taxing master.

[Reported by Miss PHILIPPA PRICE, Barrister-at-Law.]

[PRIVY COUNCIL.]

J. C.†
1960
May 2.

* PAROCHIAL CHURCH COUNCIL OF LITTLE LEIGH . . . . . APPELLANTS;

AND

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS . . . RESPONDENTS.

Ecclesiastical Law — Union of benefices — Scheme — Jurisdiction of Judicial Committee to consider proposed scheme de novo and on its merits—Compliance by scheme framing authorities with statutory requirements—Union of Benefices Measure, 1923 (14 & 15 Geo. 5, No. 2), s. 10 (3) (5)—Pastoral Reorganisation Measure, 1949 (12 & 13 Geo. 6, No. 3), s. 3 (2).

Privy Council—Jurisdiction—Union of benefices—Jurisdiction to consider proposed scheme de novo and on its merits—Union of Benefices Measure, 1923, s. 10 (3) (5)—Pastoral Reorganisation Measure, 1949, s. 3 (2).

APPEAL by the Parochial Church Council of Little Leigh against a scheme formulated by the respondents, the Church Commissioners for England, for the union of the benefices of Little Leigh and Lower Whitley, both in the diocese of Chester.

1960. March 21, 22. W. S. Wigglesworth for the appellants. J. G. Le Quesne for the respondents.

May 2. LORD JENKINS, in the course of delivering their Lordships' report sanctioning the scheme, said: At the outset of his argument before their Lordships in support of the scheme Mr. Le Quesne submitted (in effect) that as it was not shown that the Pastoral Committee in making their recommendations or the Bishop in approving them had failed to take into account any of the matters set out in section 3 (2) of the Pastoral Reorganisation Measure of 1949,[1] or that the Committee, the Bishop or the Church Commissioners had in any other respect failed to comply with the terms of the relevant legislation, the appeal must be dismissed, their Lordships having no jurisdiction to interfere with such a scheme unless it was shown to be vitiated by some such irregularity. Their Lordships have no hesitation in rejecting this argument. It appears to them that the right of appeal conferred † Present: LORD TUCKER, LORD JENKINS and SIR JOHN BEAUMONT.

[1] Pastoral Reorganisation Measure, 1949, s. 3 (2): "In making their recommendations the Committee shall take into account each of the following matters—(a) the making of the best possible provision for the ministry of the Word and Sacraments in the diocese as a whole, including the provision of appropriate spheres of work and conditions of service for all persons engaged in the cure of souls and the provision of reasonable remuneration for such persons; (b) respect for the traditions, needs and characteristics of individual parishes; and (c) the possibility of the use of the ministry of duly authorised laymen."

J. C.
1960
LITTLE LEIGH PAROCHIAL CHURCH COUNCIL v. CHURCH COMRS.

by section 10 (3), and the jurisdiction with respect to appeals conferred by section 10 (5), of the Union of Benefices Measure, 1923, are plainly wide enough to empower their Lordships to consider any scheme submitted to them on appeal de novo and on its merits. This does not, however, mean that their Lordships should not be slow to dissent, save for the most cogent reasons, from the recommendations embodied in a scheme regularly brought into existence with the concurrent approval of the Pastoral Committee, the Bishop and the Church Commissioners, and with proper regard for the matters stated in section 3 (2) of the Measure of 1949.

Solicitors: Church, Adams, Tatham & Co. for Moss & Haselhurst, Northwich; Milles, Day & Co.

C. C.

[HOUSE OF LORDS.]

H. L. (E.)†
1960
May 9.

* HENRY BRIGGS, SON & CO. LTD. . . PETITIONERS;
AND
INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS . RESPONDENTS.

PETITION for leave to appeal to the House of Lords from the decision of the Court of Appeal in HENRY BRIGGS, SON & CO. LTD. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.[1]

The Appeal Committee granted the petition.

† Present: LORD COHEN, LORD KEITH OF AVONHOLM and LORD DENNING.

[1] [1960] 1 W.L.R. 532; [1960] 1 All E.R. 800.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.
1960
March 29, 30, 31.
Lord Evershed M.R., Pearce and Harman L.JJ.

* PEAK (VALUATION OFFICER) v. BURLEY GOLF CLUB.
HARDING (VALUATION OFFICER) v. BRAMSHAW GOLF CLUB LTD.

Rates and Rating — Rateable occupation — Golf course — Golf courses occupied in New Forest under licence without prejudice to the rights of commoners—Public not prevented from wandering over golf courses—Whether any rateable occupation of golf courses.

Pursuant to licences duly granted by the Forestry Commissioners under their statutory powers, in the one case to a members' golf club and in the other to a limited company, two golf courses had been constructed and maintained in the New Forest. The licences were granted without prejudice to the rights of the commoners of the New Forest. Further, it appeared from the facts found by the Lands Tribunal, that the public were accustomed to wander at will through the unenclosed portions of the New Forest, and whatever was the legal nature of the public's rights, they were exercised over the golf courses where people came to picnic and park caravans. It also appeared that on occasions members of the public played over the golf courses without payment of green fees and had not been stopped. The boundaries of one of the courses was shown on a plan on the licence. The boundaries of the other course were not defined. The Lands Tribunal, reversing the decision of the local valuation court, held that the two golf clubs were in rateable occupation of their respective golf courses:—

Held, that the two clubs were not in exclusive occupation of the respective golf courses for the purposes for which the land was used by them and, accordingly, they were not in rateable occupation.

Test laid down by Tucker L.J. in John Laing & Son Ltd. v. Assessment Committee for Kingswood Assessment Area [1949] 1 K.B. 344, 350; 65 T.L.R. 80; [1949] 1 All E.R. 224, C.A. applied.

Westminster City Council v. Southern Railway Co., The Railway Assessment Authority and W. H. Smith & Co. Ltd. [1936] A.C. 511, 532; 52 T.L.R. 541; [1936] 2 All E.R. 322, H.L. considered.

APPEALS from the Lands Tribunal (Sir William FitzGerald).

These two appeals were heard together. The appellants in the first case were the Burley Golf Club, an unincorporated members' club, the appellants in the second case were the Bramshaw Golf Club Ltd., a limited company. Both appellants had golf courses in the boundaries of the New Forest. These two clubs and a third club, which did not appeal, had been assessed by the local valuation officers on the footing that they were in rateable occupation, both of their respective golf houses and of their respective golf courses. The appellants admitted that they were in rateable occupation of the club houses but contended that they were not in exclusive occupation of the golf courses. On appeal the local valuation court for Hampshire deleted the assessments of the golf courses.

The golf courses in question were maintained by the appellants pursuant to licences granted by the Forestry Commissioners under their statutory powers. The boundaries of the Burley golf course were shown on a plan annexed to the licence. The boundaries of the Bramshaw golf course were not defined. The licences were granted in consideration of annual payments but were subject to the rights of the commoners. Both clubs charged green fees, but if members of the public played on the courses and refused to pay green fees nothing was done to prevent them, it being recognised that the public had some right of wandering over the unenclosed parts of the forest. The terms of the licences and the facts are fully stated in the judgment of Harman L.J.

C. A.
1960
PEAK
v.
BURLEY GOLF CLUB.

The Lands Tribunal held, reversing the local valuation court, that both golf clubs were in rateable occupation of their respective golf courses.

The two clubs appealed. The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the clubs were in rateable occupation of the respective courses, and whether they were rateable in respect of the licences granted to them by the Forestry Commissioners.

Ramsay Willis Q.C. and Frank Whitworth for the appellant clubs.

Maurice Lyell Q.C. and Raymond Phillips for the respondent valuation officers.

The following cases were mentioned in argument, which are not referred to in the judgments: Mitcham Golf Course Trustees v. Ereaut [1]; Harper v. Charlesworth.[2]

LORD EVERSHED M.R. I will ask Harman L.J. to deliver the first judgment.

HARMAN L.J. These are appeals by way of cases stated signed on June 15 and 19, 1959, from a decision of the Lands Tribunal dated October 31, 1958, by which it was decided that three golf clubs had rateable occupation of their several courses situated within the boundaries of the New Forest in the County of Southampton. That decision was pronounced at the instance of the land valuation officer on appeal from decisions of the local valuation court for Hampshire given on November 15, 1957. There were three appeals to the tribunal which heard all the cases together and decided each of them in favour of the Revenue. There are two appeals to this court. Some technical difficulty is caused by the fact that one appellant is a members' club, which cannot properly appear by its name, and the other is a limited company, which can.

The members' club is styled the Burley Golf Club and its appeal concerns the "golf course and club house at Burley, "Ringwood, Hampshire." The corporation is styled the Bramshaw Golf Club Ltd., and that appeal concerns "land used as a "golf course, Brook, Bramshaw, Hampshire.": the company's club house is not within the boundaries of the forest. The third body is styled the New Forest Golf Club, and its case concerned "land used as a golf course with a club house at Southampton "Road, Lyndhurst, Hampshire"; it has not appealed.

These appeals are not concerned with the club houses within the boundaries of the forest, they being admittedly in rateable occupation. The decision treated all these cases as turning on the same point. In the Burley case the local valuation court had confirmed an assessment of £30 which the tribunal increased to [1] [1937] 3 All E.R. 450. [2] (1825) 4 B. & C. 574.

£45, while in the Bramshaw case the local court had deleted the assessment altogether, while the tribunal made an assessment of £50.

When the facts are looked into they are not altogether similar, the documents under which the two courses are occupied being in different terms. Moreover, the area occupied by the Burley Club is shown in outline on a plan, whereas the plan in the Bramshaw case gives no indication of metes and bounds.

The question in each case is whether the appellant is in rateable occupation of its course. The first question, therefore, is, what is the nature of rateable occupation? To answer this, the best guide drawn to our attention is to be found in John Laing & Son Ltd. v. Assessment Committee for Kingswood Assessment Area.[1] That was a case in which contractors at an aerodrome had put up buildings for the purposes of their contract work, garages, canteens and so on. The question was whether, in spite of the paramount occupation of the site by the Crown, the company was in rateable occupation of the structures so put up. Tucker L.J., giving judgment, laid down this test.[2] He says: "I do not think there is any controversy with regard to those "ingredients" (of rateable occupation): "First, there must be "actual occupation; secondly, it must be exclusive for the par-"ticular purposes of the possessor; thirdly, the possession must "be of some value or benefit to the possessor; and, fourthly, the "possession must not be for too transient a period." Of these four ingredients the second is the material consideration here; that is to say, whether the possession of the courses by the occupying golf clubs is exclusive for the particular purposes of the possessor. It is admitted that the occupation is of value because green fees are collected, also that it is not of so transient a nature as not to be rateable, because, although precarious, on a yearly licence, it has, in fact, continued for half a century.

As a pendant to that case, I should refer to Westminster City Council v. Southern Railway Co.[3] Lord Russell, in giving judgment, pointed out that it is no longer the law that a tenancy is an essential to rateable occupation. Occupation under a licence or easement may be enough. His Lordship said this: "In my "opinion, the crucial question must always be what in fact is the "occupation in respect of which someone is alleged to be rateable, "and it is immaterial whether the title to occupy is attributable "to a lease, a licence, or an easement."

The question for us is how do the appellants measure up to these criteria? Such facts as there are, and they are jejune enough, must be gathered from the cases stated, but before examining these it may be well to say a word about that romantic area styled the New Forest, well known to all of us from our youth up, if not from personal knowledge, then from Captain Marryatt's

[1] [1949] 1 K.B. 344; [1949] 1 All E.R. 224, C.A.
[2] [1949] 1 K.B. 344, 350.
[3] [1936] A.C. 511, 532, 533; 52 T.L.R. 541; [1936] 2 All E.R. 322.

C. A.
1960
Peak
v.
Burley Golf Club.
Harman L.J.

"The Children of the New Forest," or Maurice Hewlett's "The "Forest Lovers." The area of the forest extends, we are told, to over 80,000 acres in the County of Southampton, and it has been the subject of a number of statutes in comparatively recent times. We were referred to a local Act, the New Forest Act, 1877, which referred to parts of an Act of 1698, another Act of 1808, and another of 1851. In section 3 of the Act of 1877 the forest is defined as meaning for the purposes of the Act: "The unenclosed "lands whereof Her Majesty is seised in her domain as of fee, "subject to the rights of commoners therein or thereover, situate "within the boundaries of the New Forest in the County of "Southampton including all such lands as may at the commence-"ment of this Act be enclosed in pursuance of any commission" under former Acts. There is mention there of a register kept of commoners and their holdings in the forest. The latest Act seems to have been the New Forest Act, 1949, which is styled "An Act "to make further provision as respects the New Forest in the "County of Southampton," and deals first with the "verderers" of the forest who are the principal officers in charge of the area. They have various powers such as that of making by-laws under section 9. Under section 18, there is power in the Minister—by which is meant the Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries—to grant easements and licences for any period not exceeding 60 years on such terms as to payment and otherwise as may be specified in the licences. The licences in the present case do not seem to have been given under those powers, but under, I suppose, earlier powers vested in the Forestry Commissioners. We were also referred to the Forestry Act, 1927, and certain by-laws made under that Act which apply when made with the consent of the verderers to the New Forest. In the year 1945 the ownership of most of the Royal Forests was transferred to the Ministry of Agriculture, but it appears that the Minister has in many cases, including the New Forest, delegated the management of the forest to the Forestry Commissioners, and that is the governing body which appears in the cases before us. There are, as is well known, many commoners in the forest having rights of turbary, estovers, pasture, pannage, and so forth: but when one comes to the general public the position is less clear. Whether the general public, as such, has any legal rights is obscure. But it was agreed (and it is notorious) that the public has for many years been accustomed, whether under a dedication by the Crown or by sufferance, to wander at will and according to inclination over the unenclosed portions of the forest subject in recent times to the by-laws promulgated, as I have said, by the commissioners under the Act of 1927. These by-laws set out a long list of acts prohibited except under the written authority of the commissioners. They do not appear to me to be relevant to the appeal.

I turn now to the cases stated and first to the Bramshaw case. After a formal part, the case cites some facts to which I will revert in a moment, and annexed to it is the decision of the tribunal. There are a number of statements in this which I find it a little difficult to reconcile with any evidence before us. It begins by saying this, so far as is relevant: "The local valuation "court accepted the contention of the respondents that the golf "courses themselves were not rateable because the respective "clubs are not in exclusive occupation of the land. Each of the "golf courses has been in existence for over 50 years. Each "course is held by the club under a licence granted by the "Forestry Commission. This licence is granted on the payment "of a certain sum per year. The licence states that it gives to "the club a licence to use the links for the purpose of playing golf "and for maintaining the links and generally to take charge of "the ground." That last is a very unfortunate statement, because it appears that it can only be based on a document dated in 1913, a licence long superseded in the case of this golf club. Having gone so far, the president says this: "It is admitted that "forest ponies wander over the courses, caravans are parked "there and people come and picnic there. It is, of course, a well-"known fact that many golf courses all over the country are on "common land and that the committees of these golf clubs cannot "prevent the public from exercising their right to enter such "land and to enjoy themselves on it." Where he got that from I do not know—presumably from his own knowledge, as there is no evidence on the subject. He goes on to say: "Those clubs "have not the exclusive possession of the golf courses in the sense "that many other golf clubs have which own the land on which "they play, but in my view this does not bar these golf clubs "from possessing a right over and above that possessed by the "public using the common."

I cannot find any evidence to support that finding either. "I ask myself the question what does this licence give to these "golf clubs? It gives them the right to lay out and maintain the "golf course." With all respect to the president, there is nothing about "laying out" in any licence here. He goes on: "That "involves the making of greens and tees and erecting on the land "the usual appurtenances of a golf course such as flags and "direction boards. It must be borne in mind that we are not "attempting to rate the game of golf, what it is sought to rate is "a golf course. It appears to me that each of these clubs has, by "virtue of its licence, an exclusive right to construct these golf "courses and to play golf on them. This, in my opinion, is "sufficient to give them rateable occupation." It may well be that, if there were such an exclusive right as the president mentions, that would be a conclusion of law which would be unassailable. It is a conclusion of law because, as he states, it is "by virtue of its licence." He is, therefore, construing the licence.

When one looks at "the licence" in the Bramshaw case there are two letters, one of March 20, 1913, which looks like the beginning of the Bramshaw Club. That is an answer by the

C. A.
1960
PEAK
v.
BURLEY GOLF CLUB.
Harman L.J.

secretary of the Office of Woods and Forests to an application made to him on behalf of the appellant club, or its predecessor in title, for the use of a golf course then already laid out, apparently by a private person. The application was "for permission to "play golf on the above links originally formed by the late Mr. de "Crespigny and for that purpose to maintain the greens and "generally to take charge of the ground." That is the source of the words "generally to take charge of the ground," quoted by the president. The letter then says that the Secretary of State, Mr. Runciman, "is willing to give a new permission during "the pleasure of this department," and then there are set out certain conditions, one of which is that if the permission be determined "the surface of the soil, if required, is to be restored "to its original condition." It was an annual permission which has gone on ever since subject apparently to renewed applications. The next document we have is apparently the current permission dated October 8, 1954, and signed by Mr. Foard for the deputy surveyor of the New Forest, and it states: "I refer to your "application for permission to maintain (1) a golf course" and a number of other chattels on the land of the golf courses at Bramshaw "as shown by red crosses on the enclosed tracing." Then he says: "I am instructed to grant you the required permission "on the following terms and conditions." There is to be a payment, and then it provides: "This permission constitutes a "revision of the existing permissions numbered 26." No. 26 is the one I last read. Then it goes on to state that there is to be no interference with the pasturage, that is to say, with the rights of the commoners. I need not read more except that there is a repeated stipulation that the ground shall be put right, if the permission be withdrawn. The plan annexed or attached shows somewhere more or less in its middle the "golf course at Brook "Common," and there is no other indication where the golf course is, except that, I suppose, it is somewhere within the four corners of the plan.

The case stated in the Burley case is in the same terms as the other, but the letter of licence, though written on October 9, 1954, only one day after the one I have last read, is in a different form. Why that should be so passes the wit of a lawyer to understand. Mr. Foard, writing to the club's honorary secretary, says this: "I refer to your application on behalf of the Burley Golf Club "for permission to maintain a golf course, a length of track, two "wicket entrances and a notice board at Burley, near Ringwood, "Hants., as shown by red colour and crosses and brown colour "on the enclosed tracing. . . . I am instructed to grant you the "required permission on the following terms and conditions." There is a condition as to payment, and then follows this: "The "Forestry Commission will not be responsible for any repairs to "any of the subjects of the permission and this permission does "not afford exclusive right of user over the area comprising the "golf course." It is said to be revocable and personal to the grantees. There is provision for reinstating the hedge or fence or wall and the surface of the soil if permission be withdrawn. The plan shows by lines the extent of the area covered by the licence.

There apparently the case stated ended, but the parties were not unnaturally not satisfied that all the facts relevant had been stated by the tribunal, and they asked for further facts to be stated. This was done in the same terms at the end of each case and runs as follows: "(a) The respondent golf club maintained "the course occupied by it, including the greens, fairways, "bunkers and tees in a fit state for play, and the course was "regularly used for the purpose of playing golf; (b) although "the respondent golf club demanded and accepted green fees of "people who played on the course, if people (as they did) came "and played on them and refused to pay green fees the club did "nothing about it; (c) the sums received by the respondent golf "club from the collection of green fees formed a substantial part "of their total income."

To my mind, the conclusion of the tribunal in each case is based simply on the construction placed on what is called the licence. This seems to me an ambiguous conclusion when there are, as I have explained, three different documents of licence, and the tribunal seems to have based itself on the 1913 one in the Bramshaw case which has been superseded. Each of the two documents of 1954 permits the maintenance of a golf course, that is to say, of an existing golf course and no more. In the Bramshaw case no area is defined on the plan. In the Burley case the plan does show a line of demarcation. The licence in the Burley case expressly states that it gives no exclusive right of user over the area. The Bramshaw licence is silent on this point but provides that the commoners' right of pasture be not interfered with. One adds the findings that the forest ponies wander over the course at will, that caravans are parked there and picnickers frequent the place. Finally, members of the public who do not pay green fees when asked are suffered to play, nevertheless, without let or hindrance. I cannot see any occupation which can be based on the second of the tests applied in the 1949 case, namely, that the occupation must be exclusive for the purpose for which the land is used by the licensee.

I hold that the tribunal was not justified in its statement at the end of the decision that each of the clubs has by virtue of its licence "an exclusive right to construct these golf courses and to "play golf on them." There is no exclusive right as is shown expressly in one case and impliedly in the other by the fact that the commoners as of right still have the right of pasture over the course and cannot be excluded. Moreover, I see nothing in either licence to justify the exclusion of the public.

In my judgment, it does not appear that either of these appellants has a rateable occupation of its golf course. There is the additional element in the Bramshaw case that I cannot find any rateable hereditament defined; I should have thought that before

C. A.
1960
Peak
v.
Burley Golf Club.

levying a rate you must be able to say what the hereditament was on which you were to levy. That element is not present in the other case but, nonetheless, I think the two are in pari materia, and I would allow both these appeals.

Pearce L.J. I agree with the reasons which my Lord has given. It is not correct to say that each of these clubs has by virtue of its licence "an exclusive right to construct these golf "courses." Nor can it be properly said, in my view, that by the terms of their licence the clubs have an exclusive right to play golf on the courses. One of the licences expressly says that it does not afford an exclusive right of user over the area comprising the golf course. In practice, the clubs do not prevent unauthorised persons playing on the courses. Nor, I think, do their licences give them any right to do so, as long as the Crown allows the public free access to this part of the forest. I cannot agree with the suggestion that the Crown by granting the licence are impliedly forbidding the public to play golf on the course or giving to the licensees an implied authority to prevent the public from doing so. The by-laws do not prevent it. There is no finding that such user by the public is trivial. Moreover, in seeing how far the club's occupation is exclusive for its purposes, namely, keeping up the course and playing golf, one cannot disregard the members of the public who walk there and picnic there and park their caravans there. The club has no right to prevent them, and although their presence on the course is directed to a different end from the purposes of the members, it does, I think, constitute some interference with the club's occupation for its particular purposes.

I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Lord Evershed M.R. I, too, am of the same opinion. An alternative suggestion made by Mr. Lyell was that we should refer the matter back to the tribunal for further findings of fact, but I do not think in this case it would be right so to do. The president of the tribunal founded his conclusion upon what appears to be the construction placed by him on the licences. For the reasons which my brother Harman has stated, I do not think that the licences as a matter of fair construction suffice to determine, certainly not to establish, the essential requirements of exclusive possession for the purposes of the golf courses. But, in addition, the parties, as my brother also explained, have requested the tribunal to state further facts, and those further facts are found in paragraph 4 in each of the cases. As I think, they clearly fall short of establishing as a fact the necessary quality of possession.

In those circumstances, I do not think it would be right in these cases to say that there should be, so to speak, a second hearing of the matter, with the possibility that then a more clear or precise conclusion of fact would be reached. As I think, the Revenue, who were the appellants before the tribunal, did not establish the necessary premises for rateable occupation.

I agree that the appeals accordingly should be allowed.

C. A.
1960
PEAK v. BURLEY GOLF CLUB.

Appeals allowed with costs, here and below, the costs before the Lands Tribunal being fixed by the court at £25 in each case.

Solicitors: Mawby, Barrie & Letts for Bell, Pope & Bridgwater, Southampton; Solicitor of Inland Revenue.

B. A. B.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

* CORN v. WEIR'S (GLASS) LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[1957 C. 230.]

C. A.
1960
March 22, 23; April 4.
Hodson, Willmer and Devlin L.JJ.

Building—Safety regulations—"Hand-rail" or "guard-rail"—Meaning of—Factories Act, 1937 (1 Edw. 8 & 1 Geo. 6, c. 67), s. 25 (2)—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I. 1948, No. 1145), reg. 27 (1), (2).

Causation—Breach of statutory duty—Onus of proof—Lack of hand-rail for stairs—Fall.

The Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, provide by regulation 27: "(1) Stairs shall be provided throughout "their length with hand-rails or other efficient means to prevent the "fall of persons except for the time and to the extent necessary for "the access of persons or the movement of materials. If necessary "to prevent danger to any person the hand-rails shall be continued "beyond the ends of the stairs. (2) All gangways, runs and stairs "from which a person is liable to fall a distance of more than "6 feet 6 inches shall be provided with—(a) suitable guard-rails of "adequate strength to a height of at least 3 feet above the gangway, "run or stair. . . ."

The plaintiff was a glazier in the employment of the defendants, who were carrying out work in an uncompleted building. The plaintiff, while carrying a sheet of glass down a stairway 5 feet 6 inches wide unprovided with any kind of rail, fell from a height of between two and three feet and sustained injury:—

Held, (1) that regulation 27 (1) applied, as it was applicable to uncompleted stairs, and (on the facts) there was no necessity for the absence of a hand-rail.

(2) That, in construing the regulation, "hand-rail" in paragraph (1) must be something different from "guard-rail" in paragraph (2); the latter paragraph did not apply, as the plaintiff fell from too low a height, and the former paragraph did not require the provision of anything so substantial as to prevent a fall from the outer side of the stairs; accordingly, the plaintiff had not established that his fall was caused by any breach of the regulation.

APPEAL from Mr. Commissioner Marshall Q.C.

The plaintiff, Archibald Corn, was a glazier in the employment

C. A.
1960
Corn
v.
Weir's
(Glass) Ltd.

of the defendants, Weir's (Glass) Ltd., who were engaged on a contract in a building which was being erected. He was descending the stairs, carrying a sheet of plate glass measuring 5 feet by 2 feet 6 inches, which he was holding with both hands. The stairs were 5 feet 6 inches in width, and were disposed in two flights, with a half-landing between. There was no rail of any sort fitted on either side of the stairs. The upper flight hugged the wall on one side, while the other side was open to the hall below. The lower flight consisted of seven stairs, set at an angle to the wall, so that it was open on both sides, no rail of any sort being fitted. The plaintiff, after stumbling on the top flight, reached the half-landing in safety, but, while he was descending the lower flight, a gust of wind blowing through a window just above him caught the glass which he was carrying and upset his balance. He was close to the open side of the stairs and fell over from the fourth or fifth step up from the hall, a distance of between 2 and 3 feet, and sustained injury.

In an action for damages the commissioner held that the defendants had not been guilty of negligence or breach of statutory duty, and that the plaintiff would have been guilty of contributory negligence to the extent of two-thirds. [The defendants cited the head contractors, Bates Ltd., as a third party, on issues which are not material to this report.]

Stephen Brown for the plaintiff.
E. Brian Gibbens for the defendants.
E. W. Eveleigh for the third party.

Case cited in argument: Attorney-General v. Walker.[1]

Cur. adv. vult.

April 12. The following judgments were read:

Hodson L.J. I have had the advantage of reading a copy of the judgment which Willmer L.J. has prepared and I will ask him to deliver his judgment, with which I agree.

Willmer L.J. The plaintiff, a glazier by trade, brought this action against the defendants, his employers, claiming damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained in consequence of their negligence or breach of statutory duty. The commissioner found that the defendants were guilty of no negligence or breach of statutory duty, but that the plaintiff was himself, in the words of the commissioner, "the main architect "of his misfortune." He accordingly dismissed the action, but at the request of the parties he assessed the plaintiff's damages, at £435. He further intimated that, if he had found any breach of statutory duty on the part of the defendants, he would have held the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence to the extent of two-thirds. By the terms of the notice of appeal the plaintiff appealed against all these findings. But the argument before us has been confined to two submissions, namely (1) that the defendants ought to have been found guilty of breach of statutory duty, and (2) that the plaintiff was wrongly found guilty of contributory negligence. The defendants entered a cross-notice, by which they submitted, inter alia, that the plaintiff's injuries, loss and damage were not caused by the breach of statutory duty alleged. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:]

[1] (1849) 3 Ex. 242.

The plaintiff's case is founded on an alleged breach by the defendants of regulation 27 (1) of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, which provides as follows: "(1) Stairs shall be provided throughout their length with "hand-rails or other efficient means to prevent the fall of persons "except for the time and to the extent necessary for the access "of persons or the movement of materials. If necessary to "prevent danger to any person the hand-rails shall be continued "beyond the ends of the stairs."

It will be convenient also to refer to part of paragraph (2) of this regulation, not because any breach of its provisions is alleged, but because its terms were much relied on by the defendants as throwing light on the construction of paragraph (1). The material words are: "(2) All gangways, runs and stairs from "which a person is liable to fall a distance of more than 6 feet "6 inches shall be provided with—(a) suitable guard-rails of "adequate strength to a height of at least 3 feet above the "gangway, run or stair."

The plaintiff's case is that his fall was due to the defendants' failure to provide any hand-rail as required by regulation 27 (1). It has been contended that the type of rail contemplated by this regulation would be a rail on the open side. Had such a rail been provided, the plaintiff, it is alleged, would have been protected from falling over the open side of the stairs, and consequently the accident would not have occurred.

The commissioner found that there had been no breach of regulation 27 (1), for two reasons. First, he held that the regulation only applied to completed stairs, and these stairs had not been completed. Secondly, he considered that the absence of a rail was justified, as being necessary for the movement of materials.

I find myself unable to agree that either of these is a good reason for holding regulation 27 (1) to be inapplicable. As to the first, the defendants have not sought to support the commissioner's judgment on this point. There is nothing in the terms of the regulation to restrict its application to completed stairs. On the contrary, it could well be said that when stairs are incomplete there is all the more reason for applying the regulation and insisting on the provision of a hand-rail.

C. A.
1960
CORN
v.
WEIR'S
(GLASS) LTD.
Willmer L.J.

With regard to the second reason, the commissioner relied on evidence that was given to the effect that certain heavy equipment, such as book-cases and cupboards, had still to be taken up the stairs to the upper floors. He considered that the words of the exception in the regulation should be construed broadly, and that the evidence justified him in concluding that the non-provision of a hand-rail was necessary in a broad sense. If the commissioner meant that "necessary" was to be construed as in effect equivalent to convenient, I should certainly be unable to agree with him. But if he meant no more than that necessity does not have to be the subject of absolute mathematical proof, I should not be disposed to quarrel with his view. It seems to me that the defendants could bring themselves within the exception in the regulation by showing that the absence of a hand-rail was reasonably necessary as a practical matter. But in my judgment the evidence fell far short of proving any such thing. The stairs in question were broad, and had only a slight turn at the half-landing. Even if fitted with rails on both sides I cannot see that there would be any practical difficulty for skilled men in carrying upstairs articles of equipment such as were described.

In my judgment, therefore, there is no room for doubt that regulation 27 (1) applied. If so, it was clearly not complied with. The defendants indeed have not sought to deny that, unless excused on the ground of necessity, they were in breach of this regulation. The main contention on their behalf has been that their breach of regulation 27 (1) was not the cause of the plaintiff's fall. The validity of this contention depends upon the true construction of regulation 27 (1). It has to be determined what, upon the true construction of the regulation, the defendants were required to do. The question then arises whether, if this had been done, it can be shown that the plaintiff's accident would have been avoided.

I think it is clear, from the fact that different words are used, that a distinction is to be drawn between a "hand-rail," as prescribed by regulation 27 (1), and "guard-rails," which are the subject of regulation 27 (2). There can be no doubt that down to a height of 6 feet 6 inches above the floor of the hall guard-rails ought to have been provided on the open side of the stairs in accordance with regulation 27 (2). I think that in this context guard-rails must be construed as rails of such a character as will provide a physical barrier against the possibility of falling over the side. That this must be so is, I think, borne out by the provision that such guard-rails must be of "adequate "strength." Moreover, it seems to me clear from its wording that regulation 27 (2) contemplates the provision of a plurality of guard-rails. This, I think, is clear enough from the wording of sub-paragraph (a), but it is placed beyond doubt by the reference to "the lowest guard-rail" in sub-paragraph (b). All this goes to emphasise what I have already said, namely that the guard-rails contemplated by regulation 27 (2) must be intended as a physical barrier. Admittedly no guard-rails were provided on these stairs, and their absence no doubt constituted a breach of regulation 27 (2). It is not, however, suggested that this had any causal connection with the plaintiff's fall. Since the height above the floor level was less than 6 feet 6 inches, there was no requirement that guard-rails be fitted to any part of the lower flight, where the plaintiff was when he fell.

The plaintiff's case is that regulation 27 (1) may be called in aid to fill in, as it were, the gap left by regulation 27 (2). Undoubtedly a hand-rail ought to have been provided for the whole length of the stairs, including the lower flight, and it is suggested that such a hand-rail ought to have been fitted on the open side, so as to serve in lieu of a guard-rail and provide a physical barrier to prevent a person falling over the side. But, as I have already said, a hand-rail must in my judgment be construed as something different from a guard-rail. A hand-rail —which is not required by regulation 27 (1) to be of any particular strength—connotes to my mind a rail that can be gripped by the hand. Such a rail need not necessarily act as a physical barrier; it need only be such a rail as will enable any person, by gripping it, to steady himself against falling. There is no requirement that the hand-rail prescribed shall be fixed on the open side of the stairs. I see no answer to the argument that, if a hand-rail was intended to serve the same purpose as a guard-rail, there would have been no need to apply regulation 27 (2) to stairs at all. It seems to me that regulation 27 (1) would be fully satisfied by the provision of a hand-rail fixed on the wall side, or even, as was suggested in argument, in the case of broad stairs by a hand-rail fixed in the middle, such as is commonly found on the stairways of Underground Railway Stations in London. If this is the correct view, I can see no answer to the defendants' contention that the mere provision of a hand-rail, as required by regulation 27 (1), would have made no difference whatsoever to the plaintiff in the present case. I say this for two reasons. First, the regulation would have been complied with even though no hand-rail, certainly no hand-rail of adequate strength to serve as a physical barrier, had been fitted on the open side of the stairs. Secondly, as previously pointed out, the plaintiff did not in any event have a free hand with which to grip any hand-rail that might have been provided.

In the course of the argument before us reference was made to section 25 (2) of the Factories Act, 1937, the statute under which the regulations here in question were made. This sub-section, which of course applies to staircases in completed buildings in use as factories, rather than to staircases in use for the purpose of building operations, is in the following terms: "(2) For every staircase in a building or affording a means of "exit from a building, a substantial hand-rail shall be provided "and maintained, which, if the staircase has an open side shall

C. A.
1960
Corn
v.
Weir's
(Glass) Ltd.
Willmer L.J.

"be on that side, and, in the case of a staircase having two open "sides, or in the case of a staircase which, owing to the nature "of the construction thereof or the condition of the surface "of the steps or other special circumstances, is specially liable "to cause accidents, such a hand-rail shall be provided and "maintained on both sides. Any open side of a staircase shall "also be guarded by the provision and maintenance of a lower "rail or other effective means." Both sides relied on the terms of this subsection as tending to support their respective contentions. For the plaintiff it was argued that the word "hand-rail" in this subsection is clearly used as meaning something equivalent to a guard-rail—hence the specific provision that it must be fitted on the open side of the stairs. On the other hand, the defendants contended (1) that the requirement that the hand-rail shall be "substantial" is enough to differentiate what is required under the subsection from the kind of hand-rail required by regulation 27 (1); (2) that the requirement that a hand-rail fitted in pursuance of the subsection shall be fitted on the open side shows that, but for this provision, a hand-rail could be fitted on either side, or indeed in any position; and (3) that the subsection is specifically directed, as regulation 27 (1) is not, to the danger of a person falling over the side of the stairs.

The argument that the word "hand-rail" should be given the same meaning both in section 25 (2) of the Act, and in regulation 27 (1) is certainly attractive. But after consideration I do not think it is possible to draw any conclusion from it beyond this. A hand-rail may in certain circumstances be required to fulfil the same function as a guard-rail—that is to say, in some cases a hand-rail may be required to be fitted in such a way that it serves also as a guard-rail. Equally, as it seems to me, a guard-rail may in certain circumstances serve also as a hand-rail. Thus, it is doubtless permissible, where guard-rails are required to be fitted, as for instance under regulation 27 (2), to allow the top guard-rail on the open side to serve as a hand-rail, without the necessity of fitting a separate hand-rail to comply with regulation 27 (1). But to say this, is far from equating a hand-rail with a guard-rail, or vice versa. The two expressions are both used in the course of the same regulation, and each must, therefore, in my judgment, be assigned its own meaning.

The plaintiff further relied on the additional words in regulation 27 (1)—"or other efficient means to prevent the fall "of persons." It was argued that at least the presence of these additional words imported a duty on the defendants to fit something which would prevent a fall such as that of the plaintiff. But to my mind these words must be construed in their context as meaning something ejusdem generis with hand-rails. In my judgment they mean neither more nor less than some form of alternative device that will serve in lieu of a hand-rail, that is to say something that will serve to prevent a fall in the same way and to the like extent as a hand-rail would. I do not think, therefore, that the presence of these additional words advances the argument for the plaintiff any further.

What then is the result in the present case? It is clear that regulation 27 (2) has no application here, since in the position from which the plaintiff fell there was no possibility of falling more than 6 feet 6 inches. Unless, therefore, regulation 27 (1) is to be construed as requiring the defendants to fit something equivalent to a guard-rail on the open side of the stairs, in a position where there was no possibility of a fall of more than 6 feet 6 inches, I do not see how the plaintiff can establish that the mere absence of a hand-rail caused his fall. For my part, I do not think that any such construction is permissible. For these reasons, though they are different from those which the commissioner himself gave, I do not feel able to say that he came to a wrong conclusion. On the contrary, the argument on behalf of the defendants satisfies me that the breach of duty, of which they were admittedly guilty in failing to fit a hand-rail, was in no sense a cause of the plaintiff's injuries.

This conclusion renders it strictly unnecessary to deal with the issue of contributory negligence. [His Lordship dealt with this issue and upheld the conclusions of the commissioner.]

It follows, therefore, that although I do not agree with all his reasons, I find myself unable to say that the commissioner came to a wrong conclusion, and I would, accordingly, dismiss the appeal.

DEVLIN L.J. The decision in this appeal must turn almost entirely on the true construction of regulation 27 of the Building Regulations, 1948.

I agree completely with the interpretation which Willmer L.J. has put on the word "stairs" and the word "necessary," and there is nothing that I can add on those points. I agree also that the evidence about the articles of equipment that had to be carried upstairs was insufficient to show that the removal of the hand-rail would have been necessary. I do not therefore need to consider or determine whether the carrying of equipment, such as book-cases and cupboards, comes within the phrase "move-"ment of materials" in the regulations; I reserve my judgment on that point.

I have hesitated a great deal about the meaning of "hand-"rail" in the regulation. It is said that this point was taken before the commissioner, but it can hardly have been pressed on him; he does not deal with it in his judgment and so we have not the benefit of his view on it.

It is clear that in some parts of the Factories Acts and the regulations made thereunder a hand-rail is thought of as something that can be used to guard against a fall. Willmer L.J. has quoted section 25 (2) of the Act of 1937. There is another

C. A.
1960
CORN
v.
WEIR'S
(GLASS) LTD.
Devlin L.J.

example to be found in regulation 2 of the Shipbuilding Regulations, which provides that gangways should be "securely protected "on each side . . . by strongly constructed upper and lower hand-"rails." The word "prevented," which is used in regulation 27 (1) in conjunction with "hand-rail," is to my mind more suited to a guard whose function is to obstruct a fall than to a hand-rail whose function is to make a fall less likely. On the other hand, the change of language from "hand-rail" in subsection (1) of regulation 27 to "guard-rail" in subsection (2) raises a very strong presumption that "hand-rail" has a different meaning from "guard-rail," at least when used in this regulation.

I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment of Willmer L.J. in advance and of studying it, and I am respectfully satisfied that he has found the right solution. A hand-rail is in itself merely something that provides a continuous handhold; but it can also, if suitably constructed and positioned, be made to serve as a guard. When it is so required, as in section 25 (2) of the Act and regulation 2 of the Shipbuilding Regulations, one may expect to find some provision made about its strength and about the placing of it. In regulation 27 (1) no provision is made in respect of these matters; and the fact that such provision is made in regulation 27 (2) in respect of guard-rails shows that the hand-rail in regulation 27 (1) is intended to serve merely as a handhold. This means, I think, that the word "prevent" must be construed in the way in which Willmer L.J. has construed it.

Accordingly, I agree that the plaintiff has failed to show that his injury was a consequence of the breach of regulation 27 (1). But I do not accept to the full the argument that has been addressed to us on this point. The rule of law on causation was, after some divergence of opinion about the burden of proof, declared in the House of Lords in Bonnington Castings v. Wardlaw [1] and applied by this court in Clarke v. E. R. Wright.[2] It is that the plaintiff must show that on balance of probabilities the breach of duty caused or materially contributed to his injury.

But this does not, in my judgment, leave it open to the defendant when the nature of the accident is known, to think out as many ways as he can in which the regulation could conceivably be complied with and then demand that the court tests the question of causation by reference to the way which is of least use to the plaintiff in the circumstances of his accident. The rule requires the plaintiff to show that, if before the accident the regulation had been complied with, his injury probably would not have occurred; and this test of probability means, I think, that the court should consider independently of the accident how the employer would probably have complied with the regulation if he had done as he ought. If there are two or more ways in which he might have done so and one would, on the facts of the accident, have protected the plaintiff and the others not, and no one can say that any one way is more likely to have been chosen than the others, then the plaintiff as a matter of probability fails. But in my judgment the defendant cannot rely on a method that he is unlikely to have used simply because it is within the letter of the regulation.

[1] [1956] A.C. 613; [1956] 2 W.L.R. 707; [1956] 1 All E.R. 615.

[2] [1957] 1 W.L.R. 1191; [1957] 3 All E.R. 486, C.A.

One method of compliance proposed to us was the erection of a hand-rail down the middle of the stairs, as is done on broad stairways in stations and other public places, primarily, I should imagine, so as to separate the up-stream and the down-stream of passengers. I should dismiss that entirely from consideration. It seems to me to be most unlikely that the persons responsible for safety in this case would have thought of dividing in that way a stairway 5½ feet wide. I should go further and should say on balance of probability that if the defendants or persons responsible for safety had erected a hand-rail they would be more likely to put it on the open side than against the wall. It would certainly be more useful on the open side and I doubt if the cost would be substantially greater. I should expect a prudent employer to have regard to such considerations and, when he has got to carry out a regulation, to do the work in the way that, in the particular situation he is dealing with, gives the greatest protection and benefit to his workmen.

Where the plaintiff in this case fails, I think, is in showing that a hand-rail or other equivalent support erected on the open side would probably have protected him from injury. It might have withstood him if he had fallen against it, but I think that that must be conjectural.

For these reasons I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors: T. D. Jones & Co. for Riley, Sutcliffe & Co., Blackburn; Simmonds, Church Rackham & Co. for P. J. McKnight & Ryder, Hanley, Stoke-on-Trent; Peacock & Goddard for R. W. Beswick, Hanley, Stoke-on-Trent.

F. R. D.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

* REGINA v. LIVERPOOL JUSTICES. Ex parte ROBERTS.

1960
May 10.

Lord Parker C.J., Ashworth and Salmon JJ.

Crown Practice — Certiorari — Costs — Successful application to quash conviction—Application not resisted by prosecutor—No appearance by prosecutor—Whether costs may be awarded against non-appearing party.

Costs — Justices — Crown practice — Liability of justices for costs — Certiorari—General practice.

It is not the general practice of the court to make an order for costs against a party who has not appeared to resist a successful

1960

Regina
v.
Liverpool
Justices.
Ex parte
Roberts.

application for an order of certiorari when that party has not materially contributed to the error giving rise to the application.

Application for costs.

The applicant, Kenneth Thomas Roberts, applied for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash an order, dated May 20, 1959, made by Liverpool justices sitting at Dale Street, whereby they imposed on him a fine of £2 and ordered that his driving licence be indorsed. The ground of the application was that the justices' order was contrary to the principles of natural justice in that the applicant's solicitor was not given an opportunity of being heard by the justices before the conviction was announced. The court allowed the application and granted an order of certiorari.

Neither the justices nor the prosecutor appeared or were represented at the hearing of the application.

Raymond Stock, for the applicant, asked for costs against the prosecutor.

[Lord Parker C.J. If this had been a case stated you would be entitled to costs, but it was an application for certiorari; the prosecution were not at fault in any way and have not resisted the application.]

The applicant was not at fault in any way; he was entitled to have an injustice put right, and it has been held that certiorari is the proper remedy in these circumstances: Rex v. Wandsworth Justices, Ex parte Read.[1]

[Ashworth J. Is there any case in which costs have been awarded against a party who has taken no part in proceedings of this sort?]

The need for the proceedings arose out of the prosecution, although not out of anything done by the prosecution. It is more common now for the prosecution to be ordered to pay costs when they have not been attacked in any way. The applicant was in fact wrongly convicted; he could only get the matter put right by incurring costs, and it is not wrong that he should receive those costs out of public funds. It is submitted that there is no reason for making a distinction in the matter of costs between proceedings by way of certiorari and other proceedings whereby appeals may be brought before this court.

The court adjourned for a short time.

Lord Parker C.J. Mr. Stock, who has successfully applied for an order of certiorari, now asks for costs. So far as costs against the justices are concerned, it has been the practice not to grant costs against justices or tribunals merely because they have made a mistake in law, but only if they have acted improperly, that is to say, perversely or with some disregard for the elementary principles which every court ought to obey, and even then only if it was a flagrant instance. In the present case the court is satisfied that the denial of justice here was a pure mistake and was not a flagrant instance; indeed, Mr. Stock has not asked for costs against the justices. He asks for costs only against the prosecution. So far as that is concerned, it is the recollection of all the members of this court that the general practice is not to award costs against a party who does not appear to resist an application of this sort. That is not to say that there may not be cases where the court thinks it right to order a party to pay costs if, for instance, he had materially contributed to the error giving rise to the application. Accordingly, following that usual practice, the court in the present case refuses costs.

[1] [1942] 1 K.B. 281; 58 T.L.R. 88; [1942] 1 All E.R. 56, D.C.

1960

REGINA v. LIVERPOOL JUSTICES. Ex parte ROBERTS.

Lord Parker C.J.

No order for costs.

Solicitors: J. B. Izod for Arthur D. Dean & Co., Manchester.

J. F. L.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

*REGINA v. MINISTER OF HOUSING AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT. Ex parte CHICHESTER RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL.

1960 April 28.

Lord Parker C.J., Gorman and Ashworth JJ.

Town and Country Planning — Purchase notice by owner — Minister's reasons for confirming notice—Whether fact that land of less use to owner than if developed proper test—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (10 & 11 Geo. 6, c. 51), s. 19 (1) (2).

An owner of land subject to coastal erosion and having the benefit only of temporary planning permissions for a number of bungalows and caravan sites, finding that he would have to spend large sums of money to protect his land, applied for planning permission to develop it permanently for residential purposes. His application was refused, and his subsequent appeal to the Minister of Housing and Local Government was dismissed. He thereupon served a purchase notice on the local authority pursuant to section 19 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947.[1] The Minister

[1] Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 19: "(1) Where permission to "develop any land is refused, whether "by the local planning authority or "by the Minister, on an application "in that behalf made under this Part "of this Act, . . . then if any owner "of the land claims—(a) that the land "has become incapable of reasonably "beneficial use in its existing state; ". . . he may, . . . serve on the "council of the county borough or "county district in which the land is "situated a notice (hereinafter referred "to as a 'purchase notice') requiring "that council to purchase his interest "in the land in accordance with the "provisions of this section. (2) Where "a purchase notice is served on any "council under this section, that "council shall forthwith transmit a "copy of the notice to the Minister, "and . . . the Minister shall, if he "is satisfied that the conditions speci-"fied in paragraphs (a) to (c) of the "foregoing subsection are fulfilled, "confirm the notice. . . ."

1960

REGINA
v.
MINISTER OF HOUSING AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT.
Ex parte
CHICHESTER R.D.C.

purported to confirm the notice on the grounds that "the land in "its existing state and with the benefit of the temporary planning "permissions that have been granted is of substantially less use "and value to its owner than it would be if planning permission "had been granted (without limitation as to time) for the rebuild-"ing of the buildings which stood on the land on the appointed "day, or which formerly stood there and have been demolished "since January 7, 1937."

On an application by the local authority for an order of certiorari to quash the Minister's confirmation on the ground that the reasons given in his decision letter did not come within the provisions of the relevant paragraph (a) of section 19 (1):—

Held that, in considering whether a purchase notice should be confirmed, the test was whether the land in its existing state had become incapable of reasonably beneficial use, and the fact that the land was less useful in its present state than if developed was not the correct test; accordingly, the Minister's decision should be quashed.

APPLICATION for order of certiorari.

The owner, G. E. J. Bunn, of a strip of land on the coast at Selsey, Sussex, some two and a half acres in extent and subject to severe coastal erosion, had spent some £1,000 on coastal defence, and would, so he claimed, have to spend a further £8,500 if he was to preserve his land effectively. There were 14 bungalows and 17 caravan sites on the land, but these were the subject of temporary planning permissions only. Together they produced a gross revenue of some £930 a year.

In 1958, the owner applied to the Chichester Rural District Council for permission to develop the land permanently for residential purposes, this being in his view the only circumstances in which he could afford to incur the necessary expenditure to preserve his land; this application was refused. He appealed to the Minister of Housing and Local Government against that refusal, and his appeal was dismissed. On October 23, 1958, he served a purchase notice on the local authority and on April 1, 1959, there was a hearing before an inspector appointed by the Minister, and on April 6 the inspector reported to the Minister. On April 20 the Minister issued his decision whereby he confirmed the purchase notice on the ground that "the land in its existing "state and with the benefit of the temporary planning permis-"sions that have been granted is of substantially less use and "value to its owner than it would be if planning permission "had been granted (without limitation as to time) for the "rebuilding of the buildings which stood on the land on the "appointed day or which formerly stood there and have been "demolished since January 7, 1937."

The local authority applied for an order of certiorari to quash the decision of the Minister.

R. E. Megarry Q.C. and Jeremiah Harman for the applicants.

J. R. Cumming-Bruce for the Minister of Housing and Local Government.

No cases were cited in argument.

LORD PARKER C.J. stated the facts, read section 19 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and continued: The Minister's letter setting out his decision reads: "The inspector's "report stated that in view of the legal complications involved "in the case, he did not consider that he was in a position to "make a comprehensive recommendation. He went on, "however, 'the existing use of the site is a mixture of holiday, "'caravan and residential use, some of which has only temporary "'planning permission. The planning application in respect of "'this site was for "redevelopment of building sites for resi-"'"dential purposes." Because of this my feeling is that the "'land in its existing state and with its existing permissions is "'substantially less useful to the server than it would be with "'permission for the permanent redevelopment for residential "'purposes'." Pausing there, I think it is quite clear that that of itself is not the test. I suppose that in every case where land is worth developing and permission to develop is refused, the existing use of the land will be of less beneficial use, it will be less useful to the owner, than if it were developed. The test is whether it has become incapable of reasonably beneficial use in its existing state.

It may be that the word "reasonably" invokes some comparison, but the fact that the land is less useful, to use a comprehensive term, in its present state than if developed is clearly not the test. The Minister continues: "The Minister "therefore accepts his inspector's view that the land in its "existing state and with the benefit of the temporary planning "permissions that have been granted is of substantially less "use and value to its owner than it would be if planning "permission had been granted (without limitation as to time) "for the rebuilding of the buildings which stood on the land on "the appointed day, or which formerly stood there and have "been demolished since January 7, 1937. He is accordingly "satisfied that the conditions specified in paragraphs (a) to (c) "of subsection (1) of section 19 of the Act are fulfilled."

In my judgment that passage discloses an error of law in this speaking order. It is not, as I have said, a question of whether the land is of less use or substantially less use in its present state than if developed, and it is a non-sequitur to say that because it is of substantially less use than if developed, therefore the conditions specified in the paragraph are fulfilled. I prefer to say nothing more about the case, because it may well be that there would have been other grounds for justifying the confirmation of this purchase notice, but I am satisfied that the ground, and the only ground, stated by the Minister, is not a valid ground at all and accordingly in my judgment this decision will have to be quashed.

1960

Regina v. Minister of Housing and Local Government. Ex parte Chichester R.D.C.

Gorman J. I agree and I desire to add nothing.

Ashworth J. I also agree.

Order of certiorari.

Solicitors: Lees & Co.; Solicitor, Ministry of Housing and Local Government.

J. D. P.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.

1960 April 29; May 2.

Sellers, Willmer and Harman L.JJ.

* BOHNEL v. BOHNEL.

Husband and Wife—Cruelty—Intention to injure—Effeminacy of husband—Feminine proclivities concealed from wife—Chance discoveries by wife—Failure of husband to undergo treatment—Treatment unlikely to cure marital difficulties.

A wife petitioned for the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's alleged cruelty, in that he had constantly desired and shown his desire to dress and behave like a woman. The petition was undefended.

The husband had done his best to conceal his desires and practices from his wife and she had discovered them in 1955 only by an unforeseeable chance. After the discovery the wife had a nervous breakdown, but she recovered and returned to cohabitation with the husband, who continued to conceal his proclivities and practices from her. In 1958 the wife, again by a chance, discovered the husband dressed as a woman, and he told her later that he wished to be a woman and live with another man. He consented to see a psychiatrist, and did so, but did not undergo treatment. The treatment would not have remedied the lack of sexual desire which the husband manifested to his wife but would in fact have decreased it. The wife continued to live with him for a further period of eight months without suffering any further injury to her health. She then left the matrimonial home and petitioned for divorce. Her petition was dismissed and she appealed:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that in view of the husband's efforts to conceal his tendencies and activities from his wife, it was impossible to impute to him or to infer from his conduct any intention to injure her, or to say that he had deliberately pursued a course of conduct after 1955 which he must have realised would be likely to cause her injury; and that as any possible treatment would not have effected a cure of the marital difficulties, his failure to undergo treatment was not unreasonable; accordingly, the wife had failed to establish the charge of cruelty.

Jamieson v. Jamieson [1952] A.C. 525, 550; [1952] 1 T.L.R. 833; [1952] 1 All E.R. 875, H.L. applied.

Williams v. Williams, The Times, March 15, 1958 distinguished.

Appeal from Judge Armstrong, sitting as special commissioner in divorce at Bournemouth.

The facts, as stated in the judgment of Willmer L.J., were as follows: A wife petitioned for the dissolution of her marriage on the ground of her husband's alleged cruelty. The petition was undefended. The parties were married on April 10, 1943, the husband being then 33 years of age and the wife 29. At the time of the marriage the husband, who was of Czechoslovak origin, was serving in the forces, and continued to do so until the end of the war, after which the parties settled down and lived in this country. There were two children of the marriage, one of whom survived. The parties lived together first with the wife's parents and later in a caravan. There was then a period, from about 1949 to 1953, during which they were separated, the wife living with her parents and the husband remaining in the caravan, though he continued to visit the wife at intervals. They came together again in 1953 and lived together until the end of 1958, when the wife left the husband. Her petition was presented on January 20, 1959.

The wife's case, as set out in the particulars of the petition, was as follows: "The nature of the petitioner's case is that since "the year 1945 the respondent has constantly desired and shown "his desire to dress and behave like a woman. In 1945 the "respondent possessed a suitcase filled with women's clothes. "In 1948 he acquired a pair of women's shoes. In 1955 at the "matrimonial home the petitioner discovered the respondent "attempting to conceal women's clothes in and under a wardrobe. "On this occasion the respondent possessed unguents and powder "more usually possessed by women than men. In 1958 at the "matrimonial home the petitioner found the respondent dressed "like a woman and the respondent told the petitioner he wished "to live with another man. The respondent is repelled by sexual "intercourse."

The wife's story as given in evidence, so far as material, was as follows: From the beginning the relationship between the parties was cool, and sexual intercourse took place only at rare intervals, usually at the instigation of the wife. As early as 1945, when the parties were about to go away on a visit to Czechoslovakia, the wife, on opening the suitcase which the husband had packed, discovered that it contained women's clothes. The husband, when challenged about this, said that in his youth he had been in the habit of dressing up as a woman. For the time being the wife accepted this explanation, though she was left with a suspicion that there might be another woman involved. Nothing further was proved until 1955, when an incident of considerable consequence occurred. The parties had been away for a visit to the wife's parents, from which the husband returned to the matrimonial home before the wife. When the wife reached home she was unable to get into the place, the latch on the door having been dropped, and she had to wait until the husband opened the door and let her in. The husband was wearing a dressing gown over his jacket and trousers, but on following him upstairs the wife discovered that he had women's clothing in the bedroom and that there were cosmetics and face-cream, of a type

C. A.
1960
Bohnel
v.
Bohnel.

used by women, on the dressing table. The wife admitted that she had never seen the husband with his face actually made up, nor up to that time had she ever seen him actually wearing women's clothing. The wife challenged the husband about her discovery, and a discussion ensued, in the course of which he started crying and asked for her help. She suggested that he should see a doctor, and he agreed to do so. The discovery which the wife made caused her a very great shock, and shortly afterwards she had a complete nervous breakdown. She was received into Holloway Sanatorium, Virginia Water, as a voluntary patient and was under treatment there from June 13 to November 26, 1955. The husband did, in accordance with his promise, see a psychiatrist, but he never in fact underwent any treatment.

After her discharge from the sanatorium the wife returned to live with her husband, and the next thing that happened according to her evidence—though that was not pleaded in the petition—was that she discovered that he was again collecting women's clothing. She took no action about that, and nothing further happened till a date early in 1958, when the wife, who was working at the time, was given some time off on a Saturday afternoon, returned home unexpectedly and found the husband actually dressed in women's clothing. When challenged about this the husband said that she could have a separation or a divorce or anything she wanted. During a later discussion that same weekend he said that he wanted to be a woman, and in reply to a further question he admitted that he would like to live in a house with another man.

The wife said that she was very upset by this further discovery, but there was no evidence to show that on that occasion her health was adversely affected. She again attended the sanatorium, where she interviewed Dr. Irwin, but she did not require or receive any treatment herself. She appeared to have gone there primarily to discuss the possibility of her husband receiving treatment. The husband in fact went to see the doctor, and admitted his taste for dressing up in women's clothing; but although Dr. Irwin expressed the view that he could have been given certain treatment which might have controlled his impulses, the husband never in fact underwent any such treatment.

After that date the parties continued to live together, though more or less at arm's length. The wife said that the husband ignored her and the child. No further sexual intercourse took place, the last occasion having been, according to the wife, at Christmas, 1957. There were no further incidents, and eventually, in December, 1958, the wife left.

Evidence was given by Dr. Smedhurst, who attended the wife during her stay in the sanatorium in 1955, that at the time of her admission she was suffering from what was described as "agitated depression," requiring intensive treatment. She had to be accommodated at first in a protected room, and thereafter she received intensive electrical treatment. This was so far successful that by October of that year she was able to give a lucid history of her married life. She was discharged during the following month, apparently cured, and there was no evidence of any further breakdown in her mental health after that date. The doctor's view of the cause of the wife's breakdown in 1955 was given in answer to questions put to her, when she was asked: "Are you prepared to say whether or not within your knowledge "what Mrs. Bohnel was suffering from when she came into "Holloway on that first occasion was consistent with a woman who "had had a shock perhaps of finding out about that sort of side "of her husband's life?" To this she answered, "Yes. At that "time in fact it seemed dramatically so from the patient's point "of view. She felt at that time that he was the obsessive factor, "and we were inclined to agree that she had been trying to conceal "from herself the full significance of her husband's perversion, of "which shortly before her admission she had discovered the full "extent and its consequences; she had reacted to this by being "unable to face up to it and in time she had become more and "more shattered until she could see no way out of her predica-"ment." The doctor also said in answer to a question from the commissioner: "I think that our patient was disgusted with this "sort of thing at the time, and I think it took a violent form, "because she felt that this was a perversion that would affect "the whole family."

Dr. Irwin, who saw the wife in 1958, said that in his view there was a possibility of a recurrence of what had happened to the wife in 1955, the circumstances being similar. But in fact no such recurrence took place and it was not necessary for the wife to receive any further treatment.

On the hearing of the wife's petition, the commissioner reserved his decision, and on August 18, 1959, delivered a considered judgment dismissing the wife's petition. The wife appealed.

Roger Ormrod Q.C., T. G. Field Fisher and George Dobry for the wife.

The husband did not appear and was not represented.

The following cases, in addition to those referred to in the judgments of the court, were cited in argument: King v. King[1] and Lang v. Lang.[2]

WILLMER L.J. giving the first judgment, stated the facts set out above and continued: Though undefended the case is not without difficulty, for the allegations made by the wife against the husband are of an unusual nature. The commissioner himself clearly found

[1] [1954] P. 55; [1953] 3 W.L.R. 767; [1953] 2 All E.R. 1029, C.A.

[2] [1955] A.C. 402; [1954] 3 W.L.R. 762; [1954] 3 All E.R. 571, P.C.

C. A.
1960
BOHNEL
v.
BOHNEL.
Willmer L.J.

the case one of some difficulty, for after hearing evidence at considerable length on two separate dates, he took time to consider his decision, and in due course delivered a considered judgment in which he dealt very fully with the issues raised. It is not, as I understand it, suggested that the mere fact of the husband having a tendency which impelled him to collect women's clothes, cosmetics, and so forth, was of itself sufficient to amount to cruelty. What has been contended, both here and before the commissioner, is that the cruelty lay in continuing the practice after the events of 1955, when its damaging effect on the wife's health was brought so forcibly to his attention. The husband, it is said, is in a dilemma from which there is no escape. Either he was able to control his tendency, in which case there could be no excuse for continuing a practice which he knew was extremely distressing to his wife, or else the tendency was one which he could not control without undergoing treatment, in which case his refusal to undergo the treatment that was offered to him in 1955 was inexcusable. In either event the result must be the same—namely, that the husband continued to pursue a course of conduct which he could have avoided. Reliance was placed on Williams v. Williams,[1] in which Collingwood J. found cruelty proved against a husband who persisted in the practice of dressing up as a woman, despite the distress which to his knowledge it caused to his wife.

The commissioner came to the conclusion that the wife's nervous breakdown in 1955 was largely contributed to by the shock she received when she discovered how her husband was behaving. This conclusion was well warranted by the evidence, and must in my judgment be accepted. He took the view, however, that the decisive feature of this case was the secretive nature of the husband's behaviour. So far from flaunting his feminist tendencies, he did his best throughout to conceal from his wife the way in which he was behaving. This alone, in the view of the commissioner, was enough to distinguish the present case from Williams v. Williams,[1] in which the gravamen of the charge against the husband was that he was constantly parading his tendencies, both in his conversation and in his behaviour, to the manifest distress of his wife. On this point again I find myself in agreement with the commissioner. Moreover, the fact of the husband making every effort to conceal what he was doing from his wife makes it impossible to impute to him any actual intention to injure her. In these circumstances, the commissioner rightly applied his mind to the question whether an intent to injure ought to be inferred, on the basis that the husband deliberately pursued a course of conduct which, as a reasonable man, he must have realised would be likely to cause injury. He came to the conclusion that no such intent ought to be inferred, his reasoning, as I understand the judgment, being substantially as follows: If and so far as the husband was able to control his actions, he was indulging his tendencies in circumstances in which he could reasonably suppose they could never come to the knowledge of the wife. In so far as he was incapable of controlling his actions without treatment, his refusal to undergo the treatment that was offered was not in all the circumstances unreasonable; nor, in the view of the commissioner, would the treatment available to the husband have been effective to cure what he regarded as the real cause of the wife's distress.

[1] The Times, March 15, 1958.

With regard to this last point, the view of the commissioner appears to have been that the real cause of the wife's distress was not so much the discovery of the husband's abnormal tendencies and behaviour, but the fact that she had little sexual attraction for him, of which his abnormal tendencies were merely a symptom. The treatment which would have been available for the husband would not have had any effect by way of encouraging sexual desire on his part; on the contrary, it would have been actually repressive of the sexual drive. The commissioner accordingly concluded that it would not have been in any way effectual to remove what he regarded as the basic cause of the wife's distress. It is undoubtedly true that, on the evidence, sexual relations between the parties always were cool, and became cooler as time went on. But it is complained that the commissioner's view that this was the basic cause of the trouble finds scant support in the evidence. I am not satisfied that this criticism is justified, for it is not to be forgotten that the commissioner was not confined, as we are, to the written record of the evidence as it appears in the transcript, but had the advantage of seeing the wife herself, and the opportunity of forming his own conclusions as to her personality. But I do not think the matter is of any great relevance, and I am prepared to deal with the case on the basis that, as contended on her behalf, it was simply the discovery of the husband's habit of collecting and using female clothes, cosmetics, and so forth, that was the cause of the wife's distress.

As I have already indicated, I am satisfied that the evidence fell short of proving that the husband deliberately intended to hurt or cause injury to the wife. This is the only possible inference to draw from the fact that he was at such pains to conceal his abnormal activities from her. In these circumstances, I think the commissioner directed himself correctly in asking himself the question whether, in pursuing his abnormal course of conduct, the husband was doing something which, as a reasonable man, he ought to have foreseen was likely to cause injury to the wife. If so, there is good authority for saying that such conduct might amount to cruelty, so as to warrant the court in granting relief to the wife. But the question is one that it is rarely easy to answer, and, in the case of conduct such as is in question in this case, it is always a matter of difficulty to decide on which side of the line it falls. I do not think that the

C. A.
1960
Bohnel
v.
Bohnel.
Willmer L.J.

law, as it applies to a case of this class, can be better or more succinctly stated than it was by Lord Tucker in Jamieson v. Jamieson[2]: "Every such act must be judged in relation to its "attendant circumstances, and the physical or mental condition "or susceptibilities of the innocent spouse, the intention of the "offending spouse and the offender's knowledge of the actual "or probable effect of his conduct on the other's health (to "borrow from the language of Lord Keith) are all matters which "may be decisive in determining on which side of the line a "particular act or course of conduct lies."

Applying this test, it seems to me that, in order to found a charge of cruelty on the conduct of the husband in continuing to practise his abnormal tendency after 1955, it would have to be shown (a) that there was some real probability of the wife finding out about it, (b) that if she did find out it would probably cause her another serious shock, and (c) that such shock would be likely to cause further injury to her health, as it did in 1955. So long as the husband succeeded in concealing his continued practice of the abnormal tendency from the wife, it is clear that it could do her no hurt. As to this, the commissioner said: "He "practised it in circumstances which he, I think, could reason-"ably suppose could not come to the knowledge of his wife. "There is no case where he flaunted it or talked about it, that "he was emotional, or in any way sought to bring it into the "married life in any single form." I can find nothing to criticise in this statement. It was by the merest accident, and an accident not readily foreseeable, that the wife made her discovery in 1958, through returning home unexpectedly in the middle of the afternoon. It is, however, important to observe that on this occasion the discovery does not appear to have caused any great shock, nor did it have any adverse effect on the wife's health. Events proved, therefore, that there was in fact no such danger of injury to the wife. Moreover, it is, I think, highly relevant to remember that after the discovery the wife continued to reside with the husband, with no apparent untoward results, for another eight months, before she finally left in December, 1958. Were it proved that the previous conduct did in truth amount to cruelty, this circumstance would have been of no little materiality in considering the question of condonation. But it is also material, in my judgment, in considering the prior position, namely, whether the husband's conduct ever amounted to cruelty at all. It seems to me that the only fair inference to be drawn from the fact that the wife was prepared to continue living with the husband for another eight months is that she was not in fact unduly disturbed by her discovery that the husband was still continuing to practise his abnormal tendencies. If this be right, it makes it all the more difficult to draw the inference that the husband, by continuing his practices in secret, was pursuing a course of conduct which he might reasonably have foreseen was likely to cause injury to the wife.

[2] [1952] A.C. 525, 550.

The case is, no doubt, near the border-line; but, giving the matter the best consideration that I can, I find myself unable to say that the commissioner came to a wrong conclusion in deciding that in all the circumstances cruelty had not been proved. I think it is impossible to interfere with his decision, and accordingly, the appeal must, in my judgment, be dismissed.

HARMAN L.J. I agree with all that Willmer L.J. has said, and with the reasons which he has adduced in the course of his judgment. This case is near the border-line and it has not been made easier for us by the fact that it was undefended and that the examination of the complainant wife was conducted by counsel almost entirely through the medium of leading questions. Further than that, he occasionally volunteered a certain amount of evidence on his own behalf, no doubt on instructions. When one adds that the shorthand note is obviously not the work of a practised hand, and that the transcript of the judgment was obviously inaccurate in a number of respects and has not been revised by the judge, the difficulties of this court become apparent.

The case depended in the end on two incidents in 1955 and 1958. There was also an incident in 1945 when the wife found a suitcase full of women's clothes, but that the husband passed off so successfully that the wife thought that there was another woman behind it and, therefore, was far from guessing the truth at that stage. In 1955 she made a discovery which was a very great shock to her, but it is to be remembered that on this occasion the husband had no reason to suppose his wife would turn up at the flat. The couple had been living with her parents and he alone had returned to the matrimonial home. She followed him and found the door locked and, after waiting a certain amount of time, he came down the stairs in his dressing gown and let her in. When she got upstairs on this occasion she found a lot of women's clothing which he had attempted to hide under the wardrobe. In fact, it is quite clear that he was practising this aberration at a time when he supposed, and I think not unreasonably supposed, that she would not find out anything about it. Be that as it may, she made the discovery, and one must accept that it was a very great shock to her, and one cause, no doubt, of her subsequent breakdown.

The whole case, therefore, depends on whether the incident of 1958 shows that he was continuing a course of conduct which he knew would be likely to be detrimental to her health, and did so in reckless disregard of her welfare. It is contended that he must have contemplated the ordinary consequences of his acts, and must, therefore, have been in fact willing to hurt her, although the evidence shows that he did not intend to do so. The incident of 1958 occurred because the employers for whom she was then working at her request allowed her to go home early on a certain

C. A.
1960
Bohnel
v.
Bohnel.
Harman L.J.

Saturday afternoon. She was anxious to see what it was that he was doing, and she found him wearing one of her dresses. Again this is at a time when she was supposed to be out at work and he gave way to the temptation which this aberration put on him when he had reasonable cause to suppose that she would not be at home, and, therefore, would know nothing about it. On the whole, I cannot question the commissioner's decision that he was not acting in a way so reckless of her welfare as to be guilty of cruelty.

The second ground alleged was that it was a cruel thing on his part to decline to undergo a certain course of treatment. But I cannot accept that view. The evidence was that, if he had undergone such a course of treatment, it would have done no good to the marital relations between these parties. Her real complaint was that he was cold to her and the shock to her was finding out the reason why he was so. If by suppressing his sexual desires the psychiatrist had been able to cure him, or to suppress all the evidence of this aberration, that, so far from making him less cold to her, would on the evidence have made him more so—at any rate, it would not make him other than he already was in that respect. Therefore, things being as they were, it does not seem to me to be unreasonable on the whole for him to say that he did not propose to have this treatment but to battle with this aberration himself as best he might. If we were to hold this conduct to be cruelty, we would, in my judgment, be going beyond any case which has been drawn to our attention or is now known to the court. The cruel acts were not brought, so to speak, into the matrimonial home, except by the action of the wife, unexpected by the husband, which he had no reason to anticipate. It seems to me that there is all the difference in the world between a tendency of this sort being flaunted before others or emphasised to the wife, and a case like this where the husband struggled, unhappily in vain, to conceal it and was discovered because the wife had curiosity about it and so found out. I cannot help feeling that cruelty here is not established and I would dismiss the appeal.

Sellers L.J. I have felt considerable sympathy with the wife. There was much in the husband's conduct to humiliate and distress her. The evidence adduced at the trial seems to me to have been not wholly satisfactory. I do not feel at all convinced that the case which the wife wished to put forward was fully advanced, but, for the reasons given by my Lords, as the case stands, I do not feel that I can say that the commissioner decided the case wrongly, and I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

M. M. H.

Solicitors: Pennington & Son.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

* HOPKINS v. MANNERS.

C. A.

1960
April 7, 8.

Pearce and Harman L.JJ.

[Plaint No. P. 2317.]

Costs—County court action—Payment into court with fixed costs accepted—Subsequent application for "further costs"—Costs incurred before issue of summons—Discretion of court—Refusal to allow amendment of incomplete bill—County Court (Amendment) Rules, 1957 (S.I. 1957, No. 174 (*L.*1), amended by County Court (Amendment) Rules, 1959 (S.I. 1959, No. 1251 (*L.*7)), Ord. 11, r. 1 (3) (c).

Paragraph (c) of Order 11, r. 1 (3) of the County Court Rules, 1957, which was added by the County Court (Amendment) Rules, 1959, provides that where under the previous paragraphs to that rule a plaintiff has elected to accept a lesser amount than the sum claimed by him, together with the costs which would be entered on a summons for that amount, and the defendant has been duly notified of the acceptance and the action stayed, "the defendant shall not be "liable for any further costs unless the court otherwise orders."

A plaintiff issued a summons in a county court claiming £200 damages for personal injuries sustained in a road accident. Before issuing the summons she incurred costs in obtaining a medical report and a report from the police of criminal proceedings brought against the defendant. The defendant admitted liability and within eight days of the issue of the summons he paid £60 into court. Fixed costs and fees amounting to £8 2s. had been endorsed on the summons by the officers of the court. The plaintiff accepted the offer but a few days after notice of acceptance had been sent to the defendant her solicitors applied to the registrar for leave to have their costs taxed as between party and party, and to be allowed costs in excess of those stated on the summons. They produced a schedule of expenditure and disbursements totalling £21 but at the hearing of the application they sought to add to the bill the cost of obtaining the reports. The registrar said that these items could be added if the bill was brought in for taxing, but he refused to order the payment of further costs. The county court judge, stating that he had to consider whether this was a case where costs before action were unavoidable, affirmed the registrar's decision. On appeal it was submitted that the cost of obtaining the reports, allegedly necessary in order to make certain that the plaintiff had a good case before issuing the summons, ought to have been considered, and that the judge had exercised his discretion wrongly in refusing to order payment of further costs:—

Held, that the onus was on the plaintiff to satisfy the court that justice demanded that further costs should be allowed, and she had failed to do that. The court's discretion to allow extra costs was to be applied narrowly. The judge had approached the problem rightly and the court would not interfere with the exercise of his discretion.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL from Judge Conolly Gage sitting at Southend County Court.

On September 18, 1959, the defendant, William Henry Manners, whilst driving a Ford van, collided with the plaintiff, Eileen Mary Hopkins, riding a pedal cycle. On December 16,

C. A.
1960
Hopkins
v.
Manners.

1959, she issued a summons claiming £200 damages for personal injuries. Fixed costs and fees totalling £8 2s. were endorsed on the summons. On January 6, 1960, the plaintiff's solicitors received notice of payment in of £60 with the appropriate fixed costs and an admission of liability. Within four days the plaintiff gave proper notice of acceptance and took out the sum. The plaintiff's solicitors took the view that their disbursements and costs exceeded the fixed costs stated on the summons and they determined to apply under Order 11, r. 1 (3) (c), in order to obtain further costs. Application was made to the registrar asking for leave to have their costs taxed as between party and party, and a list of expenditure and disbursements entitled a "bill of costs" was produced to the registrar showing a total of £21. In the Court of Appeal counsel for the plaintiff submitted that this was not a bill of costs but merely a list of the items in respect of which they intended to make application, but Pearce L.J. commented that, in his view, it was a "bill of costs" to which the plaintiff claimed to be entitled.

At the hearing of the application the plaintiff's solicitors sought to add to the list the cost of obtaining a medical report and a report from the police of criminal proceedings which had been brought against the defendant. The cost of obtaining these reports had been incurred before the summons was issued and the solicitors said that it had been omitted inadvertently from the list. The registrar said that if a bill was brought in for taxation these items could be added but he dismissed the application for an order for further costs. The plaintiff appealed to the judge but he dismissed the appeal.

The plaintiff appealed.

The relevant rules are set out in the judgment of Pearce L.J.

James Miskin for the plaintiff.

Barry Chedlow and A. Gregory for the defendant.

In addition to the case referred to in the judgment of Pearce L.J., the following were cited in argument: Davis v. Dysart (Earl) [1]; Pêcheries Ostendaises (Soc. Anon.) v. Merchants Marine Insurance Co. [2]

Pearce L.J. This is a plaintiff's appeal from a refusal of the judge of the Southend County Court to allow certain costs to the plaintiff under Order 11, r. 1 (3) (c). The relevant parts of rule 1 read: "(1) Where the only relief claimed in an action is "the payment of money, the defendant may, within eight days "of the service of the summons on him inclusive of the day of "service, pay into court in satisfaction of the claim—(a) the "whole amount of the claim and the costs stated on the sum-"mons; or (b) so much of the claim as he admits to be due from

[1] (1855) 21 Beav. 124.

[2] [1928] 1 K.B. 750; 44 T.L.R. 270, C.A.

"him to the plaintiff, together with the costs (including court "fees) which would be entered on a summons for that amount "under Part I of Appendix D." Rule 2 deals with the case where the whole amount of the claim is paid in. Rule 3 reads: "Where "a lesser amount is paid into court, together with the appropriate "costs under paragraph (1) (b) of this rule, and the plaintiff "elects to accept that amount in satisfaction of his claim— "(a) he shall within four days after receipt by him of notice of "payment into court deliver or send by pre-paid post to the "registrar and to every defendant a notice of acceptance; (b) on "receipt by the registrar of the notice of acceptance the action "shall be stayed; and (c) the defendant shall not be liable for "any further costs unless the court otherwise orders." The words "unless the court otherwise orders" were added by a recent amendment made in consequence of Reid v. Bolton (Thomas) & Sons Ltd.[1] There this court, in holding that the rule applied to unliquidated as well as to liquidated claims, pointed out that the rule as then framed caused hardship in cases where a plaintiff had had to incur unusual costs before the plaint was actually issued, and was prevented by the rule from recovering them on accepting a payment in made by the defendant in accordance with the rule. The amendment gives the court a discretion to make an order allowing further costs. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:]

The county court judge considered Reid v. Bolton (Thomas) & Sons Ltd.[2] and certain words used in the judgment therein, and said: "It seems to me therefore that in order to decide whether "the registrar has exercised his discretion aright in this case I "must look to see whether it is a case where costs before action "could not be avoided, bearing in mind, of course, that the "solicitors will receive the sum of £4 from the defendant in "respect of such costs." He then considered the matter in more detail and dismissed the appeal.

It is plain that the wording of Order 11, r. 1 (3) (c), vests a discretion in the court. The plaintiff on this appeal seeks to show that the judge exercised that discretion wrongly and misdirected himself. He relies on two points. The first is this: the judge excluded from his consideration two items, namely, the cost of obtaining the medical report and the cost of obtaining the police report. With regard to those he said this: "Mr. "Lusty also tells me that he has incurred expense in respect of "a medical and police report. Neither of these items are in the "bill of costs which was before the registrar and is now before "me, and I do not see that I can accept as evidence something "said by an advocate in the course of his argument."

It is said that the judge erred and that he should have referred the matter back for investigation by the registrar, or should have

[1] [1958] 1 W.L.R. 266; [1958] 1 All E.R. 465, C.A.

[2] [1958] 1 W.L.R. 266.

C. A.
1960
Hopkins v. Manners.
Pearce L.J.

adjourned it for affidavit evidence from the solicitor as to those items. Mr. Miskin, for the plaintiff, argues that the application was being made to the judge under Order 13, r. 1 (c), which says: "No affidavit shall be necessary in the first instance, but the "judge or registrar may direct evidence to be adduced in such "manner as he thinks fit."

As to this first point, I see no good ground for interference by this court. Whether the application to the court was an interlocutory application under Order 13, r. 6, as the plaintiff contends, or was an appeal under Order 37, r. 5, from a final order made by the registrar, as the defendant contends, the onus was on the plaintiff to satisfy the judge that an order should be made. He failed to do so. The judge had a discretion, if he wished, to adjourn the matter for further evidence, and I have no doubt that he would have done so had he felt that justice required it. No doubt he viewed with a certain disfavour items which had been omitted from the bill and which the plaintiff afterwards sought to obtain. It may be that they did not get such favourable consideration as they would have had if they had been inserted in the bill in the first instance; but that is often the fate of omissions. I certainly do not accept the contention that the judge had a duty to send the case back for taxation. The rule does not, as it seems to me, envisage that procedure where cases have been settled by payment in. No doubt the judge has power to make such an order if it is appropriate, but even where further costs are allowed, I should surmise that that cumbrous method, with its necessary further expenses, would rarely commend itself to the judge.

The second point was this: it is said that the judge was plainly wrong in saying that the work dealt with under item 6 of the bill of costs was not necessary before the issue of the summons. That item reads as follows: "Part fee preparing "for trial including considering facts, evidence and law, prepara-"tion of notices of fact or argument, attending plaintiff taking "proof of evidence, attending magistrates' court taking notes of "evidence, correspondence with defendant's insurers, attending "their representative discussing case." Mr. Miskin argues that it is obvious on general grounds that the plaintiff's solicitor must have, and should have, incurred costs exceeding the amount endorsed on the summons: costs in investigating the case, in considering the law and in ascertaining that he had a good case before issuing the summons. But this argument would apply in every case, and an order for further costs would, if it is sound, be the normal order. The words of the rule, however, show a clear intention that an order for further costs should not be the normal order. In spite of Mr. Miskin's fair and forcible argument, he has not persuaded me that the court should interfere. In my view the judge was right in his approach to the problem and it was a matter for his discretion.

Unless there is some reason for ordering otherwise, the rule that the defendant shall not be liable for any further costs still holds good. The recent amendment now allows the court to order otherwise, but on the wording of the rule it is for the plaintiff to satisfy the court that it should do so. The object of the rule was to promote a speedy settlement of just claims; it was designed to encourage defendants to make reasonable payments into court with the knowledge that thereby the costs would ordinarily be limited to the sum endorsed on the summons and to prevent their being deterred from so doing from fear that thereby they might be incurring an unliquidated liability for costs. The county court rules as to costs are designed on austere rather than luxurious lines. Just as party and party costs exclude things which, though not strictly necessary, may well be prudent and desirable expenditure as between solicitor and client, so this rule in the general interests of litigants keeps the costs down to a level which may in general be ungenerous to the plaintiff's solicitor. Where, in the opinion of the court, the circumstances are such that ungenerosity becomes injustice, it has discretion to make an order. But there are two sides to the question. It is hard that a plaintiff who has incurred costs should not receive them in full; but it is also hard that a defendant who has paid a sum into court with a general expectation of limiting his liability to the amount of costs endorsed on the summons should find it increased after the acceptance of his payment in. It is for the judge to find the solution in each case and to order otherwise in cases where he is satisfied that justice needs it.

I would dismiss the appeal.

HARMAN L.J. I agree. This seems to me clearly a matter for the discretion of the judge. Extra costs must be the exception and not the rule, as the form of the rule shows, and it is for the judge to decide whether justice demands that something more than the normal reward should be given. It was said in this case that the judge erred in the exercise of his discretion because he excluded the two items amounting to £3 5s. 0d. to which my Lord has referred. Even if he should not have excluded them, but should have taken them in, he was still in a position to say, as I see it, that there was nothing sufficient to convince him that the conventional £8 2s. 0d. was not the proper measure of the plaintiff's reward, and, as he had materials on which he could exercise that discretion in that sense, I do not think it is for us to interfere, still less to encourage the view that something which adds to the costs of proceedings and the uncertainty of litigation should be made not the exception but the rule.

Appeal dismissed with costs.
Leave to appeal refused.

Solicitors: Drysdale, Lamb & Jackson; John Holt.

E. D.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.

1960
April 4, 5.

Lord Evershed M.R., Pearce and Harman L.JJ.

*HOLLOWAY AND ANOTHER v. DOVER CORPORATION.

Compulsory Purchase—Compensation—Expired lease—Notice to treat during term—No claim until lease expired—Validity—Whether any interest expropriated.

The claimants occupied premises, in which they carried on a bakery business, under a lease for 21 years expiring on October 11, 1954. In 1947 the local authority obtained a compulsory purchase order affecting the area in which the claimants' premises were situate, and by a special completion procedure incorporated in the order a notice to treat was deemed to have been served on all persons interested in property in the affected area. No further step was taken by the claimants or the local authority. In March, 1957, the claimants claimed compensation from the local authority who thereupon, in exercise of their statutory powers as acquiring authority, caused the freehold of the premises to be vested in themselves. In October, 1957, the local authority served on the claimants a notice to quit under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, expiring October 11, 1958. Early in 1958 the claimants served on the local authority a notice requiring the grant of a new lease under the Act of 1954. That claim was settled by payment to the claimants of an agreed sum expressed to be paid without prejudice to any claim they might have under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, for expropriation of their interest in the premises. In May, 1958, the claimants referred the question of the assessment of compensation arising out of the notice to treat to the Lands Tribunal:—

Held, that at the time when the reference was made to the Lands Tribunal no proprietary right of the claimants had been compulsorily acquired by the local authority and, therefore, there was no subject-matter for which compensation was payable; moreover, in 1957, when the claim was made, the only right which the claimants had was a right to continue in possession until they were served with a notice to quit; accordingly, the claim failed.

Reg. v. Kennedy [1893] 1 Q.B. 533, D.C. considered.

Appeal by case stated from the Lands Tribunal (Mr. J. P. C. Done) on a preliminary point of law.

On May 7, 1958, Carrie Elizabeth Holloway and Ernest George Harlow (hereinafter called the "claimants") gave notice of reference to the Lands Tribunal of the question of the compensation payable for the compulsory acquisition of the leasehold interest in premises known as Hopper's Bakery, 33, Woolcomber Street, and garage, Trevanion Street, Dover. In September, 1958, pursuant to an application by the Corporation of Dover, the acquiring authority, the president of the tribunal directed that the questions whether the reference was maintainable at law, and which of the heads of compensation claimed ought to be included, should be dealt with as a preliminary point of law. The following were the facts found by the tribunal relevant to this issue:

The property was acquired by the corporation pursuant to the Borough of Dover (Central Area No. 1) Compulsory Purchase Order, 1947, as confirmed by the Minister of Town and Country Planning on February 8, 1949, with modifications not affecting the said property. The purpose of the acquisition was to permit the comprehensive redevelopment of an area of extensive war damage. The compulsory purchase order incorporated expedited completion procedure, and notice to treat pursuant to the compulsory purchase order was deemed to have been served on the claimants on February 11, 1949. The corporation executed a vesting declaration on April 30, 1957, vesting the freehold of the said property in the corporation with effect from May 16, 1957.

The claimants' interest was leasehold and arose as follows: A lease of the entirety of the property was granted by the then freeholders, G. W. Chitty & Co. Ltd., to George Victor Hopper on November 3, 1933, for a term of 21 years from October 11, 1933, at an annual rent of £40 subject to the covenants and conditions therein set out. The said lease was assigned by the lessee to Carrie Elizabeth Holloway (the first claimant) on January 21, 1937. On June 9, 1947, a partnership agreement was made between the said Carrie Elizabeth Holloway of the one part and Ernest George Harlow (the second claimant) of the other part, whereby it was agreed that the business of Hopper's Bakery carried on at 33, Woolcomber Street should belong to both parties in equal shares, and that they should share the profits and loss in the same proportion. The term of the said lease expired on October 11, 1954. Thereafter, the claimants continued in occupation paying the same rent of £40 per annum to the said freeholders, G. W. Chitty & Co. Ltd., but no rent had been paid to the corporation since their acquisition of the freehold.

A notice pursuant to the provisions of section 25 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, was served by the corporation on the claimants on October 26, 1957, terminating the tenancy on October 11, 1958. It was stated in the notice, that the corporation would oppose the grant of a new tenancy on the grounds that the whole premises were to be demolished. The claimant served a counter-notice by letter through their solicitors dated December 21, 1957, to the effect that the claimants would not be willing to give up possession of the premises on the date mentioned in the said notice served by the corporation. On January 20, 1958, at the request of the claimants and in order to avoid the necessity of a formal application to the county court, the corporation agreed to pay compensation under section 37 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, in a sum equal to twice the rateable value of the property as defined in subsection (5) of the said section. The beforementioned counter-notice and request was expressed by the claimants' solicitors to be without prejudice to any claim their clients might have to compensation under the Town and Country Planning Acts. [At the time when the matter came before the Court of Appeal this compensation had not yet been paid.]

Since 1944 there were negotiations with the corporation with

C. A.
1960
Holloway
v.
Dover
Corporation.

regard to the future of the business and the provision of alternative accommodation. The claimants did not object to the making in 1947 of the said compulsory purchase order, and by a letter dated May 28, 1947, addressed to the town clerk by G. W. Chitty & Co. Ltd., the freeholders, the wish was expressed for a suitable site, preferably in the same locality where shop, dwelling-house, bakery and garage accommodation could be provided. Attempts were made, without success, by both the freeholders and the corporation to find alternative accommodation for Messrs. Hopper, and on August 27, 1956, the town clerk wrote to G. W. Chitty & Co. Ltd. asking whether they were still wishful to pursue the suggestion to buy or lease for the erection of new premises. In reply G. W. Chitty & Co. Ltd. stated that neither they nor Messrs. Hopper could contemplate the purchase or leasing of land for the erection of new premises, on the ground that the present-day cost of erecting a new bakery of the size required for Messrs. Hopper's trade and of equipping it with new ovens and the necessary plant would be far too high for it to be made an economic proposition.

On November 28, 1956, a meeting took place at the town clerk's office at which representatives of the freeholders, the claimants and the corporation were present. The subject for discussion was the provision of alternative premises, but the freeholders stated they were not prepared to finance a rebuilding, and that their only interest was to obtain compensation for the premises to be purchased from them. Mr. Harlow of Messrs. Hopper asked the corporation to find him an alternative site not too far removed from his present business, he referred, however, to the difficulty of finance. He asked if the corporation would erect new premises and lease them to him. He was informed that the rent chargeable for new premises would have to be commensurate with cost and that, inevitably, such rent would far exceed the rent of his existing premises. On March 21, 1957, claims were made on behalf of both the freeholders and the claimants [for £440 "profit rental" and £2,345 "goodwill and loss on forced sale"].

On June 4, 1957, the district valuer, accompanied by another surveyor qualified in the valuation of plant and machinery, inspected the premises but nothing was said as to whose claim was being considered.

In May, 1957, the corporation applied to the Minister of Transport and Civil Aviation for a certificate under section 57 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954. This certificate was refused and the Minister in his letter of refusal addressed to the corporation wrote: "As you will realise, the Minister is not concerned in his "consideration of this application with the question whether, and "if so what, compensation is payable by your council to the "tenant. He has simply to consider whether it is appropriate "for him to grant the certificate for the purposes of enabling your "council to obtain early possession of the property in question.

"In this case it appears to him that the council already have "full powers under the Town and Country Planning Acts to "obtain speedy possession of the premises occupied by Mrs. C. E. "Holloway and that for this purpose a certificate under section 57 "is unnecessary. He is moreover advised that it would not be "proper to invoke section 57 procedure for the purposes of "restricting the tenant's compensation to that prescribed by "section 59 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954. In all the "circumstances, therefore, the Minister has decided not to grant "the application.

"I am to add that the Minister wishes to acquire the properties "in question for incorporation in the trunk road and the district "valuer will be getting in touch with your council on the matter "in due course."

Following this letter, the corporation served the statutory notice to quit under section 25 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954.

[After referring to the submissions made at the hearing, the tribunal decided as follows:] "(1) The 'proceedings' in this case "arise out of the submission on March 21, 1957, of a claim for "compensation arising out of a notice to treat deemed to have "been served on February 11, 1949 (the material date). (2) At "that time (March 21, 1957) the acquiring authority had not "acquired the freehold interest which was vested in them on "May 16, 1957. The relationship of landlord and tenant did not "exist between the parties until the latter date and notice to quit "was not served upon the claimants until October 26, 1957. "(3) That the circumstances referred to in (1) above are distinct "from those in Reg. v. Kennedy[1] in so far as: (a) in this case "action was taken by the claimants under the notice to treat in "that a form of claim was submitted before the tenancy was "determined; and (b) in Reg. v. Kennedy[2] according to the "judgment of Cave J. 'proceedings were not taken under the "'notice to treat, they were taken in pursuance of the company's "'having acquired and taken possession in July, 1892, under "'section 85.' (4) That compensation is to be assessed as at the "material date in accordance with the provisions of section 2 of "the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, "1919, as modified by the Town and Country Planning Acts, 1947 "to 1954. (5) That rule 1 of section 2 of the 1919 Act refers "only to any addition to the compensation assessed under rule 2 "specifically on account of the fact that acquisition is compulsory. "It would not operate in this case to limit compensation to that "arising out of the relationship of landlord and tenant which did "not exist between the parties until after the material date, "provided that it could be shown that neither the parties nor "anyone else could have foreseen that legislation would be passed

[1] [1893] 1 Q.B. 533, D.C. [2] Ibid. 537.

C. A.
1960
HOLLOWAY v. DOVER CORPORATION.

"limiting the compensation payable by a public authority on the "termination of a tenancy.

"I find then that compensation is to be assessed as at the "assumed date of the notice to treat in accordance with the pro-"visions of section 2 of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of "Compensation) Act, 1919. . . ."

J. Ramsay Willis Q.C. and E. A. Vaughan-Neil for the corporation.

D. P. Kerrigan and Michael Rich for the claimants.

In addition to the cases referred to in the judgment of Lord Evershed M.R., the following were cited in argument: Grice v. Dudley Corporation[3]; Syers v. Metropolitan Board of Works[4]; Horn v. Sunderland Corporation[5]; Cranwell v. Mayor of London[6]; Oppenheimer v. Minister of Transport[7]; Tyson v. Mayor of London[8]; Bwllfa and Merthyr Dare Steam Collieries (1891) Ltd. v. Pontypridd Waterworks Co.[9]; Reg. v. Stone.[10]

LORD EVERSHED M.R. This is an appeal upon a preliminary question whether, in the circumstances, there can be any right to compensation at all on the part of the present claimants? The claimants are two persons, Mrs. Holloway and Mr. Harlow. It is not clear that Mr. Harlow ever had any direct proprietary interest, but he is a partner with Mrs. Holloway in the business of a bakery carried on on the premises in question, 33, Woolcomber Street and Trevanion Street, Dover. [His Lordship stated the facts and continued:]

It has been clearly conceded that a notice to treat is deemed to have been served on Hopper's bakery on February 11, 1949, at which date the lease still had five and a half years or more unexpired. Therefore, it clearly was an interest in land which was capable of being acquired compulsorily by an acquiring authority. In fact, however, no further step was taken by the claimants on the one side or the corporation on the other. I gather that the negotiations continued, but that is all. So you reach October 11, 1954, when the lease, according to its terms, expired. Apart from certain statutory rights, it would then, of course, have followed that the claimants ceased to have any interest whatever in the property. There would have been nothing which anybody could have acquired, compulsorily or otherwise. [His Lordship referred to the statutory protection given to lessees who carry on businesses by the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, to the claims made on the corporation under

[3] [1958] Ch. 329; [1957] 3 W.L.R. 314; [1957] 2 All E.R. 673.
[4] (1877) 36 L.T. 277, C.A.
[5] [1941] 2 K.B. 26; 57 T.L.R. 404; [1941] 1 All E.R. 480, C.A.
[6] (1870) L.R. 5 Exch. 284.
[7] [1942] 1 K.B. 242; 58 T.L.R. 86; [1941] 3 All E.R. 485, Divl.Ct.
[8] (1871) L.R. 7 C.P. 18.
[9] [1903] A.C. 426; 19 T.L.R. 673, H.L.
[10] (1866) L.R. 1 Q.B. 529.

that Act and for compensation for compulsory acquisition. After stating further facts, his Lordship continued:]

The preliminary question which arises at once, and for obvious reasons, is whether the claimants could make any claim for compensation under the Acquisition of Land Act, 1949? It was argued that they could not. The tribunal, however, held otherwise and thought that they could. [His Lordship referred to the conclusions set out above, and continued:] The tribunal was of opinion that one had to look back to February, 1949, at which date the claimants had an interest, namely, the unexpired residue of five and a half years of the terms of the lease of 1933.

I confess that I have come clearly to the conclusion that, in the circumstances of this case, no claim for compensation under the Acquisition of Land Act can be put forward by the claimants. The effect of a notice to treat is stated, among other places, in Cripps on Compensation (1938), 8th ed., at p. 59, and is in similar terms by Blackburn J. in Reg v. Stone.[1] I read from Cripps at p. 59: "A notice to treat is not in itself a contract, nor is it "necessarily a step putting in force compulsory powers, but is an "act of a neutral character which, according to circumstances, "may be followed either by an agreement or by the enforcement "of compulsory purchase. A notice to treat creates a relation "between owner and promoters, but does not constitute a con-"tract of sale until the price has been agreed or ascertained under "the provisions of the Lands Clauses Acts. The land remains "the property of the owner at law and in equity, but the pro-"moters or the owner have acquired the right to have the price "ascertained by the procedure indicated in the Lands Clauses Acts "or the Acquisition of Land Act, 1919, and the owner may compel "the settlement of the price," the settlement now being by the Lands Tribunal.

But the answer, I think, to the claimants lies in the simple proposition that, as things turned out, the corporation never acquired anything from them at all. No interest in the land of any kind was acquired by the corporation under their compulsory powers. The notice to treat, a notice which is sometimes described as creating a quasi-contract, no doubt affected the rights of the claimants under the subsisting lease, because, had the corporation proceeded to exert their compulsory powers, then the interest might have been compulsorily taken over. The claimants have said with force at this hearing that the leasehold interest was to that extent rendered precarious. Its value for commercial purposes was adversely affected. That is true. They could, no doubt, have invoked the provisions of the Act of 1919 and had a price fixed for payment as upon a compulsory acquisition, and in that way have had their interest assured for the purposes of compensation as it was back in 1949 and 1950. Had [1] (1866) L.R. 1 Q.B. 529, 533.

C. A.
1960
Holloway v. Dover Corporation.
Lord Evershed M.R.

they invoked the necessary provisions to that effect, the corporation would then have had to make up their mind whether they would go on and acquire the remainder of the lease (as they could have done), or whether they would tell the bakery that they would withdraw the notice so far as it affected the bakery. In the latter case they might well under section 5 of the Act of 1919 have had to pay compensation for the expenses and loss incurred by reason of the service of the notice to treat or the deemed service of the notice to treat. But nothing like that happened. The claimants continued in enjoyment of the premises. They continued to carry on throughout their bakery business not only until the lease expired but for some time thereafter. They made a claim under the Act of 1954 against their landlords (who in the meantime had become the corporation) and, indeed, we were informed that they did not even give up possession when the notice to quit expired in 1958.

The position in the end of all seems to me plain and incontrovertible, namely, that when the powers and jurisdiction of the Lands Tribunal were invoked it had become quite clear that no proprietary right of the claimants had been compulsorily acquired by the corporation, and, therefore, there was no subject-matter for which the corporation were liable to pay to the claimants any compensation. That seems to me the common sense of it, and nothing that Mr. Kerrigan in his careful argument has adduced has satisfied me that there is any answer to it. The same, in effect, is no less true at the date when the claim was put forward, because at that time (in 1957) the only right which the claimants had was a right to continue in possession until they were served with a notice to quit. That was a right which they enjoyed apart altogether from the Acquisition of Land Act, but which again had not been affected by anything that the corporation had done.

Reg. v. Kennedy[2] was much relied upon before the tribunal, and the tribunal has distinguished the present case from it. In that case the person whose property had been affected was a Col. North. The Bexley Heath Railway Co. under its statutory powers served a notice to treat upon Col. North in May, 1891. At that time Col. North's interest in the land was the unexpired residue, which was quite substantial, of a 30 years' lease. Under the lease, however, his landlords had at certain dates the right to terminate the lease on three months' notice. Nothing further after the notice to treat was immediately done by the railway company or by Col. North. The next event was that on June 30, 1892, Col. North's landlord, who happened to be the Crown, exercised their powers under the lease and gave three months' notice, so that the lease would expire on September 30, 1892. Shortly after that event, namely, on July 20, 1892, the railway company invoked their powers under section 85 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and took possession. So that they did, in fact,

[2] [1893] 1 Q.B. 533, D.C.

by virtue of their compulsory powers, expropriate Col. North's proprietary interest. But the point of the case was this. It was said for Col. North that he was entitled to be compensated by assessing his interest as it had stood at the date of the notice to treat, in May, 1891, when he still had a considerable number of years to run. On the other side, on behalf of the company, it was said: "No. At the relevant date the only interest Col. North "had was the rest of a three months' period which was left to him "under the notice to quit." Cave J. said[3]: "Nothing was done "under that notice to treat. The company might have taken "proceedings to settle the compensation; Col. North might have "compelled them to take proceedings; but neither party acted, "both apparently being content that matters should remain in "statu quo." I observe that all that is exactly parallel to the present case. The citation continues: "and it was not until after "the Crown had given the notice to quit that the railway com-"pany took proceedings under section 85." That means that it took steps under that section to evict Col. North and possess themselves of his property. "I endeavoured to elicit from the "learned counsel for Col. North what his claim was; but he "was very reticent upon the subject. The claim had either not "been made out, or was not ready for production, and the result "was that I could not ascertain what the claim precisely was. I "have therefore arrived at the conclusion, perhaps not unnatur-"ally under the circumstances, that Col. North has no claim "except for the loss of the right to occupy the particular piece of "land in question from July 20, 1892, when possession was taken, "down to the expiration of his interest, which would be less than "three months."

It was said that the case was distinguishable from the present case because there were independent proceedings which had superseded in all respects the notice to treat. There was no doubt that Col. North was entitled to some compensation because his interest was expropriated by the railway company; but the interest which he had at the date of his expropriation was very much less than the interest which he had at the date of the notice to treat. I do not think it follows from anything that is said in the judgment that the "section 85" steps taken by the railway company superseded entirely and for all purposes the original notice to treat. I do not find any intimation to that effect in the arguments, including the argument put forward by the railway company. Rather, as it seems to me, the "section 85" steps were taken consequentially upon the original notice to treat. I do not, therefore, think that that case is so distinguishable on the facts from the present case that we should hold, as the tribunal seem to have done, that the material date for the purposes of assessing compensation in the present case was the date of the notice to treat. Certainly I do not think there is anything which

[3] [1893] 1 Q.B. 533, 537.

C. A.
1960
Holloway v. Dover Corporation.
Lord Evershed M.R.

by implication can be extracted from Reg. v. Kennedy[4] which produces that result. As I have said, however, I prefer to base my conclusion on the simple fact that at what I think were the relevant dates (which I prefer to put as being either the date of the institution of the Lands Tribunal procedure, or, putting it at the best for the claimants, the date when they made their claim) no proprietary rights owned by them had been compulsorily acquired for which, therefore, the Acquisition of Land Act provided compensation.

The truth is, that in the event there never was any expropriation. No doubt, as I have indicated and as was said in Reg. v. Kennedy,[4] the claimants might have forced the hands of the corporation, had they chosen to do so, at a much earlier stage. Into that I need not go further because they did not do so. I conclude, therefore, that, in the circumstances of the present case, the claim for compensation by the claimants fails. Although we have not gone at all fully into the facts, I am at any rate comforted that this conclusion, I think, accords with plain common sense, and I also feel strongly that, on the material before me, even if there were some ground upon which the claimants could have compensation determined, in the circumstances the amount would be nothing or entirely negligible.

Pearce L.J. I agree, and I have nothing to add.

Harman L.J. I also agree, and I cannot usefully add anything to what my Lord has said.

Appeal allowed with party and party costs in the Court of Appeal, and on the High Court scale of the hearing before the Lands Tribunal.

Solicitors: Wilkinson, Howlett & Moorhouse for the Town Clerk, Dover Corporation; Long & Gardiner for Bradley, Chitty & Scorer, Dover.

E. D.

[4] [1893] 1 Q.B. 533, D.C.

[CHANCERY DIVISION.]

* WINE SHIPPERS (LONDON) LTD. v. BATH HOUSE SYNDICATE LTD.

1960
May 3, 4.

Buckley J.

[1960 W. 233.]

Landlord and Tenant—Business premises (security of tenure)—Discovery—Landlords' intention to demolish or reconstruct—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954 (2 & 3 Eliz. 2, c. 56), s. 30 (1) (f).

Practice — Discovery — Originating summons — Landlord and tenant — Application for a new lease — Affidavit evidence — Summons adjourned for trial on affidavit and oral evidence—Whether tenants entitled to discovery.

Landlords served a notice under section 30 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954,[1] determining a tenancy of business premises, stating in the notice that they would oppose any application for a new tenancy on the ground that they intended to demolish or reconstruct the whole of the premises and could not reasonably do so without obtaining possession. The tenants served a counter-notice under the Act stating that they were unwilling to give up possession, and applied to the court by originating summons for the grant of a new tenancy.

The tenants filed an affidavit stating that they did not admit that the landlords had the requisite intention to demolish or reconstruct the premises on the termination of their tenancy, and the master adjourned the originating summons into court to be tried on cross-examination of the deponents on their affidavits and on oral evidence in chief to be cross-examined to.

The tenants applied by summons for further directions asking for discovery of a large number of documents:—

Held, that the lanlords' project was for redevelopment as well as demolition, their intention to demolish depending on their ability to redevelop satisfactorily, and it was for them to prove a firm and settled intention to carry out the project; that the evidence so far filed was by no means all that would be required; and that, to enable all the evidence to be tested by cross-examination, the tenants ought to have discovery of documents bearing upon the question whether the landlords had a firm and settled intention to carry out the project.

In re Borthwick [1948] Ch. 645; 64 T.L.R. 471; [1948] 2 All E.R. 635, C.A. applied.

Cunliffe v. Goodman [1950] 2 K.B. 237; 66 T.L.R. 109; [1950] 1 All E.R. 720, C.A.; Betty's Cafés Ltd. v. Phillips [1959] A.C. 20; 1958] 2 W.L.R. 513; [1958] 1 All E.R. 607, H.L.; Reohorn v. Barry Corporation [1956] 1 W.L.R. 845; [1956] 2 All E.R. 742, C.A.; In re St. Martin's Theatre [1959] 1 W.L.R. 872; [1959] 3 All E.R. 293 considered.

[1] Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, s. 30: "(1) The grounds on which a landlord may oppose an application under subsection (1) of section 24 of this Act are such of the following grounds as may be stated in the landlord's notice under section 25 of this Act or, as the case may be, under subsection (6) of section 26 thereof, that is to say— . . . (f) that on the termination of the current tenancy the landlord intends to demolish or reconstruct the premises comprised in the holding or a substantial part of those premises or to carry out substantial work of construction on the holding or part thereof and that he could not reasonably do so without obtaining possession of the holding; . . ."

1960

Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v. Bath House Syndicate Ltd.

Procedure summons.

On September 28, 1959, landlords, Bath House Syndicate Ltd., gave notice under section 30 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, to tenants, Wine Shippers (London) Ltd., determining their tenancy of premises known as 83, Piccadilly, London, W.1, on March 31, 1960: the notice stated that the landlords would oppose an application to the court under Part II of the Act for a new tenancy on the ground open to them under section 30 (1) (f), that, on the termination of the current tenancy, they intended to demolish or reconstruct the whole of the premises, and that they could not reasonably do so without obtaining possession of the premises.

On November 24, 1959, the tenants served a counter-notice under the Act, stating that they were unwilling to give up possession of the premises on March 31, 1960, and on January 27, 1960, they applied by originating summons under the Act for the grant of a new tenancy. In their affidavit in support of the originating summons they set out proposals for the new lease.

The landlords filed an affidavit by one Maurice Wohl, stating that the landlord company was entitled to the reversion immediately expectant on the applicant tenants' lease, and was entitled also to the reversion of the adjoining premises, Nos. 82 and 84, Piccadilly; that the landlord company was formed with the intention and for the purpose of carrying out the redevelopment of the properties facing Piccadilly between Bolton Street and Clarges Street; that they had instructed architects to prepare plans and act on their behalf in obtaining all necessary permissions to enable the proposed redevelopment to be carried out, and that application had been made to the London County Council for town planning permission, and the permission obtained from the council was exhibited to the affidavit. That permission was for the erection of an office, showroom and residental building on the site of 82, 83 and 84, Piccadilly, subject to certain conditions: the first condition was: "The submission to, and approval by, the council "before any building work is commenced, of details of the "external facing materials to be used on the infilling panels "between the windows, and the type of rendering proposed for "the roof structure on the Bolton Street block," and the second condition was: "No works (including works of demolition) being "commenced (sic) unless and until the developers have acquired "and are to the satisfaction of the council in possession of the "necessary interests in 83 and 84, Piccadilly to ensure that they "are able to proceed with the entire development and that no "part of Bath House"—Bath House was the same as 82, Piccadilly—"shall be demolished until the aforementioned proper-"ties have been demolished." The reasons given for imposing these conditions include: "To ensure that the whole of the site, "particularly the frontage to Piccadilly between Clarges Street "and Bolton Street, shall be treated comprehensively and in such "a way as may justify the demolition of Bath House."

The deponent further stated that the architects had proceeded with preparing the necessary agreements for the demolition of No. 83, and there was exhibited a letter from the architects to the landlord company setting out the steps which were being taken to procure the carrying out of the demolition and eventual reconstruction of No. 83. Owing, however, to the interposition of the proceedings by originating summons the programme originally contemplated was already running a little behind time.

The tenants, in answer, put in evidence an affidavit in which they stated, among other things: "The applicant company does "not admit that the respondent company has the requisite inten-"tion to demolish or reconstruct the said premises on the "termination of the applicant company's current tenancy." The master adjourned the originating summons into court to be tried on cross-examination of the deponents on their affidavits and on oral evidence in chief and cross-examination.

On April 12, 1960, the tenants applied by summons that the following further directions be given in the proceedings by originating summons: 1. That the landlords within 14 days file an affidavit of the documents which were or had been in their possession or power relating to the following matters: (a) Planning permissions, building and by-law consents for the proposed demolition and/or the proposed reconstruction of the three properties, Nos. 82, 83 and 84, Piccadilly, and each of them in force or in respect of which application was being made or was required or was required by the appropriate authority to be made together with all correspondence in connection with any such application; (b) agreements or contracts for the proposed demolition and/or tenders, agreements or contracts for the proposed reconstruction of the three properties, and each of them together with all correspondence in connection with any proposed agreement or contract for any such purposes; (c) the financial position of the landlords to meet the expenditure involved in the proposed demolition and the proposed reconstruction, being balance-sheets and profit and loss accounts for the last two accounting years of the landlords for which accounts had been completed, together with any agreements entered into between the landlords and any other party for the provision of finance in connection with the proposed demolition or reconstruction; and (d) (i) the respective interests of the various occupiers of No. 84, Piccadilly and (ii) the steps taken by the landlords to determine each such interest together with all correspondence in connection therewith. 2. That there be inspection of documents by the tenants within 14 days of the filing of that affidavit. 3. That such further or other directions be given as the court might deem to be fit and proper in the circumstances. In support of the application the tenants filed a further affidavit drawing attention to a number of matters as to which they said they had no knowledge, and in relation to which they sought discovery.

1960

Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v. Bath House Syndicate Ltd.

T. J. Sophian for the applicant tenants.
Jeremiah Harman for the respondent landlords.

The following cases, referred to in argument, were not cited in the judgment: Donegal Tweed Co. Ltd. v. Stephenson[2]; In re Press Caps Ltd.[3]; Bolton's (House Furnishers) Ltd. v. Oppenheim.[4]

Buckley J. stated the facts, observed that the second condition attached to the planning permission was the important condition for the purposes of the case, and continued: It is, of course, unusual in proceedings commenced by originating summons for there to be any discovery of documents. That question was discussed by the Court of Appeal in In re Borthwick,[1] a case under the Inheritance (Family Provision) Act, 1938, in which the argument to some extent turned on the particular rules governing the procedure under that Act: Ord. 54F, r. 3 (2) (a) and rr. 9 and 14. Lord Greene M.R. said[2]: "Roxburgh J. took the "view that the ordinary practice and rules in the Chancery "Division referred to in rule 14"—that is to say, of Order 54F—"meant the ordinary practice and rules in that Division in relation "to procedure by originating summons. That is the form of "procedure which under Order 54F is required in these cases. "I see no reason at all for differing from that view of the learned "judge. In the procedure by originating summons where the "issues are not defined in the way in which they are defined in "pleadings, where there are in general affidavits in which the "relevant evidence appears, affidavits which can, if necessary, be "cross-examined to, there is really no room for the application "of the ordinary rather strict rules relating to discovery which "takes place in ordinary actions conducted with pleadings. The "view that Roxburgh J. took, and, I think, rightly took, was that "discovery in proceedings in the Chancery Division by originating "summons ought only to be ordered in very special cases where "the facts are such as to justify such an order being made." Of course, I loyally accept that statement.

I have to consider whether the present case is of such a special nature, because the facts are such as to justify an order for discovery being made. But I would point out that Lord Greene M.R., in dealing with the normal practice in the Chancery Division, was there referring to proceedings in which the issues, though not defined in pleadings, had been shown in general affidavits in which the relevant evidence appeared, affidavits which could, if necessary, be cross-examined to.

What happened in this case was that the evidence (which is

[2] (1929) 45 T.L.R. 503, D.C.
[3] [1949] Ch. 434; [1949] 1 All E.R. 1013, C.A.
[4] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 913; [1959] 3 All E.R. 90, C.A.

[1] [1948] Ch. 645; 64 T.L.R. 471; [1948] 2 All E.R. 635, C.A.
[2] [1948] Ch. 645, 649.

of a very short, simple and I might almost say elemenentary character) having been filed, the master thought it would be a convenient course to adjourn the originating summons into court to be tried on oral evidence, not merely on cross-examination of the deponents on their affidavits, but on evidence to be given orally in chief and, of course, cross-examined to in the ordinary way, in which evidence would be given in an action. The present case is not, therefore, in my view, the sort of case which Lord Greene M.R. had in mind when he made the observations in In re Borthwick [3]: which I have read.

The issue in relation to which I have to consider whether it is proper that there should be discovery or not is the issue whether or not the landlord company intends, on the termination of the current tenancy of the applicants, to demolish or reconstruct the premises comprised in the holding or a substantial part thereof.

It has been pointed out in a number of cases that the character of a party's intention, and the quality of that intention, must be considered in the light of the surrounding circumstances, so far as they affect his power to implement that intention. In Cunliffe v. Goodman [4] the question arose under section 18 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, which provided that no damage should be recovered for a breach of covenant to leave or put premises in repair at the end of a lease if it was shown that the premises would at or shortly after the end of the lease be pulled down or altered in such a way as to render valueless the repairs covered by the covenant. In that case the tenant was seeking to establish that his landlord in fact intended to demolish the premises. Asquith L.J. stated [5] that the word "intention" connoted a state of affairs in which the party said to hold that intention did more than merely contemplate carrying out the proposal; the word "intention" connoted a state of affairs in which that party decided, so far as in him lay, to bring about the proposed result, the proposed result being one which, in point of possibility, he had a reasonable prospect of being able to bring about by his own act of volition. He pointed out that if there were formidable conditions or obstacles to be complied with or overcome before the proposed result could be achieved, it might well be unmeaning to say that the party intended that result; and he also pointed out that it would be inappropriate to say that the party held the intention if at the material date he was in effect not deciding to proceed, but feeling his way and reserving his decision until he should be in possession of financial data sufficient to enable him to determine whether the project would be commercially worth while. Those observations of Asquith L.J. were mentioned with approval in the House of Lords in Betty's Cafés Ltd. v. Phillips.[6]

[3] [1948] Ch. 645, 649.

[4] [1950] 2 K.B. 237; 66 T.L.R. 109; [1950] 1 All E.R. 720, C.A.

[5] [1950] 2 K.B. 237, 253.

[6] [1958] 2 W.L.R. 513; [1958] 1 All E.R. 607.

1960

Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v. Bath House Syndicate Ltd.

Buckley J.

In Reohorn v. Barry Corporation,[7] a similar problem was considered by the Court of Appeal. That was a case under the section, subsection and paragraph with which I am concerned in the present case. The applicants there were tenants. The landlords gave notice determining their tenancy, and when the applicants applied for a new tenancy under the Act, the landlords opposed the application on the ground that they intended to develop the site, together with adjoining land, as part of a comprehensive scheme.

Denning L.J. said[8]: "Such being the facts, the question is "whether the intention required by the Act is satisfied. In the "recent case of Fisher v. Taylors Furnishing Stores Ltd.[9] I pointed "out that the intention must be '. . . a firm and settled intention, "'not likely to be changed . . . It must be remembered that, if the "'landlord, having got possession, honestly changes his mind and "'does not do any work of reconstruction, the tenant has no "'remedy.' In considering whether the court should be satisfied "of the landlord's intention, I think that it may readily be satisfied "when the premises are old and worn out or are ripe for develop-"ment, the proposed work is obviously desirable, plans and "arrangements are well in hand, and the landlord has the present "means and ability to carry out the work. Such was the position "in Fisher's case,[9] and in several other cases which have come "before this court. But the court will not be so readily satisfied "when the premises are comparatively new, or the desirability of "the project is open to doubt, when there are many difficulties "still to be surmounted, such as the preparation and approval of "plans or the obtaining of finance, or when the landlord has in the "past fluctuated in his mind as to what to do with the premises. "In those circumstances, even though he should assert at the "hearing that he has a firm and settled intention, the court is not "bound to accept it because of the likelihood that he may change "his mind once he gets possession. Such was the position in "Herbert v. Blakey (Bradford) Ltd.[10] (a case under section 30 (1) "(g)). In the present case, the premises are ripe for develop-"ment and and the proposed work is obviously desirable; but the "difficulty is to be satisfied that the corporation have the present "means and ability to carry out the work. 'Intention' connotes "an ability to carry it into effect. A man cannot properly be said "to 'intend' to do a work of reconstruction when he has not the "means to carry it out. He may hope to do so: he will not have "the intention to do so." Later in his judgment Denning L.J. referred to the observations of Asquith L.J. in Cunliffe v. Goodman,[12] to which I have referred.

Those are the matters which the court will have to consider

[7] [1956] 1 W.L.R. 845; [1956] 2 All E.R. 742, C.A.

[8] [1956] 1 W.L.R. 845, 849.

[9] [1956] 2 W.L.R. 985; [1956] 2 All E.R. 78.

[10] (Unreported.) January 11, 1956. Court of Appeal.

[12] [1950] 2 K.B. 237, 253.

and adjudicate on when the substantive application in this case comes on for hearing. The question which I have to determine today is whether, for the proper disposing of those questions, it is right for me to order the landlord company to make discovery of any documents in their possession which may relate to their ability to carry out their proposal, both from the point of view of having complied with any necessary conditions attaching to their planning consent, and matters of that nature, and with regard to their own ability, financial or otherwise, to make a profitable use of this property if and when they obtain possession of it.

I ought, I think, to make reference to one other authority, In re St. Martin's Theatre,[13] decided by Danckwerts J. That, again, was a case under the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1954, in which the landlords were resisting the grant of a new lease, on the grounds open to them under section 30 (1) (a), (c) and (g). They had at one time proposed to resist the application under paragraph (f), the paragraph relevant to the present case, but they had abandoned that ground of opposition. There was evidence that considerable dilapidations had accrued under the lease, the liability of the tenant in respect of which amounted to £16,000. Cross-applications for discovery were made, the tenant asking for discovery and inspection of the landlord's income tax returns and pass sheets over three years, on the ground that they were relevant to the question whether the landlord could carry on a theatrical business himself. The landlord, on the other hand, asked for discovery and inspection of the tenant's balance-sheets and profit and loss accounts during the period of the tenancy. Danckwerts J. thought it proper to order discovery by the tenant, because discovery of the tenant's financial position was relevant to the tenant's ability to fulfil his obligations under the covenants in the lease, but he thought it inappropriate to order discovery by the landlord because the landlord was proposing to occupy the property himself, it was his own property, and the judge did not think that his financial position was, prima facie, a relevant matter. I refer to that case because it is a case in which, in proceedings under this Act, discovery has been ordered.

It is not contended by Mr. Harman, who appears for the respondent company, that the court has not power to order discovery if there are special circumstances justifying such an order, but he does say that on an originating summons the right to discovery is a very restricted right, and that discovery will only be ordered if there are circumstances which, in the particular type of proceedings before the court, are special circumstances. I think I correctly state the effect of his submission when I say that he means that the nature of the proceedings themselves cannot be special circumstances, but there must be some circumstances peculiar to the particular case.

Where the issues between parties have been particularised and

[13] [1959] 1 W.L.R. 872.

1960

Wine Shippers (London) Ltd. v. Bath House Syndicate Ltd.

Buckley J.

defined in pleadings, but no evidence has been put on affidavit, as would be the normal course in proceedings in an action commenced by writ, there is, of course, an almost invariable right for a party to have discovery against his opponent of any documents in his opponent's possession or control which relate to matters in question in the proceedings. On the other hand, there are the kind of proceedings referred to by Lord Greene in In re Borthwick [14] which are brought by originating summons, in which the issues are not defined in the way in which they are defined in pleadings, but appear from evidence-in-chief given on affidavits, in which, in the normal case, all the evidence-in-chief is to be found.

The present case falls between the two. The issues have not been defined in pleadings, and although they may be capable of being inferred from the affidavits which have been filed, I do not think that it would be right to say that they have been defined by those affidavits. On the other hand, the evidence so far filed is not anything like the whole evidence which it will be necessary for the parties to adduce at the trial.

The onus of proving the appropriate intention under section 30 (1) (f) of the Act of 1957 will, of course, rest on Mr. Harman's clients. It will be for them to prove that they in fact have a settled intention to carry out their project. Their project is, in my view, a project not only for demolition but for redevelopment, and I think that their intention to demolish prima facie depends on their being able to redevelop satisfactorily from their own point of view. Consequently, one has not only to look at the demolition stage. I think, on the facts as at present known to the court, that the intention to demolish is one which is tied up with the possibility of the landlord company's developing the property advantageously when it obtains possession. Mr. Harman quite rightly says that it will be for him to prove circumstances supporting the view that the landlords have a firm and settled intention to carry out the project, and that he proposes to call evidence which will prove that. But the evidence before the court ought in my view, to be properly tested, and in order to enable it to be properly tested I think it is right that the applicants should have an opportunity of arming themselves to cross-examine.

When on proceedings by originating summons the affidavits contain all the evidence-in-chief, the other side, of course, knows what the material is in respect of which they have got to cross-examine, and even in such a case, if they think that they need discovery and can make out a special case for it, I think that, on the authorities, the court would order discovery before the trial; but in the present case the evidence-in-chief is not in on affidavit evidence, the applicants do not know what it will be, and in order to put themselves in a position properly to cross-examine it seems to me that they ought to have discovery, as they would in an action between parties commenced by writ.

[14] [1948] Ch. 645.

It therefore seems to me right that I should order discovery of such documents as may be proper for the landlord company to discover bearing on the question of whether or not they have a firm and settled intention within the meaning of the authorities to carry out their project with regard to these premises in Piccadilly. I propose, therefore, to order discovery, but I shall want the assistance of counsel to consider what the extent of that discovery should be, because at the present time I am rather impressed with the suggestion made by Mr. Harman that the present application is too wide in its scope, and I think that it is reasonable and right that the discovery should be restricted within suitable limits.

May 5. An agreed form of order in the terms of the summons was approved by the court.

Order accordingly.

Solicitors: Evans, Baker & Co.; Samuel Sebba.

K. R. A. H.

[HOUSE OF LORDS.]

H. L. (E.)†
1960
May 16.

* OSTIME (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) . . PETITIONER;
AND
DUPLE MOTOR BODIES LTD. . . . RESPONDENTS

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS . PETITIONERS;
AND
DUPLE MOTOR BODIES LTD. . . . RESPONDENTS.

PETITIONS for leave to appeal to the House of Lords from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Duple Motor Bodies Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Commissioners.[1]

The Appeal Committee granted the petitions.

---

† Present: LORD COHEN, LORD KEITH OF AVONHOLM and LORD DENNING.

[1] [1960] 1 W.L.R. 510; [1960] 2 All E.R. 110, C.A.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.]

1960
May 16.

Lord Parker C.J., Donovan and Davies JJ.

* VAUGHAN v. BIGGS.

Public Health—Litter—Leaving—Whether depositing and leaving litter continuing offence—Litter Act, 1958 (6 & 7 Eliz. 2, c. 34), s. 1 (1). Limitation of Action—Crime—Continuing offence—Litter depositing—Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952 (15 & 16 Geo. 6 & 1 Eliz. 2, c. 55), s. 104.

Litter Act, 1958, s. 1 (1) provides: "If any person throws down, "drops or otherwise deposits in . . . any place in the open air to "which the public are entitled . . . to have access without payment, "and leaves, any thing whatsoever in such circumstances as to "cause . . . the defacement by litter of any place in the open air, "then, unless that depositing and leaving was authorised . . . he "shall be guilty of an offence."

An offence under section 1 of the Litter Act, 1958, is not a continuing offence but one fixed in point of time.

The defendant was charged with depositing and leaving a derelict motor-car on a public open space on or before April 2, 1959, contrary to section 1 of the Litter Act, 1958. The magistrates found that a derelict motor-car constituting litter was deposited on a public open space by the defendant without lawful authority. The date on which the car was deposited was not proved. It was contended by the defendant that the information was not proved to have been laid within six months of the alleged offence as required by section 104 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952. It was contended by the prosecutor that the offence charged was a continuing offence, and that the information was laid within the requisite period. The magistrates found the offence proved. The defendant appealed:—

Held, that there were two ingredients to the offence under section 1, namely, the depositing and the leaving, and the offence was not committed unless both depositing and leaving occurred; depositing was an act fixed in point of time and not a continuing one; accordingly, it was not proved that the offence was committed within six months, and since, therefore, it was not proved that the magistrates had jurisdiction, the conviction had to be quashed.

Case stated by Pembroke magistrates sitting at Fishguard.

On July 3, 1959, an information was preferred by the prosecutor, Henry Seymour Biggs, against the defendant, David Richard Vaughan, alleging that he did deposit and leave a derelict motor-car on a public open space known as Blaen-y-delyn Quarry, Fishguard, Pembroke, on or before April 2, 1959, contrary to section 1 of the Litter Act, 1958.[1]

[1] Litter Act, 1958, s. 1 (1): "If "any person throws down, drops or "otherwise deposits in, into or from "any place in the open air to which "the public are entitled or permitted "to have access without payment, and "leaves, any thing whatsoever in such "circumstances as to cause . . . the "defacement by litter of any place in "the open air, then, unless that "depositing and leaving was autho-"rised by law or was done with "the consent of the owner, occu-"pier or other person or authority "having the control of the place in or "into which that thing was deposited, "he shall be guilty of an offence."

The magistrates found the following facts: On April 2, 1959, there was a derelict motor-car on the quarry. The quarry was a public open space, and the motor-car was deposited thereon by the defendant without lawful authority. The date on which the car was deposited was not proved. The car constituted litter.

It was contended by the defendant that the information was not proved to have been laid within six months of the date of the alleged offence as required by section 104 of the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952.

It was contended on behalf of the prosecutor that the offence charged was a continuing offence, and that the information was laid within the requisite period.

The magistrates were of opinion that the case was proved on the ground that the information was laid within the requisite period, and, accordingly, they fined the defendant £5.

The defendant appealed.

Donald Farquharson for the defendant.

The prosecutor did not appear and was not represented.

No cases were cited in argument.

LORD PARKER C.J. This is an appeal by way of case stated by magistrates for the County of Pembroke, sitting at Fishguard, before whom an information was preferred by the prosecutor against the defendant, "that he did deposit and leave a derelict motor-car "on a public open space" at a quarry in Fishguard "on or before "April 2, 1959, contrary to section 1 of the Litter Act, 1958."

The magistrates heard the evidence. They were satisfied that the quarry was an open space, that the car constituted litter, that it had been deposited there by the defendant and that the defendant had no authority so to deposit it. It was then submitted by the defendant that the information was not shown to have been laid within six months of the date of the offence as required by the Magistrates' Courts Act, 1952, s. 104. That section provides, so far as it is material, "Except as otherwise expressly provided "by any enactment, a magistrates' court shall not try an informa-"tion or hear a complaint unless the information was laid, or the "complaint made, within six months from the time when the "offence was committed." Here, all that was proved was that the defendant had left the motor-car in the quarry on or before April 2, 1959; in other words, he might have so left it more than six months before the information, which was laid on July 3, 1959. It was contended by the prosecutor that notwithstanding that, the magistrates were entitled to convict in that what was charged was a continuing offence. That argument appealed to the magistrates; they found the information proved and fined the defendant £5.

Whether the offence in question is a continuing offence or not depends on the words of section 1 (1) of the Litter Act, 1958, itself. [His Lordship read the material words of section 1 (1) and continued:] Observe that there are two ingredients there, the throwing down, dropping or otherwise depositing and the leaving. It is quite clear that not only the depositing but the leaving is necessary, because it was not intended that an offence should be committed if somebody deposited litter and immediately cleared it up. Accordingly, although the act constituting the offence consists of throwing down, dropping or otherwise depositing, it is only an offence if it is not removed. Accordingly, it seems to me here that it is really unarguable, but that the offence is not committed unless both of these things occur, the depositing and leaving. Depositing is an act fixed in point of time and not a continuing matter, and accordingly, I am quite satisfied that this cannot be treated as a continuing offence, and it was not shown that the magistrates had any jurisdiction to deal with it. Accordingly, I would allow this appeal.

1960

VAUGHAN v. BIGGS.

Lord Parker C.J.

DONOVAN J. I agree.

DAVIES J. I agree.

Appeal allowed.

Solicitors: Denton, Hall & Burgin for Walter L. Williams & Sons, Fishguard.

C. J. E.

[COURT OF APPEAL.]

C. A.

1960
May 9, 10.

Sellers, Willmer and Harman L.JJ.

* WILLAN v. WILLAN.

[W. 1958 (D) No. 369.]

Husband and Wife—Condonation—Cruelty—Cruel conduct by wife to induce sexual intercourse—Act of intercourse by husband.

A husband petitioned for divorce on the ground of his wife's cruelty. He complained in particular of her conduct—pulling his hair and ears and troubling him far into the night to deprive him of rest—in order to induce him to have unwilling intercourse with her. After a final night of such conduct culminating in an act of intercourse he had left the matrimonial home.

The commissioner found the charge of cruelty established, but held that it had been condoned by the husband's voluntary act of intercourse on the last night. On appeal by the husband:—

Held, dismissing the appeal, that though the wife's conduct inducing the act of intercourse might amount to cruelty, the actual act, being of its nature a voluntary act performed without duress by the husband, was distinct from and not a part of such cruelty, and, accordingly, fell within the general rule that an act of intercourse by a husband constituted condonation of a wife's previous matrimonial misconduct. If a man, through whatever blandishment or irritation, decides to have sexual intercourse, his act must be a voluntary act, and, in the absence of fraud by the wife, constitutes condonation.

Henderson v. Henderson [1944] A.C. 49, 52–53; 60 T.L.R. 113; [1944] 1 All E.R. 44, H.L. applied.

APPEAL from Mr. Commissioner Constantine Gallop Q.C., sitting as special commissioner in divorce, Sussex Assizes.

The facts as stated in the judgment of Willmer L.J. were as follows: A husband petitioned for the dissolution of his marriage on the grounds of his wife's alleged cruelty. The parties had been married in June, 1935, and there were two children of the marriage, one born shortly after the marriage and the other after the war in 1946. The husband was away on military service during the war, but cohabitation was resumed on his demobilisation, and he continued to live with his wife until the morning of September 29, 1958, when he left the matrimonial home and did not return to it.

The cruelty alleged in the petition and at the hearing was, inter alia, that throughout the marriage, and more particularly in the latter part of it, the wife frequently and persistently assaulted him and showed violence to him; that she was immensely jealous of his relations with other women; and that she habitually used offensive and obscene language, calling him by horrible names and so forth. It was also alleged that she frequently demanded sexual intercourse with him at times when he did not wish to have it, obliging him to conform to her wishes by indulging in various types of violence in order to bend his will to hers. In particular, it was said that she would pull his hair, catch hold of him by the ears, and shake his head violently to and fro; and, at any rate on one occasion, it was said that she kicked him on his injured leg, causing him great pain. She would also pester him far into the night to have sexual intercourse, so that eventually he was compelled to comply as the only means of getting his rest.

For some time before the final separation the parties were on bad terms, although sexual intercourse was continuing in the circumstances described. The husband at least was for some time in the hands of solicitors, and on or about August 13, 1958, the solicitors wrote on his behalf to his wife, complaining of her cruel conduct and informing her that the husband would be obliged to leave her. Even after that life went on very much as before, the husband continuing to reside in the matrimonial home with his wife, and continuing to share the same bed with her. He said in evidence at the hearing of his petition that two or three weeks before the final separation he voluntarily and willingly had intercourse with his wife. A distinction was drawn in the evidence between that occasion and certain others when he had intercourse with his wife, not because he wanted to, but for the sake of peace, in the circumstances described.

On the night of September 28/29—the night before the

C. A.
1960
WILLAN
v.
WILLAN.

husband left for the last time—an act of sexual intercourse took place between the parties. The husband said that that act, like many other acts previously, was induced by the wife pestering him far into the night, showing some degree of violence to him, pulling his hair and so forth and, finally, rolling on top of him, so that eventually, towards the small hours of the morning, and for the sake of peace, he did have intercourse with her. Thereafter, the parties appeared to have gone straight to sleep, and the next thing that happened was the alarm clock going off at a quarter to six in the morning. The husband promptly got up, dressed and left the house at six o'clock in order to go to work. He kissed his wife and said good-bye, all in accordance with his usual procedure, the wife saying good-bye to him.

The husband did not return to the matrimonial home but presented his petition for the dissolution of the marriage.

The commissioner, on October 14, 1959, found in his judgment that cruelty by the wife had been established, and in particular found the cruelty in relation to pulling his hair, gripping his ears and rocking his head to and fro, kicking his leg and so on; but he held that by the act of sexual intercourse on the final night the husband had condoned that cruelty since the act of intercourse on that occasion was a voluntary act; and he dismissed the petition.

The husband appealed. There was no cross-notice filed on behalf of the wife. During the hearing leave was sought to amend the notice of appeal by setting out as grounds of appeal: "(1) that "the commissioner had misdirected himself in law in that the last "act of intercourse between the parties on the night of Septem- "ber 28, 1958, could not have constituted condonation by reason "of the fact that it constituted an important element of the "cruelty complained of, and/or by reason of the fact that it took "place when the petitioner was under duress and/or was not a "free agent," and "(2) that on the facts found by the commis- "sioner he ought to have found that even if the cruelty "complained of had been condoned it was revived by the subse- "quent conduct of the respondent." The Court of Appeal allowed the amendment under (1) but refused leave to amend ground of appeal (2).

Lord Dunboyne for the husband.
William Kee for the wife.

The following cases were referred to in the course of argument, in addition to those cited in the judgments of the court: Roberts v. Roberts [1]; Hare v. Hare and Davidson [2]; Tilley v. Tilley.[3]

WILLMER L.J., giving the first judgment, said that as there was no cross-notice on behalf of the wife it must be taken that there was now no dispute as to the fact of the wife having been cruel to the husband. The gravamen of the husband's charge of cruelty was that in relation to the wife's demand for sexual intercourse and her conduct in that connection. His Lordship stated the facts and the evidence on that matter and continued: I have referred to the details of it because, and only because, the alleged act of condonation is very largely bound up with the kind of conduct which is complained of by the husband as cruelty on the part of his wife.

[1] (1917) 33 T.L.R. 333.
[2] (1920) 36 T.L.R. 331.
[3] [1949] P. 240; 65 T.L.R. 211; [1948] 2 All E.R. 1113, C.A.

[His Lordship continued his statement of the facts, saying that it was not without significance that even after the solicitor's letter of August 13, 1958, the husband was still found to be willingly and voluntarily having intercourse with his wife. He concluded his statement of the facts relating to the night of September 28/29 and the circumstances in which the husband left the matrimonial home, and continued:] I mention those facts as to what took place after the last act of intercourse because it was at one time suggested that, if that act of intercourse did amount to condonation, conduct subsequent thereto on the part of the wife was sufficient to bring about a revival. Clearly, however, on the evidence there never could have been any merit in that suggestion. The only question is whether or not the husband, by having intercourse with his wife in the circumstances which I have described on the night of September 28/29, must be held to have condoned the prior cruelty found against the wife.

When the case came on ultimately in this court, it was pointed out that the notice of appeal was defective in that it did not, as required by R.S.C., Ord. 58, r. 3, state what the grounds of appeal were. Counsel accordingly asked for leave to amend the notice of appeal, and an amended notice was put before us which alleges two grounds. The second ground referred to that which I have already dealt with, namely, the question of revival, and alleged that if there was condonation, the cruelty was revived by the wife's subsequent conduct. As it did not appear that that had ever been pleaded or argued below we did not give leave to amend; we did, however, give leave to amend as to the first ground, which was in the following terms: "That the commissioner misdirected himself in law in that the last act of intercourse which occurred between the parties on the night of September 28, 1958, could not have constituted condonation by reason of the fact that it constituted an important element of the cruelty complained of, and/or by reason of the fact that it took place when the petitioner was under duress and/or was not a free agent."

It must be observed that, so stated, that ground of appeal runs two or three arguments together, and I will do my best to keep them separate. In the first place, it is said that this act of intercourse on the part of the husband could not be held to amount to condonation, because it was one and the same with

C. A.
1960 Willan
v.
Willan.
Willmer L.J.

an act which was of itself relied on as part of the cruelty alleged. It was contended that an act which the husband relied on as an act of cruelty cannot be said at one and the same time to be an act of condonation. I do not think, so far as we have looked at the evidence, that that point was ever made in the evidence given before the commissioner. Certainly there is no finding by the commissioner that the last act of intercourse relied on as condonation was one with the cruelty alleged by the husband against the wife. Furthermore, as it seems to me, and as I indicated during the argument, the contention is really the result of muddled thinking, because it confuses the actual act of sexual intercourse, which constitutes the evidence of condonation, with the prior conduct complained of on the part of the wife, whereby she induced the act of intercourse. I can well understand that pestering in such circumstances on the part of the wife, in such a way as to deny the husband sleep, more particularly if accompanied by the pulling of his hair, might very well be capable of amounting to cruelty. But, whether that be so or not, I find it impossible to say that the subsequent action of the wife in submitting herself to an act of sexual intercourse could in any circumstances amount to an act of cruelty against the husband. Therefore, I do not think it is possible to accept the argument that that which was relied on as condonation was itself one and the same with conduct alleged to amount to cruelty.

Then it was said that this act of intercourse was induced by duress on the part of the wife, and that the husband was not to be regarded as a free agent. It is well established that, whatever may be the position of a wife, in the case of a husband the fact of having intercourse with the wife, with full knowledge of the matrimonial offence of which complaint is made, is conclusive evidence of condonation by the husband of the wife. It is conclusive evidence because it is the best possible way of showing that the wife has been reinstated as a wife. Only one exception to that rule was accepted by the House of Lords in Henderson v. Henderson,[1] and that is where the act of intercourse is induced by fraud on the part of the wife. Subject to that, however, as I read the speech of Lord Simon, he was accepting the view expressed by McCardie J. in Cramp v. Cramp and Freeman,[2] where the judge reviewed the authorities very fully, that intercourse by a husband with his wife after knowledge of the matters complained of is conclusive evidence of condonation.

It is sought to say, however, that some other exception to the rule ought to be accepted, which would cover facts such as have arisen in the present case. The difficulty, as I see it, in the way of the husband is that the facts found by the commissioner will not support the argument which has been put before us. The commissioner towards the end of his judgment said: "But, having "seen the two parties concerned in this case, and the husband "not saying that he acted under fear or apprehension for his "safety and had no alternative, I cannot help thinking that the "reason why he had intercourse with her on that particular "occasion was that he was so tired and exhausted and knew that "his prospect of rest and sleep was very small, if it existed at all, "until he had done that which his wife required of him." Later the commissioner expressed this view: "Leaving aside questions "of hysteria or hypnotism, or other such matters, if a man, "through whatever blandishment or irritation, decides to have "sexual intercourse, that must be a voluntary act, and I must "hold that the act of intercourse in this case was a voluntary "act." I agree with the commissioner, and I doubt whether the matter can be better stated than in the commissioner's own words.

[1] [1944] A.C. 49, 32–33; 60 T.L.R. 113; [1944] 1 All E.R. 44, H.L.

[2] [1920] P. 158, 170; 36 T.L.R. 333.

All that has been proved in this case is that the wife used means, to which exception may well be taken, for the purpose of persuading her husband to have intercourse with her. He was free to submit or to resist. He was free, I suppose, to have run away; but in the end he decided that the best course to take was to submit to her wishes. I daresay he did show unwillingness, but to say that he showed unwillingness is not to say that he acted involuntarily. It might be otherwise in the case of a wife; but in the case of a husband who has sexual intercourse it can only be said of him that what he does he does on purpose, and that sexual intercourse with his wife must be a voluntary act on his part.

In those circumstances, it seems to me that, for the reasons given by the commissioner, we cannot do other than agree with his conclusion. However much the husband disliked what he was doing, he did in fact voluntarily have intercourse with his wife on this occasion of the last night, and by doing so he must be conclusively held to have condoned the cruelty of which complaint is made. In the absence of any evidence of revival afterwards, a matter to which I have already referred, that is an end of the case.

It follows, therefore, that in my judgment this appeal, which was always a difficult appeal, fails and must be dismissed.

HARMAN L.J. I agree. It seems to me to dispose of this appeal that the arguments put before us here today were not really agitated before the commissioner at all. In the court below the point taken as to the events of the night before the husband left was that he was under duress, but that plea, which was debated to some extent before us, was, in my view, perfectly hopeless. Duress means a degree of fear which operates on the mind to such an extent that a person who is under it is not a free agent. This husband never was in anything like that condition. No doubt he was badgered into having intercourse with his wife; no doubt he submitted to it in the end as the easiest issue out of all his afflictions, for all of which one cannot have anything but

C. A.
1960
WILLAN v. WILLAN.
Harman L.J.

sympathy. But the rule that an act of intercourse on the part of the husband will operate as a reinstatement of the wife, and therefore will be a condonation of her previous misconduct, is so well established that we could not possibly go behind it.

There being no fraud alleged here, and there being no duress proved, the statement of Lord Simon in Henderson v. Henderson[3] seems to me to be conclusive. After saying that it might possibly not be a bar to a wife's suit, he proceeded[3]: "But "I know of nothing in the earlier decisions, either in the "ecclesiastical courts or in the Divorce Court of this country, which "supports the view that a husband who has intercourse which is "not induced by the fraud of the wife, . . . should not thereby be "regarded as condoning his wife's misconduct."

In my view, this appeal was doomed to failure from the first and must be dismissed.

